À entendre cette école: «Les émeutes qui compliquèrent le fait de 1830 ôtèrent à ce grand événement une partie de sa pureté. La révolution de Juillet avait été un beau coup de vent populaire, brusquement suivi du ciel bleu. Elles firent reparaître le ciel nébuleux. Elles firent dégénérer en querelle cette révolution d’abord si remarquable par l’unanimité. Dans la révolution de Juillet, comme dans tout progrès par saccades, il y avait eu des fractures secrètes; l’émeute les rendit sensibles. On put dire: Ah! ceci est cassé. Après la révolution de Juillet, on ne sentait que la délivrance; après les émeutes, on sentit la catastrophe.

Ainsi parle cet à peu près de sagesse dont la bourgeoisie, cet à peu près de peuple, se contente si volontiers.

Quant à nous, nous rejetons ce mot trop large et par conséquent trop commode: les émeutes. Entre un mouvement populaire et un mouvement populaire, nous distinguons. Nous ne nous demandons pas si une émeute coûte autant qu'une bataille. D'abord pourquoi une bataille? Ici la question de la guerre surgit. La guerre est-elle moins fléau que l'émeute n'est calamité? Et puis, toutes les émeutes sont-elles calamités? Et quand le 14 juillet coûterait cent vingt millions? L'établissement de Philippe V en Espagne a coûté à la France deux milliards. Même à prix égal, nous préférerions le 14 juillet. D'ailleurs nous repoussons ces chiffres, qui semblent des raisons et qui ne sont que des mots. Une émeute étant donnée, nous l'examinons en elle-même. Dans tout ce que dit l'objection doctrinaire exposée plus haut, il n'est question que de l'effet, nous cherchons la cause.

Nous précisons.

Chapitre II

Le fond de la question

Il y a l’émeute, et il y a l’insurrection; ce sont deux colères; l’une a tort, l’autre a droit. Dans les états démocratiques, les seuls fondés en justice, il arrive quelquefois que la fraction usurpe; alors le tout se lève, et la nécessaire revendication de son droit peut aller jusqu’à la prise d’armes. Dans toutes les questions qui ressortissent à la souveraineté collective, la guerre du tout contre la fraction est insurrection, l’attaque de la fraction contre le tout est émeute; selon que les Tuileries contiennent le roi ou contiennent la Convention, elles sont justement ou injustement attaquées. Le même canon braqué contre la foule a tort le 10 août et raison le 14 vendémiaire. Apparence semblable, fond différent; les Suisses défendent le faux, Bonaparte défend le vrai. Ce que le suffrage universel a fait dans sa liberté et dans sa souveraineté, ne peut être défait par la rue. De même dans les choses de pure civilisation; l’instinct des masses, hier clairvoyant, peut demain être trouble. La même furie est légitime contre Terray et absurde contre Turgot. Les bris de machines, les pillages d’entrepôts, les ruptures de rails, les démolitions de docks, les fausses routes des multitudes, les dénis de justice du peuple au progrès, Ramus assassiné par les écoliers, Rousseau chassé de Suisse à coups de pierre, c’est l’émeute. Israël contre Moïse, Athènes contre Phocion, Rome contre Scipion, c’est l’émeute; Paris contre la Bastille, c’est l’insurrection. Les soldats contre Alexandre, les matelots contre Christophe Colomb, c’est la même révolte; révolte impie; pourquoi? C’est qu’Alexandre fait pour l’Asie avec l’épée ce que Christophe Colomb fait pour l’Amérique avec la boussole; Alexandre, comme Colomb, trouve un monde. Ces dons d’un monde à la civilisation sont de tels accroissements de lumière que toute résistance, là, est coupable. Quelquefois le peuple se fausse fidélité à lui-même. La foule est traître au peuple. Est-il, par exemple, rien de plus étrange que cette longue et sanglante protestation des faux saulniers, légitime révolte chronique, qui, au moment décisif, au jour du salut, à l’heure de la victoire populaire, épouse le trône, tourne chouannerie, et d’insurrection contre se fait émeute pour! Sombres chefs-d’œuvre de l’ignorance! Le faux saulnier échappe aux potences royales, et, un reste de corde au cou, arbore la cocarde blanche.

Mort aux gabelles accouche de Vive le roi. Tueurs de la Saint-Barthélemy, égorgeurs de Septembre, massacreurs d’Avignon, assassins de Coligny, assassins de madame de Lamballe, assassins de Brune, miquelets, verdets, cadenettes, compagnons de Jéhu, chevaliers du brassard, voilà l’émeute. La Vendée est une grande émeute catholique. Le bruit du droit en mouvement se reconnaît, il ne sort pas toujours du tremblement des masses bouleversées; il y a des rages folles, il y a des cloches fêlées; tous les tocsins ne sonnent pas le son du bronze. Le branle des passions et des ignorances est autre que la secousse du progrès. Levez-vous, soit, mais pour grandir. Montrez-moi de quel côté vous allez. Il n’y a d’insurrection qu’en avant. Toute autre levée est mauvaise. Tout pas violent en arrière est émeute; reculer est une voie de fait contre le genre humain. L’insurrection est l’accès de fureur de la vérité; les pavés que l’insurrection remue jettent l’étincelle du droit. Ces pavés ne laissent à l’émeute que leur boue. Danton contre Louis XVI, c’est l’insurrection; Hébert contre Danton, c’est l’émeute.

De là vient que, si l’insurrection, dans des cas donnés, peut être, comme a dit Lafayette, le plus saint des devoirs, l’émeute peut être le plus fatal des attentats.

Il y a aussi quelque différence dans l’intensité de calorique; l’insurrection est souvent volcan, l’émeute est souvent feu de paille.

La révolte, nous l’avons dit, est quelquefois dans le pouvoir. Polignac est un émeutier; Camille Desmoulins est un gouvernant.

Parfois, insurrection, c’est résurrection.

La solution de tout par le suffrage universel étant un fait absolument moderne, et toute l’histoire antérieure à ce fait étant, depuis quatre mille ans, remplie du droit violé et de la souffrance des peuples, chaque époque de l’histoire apporte avec elle la protestation qui lui est possible. Sous les Césars, il n’y avait pas d’insurrection, mais il y avait Juvénal.

Le facit indignatio remplace les Gracques.

Sous les Césars il y a l’exilé de Syène; il y a aussi l’homme des Annales.

Nous ne parlons pas de l’immense exilé de Pathmos qui, lui aussi, accable le monde réel d’une protestation au nom du monde idéal, fait de la vision une satire énorme, et jette sur Rome-Ninive, sur Rome-Babylone, sur Rome-Sodome, la flamboyante réverbération de l’Apocalypse.

Jean sur son rocher, c’est le sphinx sur son piédestal; on peut ne pas le comprendre; c’est un juif, et c’est de l’hébreu; mais l’homme qui écrit les Annales est un latin; disons mieux, c'est un romain.

Comme les Nérons règnent à la manière noire, ils doivent être peints de même. Le travail au burin tout seul serait pâle; il faut verser dans l'entaille une prose concentrée qui morde.

Les despotes sont pour quelque chose dans les penseurs. Parole enchaînée, c'est parole terrible. L'écrivain double et triple son style quand le silence est imposé par un maître au peuple. Il sort de ce silence une certaine plénitude mystérieuse qui filtre et se fige en airain dans la pensée. La compression dans l'histoire produit la concision dans l'historien. La solidité granitique de telle prose célèbre n'est autre chose qu'un tassement fait par le tyran.

La tyrannie contraint l'écrivain à des rétrécissements de diamètre qui sont des accroissements de force. La période cicéronienne, à peine suffisante sur Verrès, s'émousserait sur Caligula. Moins d'envergure dans la phrase, plus d'intensité dans le coup. Tacite pense à bras raccourci.

L'honnêteté d'un grand cœur, condensée en justice et en vérité, foudroie.

Soit dit en passant, il est à remarquer que Tacite n'est pas historiquement superposé à César. Les Tibères lui sont réservés. César et Tacite sont deux phénomènes successifs dont la rencontre semble mystérieusement évitée par celui qui, dans la mise en scène des siècles, règle les entrées et les sorties. César est grand, Tacite est grand; Dieu épargne ces deux grandeurs en ne les heurtant pas l'une contre l'autre. Le justicier, frappant César, pourrait frapper trop, et être injuste. Dieu ne veut pas. Les grandes guerres d'Afrique et d'Espagne, les pirates de Cilicie détruits, la civilisation introduite en Gaule, en Bretagne, en Germanie, toute cette gloire couvre le Rubicon. Il y a là une sorte de délicatesse de la justice divine, hésitant à lâcher sur l'usurpateur illustre l'historien formidable, faisant à César grâce de Tacite, et accordant les circonstances atténuantes au génie.

Certes, le despotisme reste le despotisme, même sous le despote de génie. Il y a corruption sous les tyrans illustres, mais la peste morale est plus hideuse encore sous les tyrans infâmes. Dans Ces règnes-là rien ne voile la honte; et les faiseurs d'exemples, Tacite comme Juvénal, soufflettent plus utilement, en présence du genre humain, cette ignominie sans réplique.

Rome sent plus mauvais sous Vitellius que sous Sylla. Sous Claude et sous Domitien, il y a une difformité de bassesse correspondante à la laideur du tyran. La vilenie des esclaves est un produit direct du despote; un miasme s’exhale de ces consciences croupies où se reflète le maître; les pouvoirs publics sont immondes; les cœurs sont petits, les consciences sont plates, les âmes sont punaises; cela est ainsi sous Caracalla, cela est ainsi sous Commode, cela est ainsi sous Héliogabale, tandis qu’il ne sort du sénat romain sous César que l’odeur de fiente propre aux aires d’aigle.

De là la venue, en apparence tardive, des Tacite et des Juvénal; c’est à l’heure de l’évidence que le démonstrateur paraît.

Mais Juvénal et Tacite, de même qu’Isaïe aux temps bibliques, de même que Dante au moyen âge, c’est l’homme; l’émeute et l’insurrection, c’est la multitude, qui tantôt a tort, tantôt a raison.

Dans les cas les plus généraux, l’émeute sort d’un fait matériel; l’insurrection est toujours un phénomène moral. L’émeute, c’est Masaniello; l’insurrection, c’est Spartacus. L’insurrection confine à l’esprit, l’émeute à l’estomac. Gaster s’irrite; mais Gaster, certes, n’a pas toujours tort. Dans les questions de famine, l’émeute, Buzançais, par exemple, a un point de départ vrai, pathétique et juste. Pourtant elle reste émeute. Pourquoi? c’est qu’ayant raison au fond, elle a eu tort dans la forme. Farouche, quoique ayant droit, violente, quoique forte, elle a frappé au hasard; elle a marché comme l’éléphant aveugle, en écrasant; elle a laissé derrière elle des cadavres de vieillards, de femmes et d’enfants; elle a versé, sans savoir pourquoi, le sang des inoffensifs et des innocents. Nourrir le peuple est un bon but, le massacrer est un mauvais moyen.

Toutes les protestations armées, même les plus légitimes, même le 10 août, même le 14 juillet, débutent par le même trouble. Avant que le droit se dégage, il y a tumulte et écume. Au commencement l’insurrection est émeute, de même que le fleuve est torrent. Ordinairement elle aboutit à cet océan: révolution. Quelquefois pourtant, venue de ces hautes montagnes qui dominent l’horizon moral, la justice, la sagesse, la raison, le droit, faite de la plus pure neige de l’idéal, après une longue chute de roche en roche, après avoir reflété le ciel dans sa transparence et s’être grossie de cent affluents dans la majestueuse allure du triomphe, l’insurrection se perd tout à coup dans quelque fondrière bourgeoise, comme le Rhin dans un marais.

Tout ceci est du passé, l’avenir est autre. Le suffrage universel a cela d’admirable qu’il dissout l’émeute dans son principe, et qu’en donnant le vote à l’insurrection, il lui ôte l’arme. L’évanouissement des guerres, de la guerre des rues comme de la guerre des frontières, tel est l’inévitable progrès. Quel que soit aujourd’hui, la paix, c’est Demain.

Du reste, insurrection, émeute, en quoi la première diffère de la seconde, le bourgeois, proprement dit, connaît peu ces nuances. Pour lui tout est sédition, rébellion pure et simple, révolte du dogue contre le maître, essai de morsure qu'il faut punir de la chaîne et de la niche, aboiement, jappement; jusqu'au jour où la tête du chien, grossie tout à coup, s'ébauche vaguement dans l'ombre en face de lion.

Alors le bourgeois crie: Vive le peuple!

Cette explication donnée, qu'est-ce pour l'histoire que le mouvement de juin 1832? est-ce une émeute? est-ce une insurrection?

C'est une insurrection.

Il pourra nous arriver, dans cette mise en scène d'un événement redoutable, de dire parfois l'émeute, mais seulement pour qualifier les faits de surface, et en maintenant toujours la distinction entre la forme émeute et le fond insurrection.

Ce mouvement de 1832 a eu, dans son explosion rapide et dans son extinction lugubre, tant de grandeur que ceux-là mêmes qui n'y voient qu'une émeute n'en parlent pas sans respect. Pour eux, c'est comme un reste de 1830. Les imaginations émues, disent-ils, ne se calment pas en un jour. Une révolution ne se coupe pas à pic. Elle a toujours nécessairement quelques ondulations avant de revenir à l'état de paix comme une montagne en redescendant vers la plaine. Il n'y a point d'Alpes sans Jura, ni de Pyrénées sans Asturies.

Cette crise pathétique de l'histoire contemporaine que la mémoire des Parisiens appelle l'époque des émeutes, est à coup sûr une heure caractéristique parmi les heures orageuses de ce siècle.

Un dernier mot avant d'entrer dans le récit.

Les faits qui vont être racontés appartiennent à cette réalité dramatique et vivante que l'histoire néglige quelquefois, faute de temps et d'espace. Là pourtant, nous y insistons, là est la vie, la palpitation, le frémissement humain. Les petits détails, nous croyons l'avoir dit, sont, pour ainsi parler, le feuillage des grands événements et se perdent dans les lointains de l'histoire. L'époque dite des émeutes abonde en détails de ce genre. Les instructions judiciaires, par d'autres raisons que l'histoire, n'ont pas tout révélé, ni peut-être tout approfondi. Nous allons donc mettre en lumière, parmi les particularités connues et publiées, des choses qu'on n'a point sues, des faits sur lesquels a passé l'oubli des uns, la mort des autres. La plupart des acteurs de ces scènes gigantesques ont disparu; dès le lendemain ils se taisaient; mais ce que nous raconterons, nous pouvons dire: nous l’avons vu. Nous changerons quelques noms, car l’histoire raconte et ne dénonce pas, mais nous peindrons des choses vraies. Dans les conditions du livre que nous écrivons, nous ne montrerons qu’un côté et qu’un épisode, et à coup sûr le moins connu, des journées des 5 et 6 juin 1832; mais nous ferons en sorte que le lecteur entrevoie, sous le sombre voile que nous allons soulever, la figure réelle de cette effrayante aventure publique.

Chapitre III

Un enterrement: occasion de renaître

Au printemps de 1832, quoique depuis trois mois le choléra eût glacé les esprits et jeté sur leur agitation je ne sais quel morne apaisement, Paris était dès longtemps prêt pour une commotion. Ainsi que nous l'avons dit, la grande ville ressemble à une pièce de canon; quand elle est chargée, il suffit d'une étincelle qui tombe, le coup part. En juin 1832, l'étincelle fut la mort du général Lamarque.

Lamarque était un homme de renommée et d'action. Il avait eu successivement, sous l'Empire et sous la Restauration, les deux bravoures nécessaires aux deux époques, la bravoure des champs de bataille et la bravoure de la tribune. Il était éloquent comme il avait été vaillant; on sentait une épée dans sa parole. Comme Foy, son devancier, après avoir tenu haut le commandement, il tenait haut la liberté. Il siégeait entre la gauche et l'extrême gauche, aimé du peuple parce qu'il acceptait les chances de l'avenir, aimé de la foule parce qu'il avait bien servi l'Empereur. Il était, avec les comtes Gérard et Drouet, un des maréchaux in petto de Napoléon. Les traités de 1815 le soulevaient comme une offense personnelle. Il baissait Wellington d'une haine directe qui plaisait à la multitude; et depuis dix-sept ans, à peine attentif aux événements intermédiaires, il avait majestueusement gardé la tristesse de Waterloo. Dans son agonie, à sa dernière heure, il avait serré contre sa poitrine une épée que lui avaient décernée les officiers des Cent-Jours. Napoléon était mort en prononçant le mot armée, Lamarque en prononçant le mot patrie.

Sa mort, prévue, était redoutée du peuple comme une perte et du gouvernement comme une occasion. Cette mort fut un deuil. Comme tout ce qui est amer, le deuil peut se tourner en révolte. C'est ce qui arriva.

La veille et le matin du 5 juin, jour fixé pour l'enterrement de Lamarque, le faubourg Saint-Antoine, que le convoi devait venir toucher, prit un aspect redoutable. Ce tumultueux réseau de rues s'emplit de rumeurs. On s'y armait comme on pouvait. Des menuisiers emportaient le valet de leur établi «pour enfoncer les portes». Un d'eux s'était fait un poignard d'un crochet de chaussonnier en cassant le crochet et en aiguisant le tronçon. Un autre, dans la fièvre «d'attaquer», couchait depuis trois jours tout habillé. Un charpentier nommé Lombier rencontrait un camarade qui lui demandait: Où vas-tu? — Eh bien! je n’ai pas d’armes. — Et puis? Je vais à mon chantier chercher mon compas. — Pour quoi faire? — Je ne sais pas, disait Lombier. Un nommé Jacqueline, homme d’expédition, abordait les ouvriers quelconques qui passaient: — Viens, toi! — Il payait dix sous de vin, et disait: — As-tu de l’ouvrage? — Non. — Va chez Filspierre, entre la barrière Montreuil et la barrière Charonne, tu trouveras de l’ouvrage. On trouvait chez Filspierre des cartouches et des armes. Certains chefs connus faisaient la poste, c’est-à-dire couraient chez l’un et chez l’autre pour rassembler leur monde. Chez Barthélemy, près la barrière du Trône, chez Capel, au Petit-Chapeau, les buveurs s’accostaient d’un air grave. On les entendait se dire: — Où as-tu ton pistolet? — Sous ma blouse. Et toi? — Sous ma chemise, Rue Traversière, devant l’atelier Roland, et cour de la Maison-Brûlée devant l’atelier de l’outilleur Bernier, des groupes chuchotaient. On y remarquait, comme le plus ardent, un certain Mavot, qui ne faisait jamais plus d’une semaine dans un atelier, les maîtres le renvoyant «parce qu’il fallait tous les jours se disputer avec lui». Mavot fut tué le lendemain dans la barricade de la rue Ménilmontant. Pretot, qui devait mourir aussi dans la lutte, secondait Mavot, et à cette question: Quel est ton but? répondait: — L’insurrection. Des ouvriers rassemblés au coin de la rue de Bercy attendaient un nommé Lemarin, agent révolutionnaire pour le faubourg Saint-Marceau. Des mots d’ordre s’échangeaient presque publiquement.

Le 5 juin donc, par une journée mêlée de pluie et de soleil, le convoi du général Lamarque traversa Paris avec la pompe militaire officielle, un peu accrue par les précautions. Deux bataillons, tambours drapés, fusils renversés, dix mille gardes nationaux, le sabre au côté, les batteries de l’artillerie de la garde nationale, escortaient le cercueil. Le corbillard était traîné par des jeunes gens. Les officiers des Invalides le suivaient immédiatement, portant des branches de laurier. Puis venait une multitude innombrable, agitée, étrange, les sectionnaires des Amis du Peuple, l’École de droit, l’École de médecine, les réfugiés de toutes les nations, drapeaux espagnols, italiens, allemands, polonais, drapeaux tricolores horizontaux, toutes les bannières possibles, des enfants agitant des branches vertes, des tailleurs de pierre et des charpentiers qui faisaient grève en ce moment-là même, des imprimeurs reconnaissables à leurs bonnets de papier, marchant deux par deux, trois par trois, poussant des cris, agitant presque tous des bâtons, quelques-uns des sabres, sans ordre et pourtant avec une seule âme, tantôt une cohue, tantôt une colonne. Des pelotons se choisissaient des chefs; un homme, armé d'une paire de pistolets parfaitement visible, semblait en passer d'autres en revue dont les files s'écartaient devant lui. Sur les contre-allées des boulevards, dans les branches des arbres, aux balcons, aux fenêtres, sur les toits, les têtes fourmillaient, hommes, femmes, enfants; les yeux étaient pleins d'anxiété. Une foule armée passait, une foule effarée regardait.

De son côté le gouvernement observait. Il observait, la main sur la poignée de l'épée. On pouvait voir, tout prêts à marcher, gibernes pleines, fusils et mousquetons chargés, place Louis XV, quatre escadrons de carabiniers, en selle et clairons en tête, dans le pays latin et au Jardin des plantes, la garde municipale, échelonnée de rue en rue, à la Halle-aux-vins un escadron de dragons, à la Grève une moitié du 12ème léger, l'autre moitié à la Bastille, le 6ème dragons aux Célestins, de l'artillerie plein la cour du Louvre. Le reste des troupes était consigné dans les casernes, sans compter les régiments des environs de Paris. Le pouvoir inquiet tenait suspendus sur la multitude menaçante vingt-quatre mille soldats dans la ville et trente mille dans la banlieue.

Divers bruits circulaient dans le cortège. On parlait de menées légitimistes; on parlait du duc de Reichstadt, que Dieu marquait pour la mort à cette minute même où la foule le désignait pour l'empire. Un personnage resté inconnu annonçait qu'à l'heure dite deux contremaîtres gagnés ouvriraient au peuple les portes d'une fabrique d'armes. Ce qui dominait sur les fronts découverts de la plupart des assistants, c'était un enthousiasme mêlé d'accablement. On voyait aussi çà et là, dans cette multitude en proie à tant d'émotions violentes, mais nobles, de vrais visages de malfaiteurs et des bouches ignobles qui disaient: pillons! Il y a de certaines agitations qui remuent le fond des marais et qui font monter dans l'eau des nuages de boue. Phénomène auquel ne sont point étrangères les polices «bien faites».

Le cortège chemina, avec une lenteur fébrile, de la maison mortuaire par les boulevards jusqu'à la Bastille. Il pleuvait de temps en temps; la pluie ne faisait rien à cette foule. Plusieurs incidents, le cercueil promené autour de la colonne Vendôme, des pierres jetées au duc de Fitz-James aperçu à un balcon le chapeau sur la tête, le coq gaulois arraché d'un drapeau populaire et traîné dans la boue, un sergent de ville blessé d'un coup d'épée à la Porte

Saint-Martin, un officier du 12ème léger disant tout haut: Je suis républicain, l'École polytechnique survenant après sa consigne forcée, les cris: vive l'École polytechnique! vive la République! marquèrent le trajet du convoi. À la Bastille, les longues files de curieux redoutables qui descendaient du faubourg Saint-Antoine firent leur jonction avec le cortège et un certain bouillonnement terrible commença à soulever la foule.

On entendit un homme qui disait à un autre: — Tu vois bien celui-là avec sa barbiche rouge, c'est lui qui dira quand il faudra tirer. Il paraît que cette même barbiche rouge s'est retrouvée plus tard avec la même fonction dans une autre émeute, l'affaire Quénisset.

Le corbillard dépassa la Bastille, suivit le canal, traversa le petit pont et atteignit l'esplanade du pont d'Austerlitz. Là il s'arrêta. En ce moment cette foule vue à vol d'oiseau eût offert l'aspect d'une comète dont la tête était à l'esplanade et dont la queue développée sur le quai Bourdon couvrait la Bastille et se prolongeait sur le boulevard jusqu'à la porte Saint-Martin. Un cercle se traça autour du corbillard. La vaste cohue fit silence. Lafayette parla et dit adieu à Lamarque. Ce fut un instant touchant et auguste, toutes les têtes se découvrirent, tous les cœurs battaient. Tout à coup un homme à cheval, vêtu de noir, parut au milieu du groupe avec un drapeau rouge, d'autres disent avec une pique surmontée d'un bonnet rouge. Lafayette détourna la tête. Excelmans quitta le cortège.

Ce drapeau rouge souleva un orage et y disparut. Du boulevard Bourdon au pont d'Austerlitz une de ces clameurs qui ressemblent à des houles remua la multitude. Deux cris prodigieux s'élevèrent: — Lamarque au Panthéon! — Lafayette à l'hôtel de ville! — Des jeunes gens, aux acclamations de la foule, s'attelèrent et se mirent à traîner Lamarque dans le corbillard par le pont d'Austerlitz et Lafayette dans un fiacre par le quai Morland.

Dans la foule qui entourait et acclamait Lafayette, on remarquait et l'on se montrait un Allemand nommé Ludwig Snyder, mort centenaire depuis, qui avait fait lui aussi la guerre de 1776, et qui avait combattu à Trenton sous Washington, et sous Lafayette à Brandywine.

Cependant sur la rive gauche la cavalerie municipale s'ébranlait et venait barrer le pont, sur la rive droite les dragons sortaient des Célestins et se déployaient le long du quai Morland. Le peuple qui traînait Lafayette les aperçut brusquement au coude du quai et cria: les dragons! les dragons! Les dragons s’avançaient au pas, en silence, pistolets dans les fontes, sabres aux fourreaux, Mousquetons aux porte-crosse, avec un air d’attente sombre.

À deux cents pas du petit pont, ils firent halte. Le fiacre où était Lafayette chemina jusqu’à eux, ils ouvrirent les rangs, le laissèrent passer, et se refermèrent sur lui. En ce moment les dragons et la foule se touchaient. Les femmes s’enfuyaient avec terreur.

Que se passa-t-il dans cette minute fatale? personne ne saurait le dire. C’est le moment ténébreux où deux nuées se mêlent. Les uns racontent qu’une fanfare sonnant la charge fut entendue du côté de l’Arsenal, les autres qu’un coup de poignard fut donné par un enfant à un dragon. Le fait est que trois coups de feu partirent subitement, le premier tua le chef d’escadron Cholet, le second tua une vieille sourde qui fermait sa fenêtre rue Contrescarpe, le troisième brûla l’épaulette d’un officier; une femme cria: On commence trop tôt! et tout à coup on vit du côté opposé au quai Morland un escadron de dragons qui était resté dans la caserne déboucher au galop, le sabre nu, par la rue Bassompierre et le boulevard Bourdon, et balayer tout devant lui.

Alors tout est dit, la tempête se déchaîne, les pierres pleuvent, la fusillade éclate, beaucoup se précipitent au bas de la berge et passent le petit bras de la Seine aujourd’hui comblé; les chantiers de l’île Louviers, cette vaste citadelle toute faite, se hérissent de combattants; on arrache des pieux, on tire des coups de pistolet, une barricade s’ébauche, les jeunes gens refoulés passent le pont d’Austerlitz avec le corbillard au pas de course et chargent la garde municipale, les carabiniers accourent, les dragons sabrent, la foule se disperse dans tous les sens, une rumeur de guerre vole aux quatre coins de Paris, on crie: aux armes! on court, on culbute, on fuit, on résiste. La colère emporte l’émeute comme le vent emporte le feu.

Chapitre IV

Les bouillonnements d’autrefois

Rien n’est plus extraordinaire que le premier fourmillement d’une émeute. Tout éclate partout à la fois. Était-ce prévu? oui. Était-ce préparé? non. D’où cela sort-il? des pavés. D’où cela tombe-t-il? des nues. Ici l’insurrection a le caractère d’un complot; là d’une improvisation. Le premier venu s’empare d’un courant de la foule et le mène où il veut. Début plein d’épouvante où se mêle une sorte de gaîté formidable. Ce sont d’abord des clameurs, les magasins se ferment, les étalages des marchands disparaissent; puis des coups de feu isolés; des gens s’enfuient; des coups de crosse heurtent les portes cochères; on entend les servantes rire dans les cours des maisons et dire: Il va y avoir du train!

Un quart d’heure n’était pas écoulé, voici ce qui se passait presque en même temps sur vingt points de Paris différents.

Rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie, une vingtaine de jeunes gens, à barbes et à cheveux longs, entraient dans un estaminet et en ressortaient un moment après, portant un drapeau tricolore horizontal couvert d’un crêpe et ayant à leur tête trois hommes armés, l’un d’un sabre, l’autre d’un fusil, le troisième d’une pique.

Rue des Nonaindières, un bourgeois bien vêtu, qui avait du ventre, la voix sonore, le crâne chauve, le front élevé, la barbe noire et une de ces moustaches rudes qui ne peuvent se rabattre, offrait publiquement des cartouches aux passants.

Rue Saint-Pierre-Montmartre, des hommes aux bras nus promenaient un drapeau noir où on lisait ces mots en lettres blanches: République ou la mort. Rue des Jeûneurs, rue du Cadran, rue Montorgueil, rue Mandar, apparaissaient des groupes agitant des drapeaux sur lesquels on distinguait des lettres d’or, le mot section avec un numéro. Un de ces drapeaux était rouge et bleu avec un imperceptible entre-deux blanc.

On pillait une fabrique d’armes, boulevard Saint-Martin, et trois boutiques d’armuriers, la première rue Beaubourg, la deuxième rue Michel-le-Comte, l’autre, rue du Temple. En quelques minutes les mille mains de la foule saisissaient et emportaient deux cent trente fusils, presque tous à deux coups, soixante-quatre sabres, quatre-vingt-trois pistolets. Afin d'armer plus de monde, l'un prenait le fusil, l'autre la bayonnette.

Vis-à-vis le quai de la Grève, des jeunes gens armés de mousquets, s'installaient chez des femmes pour tirer. L'un d'eux avait un mousquet à rouet. Ils sonnaient, entraient, et se mettaient à faire des cartouches. Une de ces femmes a raconté: Je ne savais pas ce que c'était que des cartouches, c'est mon mari qui me l'a dit.

Un rassemblement enfonçait une boutique de curiosités rue des Vieilles-Haudriettes et y prenait des yatagans et des armes turques.

Le cadavre d'un maçon tué d'un coup de fusil gisait rue de la Perle.

Et puis, rive droite, rive gauche, sur les quais, sur les boulevards, dans le pays latin, dans le quartier des halles, des hommes haletants, ouvriers, étudiants, sectionnaires, lisaient des proclamations, criaient: aux armes! brisaient les réverbères, dételaient les voitures, dépavaient les rues, enfonçaient les portes des maisons, déracinaient les arbres, fouillaient les caves, roulaient des tonneaux, entassaient pavés, moellons, meubles, planches, faisaient des barricades.

On forçait les bourgeois d'y aider. On entrait chez les femmes, on leur faisait donner le sabre et le fusil des maris absents, et l'on écrivait avec du blanc d'Espagne sur la porte: les armes sont livrées. Quelques-uns signaient «de leurs noms» des reçus du fusil et du sabre, et disaient: envoyez-les chercher demain à la mairie. On désarmait dans les rues les sentinelles isolées et les gardes nationaux allant à leur municipalité. On arrachait les épaulettes aux officiers. Rue du Cimetière-Saint-Nicolas, un officier de la garde nationale, poursuivi par une troupe armée de bâtons et de fleurets, se réfugia à grand'peine dans une maison d'où il ne put sortir qu'à la nuit, et déguisé.

Dans le quartier Saint-Jacques, les étudiants sortaient par essaims de leurs hôtels, et montaient rue Saint-Hyacinthe au café du Progrès ou descendaient au café des Sept-Billards, rue des Mathurins. Là, devant les portes, des jeunes gens debout sur des bornes distribuaient des armes. On pillait le chantier de la rue Transnonain pour faire des barricades. Sur un seul point, les habitants résistaient, à l'angle des rues Sainte-Avoye et Simon-le-Franc où ils détruisaient eux-mêmes la barricade. Sur un seul point, les insurgés pliaient; ils abandonnaient une barricade commencée rue du Temple après avoir fait feu sur un détachement de garde nationale, et s'enfuyaient par la rue de la Corderie. Le détachement ramassa dans la barricade un drapeau rouge, un paquet de cartouches et trois cents balles de pistolet. Les gardes nationaux déchirèrent le drapeau et en remportèrent les lambeaux à la pointe de leurs bayonnettes.

Tout ce que nous racontons ici lentement et successivement se faisait à la fois sur tous les points de la ville au milieu d’un vaste tumulte, comme une foule d’éclairs dans un seul roulement de tonnerre.

En moins d’une heure, vingt-sept barricades sortirent de terre dans le seul quartier des halles. Au centre était cette fameuse maison nº 50, qui fut la forteresse de Jeanne et de ses cent six compagnons, et qui, flanquée d’un côté par une barricade à Saint-Merry et de l’autre par une barricade à la rue Maubuée, commandait trois rues, la rue des Arcis, la rue Saint-Martin, et la rue Aubry-le-Boucher qu’elle prenait de front. Deux barricades en équerre se repliaient l’une de la rue Montorgueil sur la Grande-Truanderie, l’autre de la rue Geoffroy-Langevin sur la rue Sainte-Avoye. Sans compter d’innombrables barricades dans vingt autres quartiers de Paris, au Marais, à la montagne Sainte-Geneviève; une, rue Ménilmontant, où l’on voyait une porte cochère arrachée de ses gonds; une autre près du petit pont de l’Hôtel-Dieu faite avec une écossaise dételée et renversée, à trois cents pas de la préfecture de police.

À la barricade de la rue des Ménétriers, un homme bien mis distribuait de l’argent aux travailleurs. À la barricade de la rue Greneta, un cavalier parut et remit à celui qui paraissait le chef de la barricade un rouleau qui avait l’air d’un rouleau d’argent. — Voilà, dit-il, pour payer les dépenses, le vin, et coetera. Un jeune homme blond, sans cravate, allait d’une barricade à l’autre portant des mots d’ordre. Un autre, le sabre nu, un bonnet de police bleu sur la tête, posait des sentinelles. Dans l’intérieur, en deçà barricades, les cabarets et les loges de portiers étaient convertis en corps de garde. Du reste l’émeute se comportait selon la plus savante tactique militaire. Les rues étroites, inégales, sinueuses, pleines d’angles et de tournants, étaient admirablement choisies; les environs des halles en particulier, réseau de rues plus embrouillé qu’une forêt. La société des Amis du Peuple avait, disait-on, pris la direction de l’insurrection dans le quartier Sainte-Avoye. Un homme tué rue du Ponceau qu’on fouilla avait sur lui un plan de Paris.

Ce qui avait réellement pris la direction de l’émeute, c’était une sorte d’impétuosité inconnue qui était dans l’air. L’insurrection, brusquement, avait bâti les barricades d’une main et de l’autre saisi presque tous les postes de la garnison. En moins de trois heures, comme une traînée de poudre qui s’allume, les insurgés avaient envahi et occupé, sur la rive droite, l’Arsenal, la mairie de la place Royale, tout le Marais, la fabrique d’armes Popincourt, la Galiote, le Château-d’Eau, toutes les rues près des halles; sur la rive gauche, la caserne des Vétérans, Sainte-Pélagie, la place Maubert, la poudrière des Deux-Moulins, toutes les barrières. À cinq heures du soir ils étaient maîtres de la Bastille, de la Lingerie, des Blancs-Manteaux; leurs éclaireurs touchaient la place des Victoires, et menaçaient la Banque, la caserne des Petits-Pères, l’hôtel des Postes. Le tiers de Paris était à l’émeute.

Sur tous les points la lutte était gigantesquement engagée; et, des désarmements, des visites domiciliaires, des boutiques d’armuriers vivement envahies, il résultait ceci que le combat commencé à coups de pierres continuait à coups de fusil.

Vers six heures du soir, le passage du Saumon devenait champ de bataille. L’émeute était à un bout, la troupe au bout opposé. On se fusillait d’une grille à l’autre. Un observateur, un rêveur, l’auteur de ce livre, qui était allé voir le volcan de près, se trouva dans le passage pris entre les deux feux. Il n’avait pour se garantir des balles que le renflement des demi-colonnes qui séparent les boutiques; il fut près d’une demi-heure dans cette situation délicate.

Cependant le rappel battait, les gardes nationaux s’habillaient et s’armaient en hâte, les légions sortaient des mairies, les régiments sortaient des casernes. Vis-à-vis le passage de l’Ancre un tambour recevait un coup de poignard. Un autre, rue du Cygne, était assailli par une trentaine de jeunes gens qui lui crevaient sa caisse et lui prenaient son sabre. Un autre était tué rue Grenier-Saint-Lazare. Rue Michel-le-Comte, trois officiers tombaient morts l’un après l’autre. Plusieurs gardes municipaux, blessés rue des Lombards, rétrogradaient.

Devant la Cour-Batave, un détachement de gardes nationaux trouvait un drapeau rouge portant cette inscription: Révolution républicaine, n^{o} 127. Était-ce une révolution en effet?

L’insurrection s’était fait du centre de Paris une sorte de citadelle inextricable, tortueuse, colossale.

Là était le foyer, là était évidemment la question. Tout le reste n’était qu’escarmouches. Ce qui prouvait que tout se déciderait là, c’est qu’on ne s’y battait pas encore.

Dans quelques régiments, les soldats étaient incertains, ce qui ajoutait à l’obscurité effrayante de la crise. Ils se rappelaient l’ovation populaire qui avait accueilli en juillet 1830 la neutralité du 53ème de ligne. Deux hommes intrépides et éprouvés par les grandes guerres, le maréchal de Lobau et le général Bugeaud, commandaient, Bugeaud sous Lobau. D’énormes patrouilles, composées de bataillons de la ligne enfermés dans des compagnies entières de garde nationale, et précédées d’un commissaire de police en écharpe, allaient reconnaître les rues insurgées. De leur côté, les insurgés posaient des vedettes au coin des carrefours et envoyaient audacieusement des patrouilles hors des barricades. On s’observait des deux parts. Le gouvernement, avec une armée dans la main, hésitait; la nuit allait venir et l’on commençait à entendre le tocsin de Saint-Merry. Le ministre de la guerre d’alors, le maréchal Soult, qui avait vu Austerlitz, regardait cela d’un air sombre.

Ces vieux matelots-là, habitués à la manœuvre correcte et n’ayant pour ressource et pour guide que la tactique, cette boussole des batailles, sont tout désorientés en présence de cette immense écume qu’on appelle la colère publique. Le vent des révolutions n’est pas maniable.

Les gardes nationales de la banlieue accouraient en hâte et en désordre. Un bataillon du 12ème léger venait au pas de course de Saint-Denis, le 14ème de ligne arrivait de Courbevoie, les batteries de l’école militaire avaient pris position au Carrousel; des canons descendaient de Vincennes.

La solitude se faisait aux Tuileries, Louis-Philippe était plein de sérénité.

Chapitre V

Originalité de Paris

Depuis deux ans, nous l’avons dit, Paris avait vu plus d’une insurrection. Hors des quartiers insurgés, rien n’est d’ordinaire plus étrangement calme que la physionomie de Paris pendant une émeute. Paris s’accoutume très vite à tout, — ce n’est qu’une émeute, — et Paris a tant d’affaires qu’il ne se dérange pas pour si peu. Ces villes colossales peuvent seules donner de tels spectacles. Ces enceintes immenses peuvent seules contenir en même temps la guerre civile et on ne sait quelle bizarre tranquillité. D’habitude, quand l’insurrection commence, quand on entend le tambour, le rappel, la générale, le boutiquier se borne à dire:

— Il paraît qu’il y a du grabuge rue Saint-Martin.

Ou:

— Faubourg Saint-Antoine.

Souvent il ajoute avec insouciance:

— Quelque part par là.

Plus tard, quand on distingue le vacarme déchirant et lugubre de la mousqueterie et des feux de peloton, le boutiquier dit:

— Ça chauffe donc? Tiens, ça chauffe?

Un moment après, si l’émeute approche et gagne, il ferme précipitamment sa boutique et endosse rapidement son uniforme, c’est-à-dire met ses marchandises en sûreté et risque sa personne.

On se fusille dans un carrefour, dans un passage, dans un cul-de-sac; on prend, perd et reprend des barricades; le sang coule, la mitraille crible les façades des maisons, les balles tuent les gens dans leur alcôve, les cadavres encombrent le pavé. À quelques rues de là, on entend le choc des billes de billard dans les cafés.

Les curieux causent et rient à deux pas de ces rues pleines de guerre; les théâtres ouvrent leurs portes et jouent des vaudevilles. Les fiacres cheminent; les passants vont dîner en ville. Quelquefois dans le quartier même où l’on se bat. En 1831, une fusillade s’interrompit pour laisser passer une noce.

Lors de l’insurrection du 12 mai 1839, rue Saint-Martin, un petit vieux homme infirme traînant une charrette à bras surmontée d’un chiffon tricolore dans laquelle il y avait des carafes emplies d'un liquide quelconque, allait et venait de la barricade à la troupe et de la troupe à la barricade, offrant impartialement des verres de coco — tantôt au gouvernement, tantôt à l'anarchie.

Rien n'est plus étrange; et c'est là le caractère propre des émeutes de Paris qui ne se retrouve dans aucune autre capitale. Il faut pour cela deux choses, la grandeur de Paris, et sa gaîté. Il faut la ville de Voltaire et de Napoléon.

Cette fois cependant, dans la prise d'armes du 5 juin 1832, la grande ville sentit quelque chose qui était peut-être plus fort qu'elle. Elle eut peur. On vit partout, dans les quartiers les plus lointains et les plus «désintéressés», les portes, les fenêtres et les volets fermés en plein jour. Les courageux s'armèrent, les poltrons se cachèrent. Le passant insouciant et affairé disparut. Beaucoup de ces rues étaient vides comme à quatre heures du matin. On colportait des détails alarmants, on répandait des nouvelles fatales. — Qu'ils étaient maîtres de la Banque; — que, rien qu'au cloître de Saint-Merry, ils étaient six cents, retranchés et crénelés dans l'église; — que la ligne n'était pas sûre; — qu'Armand Carrel avait été voir le maréchal Clausel, et que le maréchal avait dit: Ayez d'abord un régiment; — que Lafayette était malade, mais qu'il leur avait dit pourtant: Je suis à vous. Je vous suivrai partout où il y aura place pour une chaise; — qu'il fallait se tenir sur ses gardes; qu'à la nuit il y aurait des gens qui pilleraient les maisons isolées dans les coins déserts de Paris (ici on reconnaissait l'imagination de la police, cette Anne Radcliffe mêlée au gouvernement); — qu'une batterie avait été établie rue Aubry-le-Boucher; — que Lobau et Bugeaud se concertaient et qu'à minuit, ou au point du jour au plus tard, quatre colonnes marcheraient à la fois sur le centre de l'émeute, la première venant de la Bastille, la deuxième de la porte Saint-Martin, la troisième de la Grève, la quatrième des halles; — que peut-être aussi les troupes évacueraient Paris et se retireraient au Champ de Mars; — qu'on ne savait ce qui arriverait, mais qu'à coup sûr, cette fois, c'était grave. — On se préoccupait des hésitations du maréchal Soult. — Pourquoi n'attaquait-il pas tout de suite? — Il est certain qu'il était profondément absorbé. Le vieux lion semblait flairer dans cette ombre un monstre inconnu.

Le soir vint, les théâtres n'ouvrirent pas; les patrouilles circulaient d'un air irrité; on fouillait les passants; on arrêtait les suspects. Il y avait à neuf heures plus de huit cents personnes arrêtées; la préfecture de police était encombrée, la Conciergerie encombrée, la Force encombrée. À la Conciergerie, en particulier, le long souterrain qu'on nomme la rue de Paris était jonché de bottes de paille sur lesquelles gisait un entassement de prisonniers, que l'homme de Lyon, Lagrange, haranguait avec vaillance. Toute cette paille, remuée par tous ces hommes, faisait le bruit d'une averse. Ailleurs les prisonniers couchaient en plein air dans les préaux les uns sur les autres. L'anxiété était partout, et un certain tremblement, peu habituel à Paris.

On se barricadait dans les maisons; les femmes et les mères s'inquiétaient; on n'entendait que ceci: Ah mon Dieu! il n'est pas rentré! Il y avait à peine au loin quelques rares roulements de voitures. On écoutait, sur le pas des portes, les rumeurs, les cris, les tumultes, les bruits sourds et indistincts, des choses dont on disait: C'est la cavalerie, ou: Ce sont des caissons qui galopent, les clairons, les tambours, la fusillade, et surtout ce lamentable tocsin de Saint-Merry. On attendait le premier coup de canon. Des hommes armés surgissaient au coin des rues et disparaissaient en criant: Rentrez chez vous! Et l'on se hâtait de verrouiller les portes. On disait: Comment cela finira-t-il? D'instant en instant, à mesure que la nuit tombait, Paris semblait se colorer plus lugubrement du flamboiement formidable de l'émeute.

Livre onzième — L'atome fraternise avec l'ouragan

Chapitre I

Quelques éclaircissements sur les origines de la poésie de Gavroche. Influence d'un académicien sur cette poésie

À l'instant où l'insurrection, surgissant du choc du peuple et de la troupe devant l'Arsenal, détermina un mouvement d'avant en arrière dans la multitude qui suivait le corbillard et qui, de toute la longueur des boulevards, pesait, pour ainsi dire, sur la tête du convoi, ce fut un effrayant reflux. La cohue s'ébranla, les rangs se rompirent, tous coururent, partirent, s'échappèrent, les uns avec les cris de l'attaque, les autres avec la pâleur de la fuite. Le grand fleuve qui couvrait les boulevards se divisa en un clin d'œil, déborda à droite et à gauche et se répandit en torrents dans deux cents rues à la fois avec le ruissellement d'une écluse lâchée. En ce moment un enfant déguenillé qui descendait par la rue Ménilmontant, tenant à la main une branche de faux-ébénier en fleur qu'il venait de cueillir sur les hauteurs de Belleville, avisa dans la devanture de boutique d'une marchande de bric-à-brac un vieux pistolet d'arçon. Il jeta sa branche fleurie sur le pavé, et cria:

— Mère chose, je vous emprunte votre machin.

Et il se sauva avec le pistolet.

Deux minutes après, un flot de bourgeois épouvantés qui s'enfuyait par la rue Amelot et la rue Basse, rencontra l'enfant qui brandissait son pistolet et qui chantait:

La nuit on ne voit rien,
Le jour on voit très bien,
D'un écrit apocryphe
Le bourgeois s'ébouriffe,
Pratiquez la vertu,
Tutu chapeau pointu!

C'était le petit Gavroche qui s'en allait en guerre.

Sur le boulevard il s'aperçut que le pistolet n'avait pas de chien.

De qui était ce couplet qui lui servait à ponctuer sa marche, et toutes les autres chansons que, dans l'occasion, il chantait volontiers? nous l’ignorons. Qui sait? de lui peut-être. Gavroche d’ailleurs était au courant de tout le fredonnement populaire en circulation, et il y mêlait son propre gazouillement. Farfadet et galopin, il faisait un pot-pourri des voix de la nature et des voix de Paris. Il combinait le répertoire des oiseaux avec le répertoire des ateliers. Il connaissait des rapins, tribu contiguë à la sienne. Il avait, à ce qu’il paraît, été trois mois apprenti imprimeur. Il avait fait un jour une commission pour monsieur Baour-Lormian, l’un des quarante. Gavroche était un gamin de lettres.

Gavroche du reste ne se doutait pas que dans cette vilaine nuit pluvieuse où il avait offert à deux mioches l’hospitalité de son éléphant, c’était pour ses propres frères qu’il avait fait office de providence. Ses frères le soir, son père le matin; voilà quelle avait été sa nuit. En quittant la rue des Ballets au petit jour, il était retourné en hâte à l’éléphant, en avait artistement extrait les deux mômes, avait partagé avec eux le déjeuner quelconque qu’il avait inventé, puis s’en était allé, les confiant à cette bonne mère la rue qui l’avait à peu près élevé lui-même. En les quittant, il leur avait donné rendez-vous pour le soir au même endroit, et leur avait laissé pour adieu ce discours: — Je casse une canne, autrement dit je m’esbigne, ou, comme on dit à la cour, je file. Les mioches, si vous ne retrouvez pas papa maman, revenez ici ce soir. Je vous ficherai à souper et je vous coucherai. Les deux enfants, ramassés par quelque sergent de ville et mis au dépôt, ou volés par quelque saltimbanque, ou simplement égarés dans l’immense casse-tête chinois parisien, n’étaient pas revenus. Les bas-fonds du monde social actuel sont pleins de ces traces perdues. Gavroche ne les avait pas revus. Dix ou douze semaines s’étaient écoulées depuis cette nuit-là. Il lui était arrivé plus d’une fois de se gratter le dessus de la tête et de dire: Où diable sont mes deux enfants?

Cependant, il était parvenu, son pistolet au poing, rue du Pont-aux-Choux. Il remarqua qu’il n’y avait plus, dans cette rue, qu’une boutique ouverte, et, chose digne de réflexion, une boutique de pâtissier. C’était une occasion providentielle de manger encore un chausson aux pommes avant d’entrer dans l’inconnu. Gavroche s’arrêta, tâta ses flancs, fouilla son gousset, retourna ses poches, n’y trouva rien, pas un sou, et se mit à crier: Au secours!

Il est dur de manquer le gâteau suprême.

Gavroche n’en continua pas moins son chemin.

Deux minutes après, il était rue Saint-Louis. En traversant la rue du Parc-Royal il sentit le besoin de se dédommager du chausson de pommes impossible, et il se donna l'immense volupté de déchirer en plein jour les affiches de spectacle.

Un peu plus loin, voyant passer un groupe d'êtres bien portants qui lui parurent des propriétaires, il haussa les épaules et cracha au hasard devant lui cette gorgée de bile philosophique:

— Ces rentiers, comme c'est gras! Ça se gave. Ça patauge dans les bons dîners. Demandez-leur ce qu'ils font de leur argent. Ils n'en savent rien. Ils le mangent, quoi! Autant en emporte le ventre.

Chapitre II

Gavroche en marche

L’agitation d’un pistolet sans chien qu’on tient à la main en pleine rue est une telle fonction publique que Gavroche sentait croître sa verve à chaque pas. Il criait, parmi des bribes de la Marseillaise qu’il chantait:

— Tout va bien. Je souffre beaucoup de la patte gauche, je me suis cassé mon rhumatisme, mais je suis content, citoyens. Les bourgeois n’ont qu’à se bien tenir, je vas leur éternuer des couplets subversifs. Qu’est-ce que c’est que les mouchards? c’est des chiens. Nom d’unch! ne manquons pas de respect aux chiens. Avec ça que je voudrais bien en avoir un à mon pistolet. Je viens du boulevard, mes amis, ça chauffe, ça jette un petit bouillon, ça mijote. Il est temps d’écumer le pot. En avant les hommes! qu’un sang impur inonde les sillons! Je donne mes jours pour la patrie, je ne reverrai plus ma concubine, n-i-ni, fini, oui, Nini! mais c’est égal, vive la joie! Battons-nous, crebleu! j’en ai assez du despotisme.

En cet instant, le cheval d’un garde national lancier qui passait s’étant abattu, Gavroche posa son pistolet sur le pavé, et releva l’homme, puis il aida à relever le cheval. Après quoi il ramassa son pistolet et reprit son chemin.

Rue de Thorigny, tout était paix et silence. Cette apathie, propre au Marais, contrastait avec la vaste rumeur environnante. Quatre commères causaient sur le pas d’une porte. L’Écosse a des trios de sorcières, mais Paris a des quatuor de commères; et le «tu seras roi» serait tout aussi lugubrement jeté à Bonaparte dans le carrefour Baudoyer qu’à Macbeth dans la bruyère d’Armuyr. Ce serait à peu près le même croassement.

Les commères de la rue de Thorigny ne s’occupaient que de leurs affaires. C’étaient trois portières et une chiffonnière avec sa hotte et son crochet.

Elles semblaient debout toutes les quatre aux quatre coins de la vieillesse qui sont la caducité, la décrépitude, la ruine et la tristesse.

La chiffonnière était humble. Dans ce monde en plein vent, la chiffonnière salue, la portière protège. Cela tient au coin de la borne qui est ce que veulent les concierges, gras ou maigre, selon la fantaisie de celui qui fait le tas. Il peut y avoir de la bonté dans le balai.

Cette chiffonnière était une hotte reconnaissante, et elle souriait, quel sourire! aux trois portières. Il se disait des choses comme ceci:

— Ah çà, votre chat est donc toujours méchant?

— Mon Dieu, les chats, vous le savez, naturellement sont l'ennemi des chiens. C'est les chiens qui se plaignent.

— Et le monde aussi.

— Pourtant les puces de chat ne vont pas après le monde.

— Ce n'est pas l'embarras, les chiens, c'est dangereux. Je me rappelle une année où il y avait tant de chiens qu'on a été obligé de le mettre dans les journaux. C'était du temps qu'il y avait aux Tuileries de grands moutons qui traînaient la petite voiture du roi de Rome. Vous rappelez-vous le roi de Rome?

— Moi, j'aimais bien le duc de Bordeaux.

— Moi, j'ai connu Louis XVII. J'aime mieux Louis XVII.

— C'est la viande qui est chère, mame Patagon!

— Ah! ne m'en parlez pas, la boucherie est une horreur. Une horreur horrible. On n'a plus que de la réjouissance.

Ici la chiffonnière intervint:

— Mesdames, le commerce ne va pas. Les tas d'ordures sont minables. On ne jette plus rien. On mange tout.

— Il y en a de plus pauvres que vous, la Vargoulême.

— Ah, Ça C'est vrai, répondit la chiffonnière avec déférence, moi j'ai un état.

Il y eut une pause, et la chiffonnière, cédant à ce besoin d'étalage qui est le fond de l'homme, ajouta:

— Le matin en rentrant, j'épluche l'hotte, je fais mon treillage (probablement triage). Ça fait des tas dans ma chambre. Je mets les chiffons dans un panier, les trognons dans un baquet, les linges dans mon placard, les lainages dans ma commode, les vieux papiers dans le coin de la fenêtre, les choses bonnes à manger dans mon écuelle, les morceaux de verre dans la cheminée, les savates derrière la porte, et les os sous mon lit.

Gavroche, arrêté derrière, écoutait:

— Les vieilles, dit-il, qu'est-ce que vous avez donc à parler politique?

Une bordée l'assaillit, composée d'une huée quadruple.

— En voilà encore un scélérat!

— Qu'est-ce qu'il a donc à son moignon? Un pistolet?

— Je vous demande un peu, ce gueux de môme!

— Ça n’est pas tranquille si ça ne renverse pas l’autorité.

Gavroche, dédaigneux, se borna, pour toute représaille, à soulever le bout de son nez avec son pouce en ouvrant sa main toute grande.

La chiffonnière cria:

— Méchant va-nu-pattes!

Celle qui répondait au nom de mame Patagon frappa ses deux mains l’une contre l’autre avec scandale:

— Il va y avoir des malheurs, c’est sûr. Le galopin d’à côté qui a une barbiche, je le voyais passer tous les matins avec une jeunesse en bonnet rose sous le bras, aujourd’hui je l’ai vu passer, il donnait le bras à un fusil. Mame Bacheux dit qu’il y a eu la semaine passée une révolution à... à... à... — où est le veau! — à Pontoise. Et puis le voyez-vous là avec un pistolet, cette horreur de polisson! Il paraît qu’il y a des canons tout plein les Célestins. Comment voulez-vous que fasse le gouvernement avec des garnements qui ne savent qu’inventer pour déranger le monde, quand on commençait à être un peu tranquille après tous les malheurs qu’il y a eu, bon Dieu Seigneur, cette pauvre reine que j’ai vue passer dans la charrette! Et tout ça va encore faire renchérir le tabac. C’est une infamie! Et certainement, j’irai te voir guillotiner, malfaiteur!

— Tu renifles, mon ancienne, dit Gavroche. Mouche ton promontoire.

Et il passa outre.

Quand il fut rue Pavée, la chiffonnière lui revint à l’esprit, et il eut ce soliloque:

— Tu as tort d’insulter les révolutionnaires, mère Coin-de-la-Borne. Ce pistolet-là, c’est dans ton intérêt. C’est pour que tu aies dans ta hotte plus de choses bonnes à manger.

Tout à coup il entendit du bruit derrière lui; c’était la portière Patagon qui l’avait suivi, et qui, de loin, lui montrait le poing en criant:

— Tu n’es qu’un bâtard!

— Ça, dit Gavroche, je m’en fiche d’une manière profonde.

Peu après, il passait devant l’hôtel Lamoignon. Là il poussa cet appel:

— En route pour la bataille!

Et il fut pris d’un accès de mélancolie. Il regarda son pistolet d’un air de reproche qui semblait essayer de l’attendrir.

— Je pars, lui dit-il, mais toi tu ne pars pas.

Un chien peut distraire d’un autre. Un caniche très maigre vint à passer. Gavroche s’apitoya.

— Mon pauvre toutou, lui dit-il, tu as donc avalé un tonneau qu'on te voit tous les cerceaux.

Puis il se dirigea vers l'Orme-Saint-Gervais.

Chapitre III

Juste indignation d'un perruquier

Le digne perruquier qui avait chassé les deux petits auxquels Gavroche avait ouvert l'intestin paternel de l'éléphant, était en ce moment dans sa boutique occupé à raser un vieux soldat légionnaire qui avait servi sous l'Empire. On causait. Le perruquier avait naturellement parlé au vétéran de l'émeute, puis du général Lamarque, et de Lamarque on était venu à l'Empereur. De là une conversation de barbier à soldat, que Prudhomme, s'il eût été présent, eût enrichie d'arabesques, et qu'il eût intitulée: Dialogue du rasoir et du sabre.

— Monsieur, disait le perruquier, comment l'Empereur montait-il à cheval?

— Mal. Il ne savait pas tomber. Aussi il ne tombait jamais.

— Avait-il de beaux chevaux? il devait avoir de beaux chevaux?

Le jour où il m'a donné la croix, j'ai remarqué sa bête. C'était une jument coureuse, toute blanche. Elle avait les oreilles très écartées, la selle profonde, une fine tête marquée d'une étoile noire, le cou très long, les genoux fortement articulés, les côtes saillantes, les épaules obliques, l'arrière-main puissante. Un peu plus de quinze palmes de haut.

— Joli cheval, fit le perruquier.

— C'était la bête de sa majesté.

Le perruquier sentit qu'après ce mot, un peu de silence était convenable, il s'y conforma, puis reprit:

— L'Empereur n'a été blessé qu'une fois, n'est-ce pas, monsieur?

Le vieux soldat répondit avec l'accent calme et souverain de l'homme qui y a été.

— Au talon. À Ratisbonne. Je ne l'ai jamais vu si bien mis que ce jour-là. Il était propre comme un sou.

— Et vous, monsieur le vétéran, vous avez dû être souvent blessé?

— Moi? dit le soldat, ah! pas grand'chose. J'ai reçu à Marengo deux coups de sabre sur la nuque, une balle dans le bras droit à Austerlitz, une autre dans la hanche gauche à Iéna, à Friedland un coup de bayonnette là, — à la Moskowa sept ou huit coups de lance n'importe où, à Lutzen un éclat d'obus qui m'a écrasé un doigt... — Ah! et puis à Waterloo un biscaïen dans la cuisse. Voilà tout.

— Comme c’est beau, s’écria le perruquier avec un accent pindarique, de mourir sur le champ de bataille! Moi! parole d’honneur, plutôt que de crever sur le grabat, de maladie, lentement, un peu tous les jours, avec les drogues, les cataplasmes, la seringue et le médecin, j’aimerais mieux recevoir dans le ventre un boulet de canon!

— Vous n’êtes pas dégoûté, fit le soldat.

Il achevait à peine qu’un effroyable fracas ébranla la boutique. Une vitre de la devanture venait de s’étoiler brusquement.

Le perruquier devint blême.

— Ah Dieu! cria-t-il, c’en est un!

— Quoi?

— Un boulet de canon.

— Le voici, dit le soldat.

Et il ramassa quelque chose qui roulait à terre. C’était un caillou.

Le perruquier courut à la vitre brisée et vit Gavroche qui s’enfuyait à toutes jambes vers le marché Saint-Jean. En passant devant la boutique du perruquier, Gavroche, qui avait les deux mômes sur le cœur, n’avait pu résister au désir de lui dire bonjour, et lui avait jeté une pierre dans ses carreaux.

— Voyez-vous! hurla le perruquier qui de blanc était devenu bleu, cela fait le mal pour le mal. Qu’est-ce qu’on lui a fait à ce gamin-là?

Chapitre IV

L’enfant s’étonne du vieillard

Cependant Gavroche, au marché Saint-Jean, dont le poste était déjà désarmé, venait — d’opérer sa jonction — avec une bande conduite par Enjolras, Courfeyrac, Combeferre et Feuilly. Ils étaient à peu près armés. Bahorel et Jean Prouvaire les avaient retrouvés et grossissaient le groupe. Enjolras avait un fusil de chasse à deux coups, Combeferre un fusil de garde national portant un numéro de légion, et dans sa ceinture deux pistolets que sa redingote déboutonnée laissait voir, Jean Prouvaire un vieux mousqueton de cavalerie, Bahorel une carabine; Courfeyrac agitait une canne à épée dégainée. Feuilly, un sabre nu au poing, marchait en avant en criant: «Vive la Pologne!»

Ils arrivaient du quai Morland, sans cravates, sans chapeaux, essoufflés, mouillés par la pluie, l’éclair dans les yeux. Gavroche les aborda avec calme.

— Où allons-nous?

— Viens, dit Courfeyrac.

Derrière Feuilly marchait, ou plutôt bondissait Bahorel, poisson dans l’eau de l’émeute. Il avait un gilet cramoisi et de ces mots qui cassent tout. Son gilet bouleversa un passant qui cria tout éperdu:

— Voilà les rouges!

— Le rouge, les rouges! répliqua Bahorel. Drôle de peur, bourgeois. Quant à moi, je ne tremble point devant un coquelicot, le petit chaperon rouge ne m’inspire aucune épouvante. Bourgeois, croyez-moi, laissons la peur du rouge aux bêtes à cornes.

Il avisa un coin de mur où était placardée la plus pacifique feuille de papier du monde, une permission de manger des œufs, un mandement de carême adressé par l’archevêque de Paris à ses «ouailles».

Bahorel s’écria:

— Ouailles; manière polie de dire oies.

Et il arracha du mur le mandement. Ceci conquit Gavroche. À partir de cet instant, Gavroche se mit à étudier Bahorel.

— Bahorel, observa Enjolras, tu as tort. Tu aurais dû laisser ce mandement tranquille, ce n’est pas à lui que nous avons affaire, tu dépenses inutilement de la colère. Garde ta provision. On ne fait pas feu hors des rangs, pas plus avec l’âme qu’avec le fusil.

— Chacun son genre, Enjolras, riposta Bahorel. Cette prose d’évêque me choque, je veux manger des œufs sans qu’on me le permette. Toi tu as le genre froid brûlant; moi je m’amuse. D’ailleurs, je ne me dépense pas, je prends de l’élan; et si j’ai déchiré ce mandement, Hercle! c’est pour me mettre en appétit.

Ce mot, Hercle, frappa Gavroche. Il cherchait toutes les occasions de s’instruire, et ce déchireur d’affiches-là avait son estime. Il lui demanda:

— Qu’est-ce que cela veut dire, Hercle?

Bahorel répondit:

— Cela veut dire sacré nom d’un chien en latin.

Ici Bahorel reconnut à une fenêtre un jeune homme pâle à barbe noire qui les regardait passer, probablement un ami de l’A B C. Il lui cria:

— Vite, des cartouches! para bellum.

— Bel homme! c’est vrai, dit Gavroche qui maintenant comprenait le latin.

Un cortège tumultueux les accompagnait, étudiants, artistes, jeunes gens affiliés à la Cougourde d’Aix, ouvriers, gens du port, armés de bâtons et de bayonnettes, quelques-uns, comme Combeferre, avec des pistolets entrés dans leurs pantalons. Un vieillard, qui paraissait très vieux, marchait dans cette bande. Il n’avait point d’arme, et se hâtait pour ne point rester en arrière, quoiqu’il eût l’air pensif. Gavroche l’aperçut:

— Keksekça? dit-il à Courfeyrac.

— C’est un vieux.

C’était M. Mabeuf.

Chapitre V

Le vieillard

Disons ce qui s’était passé:

Enjolras et ses amis étaient sur le boulevard Bourdon près des greniers d’abondance au moment où les dragons avaient chargé. Enjolras, Courfeyrac et Combeferre étaient de ceux qui avaient pris par la rue Bassompierre en criant: Aux barricades! Rue Lesdiguières ils avaient rencontré un vieillard qui cheminait.

Ce qui avait appelé leur attention, c’est que ce bonhomme marchait en zigzag comme s’il était ivre. En outre il avait son chapeau à la main, quoiqu’il eût plu toute la matinée et qu’il plût assez fort en ce moment-là même. Courfeyrac avait reconnu le père Mabeuf. Il le connaissait pour avoir maintes fois accompagné Marius jusqu’à sa porte. Sachant les habitudes paisibles et plus que timides du vieux marguillier bouquiniste, et stupéfait de le voir au milieu de ce tumulte, à deux pas des charges de cavalerie, presque au milieu d’une fusillade, décoiffé sous la pluie et se promenant parmi les balles, il l’avait abordé, et l’émeutier de vingt-cinq ans et l’octogénaire avaient échangé ce dialogue:

— Monsieur Mabeuf, rentrez chez vous.

— Pourquoi?

— Il va y avoir du tapage.

— C’est bon.

— Des coups de sabre, des coups de fusil, monsieur Mabeuf.

— C’est bon.

— Des coups de canon.

— C’est bon. Où allez-vous, vous autres?

— Nous allons flanquer le gouvernement par terre.

— C’est bon.

Et il s’était mis à les suivre. Depuis ce moment-là, il n’avait pas prononcé une parole. Son pas était devenu ferme tout à coup, des ouvriers lui avaient offert le bras, il avait refusé d’un signe de tête. Il s’avançait presque au premier rang de la colonne, ayant tout à la fois le mouvement d’un homme qui marche et le visage d’un homme qui dort.

— Quel bonhomme enragé! murmuraient les étudiants. Le bruit courait dans l’attroupement que c’était — un ancien conventionnel, — un vieux régicide.

Le rassemblement avait pris par la rue de la Verrerie. Le petit Gavroche marchait en avant avec ce chant à tue-tête qui faisait de lui une espèce de clairon. Il chantait:

Voici la lune qui paraît,
Quand irons-nous dans la forêt?
Demandait Charlot à Charlotte.

Tou tou tou
Pour Chatou.
Je n’ai qu’un Dieu, qu’un roi, qu’un liard et qu’une botte.

Pour avoir bu de grand matin
La rosée à même le thym,
Deux moineaux étaient en ribote.

Zi zi zi
Pour Passy.
Je n’ai qu’un Dieu, qu’un roi, qu’un liard et qu’une botte.

Et ces deux pauvres petits loups
Comme deux grives étaient soûls;
Un tigre en riait dans sa grotte.

Don don don
Pour Meudon.
Je n’ai qu’un Dieu, qu’un roi, qu’un liard et qu’une botte.

L’un jurait et l’autre sacrait.
Quand irons-nous dans la forêt?
Demandait Charlot à Charlotte.

Tin tin tin
Pour Pantin.
Je n’ai qu’un Dieu, qu’un roi, qu’un liard et qu’une botte.

Ils se dirigeaient vers Saint-Merry.

Chapitre VI

Recrues

La bande grossissait à chaque instant. Vers la rue des Billettes, un homme de haute taille, grisonnant, dont Courfeyrac, Enjolras et Combeferre remarquèrent la mine rude et hardie, mais qu'aucun d'eux ne connaissait, se joignit à eux. Gavroche occupé de chanter, de siffler, de bourdonner, d'aller en avant, et de cogner aux volets des boutiques avec la crosse de son pistolet sans chien, ne fit pas attention à cet homme.

Il se trouva que, rue de la Verrerie, ils passèrent devant la porte de Courfeyrac.

— Cela se trouve bien, dit Courfeyrac, j'ai oublié ma bourse, et j'ai perdu mon chapeau. Il quitta l'attroupement et monta chez lui quatre à quatre. Il prit un vieux chapeau et sa bourse. Il prit aussi un grand coffre carré de la dimension d'une grosse valise qui était caché dans son linge sale. Comme il redescendait en courant, la portière le héla.

— Monsieur de Courfeyrac!

— Portière, comment vous appelez-vous? riposta Courfeyrac.

La portière demeura ébahie.

— Mais vous le savez bien, je suis la concierge, je me nomme la mère Veuvain.

— Eh bien, si vous m'appelez encore monsieur de Courfeyrac, je vous appelle mère de Veuvain. Maintenant, parlez, qu'y a-t-il? qu'est-ce?

— Il y a là quelqu'un qui veut vous parler.

— Qui ça?

— Je ne sais pas.

— Où ça?

— Dans ma loge.

— Au diable! fit Courfeyrac.

— Mais ça attend depuis plus d'une heure que vous rentriez! reprit la portière.

En même temps, une espèce de jeune ouvrier, maigre, blême, petit, marqué de taches de rousseur, vêtu d'une blouse trouée et d'un pantalon de velours à côtes rapiécé, et qui avait plutôt l'air d'une fille accoutrée en garçon que d'un homme, sortit de la loge et dit à Courfeyrac d'une voix qui, par exemple, n'était pas le moins du monde une voix de femme:

— Monsieur Marius, s'il vous plaît?

— Il n'y est pas.

— Rentrera-t-il ce soir?

— Je n'en sais rien.

Et Courfeyrac ajouta: — Quant à moi, je ne rentrerai pas.

Le jeune homme le regarda fixement et lui demanda:

— Pourquoi cela?

— Parce que.

— Où allez-vous donc?

— Qu'est-ce que cela te fait?

— Voulez-vous que je vous porte votre coffre?

— Je vais aux barricades.

— Voulez-vous que j'aille avec vous?

— Si tu veux! répondit Courfeyrac. La rue est libre, les pavés sont à tout le monde.

Et il s'échappa en courant pour rejoindre ses amis. Quand il les eut rejoints, il donna le coffre à porter à l'un d'eux. Ce ne fut qu'un grand quart d'heure après qu'il s'aperçut que le jeune homme les avait en effet suivis.

Un attroupement ne va pas précisément où il veut. Nous avons expliqué que c'est un coup de vent qui l'emporte. Ils dépassèrent Saint-Merry et se trouvèrent, sans trop savoir comment, rue Saint-Denis.

Livre douzième — Corinthe

Chapitre I

Histoire de Corinthe depuis sa fondation

Les Parisiens qui, aujourd’hui, en entrant dans la rue Rambuteau du côté des halles, remarquent à leur droite, vis-à-vis la rue Mondétour, une boutique de vannier ayant pour enseigne un panier qui a la forme de l’empereur Napoléon le Grand avec cette inscription:

NAPOLEON EST
FAIT TOUT EN OSIER

ne se doutent guère des scènes terribles que ce même emplacement a vues, il y a à peine trente ans.

C’est là qu’étaient la rue de la Chanvrerie, que les anciens titres écrivent Chanverrerie, et le cabaret célèbre appelé Corinthe.

On se rappelle tout ce qui a été dit sur la barricade élevée en cet endroit et éclipsée d’ailleurs par la barricade Saint-Merry. C’est sur cette fameuse barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie, aujourd’hui tombée dans une nuit profonde, que nous allons jeter un peu de lumière.

Qu’on nous permette de recourir, pour la clarté du récit, au moyen simple déjà employé par nous pour Waterloo. Les personnes qui voudront se représenter d’une manière assez exacte les pâtés de maisons qui se dressaient à cette époque près la pointe Saint-Eustache, à l’angle nord-est des halles de Paris, où est aujourd’hui l’embouchure de la rue Rambuteau, n’ont qu’à se figurer, touchant la rue Saint-Denis par le sommet et par la base les halles, une N dont les deux jambages verticaux seraient la rue de la Grande-Truanderie et la rue de la Chanvrerie et dont la rue de la Petite-Truanderie ferait le jambage transversal. La vieille rue Mondétour coupait les trois jambages selon les angles les plus tortus. Si bien que l’enchevêtrement dédaléen de ces quatre rues suffisait pour faire, sur un espace de cent toises carrées, entre les halles et la rue Saint-Denis d’une part, entre la rue du Cygne et la rue des Prêcheurs d’autre part, sept îlots de maisons, bizarrement taillés, de grandeurs diverses, posés de travers et comme au hasard, et séparés à peine, ainsi que les blocs de pierre dans le chantier, par des fentes étroites.

Nous disons fentes étroites, et nous ne pouvons pas donner une plus juste idée de ces ruelles obscures, resserrées, anguleuses, bordées de masures à huit étages. Ces masures étaient si décrépites que, dans les rues de la Chanvrerie et de la Petite-Truanderie, les façades s’étayaient de poutres allant d’une maison à l’autre. La rue était étroite et le ruisseau large, le passant y cheminait sur le pavé toujours mouillé, côtoyant des boutiques pareilles à des caves, de grosses bornes cerclées de fer, des tas d’ordures excessifs, des portes d’allées armées d’énormes grilles séculaires. La rue Rambuteau a dévasté tout cela.

Le nom Mondétour peint à merveille les sinuosités de toute cette voirie. Un peu plus loin, on les trouvait encore mieux exprimées par la rue Pirouette qui se jetait dans la rue Mondétour.

Le passant qui s’engageait de la rue Saint-Denis dans la rue de la Chanvrerie la voyait peu à peu se rétrécir devant lui, comme s’il fût entré dans un entonnoir allongé. Au bout de la rue, qui était fort courte, il trouvait le passage barré du côté des halles par une haute rangée de maisons, et il se fût cru dans un cul-de-sac, s’il n’eût aperçu à droite et à gauche deux tranchées noires par où il pouvait s’échapper. C’était la rue Mondétour, laquelle allait rejoindre d’un côté la rue des Prêcheurs, de l’autre la rue du Cygne et la Petite-Truanderie. Au fond de cette espèce de cul-de-sac, à l’angle de la tranchée de droite, on remarquait une maison moins élevée que les autres et formant une sorte de cap sur la rue.

C’est dans cette maison, de deux étages seulement, qu’était allégrement installé depuis trois cents ans un cabaret illustre. Ce cabaret faisait un bruit de joie au lieu même que le vieux Théophile a signalé dans ces deux vers:

Là branle le squelette horrible
D’un pauvre amant qui se pendit.

L’endroit étant bon, les cabaretiers s’y succédaient de père en fils.

Du temps de Mathurin Régnier, ce cabaret s’appelait le Pot-aux-Roses, et comme la mode était aux rébus, il avait pour enseigne un poteau peint en rose. Au siècle dernier, le digne Natoire, l’un des maîtres fantasques aujourd’hui dédaignés par l’école roide, s’étant grisé plusieurs fois dans ce cabaret à la table même où s’était soûlé Régnier, avait peint par reconnaissance une grappe de raisin de Corinthe sur le poteau rose. Le cabaretier, de joie, en avait changé son enseigne et avait fait dorer au-dessous de la grappe ces mots: au Raisin de Corinthe. De là ce nom, Corinthe. Rien n’est plus naturel aux ivrognes que les ellipses. L’ellipse est le zigzag de la phrase. Corinthe avait peu à peu détrôné le Pot-aux-Roses.

Le dernier cabaretier de la dynastie, le père Hucheloup, ne sachant même plus la tradition, avait fait peindre le poteau en bleu.

Une salle en bas où était le comptoir, une salle au premier où était le billard, un escalier de bois en spirale perçant le plafond, le vin sur les tables, la fumée sur les murs, des chandelles en plein jour, voilà quel était le cabaret. Un escalier à trappe dans la salle d’en bas conduisait à la cave. Au second était le logis des Hucheloup. On y montait par un escalier, échelle plutôt qu’escalier, n’ayant pour entrée qu’une porte dérobée dans la grande salle du premier. Sous le toit, deux greniers mansardes, nids de servantes. La cuisine partageait le rez-de-chaussée avec la salle du comptoir.

Le père Hucheloup était peut-être né chimiste, le fait est qu’il fut cuisinier; on ne buvait pas seulement dans son cabaret, on y mangeait. Hucheloup avait inventé une chose excellente qu’on ne mangeait que chez lui, c’étaient des carpes farcies qu’il appelait carpes au gras. On mangeait cela à la lueur d’une chandelle de suif ou d’un quinquet du temps de Louis XVI sur des tables où était clouée une toile cirée en guise de nappe. On y venait de loin. Hucheloup avait, un beau matin, avait jugé à propos d’avertir les passants de sa «spécialité»; il avait trempé un pinceau dans un pot de noir, et comme il avait une orthographe à lui, de même qu’une cuisine à lui, il avait improvisé sur son mur cette inscription remarquable:

CARPES HO GRAS

Un hiver, les averses et les giboulées avaient eu la fantaisie d’effacer l’S qui terminait le premier mot et le G qui commençait le troisième; et il était resté ceci:

CARPE HO RAS

Le temps et la pluie aidant, une humble annonce gastronomique était devenue un conseil profond.

De la sorte il s’était trouvé que, ne sachant pas le français, le père Hucheloup avait su le latin, qu’il avait fait sortir de la cuisine la philosophie, et que, voulant simplement effacer Carême, il avait égalé Horace. Et ce qui était frappant, c’est que cela aussi voulait dire: entrez dans mon cabaret.

Rien de tout cela n’existe aujourd’hui. Le dédale Mondétour était éventré et largement ouvert dès 1847, et probablement n’est plus à l’heure qu’il est. La rue de la Chanvrerie et Corinthe ont disparu sous le pavé de la rue Rambuteau.

Comme nous l’avons dit, Corinthe était un des lieux de réunion, sinon de ralliement, de Courfeyrac et de ses amis. C’est Grantaire qui avait découvert Corinthe. Il y était entré à cause de Carpe Horas et y était retourné à cause des Carpes au Gras. On y buvait, on y mangeait, on y criait; on y payait peu, on y payait mal, on n’y payait pas, on était toujours bienvenu. Le père Hucheloup était un bonhomme.

Hucheloup, bonhomme, nous venons de le dire, était un gargotier à moustaches; variété amusante. Il avait toujours la mine de mauvaise humeur, semblait vouloir intimider ses pratiques, bougonnait les gens qui entraient chez lui, et avait l’air plus disposé à leur chercher querelle qu’à leur servir la soupe. Et pourtant, nous maintenons le mot, on était toujours bienvenu. Cette bizarrerie avait achalandé sa boutique, et lui amenait des jeunes gens se disant: Viens donc voir maronner le père Hucheloup. Il avait été maître d’armes. Tout à coup il éclatait de rire. Grosse voix, bon diable. C’était un fond comique avec une apparence tragique; il ne demandait pas mieux que de vous faire peur; à peu près comme ces tabatières qui ont la forme d’un pistolet. La détonation éternue.

Il avait pour femme la mère Hucheloup, un être barbu, fort laid.

Vers 1830, le père Hucheloup mourut. Avec lui disparut le secret des carpes au gras. Sa veuve, peu consolable, continua le cabaret. Mais la cuisine dégénéra et devint exécrable, le vin, qui avait toujours été mauvais, fut affreux. Courfeyrac et ses amis continuèrent pourtant d’aller à Corinthe, — par piété, disait Bossuet.

La veuve Hucheloup était essoufflée et difforme avec des souvenirs champêtres. Elle leur ôtait la fadeur par la prononciation. Elle avait une façon à elle de dire les choses qui assaisonnait ses réminiscences villageoises et printanières. Ç’avait été jadis son bonheur, affirmait-elle, d’entendre «les loups-de-gorge chanter dans les ogrépines».

La salle du premier, où était le «restaurant» était une grande longue pièce encombrée de tabourets, d’escabeaux, de chaises, de bancs et de tables, et d’un vieux billard boiteux. On y arrivait par l’escalier en spirale qui aboutissait dans l’angle de la salle à un trou carré pareil à une écoutille de navire.

Cette salle, éclairée d’une seule fenêtre étroite et d’un quinquet toujours allumé, avait un air de galetas. Tous les meubles à quatre pieds se comportaient comme s’ils en avaient trois. Les murs blanchis à la chaux n'avaient pour tout ornement que ce quatrain en l'honneur de mame Hucheloup:

Elle étonne à dix pas, elle épouvante à deux.
Une verrue habite en son nez hasardeux;
On tremble à chaque instant qu'elle ne vous la mouche,
Et qu'un beau jour son nez ne tombe dans sa bouche.

Cela était charbonné sur la muraille.

Mame Hucheloup, ressemblante, allait et venait du matin au soir devant ce quatrain, avec une parfaite tranquillité. Deux servantes, appelées Matelote et Gibelotte, et auxquelles on n'a jamais connu d'autres noms, aidaient mame Hucheloup à poser sur les tables les cruchons de vin bleu et les brouets variés qu'on servait aux affamés dans des écuelles de poterie. Matelote, grosse, ronde, rousse et criarde, ancienne sultane favorite du défunt Hucheloup, était laide, plus que n'importe quel monstre mythologique; pourtant, comme il sied que la servante se tienne toujours en arrière de la maîtresse, elle était moins laide que mame Hucheloup. Gibelotte, longue, délicate, blanche d'une blancheur lymphatique, les yeux cernés, les paupières tombantes, toujours épuisée et accablée, atteinte de ce qu'on pourrait appeler la lassitude chronique, levée la première, couchée la dernière, servait tout le monde, même l'autre servante, en silence et avec douceur, en souriant sous la fatigue d'une sorte de vague sourire endormi.

Il y avait un miroir au-dessus du comptoir.

Avant d'entrer dans la salle-restaurant, on lisait sur la porte ce vers écrit à la craie par Courfeyrac:

Régale si tu peux et mange si tu l'oses.

Chapitre II

Gaîtés préalables

Laigle de Meaux, on le sait, demeurait plutôt chez Joly qu'ailleurs. Il avait un logis comme l'oiseau a une branche. Les deux amis vivaient ensemble, mangeaient ensemble, dormaient ensemble. Tout leur était commun, même un peu Musichetta. Ils étaient ce que, chez les frères chapeaux, on appelle bini. Le matin du 5 juin, ils s'en allèrent déjeuner à Corinthe. Joly, enchifrené, avait un fort coryza que Laigle commençait à partager. L'habit de Laigle était râpé, mais Joly était bien mis.

Il était environ neuf heures du matin quand ils poussèrent la porte de Corinthe.

Ils montèrent au premier.

Matelote et Gibelotte les reçurent.

— Huîtres, fromage et jambon, dit Laigle.

Et ils s'attablèrent.

Le cabaret était vide; il n'y avait qu'eux deux.

Gibelotte, reconnaissant Joly et Laigle, mit une bouteille de vin sur la table.

Comme ils étaient aux premières huîtres, une tête apparut à l'écoutille de l'escalier, et une voix dit:

— Je passais. J'ai senti, de la rue, une délicieuse odeur de fromage de Brie. J'entre.

C'était Grantaire.

Grantaire prit un tabouret et s'attabla.

Gibelotte, voyant Grantaire, mit deux bouteilles de vin sur la table.

Cela fit trois.

— Est-ce que tu vas boire ces deux bouteilles? demanda Laigle à Grantaire.

Grantaire répondit:

— Tous sont ingénieux, toi seul es ingénu. Deux bouteilles n'ont jamais étonné un homme.

Les autres avaient commencé par manger, Grantaire commença par boire. Une demi-bouteille fut vivement engloutie.

— Tu as donc un trou à l'estomac? reprit Laigle.

— Tu en as bien un au coude, dit Grantaire.

Et, après avoir vidé son verre, il ajouta:

— Ah ça, Laigle des oraisons funèbres, ton habit est vieux.

— Je l'espère, repartit Laigle. Cela fait que nous faisons bon ménage, mon habit et moi. Il a pris tous mes plis, il ne me gêne en rien, il s'est moulé sur mes difformités, il est complaisant à tous mes mouvements; je ne le sens que parce qu'il me tient chaud. Les vieux habits, c'est la même chose que les vieux amis.

— C'est vrai, s'écria Joly entrant dans le dialogue, un vieil habit est un vieil abi.

— Surtout, dit Grantaire, dans la bouche d'un homme enchifrené.

— Grantaire, demanda Laigle, viens-tu du boulevard?

— Non.

— Nous venons de voir passer la tête du cortège, Joly et moi.

— C'est un spectacle berveilleux, dit Joly.

— Comme cette rue est tranquille! s'écria Laigle. Qui est-ce qui se douterait que Paris est sens dessus dessous? Comme on voit que c'était jadis tout couvents par ici! Du Breul et Sauval en donnent la liste, et l'abbé Lebeuf. Il y en avait tout autour, ça fourmillait, des chaussés, des déchaussés, des tondus, des barbus, des gris, des noirs, des blancs, des franciscains, des minimes, des capucins, des carmes, des petits augustins, des grands augustins, des vieux augustins... — Ça pullulait.

— Ne parlons pas de moines, interrompit Grantaire, cela donne envie de se gratter.

Puis il s'exclama:

— Bouh! je viens d'avaler une mauvaise huître. Voilà l'hypocondrie qui me reprend. Les huîtres sont gâtées, les servantes sont laides. Je hais l'espèce humaine. J'ai passé tout à l'heure rue Richelieu devant la grosse librairie publique. Ce tas d'écailles d'huîtres qu'on appelle une bibliothèque me dégoûte de penser. Que de papier! que d'encre! que de griffonnage! On a écrit tout ça! quel maroufle a donc dit que l'homme était un bipède sans plume? Et puis, j'ai rencontré une jolie fille que je connais, belle comme le printemps, digne de s'appeler Floréal, et ravie, transportée, heureuse, aux anges, la misérable, parce que hier un épouvantable banquier tigré de petite vérole a daigné vouloir d'elle! Hélas! la femme guette le traitant non moins que le muguet; les chattes chassent aux souris comme aux oiseaux. Cette donzelle, il n'y a pas deux mois qu'elle était sage dans une mansarde, elle ajustait des petits ronds de cuivre à des œillets de corset, comment appelez-vous ça? elle cousait, elle avait un lit de sangle; elle demeurait auprès d'un pot de fleurs, elle était contente. La voilà banquière. Cette transformation s'est faite cette nuit. J'ai rencontré cette victime ce matin, toute joyeuse. Ce qui est hideux, c'est que la drôlesse était tout aussi jolie aujourd'hui qu'hier. Son financier ne paraissait pas sur sa figure. Les roses ont ceci de plus ou de moins que les femmes, que les traces que leur laissent les chenilles sont visibles. Ah! il n'y a pas de morale sur la terre, j'en atteste le myrte, symbole de l'amour, le laurier, symbole de la guerre, l'olivier, ce bêta, symbole de la paix, le pommier, qui a failli étrangler Adam avec son pépin, et le figuier, grand-père des jupons. Quant au droit, voulez-vous savoir ce que c'est que le droit? Les Gaulois convoitent Cluse, Rome protège Cluse, et leur demande quel tort Cluse leur a fait. Brennus répond: — Le tort que vous a fait Albe, le tort que vous a fait Fidèrie, le tort que vous ont fait les Èques, les Volsques et les Sabins. Ils étaient vos voisins. Les Clusiens sont les nôtres. Nous entendons le voisinage comme vous. Vous avez volé Albe, nous prenons Cluse. Rome dit: Vous ne prendrez pas Cluse. Brennus prit Rome. Puis il cria: Voe victis! Voilà ce qu'est le droit. Ah! dans ce monde, que de bêtes de proie! que d'aigles! J'en ai la chair de poule.

Il tendit son verre à Joly qui le remplit, puis il but, et poursuivit, sans presque avoir été interrompu par ce verre de vin dont personne ne s'aperçut, pas même lui:

— Brennus, qui prend Rome, est un aigle; le banquier, qui prend la grisette, est un aigle. Pas plus de pudeur ici que là. Donc ne croyons à rien. Il n'y a qu'une réalité: boire. Quelle que soit votre opinion, soyez pour le coq maigre comme le canton d'Uri ou pour le coq gras comme le canton de Glaris, peu importe, buvez. Vous me parlez du boulevard, du cortège, et caetera. Ah çà, il va donc encore y avoir une révolution? Cette indigence de moyens m'étonne de la part du bon Dieu. Il faut qu'à tout moment il se remette à suifer la rainure des événements. Ça accroche, ça ne marche pas. Vite une révolution. Le bon Dieu a toujours les mains noires de ce vilain cambouis-là. À sa place, je serais plus simple, je ne remonterais pas à chaque instant ma mécanique, je mènerais le genre humain rondement, je tricoterais les faits maille à maille sans casser le fil, je n'aurais point d'en-cas, je n'aurais pas de répertoire extraordinaire. Ce que vous autres appelez le progrès marche par deux moteurs, les hommes et les événements. Mais, chose triste, de temps en temps, l'exceptionnel est nécessaire. Pour les événements comme pour les hommes, la troupe ordinaire ne suffit pas; il faut parmi les hommes des génies, et parmi les événements des révolutions. Les grands accidents sont la loi; l'ordre des choses ne peut s'en passer; et, à voir les apparitions de comètes, on serait tenté de croire que le ciel lui-même a besoin d'acteurs en représentation. Au moment où l'on s'y attend le moins, Dieu placarde un météore sur la muraille du firmament. Quelque étoile bizarre survient, soulignée par une queue énorme. Et cela fait mourir César. Brutus lui donne un coup de couteau, et Dieu un coup de comète. Crac, voilà une aurore boréale, voilà une révolution, voilà un grand homme; 93 en grosses lettres, Napoléon en vedette, la comète de 1811 au haut de l'affiche. Ah! la belle affiche bleue, toute constellée de flamboiements inattendus! Boum! boum! spectacle extraordinaire. Levez les yeux, badauds. Tout est échevelé, l'astre comme le drame. Bon Dieu, c'est trop, et ce n'est pas assez. Ces ressources, prises dans l'exception, semblent magnificence et sont pauvreté. Mes amis, la providence en est aux expédients. Une révolution, qu'est-ce que cela prouve? Que Dieu est à court. Il fait un coup d'État, parce qu'il y a solution de continuité entre le présent et l'avenir, et parce que, lui Dieu, il n'a pas pu joindre les deux bouts. Au fait, cela me confirme dans mes conjectures sur la situation de fortune de Jéhovah; et à voir tant de malaise en haut et en bas, tant de mesquinerie et de pingrerie et de ladrerie et de détresse au ciel et sur la terre, depuis l'oiseau qui n'a pas un grain de mil jusqu'à moi qui n'ai pas cent mille livres de rente, à voir la destinée humaine, qui est fort usée, et même la destinée royale, qui montre la corde, témoin le prince de Condé pendu, à voir l'hiver, qui n'est pas autre chose qu'une déchirure au zénith par où le vent souffle, à voir tant de haillons dans la pourpre toute neuve du matin au sommet des collines, à voir les gouttes de rosée, ces perles fausses, à voir le givre, ce strass, à voir l'humanité décousue et les événements rapiécés, et tant de taches au soleil, et tant de trous à la lune, à voir tant de misère partout, je soupçonne que Dieu n'est pas riche. Il a de l'apparence, c'est vrai, mais je sens la gêne. Il donne une révolution, comme un négociant dont la caisse est vide donne un bal. Il ne faut pas juger des dieux sur l'apparence. Sous la dorure du ciel j'entrevois un univers pauvre. Dans la création il y a de la faillite. C'est pourquoi je suis mécontent. Voyez, c'est le cinq juin, il fait presque nuit; depuis ce matin j'attends que le jour vienne. Il n'est pas venu, et je gage qu'il ne viendra pas de la journée. C'est une inexactitude de commis mal payé. Oui, tout est mal arrangé, rien ne s'ajuste à rien, ce vieux monde est tout déjeté, je me range dans l'opposition. Tout va de guingois; l'univers est taquinant. C'est comme les enfants, ceux qui en désirent n'en ont pas, ceux qui n'en désirent pas en ont. Total: je bisque. En outre, Laigle de Meaux, ce chauve, m'afflige à voir. Cela m'humilie de penser que je suis du même âge que ce genou. Du reste, je critique, mais je n'insulte pas. L'univers est ce qu'il est. Je parle ici sans méchante intention et pour l'acquit de ma conscience. Recevez, Père éternel, l'assurance de ma considération distinguée. Ah! par tous les saints de l'Olympe et par tous les dieux du paradis, je n'étais pas fait pour être Parisien, c'est-à-dire pour ricocher à jamais, comme un volant entre deux raquettes, du groupe des flâneurs au groupe des tapageurs! J'étais fait pour être Turc, regardant toute la journée des péronnelles orientales exécuter ces exquises danses d'Égypte lubriques comme les songes d'un homme chaste, ou paysan beauceron, ou gentilhomme vénitien entouré de gentilles-donnes, ou petit prince allemand fournissant la moitié d'un fantassin à la confédération germanique, et occupant ses loisirs à faire sécher ses chaussettes sur sa haie, c'est-à-dire sur sa frontière! Voilà pour quels destins j'étais né! Oui, j'ai dit Turc, et je ne m'en dédis point. Je ne comprends pas qu'on prenne habituellement les Turcs en mauvaise part; Mahom a du bon; respect à l'inventeur des sérails à houris et des paradis à odalisques! N'insultons pas le mahométisme, la seule religion qui soit ornée d'un poulailler! Sur ce, j'insiste pour boire. La terre est une grosse bêtise. Et il paraît qu'ils vont se battre, tous ces imbéciles, se faire casser le profil, se massacrer, en plein été, au mois de juin, quand ils pourraient s'en aller, avec une créature sous le bras, respirer dans les champs l'immense tasse de thé des foins coupés! Vraiment, on fait trop de sottises. Une vieille lanterne cassée que j'ai vue tout à l'heure chez un marchand de bric-à-brac me suggère une réflexion: Il serait temps d'éclairer le genre humain. Oui, me revoilà triste! Ce que c'est que d'avaler une huître et une révolution de travers! Je redeviens lugubre. Oh! l'affreux vieux monde! On s'y évertue, on s'y destitue, on s'y prostitue, on s'y tue, on s'y habitue!

Et Grantaire, après cette quinte d'éloquence, eut une quinte de toux, méritée.

— À propos de révolution, dit Joly, il paraît que décidébent Barius est aboureux.

— Sait-on de qui? demanda Laigle.

— Don.

— Non?

— Don! je te dis!

— Les amours de Marius! s'écria Grantaire. Je vois ça d'ici. Marius est un brouillard, et il aura trouvé une vapeur. Marius est de la race poète. Qui dit poète dit fou. Tymbræus Apollo. Marius et sa Marie, ou sa Maria, ou sa Mariette, ou sa Marion, cela doit faire de drôles d'amants. Je me rends compte de ce que cela est. Des extases où l'on oublie le baiser. Chastes sur la terre, mais s'accouplant dans l'infini. Ce sont des âmes qui ont des sens. Ils couchent ensemble dans les étoiles.

Grantaire entamait sa seconde bouteille, et peut-être sa seconde harangue quand un nouvel être émergea du trou carré de l'escalier. C'était un garçon de moins de dix ans, déguenillé, très petit, jaune, le visage en museau, l'œil vif, énormément chevelu, mouillé de pluie, l'air content.

L'enfant, choisissant sans hésiter parmi les trois, quoiqu'il n'en connût évidemment aucun, s'adressa à Laigle de Meaux.

— Est-ce que vous êtes monsieur Bossuet? demanda-t-il.

— C'est mon petit nom, répondit Laigle. Que me veux-tu?

— Voilà. Un grand blond sur le boulevard m'a dit: Connais-tu la mère Hucheloup? J'ai dit: Oui, rue Chanvrerie, la veuve au vieux. Il m'a dit: Vas-y. Tu y trouveras monsieur Bossuet, et tu lui diras de ma part: A-B-C. C'est une farce qu'on vous fait, n'est-ce pas? Il m'a donné dix sous.

— Joly, prête-moi dix sous, dit Laigle; et se tournant vers Grantaire: Grantaire, prête-moi dix sous.

Cela fit vingt sous que Laigle donna à l'enfant.

— Merci, monsieur, dit le petit garçon.

— Comment t'appelles-tu? demanda Laigle.

— Navet, l'ami à Gavroche.

— Reste avec nous, dit Laigle.

— Déjeune avec nous, dit Grantaire.

L'enfant répondit:

— Je ne peux pas, je suis du cortège, c'est moi qui crie à bas Polignac.

Et tirant le pied longuement derrière lui, ce qui est le plus respectueux des saluts possibles, il s'en alla.

L'enfant parti, Grantaire prit la parole:

— Ceci est le gamin pur. Il y a beaucoup de variétés dans le genre gamin. Le gamin notaire s'appelle saute-ruisseau, le gamin cuisinier s'appelle marmiton, le gamin boulanger s'appelle mitron, le gamin laquais s’appelle groom, le gamin marin s’appelle mousse, le gamin soldat s’appelle tapin, le gamin peintre s’appelle rapin, le gamin négociant s’appelle trottin, le gamin courtisan s’appelle menin, le gamin roi s’appelle dauphin, le gamin dieu s’appelle bambino.

Cependant Laigle méditait; il dit à demi-voix:

— A-B-C, c’est-à-dire: Enterrement de Lamarque.

— Le grand blond, observa Grantaire, c’est Enjolras qui te fait avertir.

— Irons-nous? fit Bossuet.

— Il pleut, dit Joly. J’ai juré d’aller au feu, pas à l’eau. Je de veux pas b’enrhuber.

— Je reste ici, dit Grantaire. Je préfère un déjeuner à un corbillard.

— Conclusion: nous restons, reprit Laigle. Eh bien, buvons alors. D’ailleurs on peut manquer l’enterrement, sans manquer l’émeute.

— Ah! l’ébeute, j’en suis, s’écria Joly.

Laigle se frotta les mains:

— Voilà donc qu’on va retoucher à la révolution de 1830. Au fait elle gêne le peuple aux entournures.

— Cela m’est à peu près égal, votre révolution, dit Grantaire. Je n’exècre pas ce gouvernement-ci. C’est la couronne tempérée par le bonnet de coton. C’est un sceptre terminé en parapluie. Au fait, aujourd’hui, j’y songe, par le temps qu’il fait, Louis-Philippe pourra utiliser sa royauté à deux fins, étendre le bout sceptre contre le peuple et ouvrir le bout parapluie contre le ciel.

La salle était obscure, de grosses nuées achevaient de supprimer le jour. Il n’y avait personne dans le cabaret, ni dans la rue, tout le monde étant allé «voir les événements».

— Est-il midi ou minuit? cria Bossuet. On n’y voit goutte. Gibelotte, de la lumière!

Grantaire, triste, buvait.

— Enjolras me dédaigne, murmura-t-il. Enjolras a dit: Joly est malade, Grantaire est ivre. C’est à Bossuet qu’il a envoyé Navet. S’il était venu me prendre, je l’aurais suivi. Tant pis pour Enjolras! je n’irai pas à son enterrement.

Cette résolution prise, Bossuet, Joly et Grantaire ne bougèrent plus du cabaret. Vers deux heures de l’après-midi, la table où ils s’accoudaient était couverte de bouteilles vides. Deux chandelles y brûlaient, l’une dans un bougeoir de cuivre parfaitement vert, l’autre dans le goulot d’une carafe fêlée. Grantaire avait entraîné Joly et Bossuet vers le vin; Bossuet et Joly avaient ramené Grantaire vers la joie.

Quant à Grantaire, depuis midi, il avait dépassé le vin, médiocre source de rêves. Le vin, près des ivrognes sérieux, n’a qu’un succès d’estime. Il y a, en fait d’ébriété, la magie noire et la magie blanche; le vin n’est que la magie blanche. Grantaire était un aventureux buveur de songes. La noirceur d’une ivresse redoutable entr’ouverte devant lui, loin de l’arrêter l’attirait. Il avait laissé là les bouteilles et pris la chope. La chope, c’est le gouffre. N’ayant sous la main ni opium, ni haschisch, et voulant s’emplir le cerveau de crépuscule, il avait eu recours à cet effrayant mélange d’eau-de-vie, de stout et d’absinthe, qui produit des léthargies si terribles. C’est de ces trois vapeurs, bière, eau-de-vie, absinthe, qu’est fait le plomb de l’âme. Ce sont trois ténèbres; le papillon céleste s’y noie; et il s’y forme, dans une fumée membraneuse vaguement condensée en aile de chauve-souris, trois furies muettes, le Cauchemar, la Nuit, la Mort, voletant au-dessus de Psyché endormie.

Grantaire n’en était point encore à cette phase lugubre; loin de là. Il étai prodigieusement gai, et Bossuet et Joly lui donnaient la réplique. Ils trinquaient. Grantaire ajoutait à l’accentuation excentrique des mots et des idées la divagation du geste, il appuyait avec dignité son poing gauche sur son genou, son bras faisant l’équerre, et, la cravate défaite, à cheval sur un tabouret, son verre plein dans sa main droite, il jetait à la grosse servante Matelote ces paroles solennelles:

— Qu’on ouvre les portes du palais! que tout le monde soit de l’Académie française, et ait le droit d’embrasser madame Hucheloup! Buvons.

Et se tournant vers mame Hucheloup, il ajoutait:

— Femme antique et consacrée par l’usage, approche que je te contemple!

Et Joly s’écriait:

— Batelote et Gibelotte, de doddez plus à boire à Grantaire. Il bange des argents fous. Il a déjà dévoré depuis ce batin en prodigalités éperdues deux francs quatre-vingt-quinze centibes.

Et Grantaire reprenait:

— Qui donc a décroché les étoiles sans ma permission pour les mettre sur la table en guise de chandelles?

Bossuet, fort ivre, avait conservé son calme.

Il s’était assis sur l’appui de la fenêtre ouverte, mouillant son dos à la pluie qui tombait, et il contemplait ses deux amis.

Tout à coup il entendit derrière lui un tumulte, des pas précipités, des cris aux armes! Il se retourna, et aperçut, rue Saint-Denis, au bout de la rue de la Chanvrerie, Enjolras qui passait, la carabine à la main, et Gavroche avec son pistolet, Feuilly avec son sabre, Courfeyrac avec son épée, Jean Prouvaire avec son mousqueton, Combeferre avec son fusil, Bahorel avec son fusil, et tout le rassemblement armé et orageux qui les suivait.

La rue de la Chanvrerie n’était guère longue que d’une portée de carabine. Bossuet improvisa avec ses deux mains un porte-voix autour de sa bouche, et cria:

— Courfeyrac! Courfeyrac! hohée!

Courfeyrac entendit l’appel, aperçut Bossuet, et fit quelques pas dans la rue de la Chanvrerie, en criant un: que veux-tu? qui se croisa avec un: où vas-tu?

— Faire une barricade, répondit Courfeyrac.

— Eh bien, ici! la place est bonne! fais-la ici!

— C’est vrai, Aigle, dit Courfeyrac.

Et sur un signe de Courfeyrac, l’attroupement se précipita rue de la Chanvrerie.

Chapitre III

La nuit commence à se faire sur Grantaire

La place était en fait admirablement indiquée, l'entrée de la rue évasée, le fond rétréci et en cul-de-sac, Corinthe y faisant un étranglement, la rue Mondétour facile à barrer à droite et à gauche, aucune attaque possible que par la rue Saint-Denis, c'est-à-dire de front et à découvert. Bossuet gris avait eu le coup d'œil d'Annibal à jeun.

À l'irruption du rassemblement, l'épouvante avait pris toute la rue. Pas un passant qui ne se fût éclipsé. Le temps d'un éclair, au fond, à droite, à gauche, boutiques, établis, portes d'allées, fenêtres, persiennes, mansardes, volets de toute dimension, s'étaient fermés depuis les rez-de-chaussée jusque sur les toits. Une vieille femme effrayée avait fixé un matelas devant sa fenêtre à deux perches à sécher le linge, afin d'amortir la mousqueterie. La maison du cabaret était seule restée ouverte; et cela pour une bonne raison, c'est que l'attroupement s'y était rué. — Ah mon Dieu! ah mon Dieu! soupirait mame Hucheloup.

Bossuet était descendu au-devant de Courfeyrac.

Joly, qui s'était mis à la fenêtre, cria:

— Courfeyrac, tu aurais dû prendre un parapluie. Tu vas t'enrhuber.

Cependant, en quelques minutes, vingt barres de fer avaient été arrachées de la devanture grillée du cabaret, dix toises de rue avaient été dépavées; Gavroche et Bahorel avaient saisi au passage et renversé le haquet d'un fabricant de chaux appelé Anceau, ce haquet contenait trois barriques pleines de chaux qu'ils avaient placées sous des piles de pavés; Enjolras avait levé la trappe de la cave, et toutes les futailles vides de la veuve Hucheloup étaient allées flanquer les barriques de chaux; Feuilly, avec ses doigts habitués à enluminer les lames délicates des éventails, avait contre-buté les barriques et le haquet de deux massives piles de moellons. Moellons improvisés comme le reste, et pris on ne sait où. Des poutres d'étai avaient été arrachées à la façade d'une maison voisine et couchées sur les futailles. Quand Bossuet et Courfeyrac se retournèrent, la moitié de la rue était déjà barrée d'un rempart plus haut qu'un homme. Rien n'est tel que la main populaire pour bâtir tout ce qui se bâtit en démolissant.

Matelote et Gibelotte s'étaient mêlées aux travailleurs. Gibelotte allait et venait chargée de gravats. Sa lassitude aidait à la barricade. Elle servait des pavés comme elle eût servi du vin, l'air endormi.

Un omnibus qui avait deux chevaux blancs passa au bout de la rue.

Bossuet enjamba les pavés, courut, arrêta le cocher, fit descendre les voyageurs, donna la main «aux dames», congédia le conducteur et revint ramenant voiture et chevaux par la bride.

— Les omnibus, dit-il, ne passent pas devant Corinthe. Non licet omnibus adire Corinthum.

Un instant après, les chevaux dételés s'en allaient au hasard par la rue Mondétour, et l'omnibus couché sur le flanc complétait le barrage de la rue.

Mame Hucheloup, bouleversée, s'était réfugiée au premier étage.

Elle avait l'œil vague et regardait sans voir, criant tout bas. Ses cris épouvantés n'osaient sortir de son gosier.

— C'est la fin du monde, murmurait-elle.

Joly déposait un baiser sur le gros cou rouge et ridé de mame Hucheloup et disait à Grantaire: — Mon cher, j'ai toujours considéré le cou d'une femme comme une chose infiniment délicate.

Mais Grantaire atteignait les plus hautes régions du dithyrambe. Matelote étant remontée au premier, Grantaire l'avait saisie par la taille et poussait à la fenêtre de longs éclats de rire.

— Matelote est laide! criait-il. Matelote est la laideur rêve! Matelote est une chimère. Voici le secret de sa naissance: un Pygmalion gothique qui faisait des gargouilles de cathédrales tomba un beau matin amoureux de l'une d'elles, la plus horrible. Il supplia l'amour de l'animer, et cela fit Matelote. Regardez-la, citoyens! elle a les cheveux couleur chromate de plomb comme la maîtresse du Titien, et c'est une bonne fille. Je vous réponds qu'elle se battra bien. Toute bonne fille contient un héros. Quant à la mère Hucheloup, c'est une vieille brave. Voyez les moustaches qu'elle a! elle les a héritées de son mari. Une housarde, quoi! Elle se battra aussi. À elles deux elles feront peur à la banlieue. Camarades, nous renverserons le gouvernement, vrai comme il est vrai qu'il existe quinze acides intermédiaires entre l'acide margarique et l'acide formique. Du reste cela m'est parfaitement égal. Messieurs, mon père m'a toujours détesté parce que je ne pouvais comprendre les mathématiques. Je ne comprends que l'amour et la liberté. Je suis Grantaire le bon enfant! N'ayant jamais eu d'argent, je n'en ai pas pris l'habitude, ce qui fait que je n'en ai jamais manqué; mais si j’avais été riche, il n’y aurait plus eu de pauvres! on aurait vu! Oh! si les bons cœurs avaient les grosses bourses! comme tout irait mieux! Je me figure Jésus-Christ avec la fortune de Rothschild! Que de bien il ferait! Matelote, embrassez-moi! Vous êtes voluptueuse et timide! vous avez des joues qui appellent le baiser d’une sœur, et des lèvres qui réclament le baiser d’un amant!

— Tais-toi, futaille! dit Courfeyrac.

Grantaire répondit:

— Je suis capitoul et maître ès jeux floraux!

Enjolras qui était debout sur la crête du barrage, le fusil au poing, leva son beau visage austère. Enjolras, on le sait, tenait du spartiate et du puritain. Il fût mort aux Thermopyles avec Léonidas et eût brûlé Drogheda avec Cromwell.

— Grantaire! cria-t-il, va-t’en cuver ton vin hors d’ici. C’est la place de l’ivresse et non de l’ivrognerie. Ne déshonore pas la barricade!

Cette parole irritée produisit sur Grantaire un effet singulier. On eût dit qu’il recevait un verre d’eau froide à travers le visage. Il parut subitement dégrisé. Il s’assit, s’accouda sur une table près de la croisée, regarda Enjolras avec une inexprimable douceur, et lui dit:

— Tu sais que je crois en toi.

— Va-t’en.

— Laisse-moi dormir ici.

— Va dormir ailleurs, cria Enjolras.

Mais Grantaire, fixant toujours sur lui ses yeux tendres et troubles, répondit:

— Laisse-moi y dormir — jusqu’à ce que j’y meure.

Enjolras le considéra d’un œil dédaigneux:

— Grantaire, tu es incapable de croire, de penser, de vouloir, de vivre, et de mourir.

Grantaire répliqua d’une voix grave:

— Tu verras.

Il bégaya encore quelques mots inintelligibles, puis sa tête tomba pesamment sur la table, et, ce qui est un effet assez habituel de la seconde période de l’ébriété où Enjolras l’avait rudement et brusquement poussé, un instant après il était endormi.

Chapitre IV

Essai de consolation sur la veuve Hucheloup

Bahorel, extasié de la barricade, criait:

Voilà la rue décolletée! comme cela fait bien!

Courfeyrac, tout en démolissant un peu le cabaret, cherchait à consoler la veuve cabaretière.

— Mère Hucheloup, ne vous plaigniez-vous pas l’autre jour qu’on vous avait signifié procès-verbal et mise en contravention parce que Gibelotte avait secoué un tapis de lit par votre fenêtre?

— Oui, mon bon monsieur Courfeyrac. Ah! mon Dieu est-ce que vous allez me mettre aussi cette table-là dans votre horreur? Et même que, pour le tapis, et aussi pour un pot de fleurs qui était tombé de la mansarde dans la rue, le gouvernement m’a pris cent francs d’amende. Si ce n’est pas une abomination!

— Eh bien! mère Hucheloup, nous vous vengeons.

La mère Hucheloup, dans cette réparation qu’on lui faisait, ne semblait pas comprendre beaucoup son bénéfice. Elle était satisfaite à la manière de cette femme arabe qui, ayant reçu un soufflet de son mari, s’alla plaindre à son père, criant vengeance et disant: — Père, tu dois à mon mari affront pour affront. Le père demanda: — Sur quelle joue as-tu reçu le soufflet? Sur la joue gauche. Le père souffleta la joue droite et dit: — Te voilà contente. Va dire à ton mari qu’il a souffleté ma fille, mais que j’ai souffleté sa femme.

La pluie avait cessé. Des recrues étaient arrivées. Des ouvriers avaient apporté sous leurs blouses un baril de poudre, un panier contenant des bouteilles de vitriol, deux ou trois torches de carnaval et une bourriche pleine de lampions «restés de la fête du roi». Laquelle fête était toute récente, ayant eu lieu le 1er mai. On disait que ces munitions venaient de la part d’un épicier du faubourg Saint-Antoine nommé Pépin. On brisait l’unique réverbère de la rue de la Chanvrerie, la lanterne correspondante de la rue Saint-Denis, et toutes les lanternes des rues circonvoisines, de Mondétour, du Cygne, des Prêcheurs, et de la Grande et de la Petite-Truanderie.

Enjolras, Combeferre et Courfeyrac dirigeaient tout. Maintenant deux barricades se construisaient en même temps, toutes deux appuyées à la maison de Corinthe et faisant équerre; la plus grande fermait la rue de la Chanvrerie, l'autre fermait la rue Mondétour du côté de la rue du Cygne. Cette dernière barricade, très étroite, n'était construite que de tonneaux et de pavés. Ils étaient là environ cinquante travailleurs; une trentaine armés de fusils; car, chemin faisant, ils avaient fait un emprunt en bloc à une boutique d'armurier.

Rien de plus bizarre et de plus bigarré que cette troupe. L'un avait un habit-veste, un sabre de cavalerie et deux pistolets d'arçon, un autre était en manches de chemise avec un chapeau rond et une poire à poudre pendue au côté, un troisième plastronné de neuf feuilles de papier gris et armé d'une alène de sellier. Il y en avait un qui criait. Exterminons jusqu'au dernier et mourons au bout de notre bayonnette! Celui-là n'avait pas de bayonnette. Un autre étalait par-dessus sa redingote une buffleterie et une giberne de garde national avec le couvre-giberne orné de cette inscription en laine rouge: Ordre public. Force fusils portant des numéros de légions, peu de chapeaux, point de cravates, beaucoup de bras nus, quelques piques. Ajoutez à cela tous les âges, tous les visages, de petits jeunes gens pâles, des ouvriers du port bronzés. Tous se hâtaient, et, tout en s'entr'aidant, on causait des chances possibles, — qu'on aurait des secours vers trois heures du matin, — qu'on était sûr d'un régiment, — que Paris se soulèverait. Propos terribles auxquels se mêlait une sorte de jovialité cordiale. On eût dit des frères; ils ne savaient pas les noms les uns des autres. Les grands périls ont cela de beau qu'ils mettent en lumière la fraternité des inconnus.

Un feu avait été allumé dans la cuisine et l'on y fondait dans un moule à balles brocs, cuillers, fourchettes, toute l'argenterie d'étain du cabaret. On buvait à travers tout cela. Les capsules et les chevrotines traînaient pêle-mêle sur les tables avec les verres de vin. Dans la salle de billard, mame Hucheloup, Matelote et Gibelotte, diversement modifiées par la terreur, dont l'une était abrutie, l'autre essoufflée, l'autre éveillée, déchiraient de vieux torchons et faisaient de la charpie; trois insurgés les assistaient, trois gaillards chevelus, barbus et moustachus, qui épluchaient la toile avec des doigts de lingère et qui les faisaient trembler.

L'homme de haute stature que Courfeyrac, Combeferre et Enjolras avaient remarqué à l'instant où il abordait l'attroupement au coin de la rue des Billettes, travaillait à la petite barricade et s'y rendait utile. Gavroche travaillait à la grande. Quant au jeune homme qui avait attendu Courfeyrac chez lui et lui avait demandé monsieur Marius, il avait disparu à peu près vers le moment où l'on avait renversé l'omnibus.

Gavroche, complètement envolé et radieux, s'était chargé de la mise en train. Il allait, venait, montait, descendait, remontait, bruissait, étincelait. Il semblait être là pour l'encouragement de tous. Avait-il un aiguillon? oui, certes, sa misère; avait-il des ailes? oui, certes, sa joie. Gavroche était un tourbillonnement. On le voyait sans cesse, on l'entendait toujours. Il remplissait l'air, étant partout à la fois. C'était une espèce d'ubiquité presque irritante; pas d'arrêt possible avec lui. L'énorme barricade le sentait sur sa croupe. Il gênait les flâneurs, il excitait les paresseux, il ranimait les fatigués, il impatientait les pensifs, mettait les uns en gaîté, les autres en haleine, les autres en colère, tous en mouvement, piquait un étudiant, mordait un ouvrier; se posait, s'arrêtait, repartait, volait au-dessus du tumulte et de l'effort, sautait de ceux-ci à ceux-là, murmurait, bourdonnait, et harcelait tout l'attelage; mouche de l'immense Coche révolutionnaire.

Le mouvement perpétuel était dans ses petits bras et la clameur perpétuelle dans ses petits poumons:

— Hardi! encore des pavés! encore des tonneaux! encore des machins! où y en a-t-il? Une hottée de plâtras pour me boucher ce trou-là. C'est tout petit, votre barricade. Il faut que ça monte. Mettez-y tout, flanquez-y tout, fichez-y tout. Cassez la maison. Une barricade, c'est le thé de la mère Gibou. Tenez, voilà une porte vitrée.

Ceci fit exclamer les travailleurs.

— Une porte vitrée! qu'est-ce que tu veux qu'on fasse d'une porte vitrée, tubercule?

— Hercules vous-mêmes! riposta Gavroche. Une porte vitrée dans une barricade, c'est excellent. Ça n'empêche pas de l'attaquer, mais ça gêne pour la prendre. Vous n'avez donc jamais chipé des pommes pardessus un mur où il y avait des culs de bouteilles? Une porte vitrée, ça coupe les cors aux pieds de la garde nationale quand elle veut monter sur la barricade. Pardi! le verre est traître. Ah çà, vous n'avez pas une imagination effrénée, mes camarades!

Du reste, il était furieux de son pistolet sans chien. Il allait de l'un à l'autre, réclamant: — Un fusil! Je veux un fusil! Pourquoi ne me donne-t-on pas un fusil?

— Un fusil à toi! dit Combeferre.

— Tiens! répliqua Gavroche, pourquoi pas? J’en ai bien eu un en 1830 quand on s’est disputé avec Charles X!

Enjolras haussa les épaules.

— Quand il y en aura pour les hommes, on en donnera aux enfants.

Gavroche se tourna fièrement, et lui répondit:

— Si tu es tué avant moi, je te prends le tien.

— Gamin! dit Enjolras.

— Blanc-bec! dit Gavroche.

Un élégant fourvoyé qui flânait au bout de la rue, fit diversion.

Gavroche lui cria:

— Venez avec nous, jeune homme! Eh bien, cette vieille patrie, on ne fait donc rien pour elle?

L’élégant s’enfuit.

Chapitre V

Les préparatifs

Les journaux du temps qui ont dit que la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie, cette construction presque inexpugnable, comme ils l’appellent, atteignait au niveau d’un premier étage, se sont trompés. Le fait est qu’elle ne dépassait pas une hauteur moyenne de six ou sept pieds. Elle était bâtie de manière que les combattants pouvaient, à volonté, ou disparaître derrière, ou dominer le barrage et même en escalader la crête au moyen d’une quadruple rangée de pavés superposés et arrangés en gradins à l’intérieur. Au dehors le front de la barricade, composé de piles de pavés et de tonneaux reliés par des poutres et des planches qui s’enchevêtraient dans les roues de la charrette Anceau et de l’omnibus renversé, avait un aspect hérissé et inextricable. Une coupure suffisante pour qu’un homme y pût passer avait été ménagée entre le mur des maisons et l’extrémité de la barricade la plus éloignée du cabaret, de façon qu’une sortie était possible. La flèche de l’omnibus était dressée droite et maintenue avec des cordes, et un drapeau rouge, fixé à cette flèche, flottait sur la barricade.

La petite barricade Mondétour, cachée derrière la maison du cabaret, ne s’apercevait pas. Les deux barricades réunies formaient une véritable redoute. Enjolras et Courfeyrac n’avaient pas jugé à propos de barricader l’autre tronçon de la rue Mondétour qui ouvre par la rue des Prêcheurs une issue sur les halles, voulant sans doute conserver une communication possible avec le dehors et redoutant peu d’être attaqués par la dangereuse et difficile ruelle des Prêcheurs.

À cela près de cette issue restée libre, qui constituait ce que Folard, dans son style stratégique, eût appelé un boyau, et en tenant compte aussi de la coupure exiguë ménagée sur la rue de la Chanvrerie, l’intérieur de la barricade, où le cabaret faisait un angle saillant, présentait un quadrilatère irrégulier fermé de toutes parts. Il y avait une vingtaine de pas d’intervalle entre le grand barrage et les hautes maisons qui formaient le fond de la rue, en sorte qu’on pouvait dire que la barricade était adossée à ces maisons, toutes habitées, mais closes du haut en bas.

Tout ce travail se fit sans empêchement en moins d’une heure et sans que cette poignée d’hommes hardis vît surgir un bonnet à poil ni une bayonnette. Les bourgeois peu fréquents qui se hasardaient encore à ce moment de l’émeute dans la rue Saint-Denis jetaient un coup d’œil rue de la Chanvrerie, apercevaient la barricade, et doublaient le pas.

Les deux barricades terminées, le drapeau arboré, on traîna une table hors du cabaret? et Courfeyrac monta sur la table. Enjolras apporta le coffre carré et Courfeyrac l’ouvrit. Ce coffre était rempli de cartouches. Quand on vit les cartouches, il y eut un tressaillement parmi les plus braves et un moment de silence.

Courfeyrac les distribua en souriant.

Chacun reçut trente cartouches. Beaucoup avaient de la poudre et se mirent à en faire d’autres avec les balles qu’on fondait. Quant au baril de poudre, il était sur une table à part, près de la porte, et on le réserva.

Le rappel, qui parcourait tout Paris, ne discontinuait pas, mais cela avait fini par ne plus être qu’un bruit monotone auquel ils ne faisaient plus attention. Ce bruit tantôt s’éloignait, tantôt s’approchait, avec des ondulations lugubres.

On chargea les fusils et les carabines, tous ensemble, sans précipitation, avec une gravité solennelle. Enjolras alla placer trois sentinelles hors des barricades, l’une rue de la Chanvrerie, la seconde rue des Prêcheurs, la troisième au coin de la Petite-Truanderie.

Puis, les barricades bâties, les postes assignés, les fusils chargés, les vedettes posées, seuls dans ces rues redoutables où personne ne passait plus, entourés de ces maisons muettes et comme mortes où ne palpitait aucun mouvement humain, enveloppés des ombres croissantes du crépuscule qui commençait, au milieu de cette obscurité et de ce silence où l’on sentait s’avancer quelque chose et qui avaient je ne sais quoi de tragique et de terrifiant, isolés, armés, déterminés, tranquilles, ils attendirent.

Chapitre VI

En attendant

Dans ces heures d’attente, que firent-ils?

Il faut bien que nous le disions, puisque ceci est de l’histoire.

Tandis que les hommes faisaient des cartouches et les femmes de la charpie, tandis qu’une large casserole, pleine d’étain et de plomb fondu destinés au moule à balles, fumait sur un réchaud ardent, pendant que les vedettes veillaient l’arme au bras sur la barricade, pendant qu’Enjolras, impossible à distraire, veillait sur les vedettes, Combeferre, Courfeyrac, Jean Prouvaire, Feuilly, Bossuet, Joly, Bahorel, quelques autres encore, se cherchèrent et se réunirent, comme aux plus paisibles jours de leurs causeries d’écoliers, et dans un coin de ce cabaret changé en casemate, à deux pas de la redoute qu’ils avaient élevée, leurs carabines amorcées et chargées appuyées au dossier de leur chaise, ces beaux jeunes gens, si voisins d’une heure suprême, se mirent à dire des vers d’amour.

Quels vers? Les voici:

Vous rappelez-vous notre douce vie,
Lorsque nous étions si jeunes tous deux,
Et que nous n’avions au cœur d’autre envie
Que d’être bien mis et d’être amoureux!

Lorsqu’en ajoutant votre âge à mon âge,
Nous ne comptions pas à deux quarante ans,
Et que, dans notre humble et petit ménage,
Tout, même l’hiver, nous était printemps!

Beaux jours! Manuel était fier et sage,
Paris s’asseyait à de saints banquets,
Foy lançait la foudre, et votre corsage
Avait une épingle où je me piquais.

Tout vous contemplait. Avocat sans causes,
Quand je vous menais au Prado dîner,
Vous étiez jolie au point que les roses

Me faisaient l’effet de se retourner;

Je les entendais dire: Est-elle belle!
Comme elle sent bon! quels cheveux à flots!
Sous son mantelet elle cache une aile;
Son bonnet charmant est à peine éclos.

J’errais avec toi, pressant ton bras souple.
Les passants croyaient que l’amour charmé
Avait marié, dans notre heureux couple,
Le doux mois d’avril au beau mois de mai.

Nous vivions cachés, contents, porte close,
Dévorant l’amour, bon fruit défendu;
Ma bouche n’avait pas dit une chose
Que déjà ton cœur avait répondu.

Sorbonne était l’endroit bucolique
Où je t’adorais du soir au matin.
C’est ainsi qu’une âme amoureuse applique
La carte du Tendre au pays latin.

Ô place Maubert! Ô place Dauphine
Quand, dans le taudis frais et printanier,
Tu tirais ton bas sur ta jambe fine,
Je voyais un astre au fond du grenier.

J’ai fort lu Platon, mais rien ne m’en reste;
Mieux que Malebranche et que Lamennais,
Tu me démontrais la bonté céleste
Avec une fleur que tu me donnais.

Je t’obéissais, tu m’étais soumise.
Ô grenier doré! te lacer! te voir
Aller et venir dès l’aube en chemise,
Mirant ton front jeune à ton vieux miroir!

Et qui donc pourrait perdre la mémoire
De ces temps d'aurore et de firmament,
De rubans, de fleurs, de gaze et de moire,
Où l'amour bégaye un argot charmant?

Nos jardins étaient un pot de tulipe;
Tu masquais la vitre avec un jupon;
Je prenais le bol de terre de pipe,
Et je te donnais la tasse en japon.

Et ces grands malheurs qui nous faisaient rire!
Ton manchon brûlé, ton boa perdu!
Et ce cher portrait du divin Shakespeare
Qu'un soir pour souper nous avons vendu!

J'étais mendiant, et toi charitable.
Je baisais au vol tes bras frais et ronds.
Dante in-folio nous servait de table
Pour manger gaîment un cent de marrons.

La première fois qu'en mon joyeux bouge
Je pris un baiser à ta lèvre en feu,
Quand tu t'en allas décoiffée et rouge,
Je restai tout pâle et je crus en Dieu

Te rappelles-tu nos bonheurs sans nombre,
Et tous ces fichus changés en chiffons?
Oh! que de soupirs, de nos cœurs pleins d'ombre,
Se sont envolés dans les cieux profonds!

L'heure, le lieu, ces souvenirs de jeunesse rappelés, quelques étoiles qui commençaient à briller au ciel, le repos funèbre de ces rues désertes, l'imminence de l'aventure inexorable qui se préparait, donnaient un charme pathétique à ces vers murmurés à demi-voix dans le crépuscule par Jean Prouvaire qui, nous l'avons dit, était un doux poète.

Cependant on avait allumé un lampion dans la petite barricade, et, dans la grande, une de ces torches de cire comme on en rencontre le mardi gras en avant des voitures chargées de masques qui vont à la Courtille. Ces torches, on l’a vu, venaient du faubourg Saint-Antoine.

La torche avait été placée dans une espèce de cage de pavés fermée de trois côtés pour l’abriter du vent, et disposée de façon que toute la lumière tombait sur le drapeau. La rue et la barricade restaient plongées dans l’obscurité, et l’on ne voyait rien que le drapeau rouge formidablement éclairé comme par une énorme lanterne sourde.

Cette lumière ajoutait à l’écarlate du drapeau je ne sais quelle pourpre terrible.

Chapitre VII

L’homme recruté rue des Billettes

La nuit était tout à fait tombée, rien ne venait. On n’entendait que des rumeurs confuses, et par instants des fusillades, mais rares, peu nourries et lointaines. Ce répit, qui se prolongeait, était signe que le gouvernement prenait son temps et ramassait ses forces. Ces cinquante hommes en attendaient soixante mille.

Enjolras se sentit pris de cette impatience qui saisit les âmes fortes au seuil des événements redoutables. Il alla trouver Gavroche qui s’était mis à fabriquer des cartouches dans la salle basse à la clarté douteuse de deux chandelles, posées sur le comptoir par précaution à cause de la poudre répandue sur les tables. Ces deux chandelles ne jetaient aucun rayonnement au dehors. Les insurgés en outre avaient eu soin de ne point allumer de lumière dans les étages supérieurs.

Gavroche en ce moment était fort préoccupé, non pas précisément de ses cartouches.

L’homme de la rue des Billettes venait d’entrer dans la salle basse et était allé s’asseoir à la table la moins éclairée. Il lui était échu un fusil de munition grand modèle, qu’il tenait entre ses jambes. Gavroche jusqu’à cet instant, distrait par cent choses «amusantes», n’avait pas même vu cet homme.

Lorsqu’il entra, Gavroche le suivit machinalement des yeux, admirant son fusil, puis, brusquement, quand l’homme fut assis, le gamin se leva. Ceux qui auraient épié l’homme jusqu’à ce moment l’auraient vu tout observer dans la barricade et dans la bande des insurgés avec une attention singulière; mais depuis qu’il était entré dans la salle, il avait été pris d’une sorte de recueillement et semblait ne plus rien voir de ce qui se passait. Le gamin s’approcha de ce personnage pensif et se mit à tourner autour de lui sur la pointe du pied comme on marche auprès de quelqu’un qu’on craint de réveiller. En même temps, sur son visage enfantin, à la fois si effronté et si sérieux, si évaporé et si profond, si gai et si navrant, passaient toutes ces grimaces de vieux qui signifient: — Ah bah! — pas possible! — j’ai la berlue! — je rêve! — est-ce que ce serait?... — non, ce n’est pas! — mais si! — mais non! etc. Gavroche se balançait sur ses talons crispait ses deux poings dans ses poches, remuait le cou comme un oiseau, dépensait en une lippe démesurée toute la sagacité de sa lèvre inférieure. Il était stupéfait, incertain, incrédule, convaincu, ébloui. Il avait la mine du chef des eunuques au marché des esclaves découvrant une Vénus parmi des dondons, et l'air d'un amateur reconnaissant un Raphaël dans un tas de croûtes. Tout chez lui était en travail, l'instinct qui flaire et l'intelligence qui combine. Il était évident qu'il arrivait un événement à Gavroche.

C'est au plus fort de cette préoccupation qu'Enjolras l'aborda.

— Tu es petit, dit Enjolras, on ne te verra pas. Sors des barricades, glisse-toi le long des maisons, va un peu partout par les rues, et reviens me dire ce qui se passe.

Gavroche se haussa sur ses hanches.

— Les petits sont donc bons à quelque chose! c'est bien heureux! J'y vas. En attendant fiez-vous aux petits, méfiez-vous des grands... — Et Gavroche, levant la tête et baissant la voix, ajouta, en désignant l'homme de la rue des Billettes:

— Vous voyez bien ce grand-là?

— Eh bien?

— C'est un mouchard.

— Tu es sûr?

— Il n'y a pas quinze jours qu'il m'a enlevé par l'oreille de la corniche du pont Royal où je prenais l'air.

Enjolras quitta vivement le gamin et murmura quelques mots très bas à un ouvrier du port aux vins qui se trouvait là. L'ouvrier sortit de la salle et y rentra presque tout de suite accompagné de trois autres. Ces quatre hommes, quatre portefaix aux larges épaules, allèrent se placer, sans rien faire qui pût attirer son attention, derrière la table où était accoudé l'homme de la rue des Billettes. Ils étaient visiblement prêts à se jeter sur lui.

Alors Enjolras s'approcha de l'homme et lui demanda:

— Qui êtes-vous?

À cette question brusque, l'homme eut un soubresaut. Il plongea son regard jusqu'au fond de la prunelle candide d'Enjolras et parut y saisir sa pensée. Il sourit d'un sourire qui était tout ce qu'on peut voir au monde de plus dédaigneux, de plus énergique et de plus résolu, et répondit avec une gravité hautaine:

— Je vois ce que c'est.... Eh bien oui!

— Vous êtes mouchard?

— Je suis agent de l’autorité.

— Vous vous appelez?

— Javert.

Enjolras fit signe aux quatre hommes. En un clin d’œil, avant que Javert eût eu le temps de se retourner, il fut colleté, terrassé, garrotté, fouillé.

On trouva sur lui une petite carte ronde collée entre deux verres et portant d’un côté les armes de France, gravées, avec cette légende: Surveillance et vigilance, et de l’autre cette mention: JAVERT, inspecteur de police, âgé de cinquante-deux ans; et la signature du préfet de police d’alors, M. Gisquet.

Il avait en outre sa montre et sa bourse, qui contenait quelques pièces d’or. On lui laissa la bourse et la montre. Derrière la montre, au fond du gousset, on tâta et l’on saisit un papier sous enveloppe qu’Enjolras déplia et où il lut ces cinq lignes écrites de la main même du préfet de police:

Le fouillage terminé, on redressa Javert, on lui noua les bras derrière le dos et on l’attacha au milieu de la salle basse à ce poteau célèbre qui avait jadis donné son nom au cabaret.

Gavroche, qui avait assisté à toute la scène et tout approuvé d’un hochement de tête silencieux, s’approcha de Javert et lui dit:

— C’est la souris qui a pris le chat.

Tout cela s’était exécuté si rapidement que c’était fini quand on s’en aperçut autour du cabaret. Javert n’avait pas jeté un cri. En voyant Javert lié au poteau, Courfeyrac, Bossuet, Joly, Combeferre, et les hommes dispersés dans les deux barricades, accoururent.

Javert, adossé au poteau, et si entouré de cordes qu’il ne pouvait faire un mouvement, levait la tête avec la sérénité intrépide de l’homme qui n’a jamais menti.

— C’est un mouchard, dit Enjolras.

Et se tournant vers Javert:

— Vous serez fusillé deux minutes avant que la barricade soit prise.

Javert répliqua de son accent le plus impérieux:

— Pourquoi pas tout de suite?

— Nous ménageons la poudre.

— Alors finissez-en d’un coup de couteau.

— Mouchard, dit le bel Enjolras, nous sommes des juges et non des assassins.

Puis il appela Gavroche.

— Toi! va à ton affaire! Fais ce que je t'ai dit.

— J'y vas, cria Gavroche.

Et s'arrêtant au moment de partir:

— À propos, vous me donnerez son fusil! Et il ajouta: Je vous laisse le musicien, mais je veux la clarinette.

Le gamin fit le salut militaire et franchit gaîment la coupure de la grande barricade.

Chapitre VIII

Plusieurs points d'interrogation à propos d'un nommé Le Cabuc qui ne se nommait peut-être pas Le Cabuc

La peinture tragique que nous avons entreprise ne serait pas complète, le lecteur ne verrait pas dans leur relief exact et réel ces grandes minutes de gésine sociale et d'enfantement révolutionnaire où il y a de la convulsion mêlée à l'effort, si nous omettions, dans l'esquisse ébauchée ici, un incident plein d'une horreur épique et farouche qui survint presque aussitôt après le départ de Gavroche.

Les attroupements, comme on sait, font boule de neige et agglomèrent en roulant un tas d'hommes tumultueux. Ces hommes ne se demandent pas entre eux d'où ils viennent. Parmi les passants qui s'étaient réunis au rassemblement conduit par Enjolras, Combeferre et Courfeyrac, il y avait un être portant la veste du portefaix usée aux épaules, qui gesticulait et vociférait et avait la mine d'une espèce d'ivrogne sauvage. Cet homme, un nommé ou surnommé Le Cabuc, et du reste tout à fait inconnu de ceux qui prétendaient le connaître, très ivre, ou faisant semblant, s'était attablé avec quelques autres à une table qu'ils avaient tirée en dehors du cabaret. Ce Cabuc, tout en faisant boire ceux qui lui tenaient tête, semblait considérer d'un air de réflexion la grande maison du fond de la barricade dont les cinq étages dominaient toute la rue et faisaient face à la rue Saint-Denis. Tout à coup il s'écria:

— Camarades, savez-vous? c'est de cette maison-là qu'il faudrait tirer. Quand nous serons là aux croisées, du diable si quelqu'un avance dans la rue!

— Oui, mais la maison est fermée, dit un des buveurs.

— Cognons!

— On n’ouvrira pas.

— Enfonçons la porte!

Le Cabuc court à la porte qui avait un marteau fort massif, et frappe. La porte ne s’ouvre pas. Il frappe un second coup. Personne ne répond. Un troisième coup. Même silence.

— Y a-t-il quelqu’un ici? crie Le Cabuc.

Rien ne bouge.

Alors il saisit un fusil et commence à battre la porte à coups de crosse. C’était une vieille porte d’allée, cintrée, basse, étroite, solide, toute en chêne, doublée à l’intérieur d’une feuille de tôle et d’une armature de fer, une vraie poterne de bastille. Les coups de crosse faisaient trembler la maison, mais n’ébranlaient pas la porte.

Toutefois il est probable que les habitants s’étaient émus, car on vit enfin s’éclairer et s’ouvrir une petite lucarne carrée au troisième étage, et apparaître à cette lucarne une chandelle et la tête béate et effrayée d’un bonhomme en cheveux gris qui était le portier.

L’homme qui cognait s’interrompit.

— Messieurs, demanda le portier, que désirez-vous?

— Ouvre! dit Le Cabuc.

— Messieurs, cela ne se peut pas.

— Ouvre toujours!

— Impossible, messieurs!

Le Cabuc prit son fusil et coucha en joue le portier; mais comme il était en bas, et qu’il faisait très noir, le portier ne le vit point.

— Oui ou non, veux-tu ouvrir?

— Non, messieurs!

— Tu dis non?

— Je dis non, mes bons....

Le portier n’acheva pas. Le coup de fusil était lâché; la balle lui était entrée sous le menton et était sortie par la nuque après avoir traversé la jugulaire. Le vieillard s’affaissa sur lui-même sans pousser un soupir. La chandelle tomba et s’éteignit, et l’on ne vit plus rien qu’une tête immobile posée au bord de la lucarne et un peu de fumée blanchâtre qui s’en allait vers le toit.

— Voilà! dit Le Cabuc en laissant retomber sur le pavé la crosse de son fusil.

Il avait à peine prononcé ce mot qu’il sentit une main qui se posait sur son épaule avec la pesanteur d’une serre d’aigle, et il entendit une voix qui lui disait:

— À genoux.

Le meurtrier se retourna et vit devant lui la figure blanche et froide d’Enjolras. Enjolras avait un pistolet à la main.

À la détonation, il était arrivé.

Il avait empoigné de sa main gauche le collet, la blouse, la chemise et la bretelle du Cabuc.

— À genoux, répéta-t-il.

Et d’un mouvement souverain le frêle jeune homme de vingt ans plia comme un roseau le crocheteur trapu et robuste et l’agenouilla dans la boue. Le Cabuc essaya de résister, mais il semblait qu’il eût été saisi par un poing surhumain.

Pâle, le col nu, les cheveux épars, Enjolras, avec son visage de femme, avait en ce moment je ne sais quoi de la Thémis antique. Ses narines gonflées, ses yeux baissés donnaient à son implacable profil grec cette expression de colère et cette expression de chasteté qui, au point de vue de l’ancien monde, conviennent à la justice.

Toute la barricade était accourue, puis tous s’étaient rangés en cercle à distance, sentant qu’il était impossible de prononcer une parole devant la chose qu’ils allaient voir.

Le Cabuc, vaincu, n’essayait plus de se débattre et tremblait de tous ses membres. Enjolras le lâcha et tira sa montre.

— Recueille-toi, dit-il. Prie ou pense. Tu as une minute.

— Grâce, murmura le meurtrier; puis il baissa la tête et balbutia quelques jurements inarticulés.

Enjolras ne quitta pas la montre des yeux; il laissa passer la minute, puis il remit la montre dans son gousset. Cela fait, il prit par les cheveux Le Cabuc qui se pelotonnait contre ses genoux en hurlant et lui appuya sur l’oreille le canon de son pistolet. Beaucoup de ces hommes intrépides, qui étaient si tranquillement entrés dans la plus effrayante des aventures, détournèrent la tête.

On entendit l’explosion, l’assassin tomba sur le pavé le front en avant, et Enjolras se redressa et promena autour de lui son regard convaincu et sévère.

Puis il poussa du pied le cadavre et dit:

— Jetez cela dehors.

Trois hommes soulevèrent le corps du misérable qu’agitaient les dernières convulsions machinales de la vie expirée, et le jetèrent par-dessus la petite barricade dans la ruelle Mondétour.

Enjolras était demeuré pensif. On ne sait quelles ténèbres grandioses se répandaient lentement sur sa redoutable sérénité. Tout à coup il éleva la voix. On fit silence.

— Citoyens, dit Enjolras, ce que cet homme a fait est effroyable et ce que j’ai fait est horrible. Il a tué, c’est pourquoi je l’ai tué. J’ai dû le faire, car l’insurrection doit avoir sa discipline. L’assassinat est encore plus un crime ici qu’ailleurs; nous sommes sous le regard de la révolution, nous sommes les prêtres de la république, nous sommes les hosties du devoir, et il ne faut pas qu’on puisse calomnier notre combat. J’ai donc jugé et condamné à mort cet homme. Quant à moi, contraint de faire ce que j’ai fait, mais l’abhorrant, je me suis jugé aussi, et vous verrez tout à l’heure à quoi je me suis condamné.

Ceux qui écoutaient tressaillirent.

— Nous partagerons ton sort, cria Combeferre.

— Soit, reprit Enjolras. Encore un mot. En exécutant cet homme, j’ai obéi à la nécessité; mais la nécessité est un monstre du vieux monde; la nécessité s’appelle Fatalité. Or, la loi du progrès, c’est que les monstres disparaissent devant les anges, et que la fatalité s’évanouisse devant la fraternité. C’est un mauvais moment pour prononcer le mot amour. N’importe, je le prononce, et je le glorifie. Amour, tu as l’avenir. Mort, je me sers de toi, mais je te hais. Citoyens, il n’y aura dans l’avenir ni ténèbres, ni coups de foudre, ni ignorance féroce, ni talion sanglant. Comme il n’y aura plus de Satan, il n’y aura plus de Michel. Dans l’avenir personne ne tuera personne, la terre rayonnera, le genre humain aimera. Il viendra, citoyens, ce jour où tout sera concorde, harmonie, lumière, joie et vie, il viendra. Et c’est pour qu’il vienne que nous allons mourir.

Enjolras se tut. Ses lèvres de vierge se refermèrent; et il resta quelque temps debout à l’endroit où il avait versé le sang, dans une immobilité de marbre. Son œil fixe faisait qu’on parlait bas autour de lui.

Jean Prouvaire et Combeferre se serraient la main silencieusement, et, appuyés l’un sur l’autre à l’angle de la barricade, considéraient avec une admiration où il y avait de la compassion ce grave jeune homme, bourreau et prêtre, de lumière comme le cristal, et de roche aussi.

Disons tout de suite que plus tard, après l’action, quand les cadavres furent portés à la morgue et fouillés, on trouva sur Le Cabuc une carte d’agent de police. L’auteur de ce livre a eu entre les mains, en 1848, le rapport spécial fait à ce sujet au préfet de police de 1832.

Ajoutons que, s’il faut en croire une tradition de police étrange, mais probablement fondée, Le Cabuc, c’était Claquesous. Le fait est qu’à partir de la mort du Cabuc, il ne fut plus question de Claquesous. Claquesous n’a laissé nulle trace de sa disparition; il semblerait s’être amalgamé à l’invisible. Sa vie avait été ténèbres; sa fin fut nuit.

Tout le groupe insurgé était encore sous l’émotion de ce procès tragique si vite instruit et si vite terminé, quand Courfeyrac revit dans la barricade le petit jeune homme qui le matin avait demandé chez lui Marius.

Ce garçon, qui avait l’air hardi et insouciant, était venu à la nuit rejoindre les insurgés.

Livre treizième — Marius entre dans l’ombre

Chapitre I

De la rue Plumet au quartier Saint-Denis

Cette voix qui à travers le crépuscule avait appelé Marius à la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie lui avait fait l'effet de la voix de la destinée. Il voulait mourir, l'occasion s'offrait; il frappait à la porte du tombeau, une main dans l'ombre lui en tendait la clef. Ces lugubres ouvertures qui se font dans les ténèbres devant le désespoir sont tentantes, Marius écarta la grille qui l'avait tant de fois laissé passer, sortit du jardin et dit: allons!

Fou de douleur, ne se sentant plus rien de fixe et de solide dans le cerveau, incapable de rien accepter désormais du sort après ces deux mois passés dans les enivrements de la jeunesse et de l'amour, accablé à la fois par toutes les rêveries du désespoir, il n'avait plus qu'un désir, en finir bien vite.

Il se mit à marcher rapidement. Il se trouvait précisément qu'il était armé, ayant sur lui les pistolets de Javert.

Le jeune homme qu'il avait cru apercevoir s'était perdu à ses yeux dans les rues.

Marius, qui était sorti de la rue Plumet par le boulevard, traversa l'esplanade et le pont des Invalides, les Champs-Élysées, la place Louis XV, et gagna la rue de Rivoli. Les magasins y étaient ouverts, le gaz y brûlait sous les arcades, les femmes achetaient dans les boutiques, on prenait des glaces au café Laiter, on mangeait des petits gâteaux à la pâtisserie anglaise. Seulement quelques chaises de poste partaient au galop de l'hôtel des Princes et de l'hôtel Meurice.

Marius entra par le passage Delorme dans la rue Saint-Honoré. Les boutiques y étaient fermées, les marchands causaient devant leurs portes entr'ouvertes, les passants circulaient, les réverbères étaient allumés, à partir du premier étage toutes les croisées étaient éclairées comme à l'ordinaire. Il y avait de la cavalerie sur la place du Palais-Royal.

Marius suivit la rue Saint-Honoré. À mesure qu'il s'éloignait du Palais-Royal, il y avait moins de fenêtres éclairées; les boutiques étaient tout à fait closes, personne ne causait sur les seuils, la rue s'assombrissait et en même temps la foule s'épaississait. Car les passants maintenant étaient une foule.

On ne voyait personne parler dans cette foule, et pourtant il en sortait un bourdonnement sourd et profond.

Vers la fontaine de l'Arbre-Sec, il y avait «des rassemblements», espèces de groupes immobiles et sombres qui étaient parmi les allants et venants comme des pierres au milieu d'une eau courante.

À l'entrée de la rue des Prouvaires, la foule ne marchait plus. C'était un bloc résistant, massif, solide, compact, presque impénétrable, de gens entassés qui s'entretenaient tout bas. Il n'y avait là presque plus d'habits noirs ni de chapeaux ronds. Des sarraus, des blouses, des casquettes, des têtes hérissées et terreuses. Cette multitude ondulait confusément dans la brume nocturne. Son chuchotement avait l'accent rauque d'un frémissement. Quoique pas un ne marchât, on entendait un piétinement dans la boue. Au-delà de cette épaisseur de foule, dans la rue du Roule, dans la rue des Prouvaires, et dans le prolongement de la rue Saint-Honoré, il n'y avait plus une seule vitre où brillât une chandelle. On voyait s'enfoncer dans ces rues les files solitaires et décroissantes des lanternes. Les lanternes de ce temps-là ressemblaient à de grosses étoiles rouges pendues à des cordes et jetaient sur le pavé une ombre qui avait la forme d'une grande araignée. Ces rues n'étaient pas désertes. On y distinguait des fusils en faisceaux, des bayonnettes remuées et des troupes bivouaquant. Aucun curieux ne dépassait cette limite. Là cessait la circulation. Là finissait la foule et commençait l'armée.

Marius voulait avec la volonté de l'homme qui n'espère plus. On l'avait appelé, il fallait qu'il allât. Il trouva le moyen de traverser la foule et de traverser le bivouac des troupes, il se déroba aux patrouilles, il évita les sentinelles. Il fit un détour, gagna la rue de Béthisy, et se dirigea vers les halles. Au coin de la rue des Bourdonnais il n'y avait plus de lanternes.

Après avoir franchi la zone de la foule, il avait dépassé la lisière des troupes; il se trouvait dans quelque chose d'effrayant. Plus un passant, plus un soldat, plus une lumière; personne. La solitude, le silence, la nuit; je ne sais quel froid qui saisissait. Entrer dans une rue, c'était entrer dans une cave.

Il continua d'avancer.

Il fit quelques pas. Quelqu'un passa près de lui en courant. Était-ce un homme? une femme? étaient-ils plusieurs? Il n'eût pu le dire. Cela avait passé et s'était évanoui.

De circuit en circuit, il arriva dans une ruelle qu’il jugea être la rue de la Poterie; vers le milieu de cette ruelle il se heurta à un obstacle. Il étendit les mains. C’était une charrette renversée; son pied reconnut des flaques d’eau, des fondrières, des pavés épars et amoncelés. Il y avait là une barricade ébauchée et abandonnée. Il escalada les pavés et se trouva de l’autre côté du barrage. Il marchait très près des bornes et se guidait sur le mur des maisons. Un peu au delà de la barricade, il lui sembla entrevoir devant lui quelque chose de blanc. Il approcha, cela prit une forme. C’étaient deux chevaux blancs; les chevaux de l’omnibus dételé le matin par Bossuet, qui avaient erré au hasard de rue en rue toute la journée et avaient fini par s’arrêter là, avec cette patience accablée des brutes qui ne comprennent pas plus les actions de l’homme que l’homme ne comprend les actions de la providence.

Marius laissa les chevaux derrière lui. Comme il abordait une rue qui lui faisait l’effet d’être la rue du Contrat-Social, un coup de fusil, venu on ne sait d’où et qui traversait l’obscurité au hasard, siffla tout près de lui, et la balle perça au-dessus de sa tête un plat à barbe de cuivre suspendu à la boutique d’un coiffeur. On voyait encore, en 1846, rue du Contrat-Social, au coin des piliers des halles, ce plat à barbe troué.

Ce coup de fusil, c’était encore de la vie. À partir de cet instant, il ne rencontra plus rien.

Tout cet itinéraire ressemblait à une descente de marches noires.

Marius n’en alla pas moins en avant.

Chapitre II

Paris à vol de hibou

Un être qui eût plané sur Paris en ce moment avec l'aile de la chauve-souris ou de la chouette eût eu sous les yeux un spectacle morne.

Tout ce vieux quartier des halles, qui est comme une ville dans la ville, que traversent les rues Saint-Denis et Saint-Martin, où se croisent mille ruelles et dont les insurgés avaient fait leur redoute et leur place d'armes, lui eût apparu comme un énorme trou sombre creusé au centre de Paris. Là le regard tombait dans un abîme. Grâce aux réverbères brisés, grâce aux fenêtres fermées, là cessait tout rayonnement, toute vie, toute rumeur, tout mouvement. L'invisible police de l'émeute veillait partout, et maintenait l'ordre, c'est-à-dire la nuit. Noyer le petit nombre dans une vaste obscurité, multiplier chaque combattant par les possibilités que cette obscurité contient, c'est la tactique nécessaire de l'insurrection. À la chute du jour, toute croisée où une chandelle s'allumait avait reçu une balle. La lumière était éteinte, quelquefois l'habitant tué. Aussi rien ne bougeait. Il n'y avait rien là que l'effroi, le deuil, la stupeur dans les maisons; dans les rues une sorte d'horreur sacrée. On n'y apercevait même pas les longues rangées de fenêtres et d'étages, les dentelures des cheminées et des toits, les reflets vagues qui luisent sur le pavé boueux et mouillé. L'œil qui eût regardé d'en haut dans cet amas d'ombre eût entrevu peut-être çà et là, de distance en distance, des clartés indistinctes faisant saillir des lignes brisées et bizarres, des profils de constructions singulières, quelque chose de pareil à des lueurs allant et venant dans des ruines; c'est là qu'étaient les barricades. Le reste était un lac d'obscurité, brumeux, pesant, funèbre, au-dessus duquel se dressaient, silhouettes immobiles et lugubres, la tour Saint-Jacques, l'église Saint-Merry, et deux ou trois autres de ces grands édifices dont l'homme fait des géants et dont la nuit fait des fantômes.

Tout autour de ce labyrinthe désert et inquiétant, dans les quartiers où la circulation parisienne n'était pas anéantie et où quelques rares réverbères brillaient, l'observateur aérien eût pu distinguer la scintillation métallique des sabres et des bayonnettes, le roulement sourd de l'artillerie, et le fourmillement des bataillons silencieux grossissant de minute en minute; ceinture formidable qui se serrait et se fermait lentement autour de l’émeute.

Le quartier investi n’était plus qu’une sorte de monstrueuse caverne; tout y paraissait endormi ou immobile, et, comme on vient de le voir, chacune des rues où l’on pouvait arriver n’offrait rien que de l’ombre.

Ombre farouche, pleine de pièges, pleine de chocs inconnus et redoutables, où il était effrayant de pénétrer et épouvantable de séjourner, où ceux qui entraient frissonnaient devant ceux qui les attendaient, où ceux qui attendaient tressaillaient devant ceux qui allaient venir. Des combattants invisibles retranchés à chaque coin de rue; les embûches du sépulcre cachées dans les épaisseurs de la nuit. C’était fini. Plus d’autre clarté à espérer là désormais que l’éclair des fusils, plus d’autre rencontre que l’apparition brusque et rapide de la mort. Où? comment? quand? On ne savait, mais c’était certain et inévitable. Là, dans ce lieu marqué pour la lutte, le gouvernement et l’insurrection, la garde nationale et les sociétés populaires, la bourgeoisie et l’émeute, allaient s’aborder à tâtons. Pour les uns comme pour les autres, la nécessité était la même. Sortir de là tués ou vainqueurs, seule issue possible désormais. Situation tellement extrême, obscurité tellement puissante, que les plus timides s’y sentaient pris de résolution et les plus hardis de terreur.

Du reste, des deux côtés, furie, acharnement, détermination égale. Pour les uns, avancer, c’était mourir, et personne ne songeait à reculer; pour les autres, rester, c’était mourir, et personne ne songeait à fuir.

Il était nécessaire que le lendemain tout fût terminé, que le triomphe fût ici ou là, que l’insurrection fût une révolution ou une échauffourée. Le gouvernement le comprenait comme les partis; le moindre bourgeois le sentait. De là une pensée d’angoisse qui se mêlait à l’ombre impénétrable de ce quartier où tout allait se décider; de là un redoublement d’anxiété autour de ce silence d’où allait sortir une catastrophe. On n’y entendait qu’un seul bruit, bruit déchirant comme un râle, menaçant comme une malédiction, le tocsin de Saint-Merry. Rien n’était glaçant comme la clameur de cette cloche éperdue et désespérée se lamentant dans les ténèbres.

Comme il arrive souvent, la nature semblait s’être mise d’accord avec ce que les hommes allaient faire. Rien ne dérangeait les funestes harmonies de cet ensemble. Les étoiles avaient disparu; des nuages lourds emplissaient tout l’horizon de leurs plis mélancoliques. Il y avait un ciel noir sur ces rues mortes, comme si un immense linceul se déployait sur cet immense tombeau.

Tandis qu’une bataille encore toute politique se préparait dans ce même emplacement qui avait vu déjà tant d’événements révolutionnaires, tandis que la jeunesse, les associations secrètes, les écoles, au nom des principes, et la classe moyenne, au nom des intérêts, s’approchaient pour se heurter, s’étreindre et se terrasser, tandis que chacun hâtait et appelait l’heure dernière et décisive de la crise, au loin et en dehors de ce quartier fatal, au plus profond des cavités insondables de ce vieux Paris misérable qui disparaît sous la splendeur du Paris heureux et opulent, on entendait gronder sourdement la sombre voix du peuple.

Voix effrayante et sacrée qui se compose du rugissement de la brute et de la parole de Dieu, qui terrifie les faibles et qui avertit les sages, qui vient tout à la fois d’en bas comme la voix du lion et d’en haut comme la voix du tonnerre.

Chapitre III

L’extrême bord

Marius était arrivé aux halles.

Là tout était plus calme, plus obscur et plus immobile encore que dans les rues voisines. On eût dit que la paix glaciale du sépulcre était sortie de terre et s’était répandue sous le ciel.

Une rougeur pourtant découpait sur ce fond noir la haute toiture des maisons qui barraient la rue de la Chanvrerie du côté de Saint-Eustache. C’était le reflet de la torche qui brûlait dans la barricade de Corinthe. Marius s’était dirigé sur cette rougeur. Elle l’avait amené au Marché-aux-Poirées, et il entrevoyait l’embouchure ténébreuse de la rue des Prêcheurs. Il y entra. La vedette des insurgés qui guettait à l’autre bout ne l’aperçut pas. Il se sentait tout près de ce qu’il était venu chercher, et il marchait sur la pointe du pied. Il arriva ainsi au coude de ce court tronçon de la ruelle Mondétour qui était, on s’en souvient, la seule communication conservée par Enjolras avec le dehors. Au coin de la dernière maison, à sa gauche, il avança la tête, et regarda dans le tronçon Mondétour.

Un peu au delà de l’angle noir de la ruelle et de la rue de la Chanvrerie qui jetait une large nappe d’ombre où il était lui-même enseveli, il aperçut quelque lueur sur les pavés, un peu du cabaret, et, derrière, un lampion clignotant dans une espèce de muraille informe, et des hommes accroupis ayant des fusils sur leurs genoux. Tout cela était à dix toises de lui. C’était l’intérieur de la barricade.

Les maisons qui bordaient la ruelle à droite lui cachaient le reste du cabaret, la grande barricade et le drapeau.

Marius n’avait plus qu’un pas à faire.

Alors le malheureux jeune homme s’assit sur une borne, croisa les bras, et songea à son père.

Il songea à cet héroïque colonel Pontmercy qui avait été un si fier soldat, qui avait gardé sous la République la frontière de France et touché sous l’empereur la frontière d’Asie, qui avait vu Gênes, Alexandrie, Milan, Turin, Madrid, Vienne, Dresde, Berlin, Moscou, qui avait laissé sur tous les champs de victoire de l’Europe des gouttes de ce même sang que lui Marius avait dans les veines, qui avait blanchi avant l’âge dans la discipline et le commandement, qui avait vécu le ceinturon bouclé, les épaulettes tombant sur la poitrine, la cocarde noircie par la poudre, le front plissé par le casque, sous la baraque, au camp, au bivouac, aux ambulances, et qui au bout de vingt ans était revenu des grandes guerres la joue balafrée, le visage souriant, simple, tranquille, admirable, pur comme un enfant, ayant tout fait pour la France et rien contre elle.

Il se dit que son jour à lui était venu aussi, que son heure avait enfin sonné, qu'après son père il allait, lui aussi, être brave, intrépide, hardi, courir au-devant des balles, offrir sa poitrine aux bayonnettes, verser son sang, chercher l'ennemi, chercher la mort, qu'il allait faire la guerre à son tour et descendre sur le champ de bataille, et que ce champ de bataille où il allait descendre, c'était la rue, et que cette guerre qu'il allait faire, c'était la guerre civile!

Il vit la guerre civile ouverte comme un gouffre devant lui et que c'était là qu'il allait tomber.

Alors il frissonna.

Il songea à cette épée de son père que son aïeul avait vendue à un brocanteur, et qu'il avait, lui, si douloureusement regrettée. Il se dit qu'elle avait bien fait, cette vaillante et chaste épée, de lui échapper et de s'en aller irritée dans les ténèbres; que si elle s'était enfuie ainsi, c'est qu'elle était intelligente et qu'elle prévoyait l'avenir; c'est qu'elle pressentait l'émeute, la guerre des ruisseaux, la guerre des pavés, les fusillades par les soupiraux des caves, les coups donnés et reçus par derrière; c'est que, venant de Marengo et de Friedland, elle ne voulait pas aller rue de la Chanvrerie, c'est qu'après ce qu'elle avait fait avec le père, elle ne voulait pas faire cela avec le fils! Il se dit que si cette épée était là, si, l'ayant recueillie au chevet de son père mort, il avait osé la prendre et l'emporter pour ce combat de nuit entre Français dans un carrefour, à coup sûr elle lui brûlerait les mains et se mettrait à flamboyer devant lui comme l'épée de l'ange! Il se dit qu'il était heureux qu'elle n'y fût pas et qu'elle eût disparu, que cela était bien, que cela était juste, que son aïeul avait été le vrai gardien de la gloire de son père, et qu'il valait mieux que l'épée du colonel eût été criée à l'encan, vendue au fripier, jetée aux ferrailles, que de faire aujourd'hui saigner le flanc de la patrie.

Et puis il se mit à pleurer amèrement.

Cela était horrible. Mais que faire? Vivre sans Cosette, il ne le pouvait. Puisqu'elle était partie, il fallait bien qu'il mourût. Ne lui avait-il pas donné sa parole d’honneur qu’il mourrait? Elle était partie sachant cela; c’est qu’il lui plaisait que Marius mourût. Et puis il était clair qu’elle ne l’aimait plus, puisqu’elle s’en était allée ainsi, sans l’avertir, sans un mot, sans une lettre, et elle savait son adresse! À quoi bon vivre et pourquoi vivre à présent? Et puis, quoi! être venu jusque-là et reculer! s’être approché du danger, et s’enfuir! être venu regarder dans la barricade, et s’esquiver! s’esquiver tout tremblant en disant: au fait, j’en ai assez comme cela, j’ai vu, cela suffit, c’est la guerre civile, je m’en vais! Abandonner ses amis qui l’attendaient! qui avaient peut-être besoin de lui! qui étaient une poignée contre une armée! Manquer à tout à la fois, à l’amour, à l’amitié, à sa parole! Donner à sa poltronnerie le prétexte du patriotisme! Mais cela était impossible, et si le fantôme de son père était là dans l’ombre et le voyait reculer, il lui fouetterait les reins du plat de son épée et lui crierait: Marche donc, lâche!

En proie au va-et-vient de ses pensées, il baissait la tête.

Tout à coup il la redressa. Une sorte de rectification splendide venait de se faire dans son esprit. Il y a une dilatation de pensée propre au voisinage de la tombe; être près de la mort, cela fait voir vrai. La vision de l’action dans laquelle il se sentait peut-être sur le point d’entrer lui apparut, non plus lamentable, mais superbe. La guerre de la rue se transfigura subitement, par on ne sait quel travail d’âme intérieur, devant l’œil de sa pensée. Tous les tumultueux points d’interrogation de la rêverie lui revinrent en foule, mais sans le troubler. Il n’en laissa aucun sans réponse.

Voyons, pourquoi son père s’indignerait-il? est-ce qu’il n’y a point des cas où l’insurrection monte à la dignité de devoir? qu’y aurait-il donc de diminuant pour le fils du colonel Pontmercy dans le combat qui s’engage? Ce n’est plus Montmirail ni Champaubert; c’est autre chose. Il ne s’agit plus d’un territoire sacré, mais d’une idée sainte. La patrie se plaint, soit; mais l’humanité applaudit. Est-il vrai d’ailleurs que la patrie se plaigne? La France saigne, mais la liberté sourit; et devant le sourire de la liberté, la France oublie sa plaie. Et puis, à voir les choses de plus haut encore, que viendrait-on parler de guerre civile?

La guerre civile? qu’est-ce à dire? Est-ce qu’il y a une guerre étrangère? Est-ce que toute guerre entre hommes n’est pas la guerre entre frères? La guerre ne se qualifie que par son but. Il n’y a ni guerre étrangère, ni guerre civile; il n’y a que la guerre injuste et la guerre juste. Jusqu’au jour où le grand concordat humain sera conclu, la guerre, celle du moins qui est l’effort de l’avenir qui se hâte contre le passé qui s’attarde, peut être nécessaire. Qu'a-t-on à reprocher à cette guerre-là? La guerre ne devient honte, l'épée ne devient poignard que lorsqu'elle assassine le droit, le progrès, la raison, la civilisation, la vérité. Alors, guerre civile ou guerre étrangère, elle est inique; elle s'appelle le crime. En dehors de cette chose sainte, la justice, de quel droit une forme de la guerre en mépriserait-elle une autre? de quel droit l'épée de Washington renierait-elle la pique de Camille Desmoulins? Léonidas contre l'étranger, Timoléon contre le tyran, lequel est le plus grand? l'un est le défenseur, l'autre est le libérateur. Flétrira-t-on, sans s'inquiéter du but, toute prise d'armes dans l'intérieur de la cité? alors notez d'infamie Brutus, Marcel, Arnould de Blankenheim, Coligny. Guerre de buissons? guerre de rues? Pourquoi pas? c'était la guerre d'Ambiorix, d'Artevelde, de Marnix, de Pélage. Mais Ambiorix luttait contre Rome, Artevelde contre la France, Marnix contre l'Espagne, Pélage contre les Maures; tous contre l'étranger. Eh bien, la monarchie, c'est l'étranger; l'oppression, c'est l'étranger; le droit divin, c'est l'étranger. Le despotisme viole la frontière morale, comme l'invasion viole la frontière géographique. Chasser le tyran ou chasser l'anglais, c'est, dans les deux cas, reprendre son territoire. Il vient une heure où protester ne suffit plus; après la philosophie il faut l'action; la vive force achève ce que l'idée a ébauché; Prométhée enchaîné commence, Aristogiton finit; l'Encyclopédie éclaire les âmes, le 10 août les électrise. Après Eschyle, Thrasybule; après Diderot, Danton. Les multitudes ont une tendance à accepter le maître. Leur masse dépose de l'apathie. Une foule se totalise aisément en obéissance. Il faut les remuer, les pousser, rudoyer les hommes par le bienfait même de leur délivrance, leur blesser les yeux par le vrai, leur jeter la lumière à poignées terribles. Il faut qu'ils soient eux-mêmes un peu foudroyés par leur propre salut; cet éblouissement les réveille. De là la nécessité des tocsins et des guerres. Il faut que de grands combattants se lèvent, illuminent les nations par l'audace, et secouent cette triste humanité que couvrent d'ombre le droit divin, la gloire césarienne, la force, le fanatisme, le pouvoir irresponsable et les majestés absolues; cohue stupidement occupée à contempler, dans leur splendeur crépusculaire, ces sombres triomphes de la nuit. À bas le tyran! Mais quoi? de qui parlez-vous? appelez-vous Louis-Philippe tyran? Non; pas plus que Louis XVI. Ils sont tous deux ce que l'histoire a coutume de nommer de bons rois; mais les principes ne se morcellent pas, la logique du vrai est rectiligne, le propre de la vérité c'est de manquer de complaisance; pas de concession donc; tout empiétement sur l’homme doit être réprimé; il y a le droit divin dans Louis XVI, il y a le parce que Bourbon dans Louis-Philippe; tous deux représentent dans une certaine mesure la confiscation du droit, et pour déblayer l’usurpation universelle, il faut les combattre; il le faut, la France étant toujours ce qui commence. Quand le maître tombe en France, il tombe partout. En somme, rétablir la vérité sociale, rendre son trône à la liberté, rendre le peuple au peuple, rendre à l’homme la souveraineté, replacer la pourpre sur la tête de la France, restaurer dans leur plénitude la raison et l’équité, supprimer tout germe d’antagonisme en restituant chacun à lui-même, anéantir l’obstacle que la royauté fait à l’immense concorde universelle, remettre le genre humain de niveau avec le droit, quelle cause plus juste, et, par conséquent, quelle guerre plus grande? Ces guerres-là construisent la paix. Une énorme forteresse de préjugés, de privilèges, de superstitions, de mensonges, d’exactions, d’abus, de violences, d’iniquités, de ténèbres, est encore debout sur le monde avec ses tours de haine. Il faut la jeter bas. Il faut faire crouler cette masse monstrueuse. Vaincre à Austerlitz, c’est grand, prendre la Bastille, c’est immense.

Il n’est personne qui ne l’ait remarqué sur soi-même, l’âme, et c’est là la merveille de son unité compliquée d’ubiquité, a cette aptitude étrange de raisonner presque froidement dans les extrémités les plus violentes, et il arrive souvent que la passion désolée et le profond désespoir, dans l’agonie même de leurs monologues les plus noirs, traitent des sujets et discutent des thèses. La logique se mêle à la convulsion, et le fil du syllogisme flotte sans se casser dans l’orage lugubre de la pensée. C’était là la situation d’esprit de Marius.

Tout en songeant ainsi, accablé, mais résolu, hésitant pourtant, et, en somme, frémissant devant ce qu’il allait faire, son regard errait dans l’intérieur de la barricade. Les insurgés y causaient à demi-voix, sans remuer, et l’on y sentait ce quasi-silence qui marque la dernière phase de l’attente. Au-dessus d’eux, à une lucarne d’un troisième étage, Marius distinguait une espèce de spectateur ou de témoin qui lui semblait singulièrement attentif. C’était le portier tué par Le Cabuc. D’en bas, à la réverbération de la torche enfouie dans les pavés, on apercevait cette tête vaguement. Rien n’était plus étrange, à cette clarté sombre et incertaine, que cette face livide, immobile, étonnée, avec ses cheveux hérissés, ses yeux ouverts et fixes et sa bouche béante, penchée sur la rue dans une attitude de curiosité.

On eût dit que celui qui était mort considérait ceux qui allaient mourir. Une longue traînée de sang qui avait coulé de cette tête descendait en filets rougeâtres de la lucarne jusqu'à la hauteur du premier étage où elle s'arrêtait.

Livre quatorzième — Les grandeurs du désespoir

Chapitre I

Le drapeau — Premier acte

Rien ne venait encore. Dix heures avaient sonné à Saint-Merry, Enjolras et Combeferre étaient allés s’asseoir, la carabine à la main, près de la coupure de la grande barricade. Ils ne se parlaient pas; ils écoutaient, cherchant à saisir même le bruit de marche le plus sourd et le plus lointain.

Subitement, au milieu de ce calme lugubre, une voix claire, jeune, gaie, qui semblait venir de la rue Saint-Denis, s’éleva et se mit à chanter distinctement sur le vieil air populaire Au clair de la lune cette poésie terminée par une sorte de cri pareil au chant du coq:

Mon nez est en larmes.
Mon ami Bugeaud,
Prêt’-moi tes gendarmes
Pour leur dire un mot.
En capote bleue,
La poule au shako,
Voici la banlieue!
Co-cocorico!

Ils se serrèrent la main.

— C’est Gavroche, dit Enjolras.

— Il nous avertit, dit Combeferre.

Une course précipitée troubla la rue déserte, on vit un être plus agile qu’un clown grimper par-dessus l’omnibus, et Gavroche bondit dans la barricade tout essoufflé, en disant:

— Mon fusil! Les voici.

Un frisson électrique parcourut toute la barricade, et l’on entendit le mouvement des mains cherchant les fusils.

— Veux-tu ma carabine? dit Enjolras au gamin.

— Je veux le grand fusil, répondit Gavroche.

Et il prit le fusil de Javert.

Deux sentinelles s’étaient repliées et étaient rentrées presque en même temps que Gavroche. C’était la sentinelle du bout de la rue et la vedette de la Petite-Truanderie. La vedette de la ruelle des Prêcheurs était restée à son poste, ce qui indiquait que rien ne venait du côté des ponts et des halles.

La rue de la Chanvrerie, dont quelques pavés à peine étaient visibles au reflet de la lumière qui se projetait sur le drapeau, offrait aux insurgés l'aspect d'un grand porche noir vaguement ouvert dans une fumée.

Chacun avait pris son poste de combat.

Quarante-trois insurgés, parmi lesquels Enjolras, Combeferre, Courfeyrac, Bossuet, Joly, Bahorel, et Gavroche, étaient agenouillés dans la grande barricade, les têtes à fleur de la crête du barrage, les canons des fusils et des carabines braqués sur les pavés comme à des meurtrières, attentifs, muets, prêts à faire feu. Six, commandés par Feuilly, s'étaient installés, le fusil en joue, aux fenêtres des deux étages de Corinthe.

Quelques instants s'écoulèrent encore, puis un bruit de pas, mesuré, pesant, nombreux, se fit entendre distinctement du côté de Saint-Leu. Ce bruit, d'abord faible, puis précis, puis lourd et sonore, s'approchait lentement, sans halte, sans interruption, avec une continuité tranquille et terrible. On n'entendait rien que cela. C'était tout ensemble le silence et le bruit de la statue du commandeur, mais ce pas de pierre avait on ne sait quoi d'énorme et de multiple qui éveillait l'idée d'une foule en même temps que l'idée d'un spectre. On croyait entendre marcher l'effrayante statue Légion. Ce pas approcha; il approcha encore, et s'arrêta. Il sembla qu'on entendît au bout de la rue le souffle de beaucoup d'hommes. On ne voyait rien pourtant, seulement on distinguait tout au fond, dans cette épaisse obscurité, une multitude de fils métalliques, fins comme des aiguilles et presque imperceptibles, qui s'agitaient, pareils à ces indescriptibles réseaux phosphoriques qu'au moment de s'endormir on aperçoit, sous ses paupières fermées, dans les premiers brouillards du sommeil. C'étaient les bayonnettes et les canons de fusils confusément éclairés par la réverbération lointaine de la torche.

Il y eut encore une pause, comme si des deux côtés on attendait. Tout à coup, du fond de cette ombre, une voix, d'autant plus sinistre qu'on ne voyait personne, et qu'il semblait que c'était l'obscurité elle-même qui parlait, cria:

— Qui vive?

En même temps on entendit le cliquetis des fusils qui s'abattent.

Enjolras répondit d'un accent vibrant et altier:

— Révolution française.

— Feu! dit la voix.

Un éclair empourpra toutes les façades de la rue comme si la porte d’une fournaise s’ouvrait et se fermait brusquement.

Une effroyable détonation éclata sur la barricade. Le drapeau rouge tomba. La décharge avait été si violente et si dense qu’elle en avait coupé la hampe; c’est-à-dire la pointe même du timon de l’omnibus. Des balles, qui avaient ricoché sur les corniches des maisons, pénétrèrent dans la barricade et blessèrent plusieurs hommes.

L’impression de cette première décharge fut glaçante. L’attaque était rude, et de nature à faire songer les plus hardis. Il était évident qu’on avait au moins affaire à un régiment tout entier.

— Camarades, cria Courfeyrac, ne perdons pas la poudre. Attendons pour riposter qu’ils soient engagés dans la rue.

— Et, avant tout, dit Enjolras, relevons le drapeau!

Il ramassa le drapeau qui était précisément tombé à ses pieds.

On entendait au dehors le choc des baguettes dans les fusils; la troupe rechargeait les armes.

Enjolras reprit:

— Qui est-ce qui a du cœur ici? qui est-ce qui replante le drapeau sur la barricade?

Pas un ne répondit. Monter sur la barricade au moment où sans doute elle était couchée en joue de nouveau, c’était simplement la mort. Le plus brave hésite à se condamner. Enjolras lui-même avait un frémissement. Il répéta:

— Personne ne se présente?

Chapitre II

Le drapeau — Deuxième acte

Depuis qu'on était arrivé à Corinthe et qu'on avait commencé à construire la barricade, on n'avait plus guère fait attention au père Mabeuf. M. Mabeuf pourtant n'avait pas quitté l'attroupement. Il était entré dans le rez-de-chaussée du cabaret et s'était assis derrière le comptoir. Là, il s'était pour ainsi dire anéanti en lui-même. Il semblait ne plus regarder et ne plus penser. Courfeyrac et d'autres l'avaient deux ou trois fois accosté, l'avertissant du péril, l'engageant à se retirer, sans qu'il parût les entendre. Quand on ne lui parlait pas, sa bouche remuait comme s'il répondait à quelqu'un, et dès qu'on lui adressait la parole, ses lèvres devenaient immobiles et ses yeux n'avaient plus l'air vivants. Quelques heures avant que la barricade fût attaquée, il avait pris une posture qu'il n'avait plus quittée, les deux poings sur ses deux genoux et la tête penchée en avant comme s'il regardait dans un précipice. Rien n'avait pu le tirer de cette attitude; il ne paraissait pas que son esprit fût dans la barricade. Quand chacun était allé prendre sa place de combat, il n'était plus resté dans la salle basse que Javert lié au poteau, un insurgé le sabre nu, veillant sur Javert, et lui Mabeuf. Au moment de l'attaque, à la détonation, la secousse physique l'avait atteint et comme réveillé, il s'était levé brusquement, il avait traversé la salle, et à l'instant où Enjolras répéta son appel: — Personne ne se présente? on vit le vieillard apparaître sur le seuil du cabaret.

Sa présence fit une sorte de commotion dans les groupes. Un cri s'éleva:

— C'est le votant! c'est le conventionnel! c'est le représentant du peuple!

Il est probable qu'il n'entendait pas.

Il marcha droit à Enjolras, les insurgés s'écartaient devant lui avec une crainte religieuse, il arracha le drapeau à Enjolras qui reculait pétrifié, et alors, sans que personne osât ni l'arrêter ni l'aider, ce vieillard de quatre-vingts ans, la tête branlante, le pied ferme, se mit à gravir lentement l'escalier de pavés pratiqué dans la barricade. Cela était si sombre et si grand que tous autour de lui crièrent: Chapeau bas! À chaque marche qu'il montait, c'était effrayant, ses cheveux blancs, sa face décrépite, son grand front chauve et ridé, ses yeux caves, sa bouche étonnée et ouverte, son vieux bras levant la bannière rouge, surgissaient de l’ombre et grandissaient dans la clarté sanglante de la torche, et l’on croyait voir le spectre de 93 sortir de terre, le drapeau de la terreur à la main.

Quand il fut au haut de la dernière marche, quand ce fantôme tremblant et terrible, debout sur ce monceau de décombres en présence de douze cents fusils invisibles, se dressa, en face de la mort et comme s’il était plus fort qu’elle, toute la barricade eut dans les ténèbres une figure surnaturelle et colossale.

Il y eut un de ces silences qui ne se font qu’autour des prodiges.

Au milieu de ce silence le vieillard agita le drapeau rouge et cria:

— Vive la Révolution! vive la République! fraternité! égalité! et la mort!

On entendit de la barricade un chuchotement bas et rapide pareil au murmure d’un prêtre pressé qui dépêche une prière. C’était probablement le commissaire de police qui faisait les sommations légales à l’autre bout de la rue.

Puis la même voix éclatante qui avait crié: qui vive? cria:

— Retirez-vous!

M. Mabeuf, blême, hagard, les prunelles illuminées des lugubres flammes de l’égarement, leva le drapeau au-dessus de son front et répéta:

— Vive la République!

— Feu! dit la voix.

Une seconde décharge, pareille à une mitraille, s’abattit sur la barricade.

Le vieillard fléchit sur ses genoux, puis se redressa, laissa échapper le drapeau et tomba en arrière à la renverse sur le pavé, comme une planche, tout de son long et les bras en croix.

Des ruisseaux de sang coulèrent de dessous lui. Sa vieille tête, pâle et triste, semblait regarder le ciel.

Une de ces émotions supérieures à l’homme qui font qu’on oublie même de se défendre, saisit les insurgés, et ils s’approchèrent du cadavre avec une épouvante respectueuse.

— Quels hommes que ces régicides! dit Enjolras.

Courfeyrac se pencha à l’oreille d’Enjolras:

— Ceci n’est que pour toi, et je ne veux pas diminuer l’enthousiasme. Mais ce n’était rien moins qu’un régicide. Je l’ai connu. Il s’appelait le père Mabeuf. Je ne sais pas ce qu’il avait aujourd’hui. Mais c’était une brave ganache. Regarde-moi sa tête.

— Tête de ganache et cœur de Brutus, répondit Enjolras.

Puis il éleva la voix:

— Citoyens! ceci est l'exemple que les vieux donnent aux jeunes. Nous hésitions, il est venu! nous reculions, il a avancé! Voilà ce que ceux qui tremblent de vieillesse enseignent à ceux qui tremblent de peur! Cet aïeul est auguste devant la patrie. Il a eu une longue vie et une magnifique mort! Maintenant abritons le cadavre, que chacun de nous défende ce vieillard mort comme il défendrait son père vivant, et que sa présence au milieu de nous fasse la barricade imprenable!

Un murmure d'adhésion morne et énergique suivit ces paroles.

Enjolras se courba, souleva la tête du vieillard, et, farouche, le baisa au front, puis, lui écartant les bras, et maniant ce mort avec une précaution tendre, comme s'il eût craint de lui faire du mal, il lui ôta son habit, en montra à tous les trous sanglants, et dit:

— Voilà maintenant notre drapeau.

Chapitre III

Gavroche aurait mieux fait d’accepter la carabine d’Enjolras

On jeta sur le père Mabeuf un long châle noir de la veuve Hucheloup. Six hommes firent de leurs fusils une civière, on y posa le cadavre, et on le porta, têtes nues, avec une lenteur solennelle, sur la grande table de la salle basse.

Ces hommes, tout entiers à la chose grave et sacrée qu’ils faisaient, ne songeaient plus à la situation périlleuse où ils étaient.

Quand le cadavre passa près de Javert toujours impassible, Enjolras dit à l’espion:

— Toi! tout à l’heure.

Pendant ce temps-là, le petit Gavroche, qui seul n’avait pas quitté son poste et était resté en observation, croyait voir des hommes s’approcher à pas de loup de la barricade. Tout à coup il cria:

— Méfiez-vous!

Courfeyrac, Enjolras, Jean Prouvaire, Combeferre, Joly, Bahorel, Bossuet, tous sortirent en tumulte du cabaret. Il n’était déjà presque plus temps. On apercevait une étincelante épaisseur de bayonnettes ondulant au-dessus de la barricade. Des gardes municipaux de haute taille, pénétraient, les uns en enjambant l’omnibus, les autres par la coupure, poussant devant eux le gamin qui reculait, mais ne fuyait pas.

L’instant était critique. C’était cette première redoutable minute de l’inondation, quand le fleuve se soulève an niveau de la levée et que l’eau commence à s’infiltrer par les fissures de la digue. Une seconde encore, et la barricade était prise.

Bahorel s’élança sur le premier garde municipal qui entrait et le tua à bout portant d’un coup de carabine; le second tua Bahorel d’un coup de bayonnette. Un autre avait déjà terrassé Courfeyrac qui criait: «À moi!» Le plus grand de tous, une espèce de colosse, marchait sur Gavroche la bayonnette en avant. Le gamin prit dans ses petits bras l’énorme fusil de Javert, coucha résolûment en joue le géant, et lâcha son coup. Rien ne partit. Javert n’avait pas chargé son fusil. Le garde municipal éclata de rire et leva la bayonnette sur l’enfant.

Avant que la bayonnette eût touché Gavroche, le fusil échappait des mains du soldat, une balle avait frappé le garde municipal au milieu du front et il tombait sur le dos. Une seconde balle frappait en pleine poitrine l’autre garde qui avait assailli Courfeyrac, et le jetait sur le pavé.

C’était Marius qui venait d’entrer dans la barricade.

Chapitre IV

Le baril de poudre

Marius, toujours caché dans le coude de la rue Mondétour, avait assisté à la première phase du combat, irrésolu et frissonnant. Cependant il n’avait pu résister longtemps à ce vertige mystérieux et souverain qu’on pourrirait nommer l’appel de l’abîme. Devant l’imminence du péril, devant la mort de M. Mabeuf, cette funèbre énigme, devant Bahorel tué, Courfeyrac criant: à moi! cet enfant menacé, ses amis à secourir ou à venger, toute hésitation s’était évanouie, et il s’était rué dans la mêlée ses deux pistolets à la main. Du premier coup il avait sauvé Gavroche et du second délivré Courfeyrac.

Aux coups de feu, aux cris des gardes frappés, les assaillants avaient gravi le retranchement, sur le sommet duquel on voyait maintenant se dresser plus d’à mi-corps, et en foule, des gardes municipaux, des soldats de la ligne, des gardes nationaux de la banlieue, le fusil au poing. Ils couvraient déjà plus des deux tiers du barrage, mais ils ne sautaient pas dans l’enceinte, comme s’ils balançaient, craignant quelque piège. Ils regardaient dans la barricade obscure comme on regarderait dans une tanière de lions. La lueur de la torche n’éclairait que les bayonnettes, les bonnets à poil et le haut des visages inquiets et irrités.

Marius n’avait plus d’armes, il avait jeté ses pistolets déchargés, mais il avait aperçu le baril de poudre dans la salle basse près de la porte.

Comme il se tournait à demi, regardant de ce côté, un soldat le coucha en joue. Au moment où le soldat ajustait Marius, une main se posa sur le bout du canon du fusil, et le boucha. C’était quelqu’un qui s’était élancé, le jeune ouvrier au pantalon de velours. Le coup partit, traversa la main, et peut-être aussi l’ouvrier, car il tomba, mais la balle n’atteignit pas Marius. Tout cela dans la fumée, plutôt entrevu que vu. Marius, qui entrait dans la salle basse, s’en aperçut à peine. Cependant il avait confusément vu ce canon de fusil dirigé sur lui et cette main qui l’avait bouché, et il avait entendu le coup. Mais dans des minutes comme celle-là, les choses qu’on voit vacillent et se précipitent, et l’on ne s’arrête à rien. On se sent obscurément poussé vers plus d’ombre encore, et tout est nuage.

Les insurgés, surpris, mais non effrayés, s’étaient ralliés. Enjolras avait crié: Attendez! ne tirez pas au hasard! Dans la première confusion en effet ils pouvaient se blesser les uns les autres. La plupart étaient montés à la fenêtre du premier étage et aux mansardes d’où ils dominaient les assaillants. Les plus déterminés, avec Enjolras, Courfeyrac, Jean Prouvaire et Combeferre, s’étaient fièrement adossés aux maisons du fond, à découvert et faisant face aux rangées de soldats et de gardes qui couronnaient la barricade.

Tout cela s’accomplit sans précipitation, avec cette gravité étrange et menaçante qui précède les mêlées. Des deux parts on se couchait en joue, à bout portant, on était si près qu’on pouvait se parler à portée de voix. Quand on fut à ce point où l’étincelle va jaillir, un officier en hausse-col et à grosses épaulettes étendit son épée et dit:

— Bas les armes!

— Feu! dit Enjolras.

Les deux détonations partirent en même temps, et tout disparut dans la fumée.

Fumée âcre et étouffante où se traînaient, avec des gémissements faibles et sourds, des mourants et des blessés.

Quand la fumée se dissipa, on vit des deux côtés les combattants, éclaircis, mais toujours aux mêmes places, qui rechargeaient les armes en silence.

Tout à coup, on entendit une voix tonnante qui criait:

— Allez-vous-en, ou je fais sauter la barricade!

Tous se retournèrent du côté d’où venait la voix.

Marius était entré dans la salle basse, y avait pris le baril de poudre, puis il avait profité de la fumée et de l’espèce de brouillard obscur qui emplissait l’enceinte retranchée, pour se glisser le long de la barricade jusqu’à cette cage de pavés où était fixée la torche. En arracher la torche, y mettre le baril de poudre, pousser la pile de pavés sous le baril, qui s’était sur-le-champ défoncé, avec une sorte d’obéissance terrible, tout cela avait été pour Marius le temps de se baisser et de se relever; et maintenant tous, gardes nationaux, gardes municipaux, officiers, soldats, pelotonnés à l’autre extrémité de la barricade, le regardaient avec stupeur le pied sur les pavés, la torche à la main, son fier visage éclairé par une résolution fatale, penchant la flamme de la torche vers ce monceau redoutable où l’on distinguait le baril de poudre brisé, et poussant ce cri terrifiant:

— Allez-vous-en, ou je fais sauter la barricade!

Marius sur cette barricade après l’octogénaire, c’était la vision de la jeune révolution après l’apparition de la vieille.

— Sauter la barricade! dit un sergent, et toi aussi!

Marius répondit:

— Et moi aussi.

Et il approcha la torche du baril de poudre.

Mais il n’y avait déjà plus personne sur le barrage. Les assaillants, laissant leurs morts et leurs blessés, refluaient pêle-mêle et en désordre vers l’extrémité de la rue et s’y perdaient de nouveau dans la nuit. Ce fut un sauve-qui-peut.

La barricade était dégagée.

Chapitre V

Fin des vers de Jean Prouvaire

Tous entourèrent Marius. Courfeyrac lui sauta au cou.

— Te voilà!

— Quel bonheur! dit Combeferre.

— Tu es venu à propos! fit Bossuet.

— Sans toi j’étais mort! reprit Courfeyrac.

— Sans vous j’étais gobé! ajouta Gavroche.

Marius demanda:

— Où est le chef?

— C’est toi, dit Enjolras.

Marius avait eu toute la journée une fournaise dans le cerveau, maintenant c’était un tourbillon. Ce tourbillon qui était en lui lui faisait l’effet d’être hors de lui et de l’emporter. Il lui semblait qu’il était déjà à une distance immense de la vie. Ses deux lumineux mois de joie et d’amour aboutissant brusquement à cet effroyable précipice, Cosette perdue pour lui, cette barricade, M. Mabeuf se faisant tuer pour la République, lui-même chef d’insurgés, toutes ces choses lui paraissaient un cauchemar monstrueux. Il était obligé de faire un effort d’esprit pour se rappeler que tout ce qui l’entourait était réel. Marius avait trop peu vécu encore pour savoir que rien n’est plus imminent que l’impossible, et que ce qu’il faut toujours prévoir, c’est l’imprévu. Il assistait à son propre drame comme à une pièce qu’on ne comprend pas.

Dans cette brume où était sa pensée, il ne reconnut pas Javert qui, lié à son poteau, n’avait pas fait un mouvement de la tête pendant l’attaque de la barricade et qui regardait s’agiter autour de lui la révolte avec la résignation d’un martyr et la majesté d’un juge. Marius ne l’aperçut même pas.

Cependant les assaillants ne bougeaient plus, on les entendait marcher et fourmiller au bout de la rue, mais ils ne s’y aventuraient pas, soit qu’ils attendissent des ordres, soit qu’avant de se ruer de nouveau sur cette imprenable redoute, ils attendissent des renforts. Les insurgés avaient posé des sentinelles, et quelques-uns qui étaient étudiants en médecine s’étaient mis à panser les blessés.

On avait jeté les tables hors du cabaret à l’exception de deux tables réservées à la charpie et aux cartouches, et de la table où gisait le père Mabeuf; on les avait ajoutées à la barricade, et on les avait remplacées dans la salle basse par les matelas des lits de la veuve Hucheloup et des servantes. Sur ces matelas on avait étendu les blessés. Quant aux trois pauvres créatures qui habitaient Corinthe, on ne savait ce qu’elles étaient devenues. On finit pourtant par les retrouver cachées dans la cave.

Une émotion poignante vint assombrir la joie de la barricade dégagée.

On fit l’appel. Un des insurgés manquait. Et qui? Un des plus chers, un des plus vaillants. Jean Prouvaire. On le chercha parmi les blessés, il n’y était pas. On le chercha parmi les morts, il n’y était pas. Il était évidemment prisonnier.

Combeferre dit à Enjolras:

— Ils ont notre ami; mais nous avons leur agent. Tiens-tu à la mort de ce mouchard?

— Oui, répondit Enjolras, mais moins qu’à la vie de Jean Prouvaire.

Ceci se passait dans la salle basse près du poteau de Javert.

— Eh bien, reprit Combeferre, je vais attacher mon mouchoir à ma canne, et aller en parlementaire leur offrir de leur donner leur homme pour le nôtre.

— Écoute, dit Enjolras en posant sa main sur le bras de Combeferre.

Il y avait au bout de la rue un cliquetis d’armes significatif.

On entendit une voix mâle crier:

— Vive la France! vive l’avenir!

On reconnut la voix de Prouvaire.

Un éclair passa et une détonation éclata.

Le silence se refit.

— Ils l’ont tué, s’écria Combeferre.

Enjolras regarda Javert et lui dit:

— Tes amis viennent de te fusiller.

Chapitre VI

L’agonie de la mort après l’agonie de la vie

Une singularité de ce genre de guerre, c’est que l’attaque des barricades se fait presque toujours de front, et qu’en général les assaillants s’abstiennent de tourner les positions, soit qu’ils redoutent des embuscades, soit qu’ils craignent de s’engager dans des rues tortueuses. Toute l’attention des insurgés se portait donc du côté de la grande barricade qui était évidemment le point toujours menacé et où devait recommencer infailliblement la lutte. Marius pourtant songea à la petite barricade et y alla. Elle était déserte et n’était gardée que par le lampion qui tremblait entre les pavés. Du reste la ruelle Mondétour et les embranchements de la Petite-Truanderie et du Cygne étaient profondément calmes.

Comme Marius, l’inspection faite, se retirait, il entendit son nom prononcé faiblement dans l’obscurité:

— Monsieur Marius!

Il tressaillit, car il reconnut la voix qui l’avait appelé deux heures auparavant à travers la grille de la rue Plumet.

Seulement cette voix maintenant semblait n’être plus qu’un souffle.

Il regarda autour de lui et ne vit personne.

Marius crut s’être trompé, et que c’était une illusion ajoutée par son esprit aux réalités extraordinaires qui se heurtaient autour de lui. Il fit un pas pour sortir de l’enfoncement reculé où était la barricade.

— Monsieur Marius! répéta la voix.

Cette fois il ne pouvait douter, il avait distinctement entendu; il regarda, et ne vit rien.

— À vos pieds, dit la voix.

Il se courba et vit dans l’ombre une forme qui se traînait vers lui. Cela rampait sur le pavé. C’était cela qui lui parlait.

Le lampion permettait de distinguer une blouse, un pantalon de gros velours déchiré, des pieds nus, et quelque chose qui ressemblait à une mare de sang. Marius entrevit une tête pâle qui se dressait vers lui et qui lui dit:

— Vous ne me reconnaissez pas?

— Non.

— Éponine.

Marius se baissa vivement. C’était en effet cette malheureuse enfant. Elle était habillée en homme.

— Comment êtes-vous ici? que faites-vous là?

— Je meurs, lui dit-elle.

Il y a des mots et des incidents qui réveillent les êtres accablés. Marius s’écria comme en sursaut:

— Vous êtes blessée! Attendez, je vais vous porter dans la salle. On va vous panser. Est-ce grave? comment faut-il vous prendre pour ne pas vous faire mal? où souffrez-vous? Du secours! mon Dieu! Mais qu’êtes-vous venue faire ici?

Et il essaya de passer son bras sous elle pour la soulever.

En la soulevant il rencontra sa main.

Elle poussa un cri faible.

— Vous ai-je fait mal? demanda Marius.

— Un peu.

— Mais je n’ai touché que votre main.

Elle leva sa main vers le regard de Marius, et Marius au milieu de cette main vit un trou noir.

— Qu’avez-vous donc à la main? dit-il.

— Elle est percée.

— Percée!

— Oui.

— De quoi?

— D’une balle.

— Comment?

— Avez-vous vu un fusil qui vous couchait en joue?

— Oui, et une main qui l’a bouché.

— C’était la mienne.

Marius eut un frémissement:

— Quelle folie! Pauvre enfant! Mais tant mieux, si c’est cela, ce n’est rien. Laissez-moi vous porter sur un lit. On va vous panser, on ne meurt pas d’une main percée.

Elle murmura:

— La balle a traversé la main, mais elle est sortie par le dos. C’est inutile de m’ôter d’ici. Je vais vous dire comment vous pouvez me panser, mieux qu’un chirurgien. Asseyez-vous près de moi sur cette pierre.

Il obéit; elle posa sa tête sur les genoux de Marius, et, sans le regarder, elle dit:

— Oh! que c'est bon! Comme on est bien! Voilà! Je ne souffre plus.

Elle demeura un moment en silence, puis elle tourna son visage avec effort et regarda Marius.

— Savez-vous, monsieur Marius? Cela me taquinait que vous entriez dans ce jardin, c'était bête, puisque c'était moi qui vous avais montré la maison, et puis enfin je devais bien me dire qu'un jeune homme comme vous....

Elle s'interrompit, et, franchissant les sombres transitions qui étaient sans doute dans son esprit, elle reprit avec un déchirant sourire:

— Vous me trouviez laide, n'est-ce pas?

Elle continua:

— Voyez-vous, vous êtes perdu! Maintenant personne ne sortira de la barricade. C'est moi qui vous ai amené ici, tiens! Vous allez mourir. J'y compte bien. Et pourtant, quand j'ai vu qu'on vous visait, j'ai mis la main sur la bouche du canon de fusil. Comme c'est drôle! Mais c'est que je voulais mourir avant vous. Quand j'ai reçu cette balle, je me suis traînée ici, on ne m'a pas vue, on ne m'a pas ramassée. Je vous attendais, je disais: Il ne viendra donc pas? Oh! si vous saviez, je mordais ma blouse, je souffrais tant! Maintenant je suis bien. Vous rappelez-vous le jour où je suis entrée dans votre chambre et où je me suis mirée dans votre miroir, et le jour où je vous ai rencontré sur le boulevard près des femmes en journée? Comme les oiseaux chantaient! Il n'y a pas bien longtemps. Vous m'avez donné cent sous, et je vous ai dit: Je ne veux pas de votre argent. Avez-vous ramassé votre pièce au moins? Vous n'êtes pas riche. Je n'ai pas pensé à vous dire de la ramasser. Il faisait beau soleil, on n'avait pas froid. Vous souvenez-vous, monsieur Marius? Oh! je suis heureuse! Tout le monde va mourir.

Elle avait un air insensé, grave et navrant. Sa blouse déchirée montrait sa gorge nue. Elle appuyait en parlant sa main percée sur sa poitrine où il y avait un autre trou, et d'où il sortait par instants un flot de sang comme le jet de vin d'une bonde ouverte.

Marius considérait cette créature infortunée avec une profonde compassion.

— Oh! reprit-elle tout à coup, cela revient. J'étouffe!

Elle prit sa blouse et la mordit, et ses jambes se raidissaient sur le pavé.

En ce moment la voix de jeune coq du petit Gavroche retentit dans la barricade. L'enfant était monté sur une table pour charger son fusil et chantait gaîment la chanson alors si populaire:

En voyant Lafayette,
Le gendarme répète:
Sauvons-nous! sauvons-nous! sauvons-nous!

Éponine se souleva, et écouta, puis elle murmura:

— C'est lui.

Et se tournant vers Marius:

— Mon frère est là. Il ne faut pas qu'il me voie. Il me gronderait.

— Votre frère? demanda Marius qui songeait dans le plus amer et le plus douloureux de son cœur aux devoirs que son père lui avait légués envers les Thénardier, qui est votre frère?

— Ce petit.

— Celui qui chante?

— Oui.

Marius fit un mouvement.

— Oh! ne vous en allez pas! dit-elle, cela ne sera pas long à présent.

Elle était presque sur son séant, mais sa voix était très basse et coupée de hoquets. Par intervalles le râle l'interrompait. Elle approchait le plus qu'elle pouvait son visage du visage de Marius. Elle ajouta avec une expression étrange:

— Écoutez, je ne veux pas vous faire une farce. J'ai dans ma poche une lettre pour vous. Depuis hier. On m'avait dit de la mettre à la poste. Je l'ai gardée. Je ne voulais pas qu'elle vous parvînt. Mais vous m'en voudriez peut-être quand nous allons nous revoir tout à l'heure. On se revoit, n'est-ce pas? Prenez votre lettre.

Elle saisit convulsivement la main de Marius avec sa main trouée, mais elle semblait ne plus percevoir la souffrance. Elle mit la main de Marius dans la poche de sa blouse. Marius y sentit en effet un papier.

— Prenez, dit-elle.

Marius prit la lettre.

Elle fit un signe de satisfaction et de consentement.

— Maintenant pour ma peine, promettez-moi....

Et elle s'arrêta.

— Quoi? demanda Marius.

— Promettez-moi!

— Je vous promets.

— Promettez-moi de me donner un baiser sur le front quand je serai morte. — Je le sentirai.

Elle laissa retomber sa tête sur les genoux de Marius et ses paupières se fermèrent. Il crut cette pauvre âme partie. Éponine restait immobile; tout à coup, à l’instant où Marius la croyait à jamais endormie, elle ouvrit lentement ses yeux où apparaissait la sombre profondeur de la mort, et lui dit avec un accent dont la douceur semblait déjà venir d’un autre monde:

— Et puis, tenez, monsieur Marius, je crois que j’étais un peu amoureuse de vous.

Elle essaya encore de sourire et expira.

Chapitre VII

Gavroche profond calculateur des distances

Marius tint sa promesse. Il déposa un baiser sur ce front livide où perlait une sueur glacée. Ce n’était pas une infidélité à Cosette; c’était un adieu pensif et doux à une malheureuse âme.

Il n’avait pas pris sans un tressaillement la lettre qu’Éponine lui avait donnée. Il avait tout de suite senti là un événement. Il était impatient de la lire. Le cœur de l’homme est ainsi fait, l’infortunée enfant avait à peine fermé les yeux que Marius songeait à déplier ce papier. Il la reposa doucement sur la terre et s’en alla. Quelque chose lui disait qu’il ne pouvait lire cette lettre devant ce cadavre.

Il s’approcha d’une chandelle dans la salle basse. C’était un petit billet plié et cacheté avec ce soin élégant des femmes. L’adresse était d’une écriture de femme et portait:

— À monsieur, monsieur Marius Pontmercy, chez M. Courfeyrac, rue de la Verrerie, nº 16.

Il défit le cachet, et lut:

«Mon bien-aimé, hélas! mon père veut que nous partions tout de suite. Nous serons ce soir rue de l’Homme-Armé, nº 7. Dans huit jours nous serons à Londres. COSETTE, 4 juin.»

Telle était l’innocence de ces amours que Marius ne connaissait même pas l’écriture de Cosette.

Ce qui s’était passé peut être dit en quelques mots. Éponine avait tout fait. Après la soirée du 3 juin, elle avait eu une double pensée, déjouer les projets de son père et des bandits sur la maison de la rue Plumet, et séparer Marius de Cosette. Elle avait changé de guenilles avec le premier jeune drôle venu qui avait trouvé amusant de s’habiller en femme pendant qu’Éponine se déguisait en homme. C’était elle qui au Champ de Mars avait donné à Jean Valjean l’avertissement expressif: Déménagez. Jean Valjean était rentré en effet et avait dit à Cosette: Nous partons ce soir et nous allons rue de l’Homme-Armé avec Toussaint. La semaine prochaine nous serons à Londres. Cosette, atterrée de ce coup inattendu, avait écrit en hâte deux lignes à Marius. Mais comment faire mettre la lettre à la poste? Elle ne sortait pas seule, et Toussaint, surprise d’une telle commission, eût à coup sûr montré la lettre à M. Fauchelevent. Dans cette anxiété, Cosette avait aperçu à travers la grille Éponine en habits d'homme, qui rôdait maintenant sans cesse autour du jardin. Cosette avait appelé «ce jeune ouvrier» et lui avait remis cinq francs et la lettre, en lui disant: Portez cette lettre tout de suite à son adresse. Éponine avait mis la lettre dans sa poche. Le lendemain 5 juin, elle était allée chez Courfeyrac demander Marius, non pour lui remettre la lettre, mais, chose que toute âme jalouse et aimante comprendra, «pour voir». Là elle avait attendu Marius, ou au moins Courfeyrac, — toujours pour voir. — Quand Courfeyrac lui avait dit: nous allons aux barricades, une idée lui avait traversé l'esprit. Se jeter dans cette mort-là comme elle se serait jetée dans toute autre, et y pousser Marius. Elle avait suivi Courfeyrac, s'était assurée de l'endroit où l'on construisait la barricade; et bien sûre, puisque Marius n'avait reçu aucun avis et qu'elle avait intercepté la lettre, qu'il serait à la nuit tombante au rendez-vous de tous les soirs, elle était allée rue Plumet, y avait attendu Marius, et lui avait envoyé, au nom de ses amis, cet appel qui devait, pensait-elle, l'amener à la barricade. Elle comptait sur le désespoir de Marius quand il ne trouverait pas Cosette; elle ne se trompait pas. Elle était retournée de son côté rue de la Chanvrerie. On vient de voir ce qu'elle y avait fait. Elle était morte avec cette joie tragique des cœurs jaloux qui entraînent l'être aimé dans leur mort, et qui disent: personne ne l'aura!

Marius couvrit de baisers la lettre de Cosette. Elle l'aimait donc! Il eut un instant l'idée qu'il ne devait plus mourir. Puis il se dit: Elle part. Son père l'emmène en Angleterre et mon grand-père se refuse au mariage. Rien n'est changé dans la fatalité. Les rêveurs comme Marius ont de ces accablements suprêmes, et il en sort des partis pris désespérés. La fatigue de vivre est insupportable; la mort, c'est plus tôt fait.

Alors il songea qu'il lui restait deux devoirs à accomplir: informer Cosette de sa mort et lui envoyer un suprême adieu, et sauver de la catastrophe imminente qui se préparait ce pauvre enfant, frère d'Éponine et fils de Thénardier.

Il avait sur lui un portefeuille; le même qui avait contenu le cahier où il avait écrit tant de pensées d'amour pour Cosette. Il en arracha une feuille et écrivit au crayon ces quelques lignes:

«Notre mariage était impossible. J'ai demandé à mon grand-père, il a refusé; je suis sans fortune, et toi aussi. J'ai couru chez toi, je ne t'ai plus trouvée, tu sais la parole que je t'avais donnée, je la tiens. Je meurs. Je t'aime. Quand tu liras ceci, mon âme sera près de toi, et te sourira.»

N'ayant rien pour cacheter cette lettre, il se borna à plier le papier en quatre et y mit cette adresse:

À Mademoiselle Cosette Fauchelevent, chez M. Fauchelevent, rue de l'Homme-Armé, nº 7.

La lettre pliée, il demeura un moment pensif, reprit son portefeuille, l'ouvrit, et écrivit avec le même crayon sur la première page ces quatre lignes:

Il remit le portefeuille dans la poche de son habit, puis il appela Gavroche. Le gamin, à la voix de Marius, accourut avec sa mine joyeuse et dévouée.

— Veux-tu faire quelque chose pour moi?

— Tout, dit Gavroche. Dieu du bon Dieu! sans vous, vrai, j'étais cuit.

— Tu vois bien cette lettre?

— Oui.

— Prends-la. Sors de la barricade sur-le-champ (Gavroche, inquiet, commença à se gratter l'oreille), et demain matin tu la remettras à son adresse, à mademoiselle Cosette chez M. Fauchelevent, rue de l'Homme-Armé, nº 7.

L'héroïque enfant répondit:

— Ah bien mais! pendant ce temps-là, on prendra la barricade, et je n'y serai pas.

— La barricade ne sera plus attaquée qu'au point du jour selon toute apparence et ne sera pas prise avant demain midi.

Le nouveau répit que les assaillants laissaient à la barricade se prolongeait en effet. C'était une de ces intermittences, fréquentes dans les combats nocturnes, qui sont toujours suivies d'un redoublement d'acharnement.

— Eh bien, dit Gavroche, si j'allais porter votre lettre demain matin?

— Il sera trop tard. La barricade sera probablement bloquée, toutes les rues seront gardées, et tu ne pourras sortir. Va tout de suite.

Gavroche ne trouva rien à répliquer, il restait là, indécis, et se grattant l'oreille tristement. Tout à coup, avec un de ces mouvements d'oiseau qu'il avait, il prit la lettre.

— C’est bon, dit-il.

Et il partit en courant par la ruelle Mondétour.

Gavroche avait eu une idée qui l’avait déterminé, mais qu’il n’avait pas dite, de peur que Marius n’y fît quelque objection.

Cette idée, la voici:

— Il est à peine minuit, la rue de l’Homme-Armé n’est pas loin, je vais porter la lettre tout de suite, et je serai revenu à temps.

Livre quinzième — La rue de l’Homme-Armé

Chapitre I

Buvard, bavard

Qu’est-ce que les convulsions d’une ville auprès des émeutes de l’âme? L’homme est une profondeur plus grande encore que le peuple. Jean Valjean, en ce moment-là même, était en proie à un soulèvement effrayants. Tous les gouffres s’étaient rouverts en lui. Lui aussi frissonnait, comme Paris, au seuil d’une révolution formidable et obscure. Quelques heures avaient suffi. Sa destinée et sa conscience s’étaient brusquement couvertes d’ombre. De lui aussi, comme de Paris, on pouvait dire: les deux principes sont en présence. L’ange blanc et l’ange noir vont se saisir corps à corps sur le pont de l’abîme. Lequel des deux précipitera l’autre? Qui l’emportera?

La veille de ce même jour 5 juin, Jean Valjean, accompagné de Cosette et de Toussaint, s’était installé rue de l’Homme-Armé. Une péripétie l’y attendait.

Cosette n’avait pas quitté la rue Plumet sans un essai de résistance. Pour la première fois depuis qu’ils existaient côte à côte, la volonté de Cosette et la volonté de Jean Valjean s’étaient montrées distinctes, et s’étaient, sinon heurtées, du moins contredites. Il y avait eu objection d’un côté et inflexibilité de l’autre. Le brusque conseil: déménagez, jeté par un inconnu à Jean Valjean, l’avait alarmé au point de le rendre absolu. Il se croyait dépisté et poursuivi. Cosette avait dû céder.

Tous deux étaient arrivés rue de l’Homme-Armé sans desserrer les dents et sans se dire un mot, absorbés chacun dans leur préoccupation personnelle; Jean Valjean si inquiet qu’il ne voyait pas la tristesse de Cosette, Cosette si triste qu’elle ne voyait pas l’inquiétude de Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean avait emmené Toussaint, ce qu’il n’avait jamais fait dans ses précédentes absences. Il entrevoyait qu’il ne reviendrait peut-être pas rue Plumet, et il ne pouvait ni laisser Toussaint derrière lui, ni lui dire son secret. D’ailleurs il la sentait dévouée et sûre. De domestique à maître, la trahison commence par la curiosité. Or, Toussaint, comme si elle eût été prédestinée à être la servante de Jean Valjean, n’était pas curieuse. Elle disait à travers son bégayement, dans son parler de paysanne de Barneville: Je suis de même de même; je chose mon fait; le demeurant n’est pas mon travail. (Je suis ainsi; je fais ma besogne; le reste n’est pas mon affaire.)

Dans ce départ de la rue Plumet, qui avait été presque une fuite, Jean Valjean n'avait rien emporté que la petite valise embaumée baptisée par Cosette l'inséparable. Des malles pleines eussent exigé des commissionnaires, et des commissionnaires sont des témoins. On avait fait venir un fiacre à la porte de la rue de Babylone, et l'on s'en était allé.

C'est à grand'peine que Toussaint avait obtenu la permission d'empaqueter un peu de linge et de vêtements et quelques objets de toilette. Cosette, elle, n'avait emporté que sa papeterie et son buvard.

Jean Valjean, pour accroître la solitude et l'ombre de cette disparition, s'était arrangé de façon à ne quitter le pavillon de la rue Plumet qu'à la chute du jour, ce qui avait laissé à Cosette le temps d'écrire son billet à Marius. On était arrivé rue de l'Homme-Armé à la nuit close.

On s'était couché silencieusement.

Le logement de la rue de l'Homme-Armé était situé dans une arrière-cour, à un deuxième étage, et composé de deux chambres à coucher, d'une salle à manger et d'une cuisine attenante à la salle à manger, avec soupente où il y avait un lit de sangle qui échut à Toussaint. La salle à manger était en même temps l'antichambre et séparait les deux chambres à coucher. L'appartement était pourvu des ustensiles nécessaires.

On se rassure presque aussi follement qu'on s'inquiète; la nature humaine est ainsi. À peine Jean Valjean fut-il rue de l'Homme-Armé que son anxiété s'éclaircit, et, par degrés, se dissipa. Il y a des lieux calmants qui agissent en quelque sorte mécaniquement sur l'esprit. Rue obscure, habitants paisibles. Jean Valjean sentit on ne sait quelle contagion de tranquillité dans cette ruelle de l'ancien Paris, si étroite qu'elle est barrée aux voitures par un madrier transversal posé sur deux poteaux, muette et sourde au milieu de la ville en rumeur, crépusculaire en plein jour, et, pour ainsi dire, incapable d'émotions entre ses deux rangées de hautes maisons centenaires qui se taisent comme des vieillards qu'elles sont. Il y a dans cette rue de l'oubli stagnant. Jean Valjean y respira. Le moyen qu'on pût le trouver là?

Son premier soin fut de mettre l'inséparable à côté de lui.

Il dormit bien. La nuit conseille, on peut ajouter: la nuit apaise. Le lendemain matin, il s'éveilla presque gai. Il trouva charmante la salle à manger qui était hideuse, meublée d'une vieille table ronde, d'un buffet bas que surmontait un miroir penché, d'un fauteuil vermoulu et de quelques chaises encombrées des paquets de Toussaint. Dans un de ces paquets, on apercevait par un hiatus l’uniforme de garde national de Jean Valjean.

Quant à Cosette, elle s’était fait apporter par Toussaint un bouillon dans sa chambre, et ne parut que le soir.

Vers cinq heures, Toussaint, qui allait et venait, très occupée de ce petit emménagement, avait mis sur la table de la salle à manger une volaille froide que Cosette, par déférence pour son père, avait consenti à regarder.

Cela fait, Cosette, prétextant une migraine persistante, avait dit bonsoir à Jean Valjean et s’était enfermée dans sa chambre à coucher. Jean Valjean avait mangé une aile de poulet avec appétit, et accoudé sur la table, rasséréné peu à peu, rentrait en possession de sa sécurité.

Pendant qu’il faisait ce sobre dîner, il avait perçu confusément, à deux ou trois reprises, le bégayement de Toussaint qui lui disait: — Monsieur, il y a du train, on se bat dans Paris. Mais, absorbé dans une foule de combinaisons intérieures, il n’y avait point pris garde. À vrai dire, il n’avait pas entendu.

Il se leva, et se mit à marcher de la fenêtre à la porte et de la porte à la fenêtre, de plus en plus apaisé.

Avec le calme, Cosette, sa préoccupation unique, revenait dans sa pensée. Non qu’il s’émût de cette migraine, petite crise de nerfs, bouderie de jeune fille, nuage d’un moment, il n’y paraîtrait pas dans un jour ou deux; mais il songeait à l’avenir, et, comme d’habitude, il y songeait avec douceur. Après tout, il ne voyait aucun obstacle à ce que la vie heureuse reprît son cours. À de certaines heures, tout semble impossible; à d’autres heures, tout paraît aisé; Jean Valjean était dans une de ces bonnes heures. Elles viennent d’ordinaire après les mauvaises, comme le jour après la nuit, par cette loi de succession et de contraste qui est le fond même de la nature et que les esprits superficiels appellent antithèse. Dans cette paisible rue où il se réfugiait, Jean Valjean se dégageait de tout ce qui l’avait troublé depuis quelque temps. Par cela même qu’il avait vu beaucoup de ténèbres, il commençait à apercevoir un peu d’azur. Avoir quitté la rue Plumet sans complication et sans incident, c’était déjà un bon pas de fait. Peut-être serait-il sage de se dépayser, ne fût-ce que pour quelques mois, et d’aller à Londres. Eh bien, on irait. Être en France, être en Angleterre, qu’est-ce que cela faisait, pourvu qu’il eût près de lui Cosette? Cosette était sa nation. Cosette suffisait à son bonheur; l’idée qu’il ne suffisait peut-être pas, lui, au bonheur de Cosette, cette idée, qui avait été autrefois sa fièvre et son insomnie, ne se présentait même pas à son esprit. Il était dans le collapsus de toutes ses douleurs passées, et en plein optimisme. Cosette, étant près de lui, lui semblait à lui; effet d'optique que tout le monde a éprouvé. Il arrangeait en lui-même, et avec toutes sortes de facilités, le départ pour l'Angleterre avec Cosette, et il voyait sa félicité se reconstruire n'importe où dans les perspectives de sa rêverie.

Tout en marchant de long en large à pas lents, son regard rencontra tout à coup quelque chose d'étrange.

Il aperçut en face de lui, dans le miroir incliné qui surmontait le buffet, et il lut distinctement les quatre lignes que voici:

Jean Valjean s'arrêta hagard.

Cosette en arrivant avait posé son buvard sur le buffet devant le miroir, et, toute à sa douloureuse angoisse, l'avait oublié là, sans même remarquer qu'elle le laissait tout ouvert, et ouvert précisément à la page sur laquelle elle avait appuyé, pour les sécher, les quatre lignes écrites par elle et dont elle avait chargé le jeune ouvrier passant rue Plumet. L'écriture s'était imprimée sur le buvard.

Le miroir reflétait l'écriture.

Il en résultait ce qu'on appelle en géométrie l'image symétrique; de telle sorte que l'écriture renversée sur le buvard s'offrait redressée dans le miroir et présentait son sens naturel; et Jean Valjean avait sous les yeux la lettre écrite la veille par Cosette à Marius.

C'était simple et foudroyant.

Jean Valjean alla au miroir. Il relut les quatre lignes, mais il n'y crut point. Elles lui faisaient l'effet d'apparaître dans de la lueur d'éclair. C'était une hallucination. Cela était impossible. Cela n'était pas.

Peu à peu sa perception devint plus précise; il regarda le buvard de Cosette, et le sentiment du fait réel lui revint. Il prit le buvard et dit: Cela vient de là. Il examina fiévreusement les quatre lignes imprimées sur le buvard, le renversement des lettres en faisait un griffonnage bizarre, et il n'y vit aucun sens. Alors il se dit: Mais cela ne signifie rien, il n'y a rien d'écrit là. Et il respira à pleine poitrine avec un inexprimable soulagement. Qui n'a pas eu de ces joies bêtes dans les instants horribles? L'âme ne se rend pas au désespoir sans avoir épuisé toutes les illusions.

Il tenait le buvard à la main et le contemplait, stupidement heureux, presque prêt à rire de l’hallucination dont il avait été dupe. Tout à coup ses yeux retombèrent sur le miroir, et il revit la vision. Les quatre lignes s’y dessinaient avec une netteté inexorable. Cette fois ce n’était pas un mirage. La récidive d’une vision est une réalité, c’était palpable, c’était l’écriture redressée dans le miroir. Il comprit.

Jean Valjean chancela, laissa échapper le buvard, et s’affaissa dans le vieux fauteuil à côté du buffet, la tête tombante, la prunelle vitreuse, égaré. Il se dit que c’était évident, et que la lumière du monde était à jamais éclipsée, et que Cosette avait écrit cela à quelqu’un. Alors il entendit son âme, redevenue terrible, pousser dans les ténèbres un sourd rugissement. Allez donc ôter au lion le chien qu’il a dans sa cage!

Chose bizarre et triste, en ce moment-là, Marius n’avait pas encore la lettre de Cosette; le hasard l’avait portée en traître à Jean Valjean avant de la remettre à Marius.

Jean Valjean jusqu’à ce jour n’avait pas été vaincu par l’épreuve. Il avait été soumis à des essais affreux; pas une voie de fait de la mauvaise fortune ne lui avait été épargnée; la férocité du sort, armée de toutes les vindictes et de toutes les méprises sociales, l’avait pris pour sujet et s’était acharnée sur lui. Il n’avait reculé ni fléchi devant rien. Il avait accepté, quand il l’avait fallu, toutes les extrémités; il avait sacrifié son inviolabilité d’homme reconquise, livré sa liberté, risqué sa tête, tout perdu, tout souffert, et il était resté désintéressé et stoïque, au point que par moments on aurait pu le croire absent de lui-même comme un martyr. Sa conscience, aguerrie à tous les assauts possibles de l’adversité, pouvait sembler à jamais imprenable. Eh bien, quelqu’un qui eût vu son for intérieur eût été forcé de constater qu’à cette heure elle faiblissait.

C’est que de toutes les tortures qu’il avait subies dans cette longue question que lui donnait la destinée, celle-ci était la plus redoutable. Jamais pareille tenaille ne l’avait saisi. Il sentit le remuement mystérieux de toutes les sensibilités latentes. Il sentit le pincement de la fibre inconnue. Hélas, l’épreuve suprême, disons mieux, l’épreuve unique, c’est la perte de l’être aimé.

Le pauvre vieux Jean Valjean n’aimait, certes, pas Cosette autrement que comme un père; mais, nous l’avons fait remarquer plus haut, dans cette paternité la viduité même de sa vie avait introduit tous les amours; il aimait Cosette comme sa fille, et il l’aimait comme sa mère, et il l’aimait comme sa sœur; et, comme il n’avait jamais eu ni amante ni épouse, comme la nature est un créancier qui n’accepte aucun protêt, ce sentiment-là aussi, le plus imperdable de tous, était mêlé aux autres, vague, ignorant, pur de la pureté de l’aveuglement, inconscient, céleste, angélique, divin; moins comme un sentiment que comme un instinct, moins comme un instinct que comme un attrait, imperceptible et invisible, mais réel; et l’amour proprement dit était dans sa tendresse énorme pour Cosette comme le filon d’or est dans la montagne, ténébreux et vierge.

Qu’on se rappelle cette situation de cœur que nous avons indiquée déjà. Aucun mariage n’était possible entre eux, pas même celui des âmes; et cependant il est certain que leurs destinées s’étaient épousées. Excepté Cosette, c’est-à-dire excepté une enfance, Jean Valjean n’avait, dans toute sa longue vie, rien connu de ce qu’on peut aimer. Les passions et les amours qui se succèdent n’avaient point fait en lui de ces verts successifs, vert tendre sur vert sombre, qu’on remarque sur les feuillages qui passent l’hiver et sur les hommes qui passent la cinquantaine. En somme, et nous y avons plus d’une fois insisté, toute cette fusion intérieure, tout cet ensemble, dont la résultante était une haute vertu, aboutissait à faire de Jean Valjean un père pour Cosette. Père étrange forgé de l’aïeul, du fils, du frère et du mari qu’il y avait dans Jean Valjean; père dans lequel il y avait même une mère; père qui aimait Cosette et qui l’adorait, et qui avait cette enfant pour lumière, pour demeure, pour famille, pour patrie, pour paradis.

Aussi, quand il vit que c’était décidément fini, qu’elle lui échappait, qu’elle glissait de ses mains, qu’elle se dérobait, que c’était du nuage, que c’était de l’eau, quand il eut devant les yeux cette évidence écrasante: un autre est le but de son cœur, un autre est le souhait de sa vie; il y a le bien-aimé, je ne suis que le père; je n’existe plus; quand il ne put plus douter, quand il se dit: Elle s’en va hors de moi! la douleur qu’il éprouva dépassa le possible. Avoir fait tout ce qu’il avait fait pour en venir là! et, quoi donc! n’être rien! Alors, comme nous venons de le dire, il eut de la tête aux pieds un frémissement de révolte. Il sentit jusque dans la racine de ses cheveux l’immense réveil de l’égoïsme, et le moi hurla dans l’abîme de cet homme.

Il y a des effondrements intérieurs. La pénétration d’une certitude désespérante dans l’homme ne se fait point sans écarter et rompre de certains éléments profonds qui sont quelquefois l’homme lui-même. La douleur, quand elle arrive à ce degré, est un sauve-qui-peut de toutes les forces de la conscience. Ce sont là des crises fatales. Peu d’entre nous en sortent semblables à eux-mêmes et fermes dans le devoir. Quand la limite de la souffrance est débordée, la vertu la plus imperturbable se déconcerte. Jean Valjean reprit le buvard, et se convainquit de nouveau; il resta penché et comme pétrifié sur les quatre lignes irrécusables, l’œil fixe; et il se fit en lui un tel nuage qu’on eût pu croire que tout le dedans de cette âme s’écroulait.

Il examina cette révélation, à travers les grossissements de la rêverie, avec un calme apparent et effrayant, car c’est une chose redoutable quand le calme de l’homme arrive à la froideur de la statue.

Il mesura le pas épouvantable que sa destinée avait fait sans qu’il s’en doutât; il se rappela ses craintes de l’autre été, si follement dissipées; il reconnut le précipice; c’était toujours le même; seulement Jean Valjean n’était plus au seuil, il était au fond.

Chose inouïe et poignante, il y était tombé sans s’en apercevoir. Toute la lumière de sa vie s’en était allée, lui croyant voir toujours le soleil.

Son instinct n’hésita point. Il rapprocha certaines circonstances, certaines dates, certaines rougeurs et certaines pâleurs de Cosette, et il se dit: C’est lui. La divination du désespoir est une sorte d’arc mystérieux qui ne manque jamais son coup. Dès sa première conjecture, il atteignit Marius. Il ne savait pas le nom, mais il trouva tout de suite l’homme. Il aperçut distinctement, au fond de l’implacable évocation du souvenir, le rôdeur inconnu du Luxembourg, ce misérable chercheur d’amourettes, ce fainéant de romance, cet imbécile, ce lâche, car c’est une lâcheté de venir faire les yeux doux à des filles qui ont à côté d’elles leur père qui les aime.

Après qu’il eut bien constaté qu’au fond de cette situation il y avait ce jeune homme, et que tout venait de là, lui, Jean Valjean, l’homme régénéré, l’homme qui avait tant travaillé à son âme, l’homme qui avait fait tant d’efforts pour résoudre toute la vie, toute la misère et tout le malheur en amour, il regarda en lui-même et il y vit un spectre, la Haine.

Les grandes douleurs contiennent de l’accablement. Elles découragent d’être. L’homme chez lequel elles entrent sent quelque chose se retirer de lui. Dans la jeunesse, leur visite est lugubre; plus tard, elle est sinistre. Hélas, quand le sang est chaud, quand les cheveux sont noirs, quand la tête est droite sur le corps comme la flamme sur le flambeau, quand le rouleau de la destinée a encore presque toute son épaisseur, quand le cœur, plein d’un amour désirable, a encore des battements qu’on peut lui rendre, quand on a devant soi le temps de réparer, quand toutes les femmes sont là, et tous les sourires, et tout l'avenir, et tout l'horizon, quand la force de la vie est complète, si c'est une chose effroyable que le désespoir, qu'est-ce donc dans la vieillesse, quand les années se précipitent de plus en plus blêmissantes, à cette heure crépusculaire où l'on commence à voir les étoiles de la tombe!

Tandis qu'il songeait, Toussaint entra, Jean Valjean se leva, et lui demanda:

— De quel côté est-ce? savez-vous?

Toussaint, stupéfaite, ne put que lui répondre:

— Plaît-il?

Jean Valjean reprit:

— Ne m'avez-vous pas dit tout à l'heure qu'on se bat?

— Ah! oui, monsieur, répondit Toussaint. C'est du côté de Saint-Merry.

Il y a tel mouvement machinal qui nous vient, à notre insu même, de notre pensée la plus profonde. Ce fut sans doute sous l'impulsion d'un mouvement de ce genre, et dont il avait à peine conscience, que Jean Valjean se trouva cinq minutes après dans la rue.

Il était nu-tête, assis sur la borne de la porte de sa maison. Il semblait écouter.

La nuit était venue.

Chapitre II

Le gamin ennemi des lumières

Combien de temps passa-t-il ainsi? Quels furent les flux et les reflux de cette méditation tragique? se redressa-t-il? resta-t-il ployé? avait-il été courbé jusqu’à être brisé? pouvait-il se redresser encore et reprendre pied dans sa conscience sur quelque chose de solide? Il n’aurait probablement pu le dire lui-même.

La rue était déserte. Quelques bourgeois inquiets qui rentraient rapidement chez eux l’aperçurent à peine. Chacun pour soi dans les temps de péril. L’allumeur de nuit vint comme à l’ordinaire allumer le réverbère, qui était précisément placé en face de la porte du nº 7, et s’en alla. Jean Valjean, à qui l’eût examiné dans cette ombre, n’eût pas semblé un homme vivant. Il était là, assis sur la borne de sa porte, immobile comme une larve de glace. Il y a de la congélation dans le désespoir. On entendait le tocsin et de vagues rumeurs orageuses. Au milieu de toutes ces convulsions de la cloche mêlée à l’émeute, l’horloge de Saint-Paul sonna onze heures, gravement et sans se hâter; car le tocsin, c’est l’homme; l’heure, c’est Dieu. Le passage de l’heure ne fit rien à Jean Valjean; Jean Valjean ne remua pas. Cependant, à peu près vers ce moment-là, une brusque détonation éclata du côté des halles, une seconde la suivit, plus violente encore; c’était probablement cette attaque de la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie que nous venons de voir repoussée par Marius. À cette double décharge, dont la furie semblait accrue par la stupeur de la nuit, Jean Valjean tressaillit; il se dressa du côté d’où le bruit venait; puis il retomba sur la borne, il croisa les bras, et sa tête revint lentement se poser sur sa poitrine.

Il reprit son ténébreux dialogue avec lui-même.

Tout à coup, il leva les yeux, on marchait dans la rue, il entendait des pas près de lui, il regarda, et, à la lueur du réverbère, du côté de la rue qui aboutit aux Archives, il aperçut une figure livide, jeune et radieuse.

Gavroche venait d’arriver rue de l’Homme-Armé.

Gavroche regardait en l’air, et paraissait chercher. Il voyait parfaitement Jean Valjean, mais il ne s’en apercevait pas.

Gavroche, après avoir regardé en l’air, regardait en bas; il se haussait sur la pointe des pieds et tâtait les portes et les fenêtres des rez-de-chaussée; elles étaient toutes fermées, verrouillées et cadenassées. Après avoir constaté cinq ou six devantures de maisons barricadées de la sorte, le gamin haussa les épaules, et entra en matière avec lui-même en ces termes:

— Pardi!

Puis il se remit à regarder en l'air.

Jean Valjean, qui, l'instant d'auparavant, dans la situation d'âme où il était, n'eût parlé ni même répondu à personne, se sentit irrésistiblement poussé à adresser la parole à cet enfant.

— Petit, dit-il, qu'est-ce que tu as?

— J'ai que j'ai faim, répondit Gavroche nettement. Et il ajouta: Petit vous-même.

Jean Valjean fouilla dans son gousset et en tira une pièce de cinq francs.

Mais Gavroche, qui était de l'espèce du hoche-queue et qui passait vite d'un geste à l'autre, venait de ramasser une pierre. Il avait aperçu le réverbère.

— Tiens, dit-il, vous avez encore vos lanternes ici. Vous n'êtes pas en règle, mes amis. C'est du désordre. Cassez-moi ça.

Et il jeta la pierre dans le réverbère dont la vitre tomba avec un tel fracas que des bourgeois, blottis sous leurs rideaux dans la maison d'en face, crièrent: Voilà Quatre-vingt-treize!

Le réverbère oscilla violemment et s'éteignit. La rue devint brusquement noire.

— C'est ça, la vieille rue, fit Gavroche, mets ton bonnet de nuit.

Et se tournant vers Jean Valjean:

— Comment est-ce que vous appelez ce monument gigantesque que vous avez là au bout de la rue? C'est les Archives, pas vrai? Il faudrait me chiffonner un peu ces grosses bêtes de colonnes-là, et en faire gentiment une barricade.

Jean Valjean s'approcha de Gavroche.

— Pauvre être, dit-il à demi-voix et se parlant à lui-même, il a faim.

Et il lui mit la pièce de cent sous dans la main.

Gavroche leva le nez, étonné de la grandeur de ce gros sou; il le regarda dans l'obscurité, et la blancheur du gros sou l'éblouit. Il connaissait les pièces de cinq francs par ouï-dire; leur réputation lui était agréable; il fut charmé d'en voir une de près. Il dit: contemplons le tigre.

Il le considéra quelques instants avec extase; puis, se retournant vers Jean Valjean, il lui tendit la pièce et lui dit majestueusement:

— Bourgeois, j’aime mieux casser les lanternes. Reprenez votre bête féroce. On ne me corrompt point. Ça a cinq griffes; mais ça ne m’égratigne pas.

— As-tu une mère? demanda Jean Valjean.

Gavroche répondit:

— Peut-être plus que vous.

— Eh bien, reprit Jean Valjean, garde cet argent pour ta mère.

Gavroche se sentit remué. D’ailleurs, il venait de remarquer que l’homme qui lui parlait n’avait pas de chapeau, et cela lui inspirait confiance.

— Vrai, dit-il, ce n’est pas pour m’empêcher de casser les réverbères?

— Casse tout ce que tu voudras.

— Vous êtes un brave homme, dit Gavroche.

Et il mit la pièce de cinq francs dans une de ses poches.

Sa confiance croissant, il ajouta:

— Êtes-vous de la rue?

— Oui, pourquoi?

— Pourriez-vous m’indiquer le numéro 7?

— Pourquoi faire le numéro 7?

Ici l’enfant s’arrêta, il craignit d’en avoir trop dit, il plongea énergiquement ses ongles dans ses cheveux, et se borna à répondre:

— Ah! voilà.

Une idée traversa l’esprit de Jean Valjean. L’angoisse a de ces lucidités-là. Il dit à l’enfant:

— Est-ce que c’est toi qui m’apportes la lettre que j’attends?

— Vous? dit Gavroche. Vous n’êtes pas une femme.

— La lettre est pour mademoiselle Cosette, n’est-ce pas?

— Cosette? grommela Gavroche. Oui, je crois que c’est ce drôle de nom-là.

— Eh bien, reprit Jean Valjean, c’est moi qui dois lui remettre la lettre. Donne.

— En ce cas, vous devez savoir que je suis envoyé de la barricade?

— Sans doute, dit Jean Valjean.

Gavroche engloutit son poing dans une autre de ses poches et en tira un papier plié en quatre.

Puis il fit le salut militaire.

— Respect à la dépêche, dit-il. Elle vient du gouvernement provisoire.

— Donne, dit Jean Valjean.

Gavroche tenait le papier élevé au-dessus de sa tête.

— Ne vous imaginez pas que c’est là un billet doux. C’est pour une femme, mais c’est pour le peuple. Nous autres, nous nous battons, et nous respectons le sexe. Nous ne sommes pas comme dans le grand monde où il y a des lions qui envoient des poulets à des chameaux.

— Donne.

— Au fait, continua Gavroche, vous m’avez l’air d’un brave homme.

— Donne vite.

— Tenez.

Et il remit le papier à Jean Valjean.

— Et dépêchez-vous, monsieur Chose, puisque mamselle Chosette attend.

Gavroche fut satisfait d’avoir produit ce mot.

Jean Valjean reprit:

— Est-ce à Saint-Merry qu’il faudra porter la réponse?

— Vous feriez là, s’écria Gavroche, une de ces pâtisseries vulgairement nommées brioches. Cette lettre vient de la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie et j’y retourne. Bonsoir, citoyen.

Cela dit, Gavroche s’en alla, ou, pour mieux dire, reprit vers le lieu d’où il venait son vol d’oiseau échappé. Il se replongea dans l’obscurité comme s’il y faisait un trou, avec la rapidité rigide d’un projectile; la ruelle de l’Homme-Armé redevint silencieuse et solitaire; en un clin d’œil, cet étrange enfant, qui avait de l’ombre et du rêve en lui, s’était enfoncé dans la brume de ces rangées de maisons noires, et s’y était perdu comme de la fumée dans des ténèbres; et l’on eût pu le croire dissipé et évanoui, si, quelques minutes après sa disparition, une éclatante cassure de vitre et le patatras splendide d’un réverbère croulant sur le pavé n’eussent brusquement réveillé de nouveau les bourgeois indignés. C’était Gavroche qui passait rue du Chaume.

Chapitre III

Pendant que Cosette et Toussaint dorment

Jean Valjean rentra avec la lettre de Marius.

Il monta l'escalier à tâtons, satisfait des ténèbres comme le hibou qui tient sa proie, ouvrit et referma doucement sa porte, écouta s'il n'entendait aucun bruit, constata que, selon toute apparence, Cosette et Toussaint dormaient, plongea dans la bouteille du briquet Fumade trois ou quatre allumettes avant de pouvoir faire jaillir l'étincelle, tant sa main tremblait; il y avait du vol dans ce qu'il venait de faire. Enfin, sa chandelle fut allumée, il s'accouda sur la table, déplia le papier, et lut.

Dans les émotions violentes, on ne lit pas, on terrasse pour ainsi dire le papier qu'on tient, on l'étreint comme une victime, on le froisse, on enfonce dedans les ongles de sa colère ou de son allégresse; on court à la fin, on saute au commencement; l'attention a la fièvre; elle comprend en gros, à peu près, l'essentiel; elle saisit un point, et tout le reste disparaît. Dans le billet de Marius à Cosette, Jean Valjean ne vit que ces mots:

En présence de ces deux lignes, il eut un éblouissement horrible; il resta un moment comme écrasé du changement d'émotion qui se faisait en lui, il regardait le billet de Marius avec une sorte d'étonnement ivre; il avait devant les yeux cette splendeur, la mort de l'être haï.

Il poussa un affreux cri de joie intérieure. — Ainsi, c'était fini. Le dénouement arrivait plus vite qu'on n'eût osé l'espérer. L'être qui encombrait sa destinée disparaissait. Il s'en allait de lui-même, librement, de bonne volonté. Sans que lui, Jean Valjean, eût rien fait pour cela, sans qu'il y eût de sa faute, «cet homme» allait mourir. Peut-être même était-il déjà mort. — Ici sa fièvre fit des calculs. — Non. Il n'est pas encore mort. La lettre a été visiblement écrite pour être lue par Cosette le lendemain matin; depuis ces deux décharges qu'on a entendues entre onze heures et minuit, il n'y a rien eu; la barricade ne sera sérieusement attaquée qu'au point du jour; mais c'est égal, du moment où «cet homme» est mêlé à cette guerre, il est perdu; il est pris dans l'engrenage. — Jean Valjean se sentait délivré. Il allait donc, lui, se retrouver seul avec Cosette. La concurrence cessait; l'avenir recommençait. Il n'avait qu'à garder ce billet dans sa poche. Cosette ne saurait jamais ce que «cet homme» était devenu. «Il n’y a qu’à laisser les choses s’accomplir. Cet homme ne peut échapper. S’il n’est pas mort encore, il est sûr qu’il va mourir. Quel bonheur!»

Tout cela dit en lui-même, il devint sombre.

Puis il descendit et réveilla le portier.

Environ une heure après, Jean Valjean sortait en habit complet de garde national et en armes. Le portier lui avait aisément trouvé dans le voisinage de quoi compléter son équipement. Il avait un fusil chargé et une giberne pleine de cartouches. Il se dirigea du côté des halles.

Chapitre IV

Les excès de zèle de Gavroche

Cependant il venait d'arriver une aventure à Gavroche.

Gavroche, après avoir consciencieusement lapidé le réverbère de la rue du Chaume, aborda la rue des Vieilles-Haudriettes, et n'y voyant pas «un chat», trouva l'occasion bonne pour entonner toute la chanson dont il était capable. Sa marche, loin de se ralentir par le chant, s'en accélérait. Il se mit à semer le long des maisons endormies ou terrifiées ces couplets incendiaires:

L'oiseau médit dans les charmilles
Et prétend qu'hier Atala
Avec un Russe s'en alla.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Mon ami pierrot, tu babilles,
Parce que l'autre jour Mila
Cogna sa vitre, et m'appela.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Les drôlesses sont fort gentilles;
Leur poison qui m'ensorcela
Griserait monsieur Orfila.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

J'aime l'amour et ses bisbilles,
J'aime Agnès, j'aime Paméla,
Lise en m'allumant se brûla.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Jadis, quand je vis les mantilles
De Suzette et de Zéïla,
Mon âme à leurs plis se mêla.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Amour, quand, dans l’ombre où tu brilles,
Tu coiffes de roses Lola,
Je me damnerais pour cela.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Jeanne, à ton miroir tu t’habilles!
Mon cœur un beau jour s’envola;
Je crois que c’est Jeanne qui l’a.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Le soir en sortant des quadrilles,
Je montre aux étoiles Stella
Et je leur dis: regardez-la.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Gavroche, tout en chantant, prodiguait la pantomime. Le geste est le point d’appui du refrain. Son visage, inépuisable répertoire de masques, faisait des grimaces plus convulsives et plus fantasques que les bouches d’un linge troué dans un grand vent. Malheureusement, comme il était seul et dans la nuit, cela n’était ni vu, ni visible. Il y a de ces richesses perdues.

Soudain il s’arrêta court.

— Interrompons la romance, dit-il.

Sa prunelle féline venait de distinguer dans le renfoncement d’une porte cochère ce qu’on appelle en peinture un ensemble; c’est-à-dire un être et une chose; la chose était une charrette à bras, l’être était un Auvergnat qui dormait dedans.

Les bras de la charrette s’appuyaient sur le pavé et la tête de l’Auvergnat s’appuyait sur le tablier de la charrette. Son corps se pelotonnait sur ce plan incliné et ses pieds touchaient la terre.

Gavroche, avec son expérience des choses de ce monde, reconnut un ivrogne.

C’était quelque commissionnaire du coin qui avait trop bu et qui dormait trop.

— Voilà, pensa Gavroche, à quoi servent les nuits d’été. L’Auvergnat s’endort dans sa charrette. On prend la charrette pour la République et on laisse l’Auvergnat à la monarchie.

Son esprit venait d’être illuminé par la clarté que voici:

— Cette charrette ferait joliment bien sur notre barricade.

L’Auvergnat ronflait.

Gavroche tira doucement la charrette par l’arrière et l’Auvergnat par l’avant, c’est-à-dire par les pieds, et, au bout d’une minute, l’Auvergnat, imperturbable, reposait à plat sur le pavé.

La charrette était délivrée.

Gavroche, habitué à faire face de toutes parts à l’imprévu, avait toujours tout sur lui. Il fouilla dans une de ses poches, et en tira un chiffon de papier et un bout de crayon rouge chipé à quelque charpentier.

Il écrivit:

République française.

«Reçu ta charrette.»

Et il signa: «Gavroche.»

Cela fait, il mit le papier dans la poche du gilet de velours de l’Auvergnat toujours ronflant, saisit le brancard dans ses deux poings, et partit, dans la direction des halles, poussant devant lui la charrette au grand galop avec un glorieux tapage triomphal.

Ceci était périlleux. Il y avait un poste à l’Imprimerie royale. Gavroche n’y songeait pas. Ce poste était occupé par des gardes nationaux de la banlieue. Un certain éveil commençait à émouvoir l’escouade, et les têtes se soulevaient sur les lits de camp. Deux réverbères brisés coup sur coup, cette chanson chantée à tue-tête, cela était beaucoup pour des rues si poltronnes, qui ont envie de dormir au coucher du soleil, et qui mettent de si bonne heure leur éteignoir sur leur chandelle. Depuis une heure le gamin faisait dans cet arrondissement paisible le vacarme d'un moucheron dans une bouteille. Le sergent de la banlieue écoutait. Il attendait. C'était un homme prudent.

Le roulement forcené de la charrette combla la mesure de l'attente possible, et détermina le sergent à tenter une reconnaissance.

— Ils sont là toute une bande! dit-il, allons doucement.

Il était clair que l'Hydre de l'Anarchie était sortie de sa boîte et qu'elle se démenait dans le quartier.

Et le sergent se hasarda hors du poste à pas sourds.

Tout à coup, Gavroche, poussant sa charrette, au moment où il allait déboucher de la rue des Vieilles-Haudriettes, se trouva face à face avec un uniforme, un shako, un plumet et un fusil.

Pour la seconde fois, il s'arrêta net.

— Tiens, dit-il, c'est lui. Bonjour, l'ordre public.

Les étonnements de Gavroche étaient courts et dégelaient vite.

— Où vas-tu, voyou? cria le sergent.

— Citoyen, dit Gavroche, je ne vous ai pas encore appelé bourgeois. Pourquoi m'insultez-vous?

— Où vas-tu, drôle?

— Monsieur, reprit Gavroche, vous étiez peut-être hier un homme d'esprit, mais vous avez été destitué ce matin.

— Je te demande où tu vas, gredin?

Gavroche répondit:

— Vous parlez gentiment. Vrai, on ne vous donnerait pas votre âge. Vous devriez vendre tous vos cheveux cent francs la pièce. Cela vous ferait cinq cents francs.

— Où vas-tu? où vas-tu? où vas-tu, bandit?

Gavroche repartit:

— Voilà de vilains mots. La première fois qu'on vous donnera à téter, il faudra qu'on vous essuie mieux la bouche.

Le sergent croisa la bayonnette.

— Me diras-tu où tu vas, à la fin, misérable?

— Mon général, dit Gavroche, je vas chercher le médecin pour mon épouse qui est en couches.

— Aux armes! cria le sergent.

Se sauver par ce qui vous a perdu, c'est là le chef-d'œuvre des hommes forts; Gavroche mesura d'un coup d'œil toute la situation. C'était la charrette qui l'avait compromis, c'était à la charrette de le protéger.

Au moment où le sergent allait fondre sur Gavroche, la charrette, devenue projectile et lancée à tour de bras, roulait sur lui avec furie, et le sergent, atteint en plein ventre, tombait à la renverse dans le ruisseau pendant que son fusil partait en l'air.

Au cri du sergent, les hommes du poste étaient sortis pêle-mêle; le coup de fusil détermina une décharge générale au hasard, après laquelle on rechargea les armes et l'on recommença.

Cette mousquetade à colin-maillard dura un bon quart d'heure, et tua quelques carreaux de vitre.

Cependant Gavroche, qui avait éperdument rebroussé chemin, s'arrêtait à cinq ou six rues de là, et s'asseyait haletant sur la borne qui fait le coin des Enfants-Rouges.

Il prêtait l'oreille.

Après avoir soufflé quelques instants, il se tourna du côté où la fusillade faisait rage, éleva sa main gauche à la hauteur de son nez, et la lança trois fois en avant en se frappant de la main droite le derrière de la tête; geste souverain dans lequel la gaminerie parisienne a condensé l'ironie française, et qui est évidemment efficace, puisqu'il a déjà duré un demi-siècle.

Cette gaîté fut troublée par une réflexion amère.

— Oui, dit-il, je pouffe, je me tords, j'abonde en joie, mais je perds ma route, il va falloir faire un détour. Pourvu que j'arrive à temps à la barricade!

Là-dessus, il reprit sa course.

Et tout en courant:

— Ah çà, où en étais-je donc? dit-il.

Il se remit à chanter sa chanson en s'enfonçant rapidement dans les rues, et ceci décrut dans les ténèbres:

Mais il reste encor des bastilles,
Et je vais mettre le holà
Dans l'ordre public que voilà.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Quelqu'un veut-il jouer aux quilles?
Tout l'ancien monde s'écroula
Quand la grosse boule roula.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Vieux bon peuple, à coups de béquilles
Cassons ce Louvre où s'étala
La monarchie en falbala.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

Nous en avons forcé les grilles;
Le roi Charles Dix ce jour-là
Tenait mal et se décolla.

Où vont les belles filles,
Lon la.

La prise d'armes du poste ne fut point sans résultat. La charrette fut conquise, l'ivrogne fut fait prisonnier. L'une fut mise en fourrière; l'autre fut plus tard un peu poursuivi devant les conseils de guerre comme complice. Le ministère public d'alors fit preuve en cette circonstance de son zèle infatigable pour la défense de la société.

L'aventure de Gavroche, restée dans la tradition du quartier du Temple, est un des souvenirs les plus terribles des vieux bourgeois du Marais, et est intitulée dans leur mémoire: Attaque nocturne du poste de l'Imprimerie royale.

Tome V — JEAN VALJEAN

Livre premier — La guerre entre quatre murs

Chapitre I

La Charybde du faubourg Saint-Antoine et la Scylla du faubourg du Temple

Les deux plus mémorables barricades que l’observateur des maladies sociales puisse mentionner n’appartiennent point à la période où est placée l’action de ce livre. Ces deux barricades, symboles toutes les deux, sous deux aspects différents, d’une situation redoutable, sortirent de terre lors de la fatale insurrection de juin 1848, la plus grande guerre des rues qu’ait vue l’histoire.

Il arrive quelquefois que, même contre les principes, même contre la liberté, l’égalité et la fraternité, même contre le vote universel, même contre le gouvernement de tous par tous, du fond de ses angoisses, de ses découragements, de ses dénûments, de ses fièvres, de ses détresses, de ses miasmes, de ses ignorances, de ses ténèbres, cette grande désespérée, la canaille, proteste, et que la populace livre bataille au peuple.

Les gueux attaquent le droit commun; l’ochlocratie s’insurge contre le démos.

Ce sont là des journées lugubres; car il y a toujours une certaine quantité de droit même dans cette démence, il y a du suicide dans ce duel; et ces mots, qui veulent être des injures, gueux, canaille, ochlocratie, populace, constatent, hélas! plutôt la faute de ceux qui règnent que la faute de ceux qui souffrent; plutôt la faute des privilégiés que la faute des déshérités.

Quant à nous, ces mots-là, nous ne les prononçons jamais sans douleur et sans respect, car, lorsque la philosophie sonde les faits auxquels ils correspondent, elle y trouve souvent bien des grandeurs à côté des misères. Athènes était une ochlocratie; les gueux ont fait la Hollande; la populace a plus d’une fois sauvé Rome; et la canaille suivait Jésus-Christ.

Il n’est pas de penseur qui n’ait parfois contemplé les magnificences d’en bas.

C’est à cette canaille que songeait sans doute saint Jérôme, et à tous ces pauvres gens, et à tous ces vagabonds, et à tous ces misérables d’où sont sortis les apôtres et les martyrs, quand il disait cette parole mystérieuse: Fex urbis, lex orbis.

Les exaspérations de cette foule qui souffre et qui saigne, ses violences à contre-sens sur les principes qui sont sa vie, ses voies de fait contre le droit, sont des coups d’État populaires, et doivent être réprimés. L’homme probe s’y dévoue, et, par amour même pour cette foule, il la combat. Mais comme il la sent excusable tout en lui tenant tête! comme il la vénère tout en lui résistant! C’est là un de ces moments rares où, en faisant ce qu’on doit faire, on sent quelque chose qui déconcerte et qui déconseillerait presque d’aller plus loin; on persiste, il le faut; mais la conscience satisfaite est triste, et l’accomplissement du devoir se complique d’un serrement de cœur.

Juin 1848 fut, hâtons-nous de le dire, un fait à part, et presque impossible à classer dans la philosophie de l’histoire. Tous les mots que nous venons de prononcer doivent être écartés quand il s’agit de cette émeute extraordinaire où l’on sentit la sainte anxiété du travail réclamant ses droits. Il fallut la combattre, et c’était le devoir, car elle attaquait la République. Mais, au fond, que fut juin 1848? Une révolte du peuple contre lui-même.

Là où le sujet n’est point perdu de vue, il n’y a point de digression; qu’il nous soit donc permis d’arrêter un moment l’attention du lecteur sur les deux barricades absolument uniques dont nous venons de parler et qui ont caractérisé cette insurrection.

L’une encombrait l’entrée du faubourg Saint-Antoine; l’autre défendait l’approche du faubourg du Temple; ceux devant qui se sont dressés, sous l’éclatant ciel bleu de juin, ces deux effrayants chefs-d’œuvre de la guerre civile, ne les oublieront jamais.

La barricade Saint-Antoine était monstrueuse; elle était haute de trois étages et large de sept cents pieds. Elle barrait d’un angle à l’autre la vaste embouchure du faubourg, c’est-à-dire trois rues; ravinée, déchiquetée, dentelée, hachée, crénelée d’une immense déchirure, contre-butée de monceaux qui étaient eux-mêmes des bastions, poussant des caps çà et là, puissamment adossée aux deux grands promontoires de maisons du faubourg, elle surgissait comme une levée cyclopéenne au fond de la redoutable place qui a vu le 14 juillet. Dix-neuf barricades s’étageaient dans la profondeur des rues derrière cette barricade mère. Rien qu’à la voir, on sentait dans le faubourg l’immense souffrance agonisante arrivée à cette minute extrême où une détresse veut devenir une catastrophe. De quoi était faite cette barricade? De l’écroulement de trois maisons à six étages, démolies exprès, disaient les uns. Du prodige de toutes les colères, disaient les autres. Elle avait l’aspect lamentable de toutes les constructions de la haine: la ruine. On pouvait dire: qui a bâti cela? On pouvait dire aussi: qui a détruit cela? C’était l’improvisation du bouillonnement. Tiens! cette porte! cette grille! cet auvent! ce chambranle! ce réchaud brisé! cette marmite fêlée! Donnez tout! jetez tout! poussez, roulez, piochez, démantelez, bouleversez, écroulez tout! C’était la collaboration du pavé, du moellon, de la poutre, de la barre de fer, du chiffon, du carreau défoncé, de la chaise dépaillée, du trognon de chou, de la loque, de la guenille, et de la malédiction. C’était grand et c’était petit. C’était l’abîme parodié sur place par le tohu-bohu. La masse près de l’atome; le pan de mur arraché et l’écuelle cassée; une fraternisation menaçante de tous les débris; Sisyphe avait jeté là son rocher et Job son tesson. En somme, terrible. C’était l’acropole des va-nu-pieds. Des charrettes renversées accidentaient le talus; un immense haquet y était étalé en travers, l’essieu vers le ciel, et semblait une balafre sur cette façade tumultueuse, un omnibus, hissé gaîment à force de bras tout au sommet de l’entassement, comme si les architectes de cette sauvagerie eussent voulu ajouter la gaminerie à l’épouvante, offrait son timon dételé à on ne sait quels chevaux de l’air. Cet amas gigantesque, alluvion de l’émeute, figurait à l’esprit un Ossa sur Pélion de toutes les révolutions; 93 sur 89, le 9 thermidor sur le 10 août, le 18 brumaire sur le 21 janvier, vendémiaire sur prairial, 1848 sur 1830. La place en valait la peine, et cette barricade était digne d’apparaître à l’endroit même où la Bastille avait disparu. Si l’océan faisait des digues, c’est ainsi qu’il les bâtirait. La furie du flot était empreinte sur cet encombrement difforme. Quel flot? la foule. On croyait voir du vacarme pétrifié. On croyait entendre bourdonner, au-dessus de cette barricade, comme si elles eussent été là sur leur ruche, les énormes abeilles ténébreuses du progrès violent. Était-ce une broussaille? était-ce une bacchanale? était-ce une forteresse? Le vertige semblait avoir construit cela à coups d’aile. Il y avait du cloaque dans cette redoute et quelque chose d’olympien dans ce fouillis. On y voyait, dans un pêle-mêle plein de désespoir, des chevrons de toits, des morceaux de mansardes avec leur papier peint, des châssis de fenêtres avec toutes leurs vitres plantés dans les décombres, attendant le canon, des cheminées descellées, des armoires, des tables, des bancs, un sens dessus dessous hurlant, et ces mille choses indigentes, rebuts même du mendiant, qui contiennent à la fois de la fureur et du néant. On eût dit que c’était le haillon d’un peuple, haillon de bois, de fer, de bronze, de pierre, et que le faubourg Saint-Antoine l’avait poussé là à sa porte d’un colossal coup de balai, faisant de sa misère sa barricade. Des blocs pareils à des billots, des chaînes disloquées, des charpentes à tasseaux ayant forme de potences, des roues horizontales sortant des décombres, amalgamaient à cet édifice de l’anarchie la sombre figure des vieux supplices soufferts par le peuple. La barricade Saint-Antoine faisait arme de tout; tout ce que la guerre civile peut jeter à la tête de la société sortait de là; ce n’était pas du combat, c’était du paroxysme; les carabines qui défendaient cette redoute, parmi lesquelles il y avait quelques espingoles, envoyaient des miettes de faïence, des osselets, des boutons d’habit, jusqu’à des roulettes de tables de nuit, projectiles dangereux à cause du cuivre. Cette barricade était forcenée; elle jetait dans les nuées une clameur inexprimable; à de certains moments, provoquant l’armée, elle se couvrait de foule et de tempête, une cohue de têtes flamboyantes la couronnait; un fourmillement l’emplissait; elle avait une crête épineuse de fusils, de sabres, de bâtons, de haches, de piques et de bayonnettes; un vaste drapeau rouge y claquait dans le vent; on y entendait les cris du commandement, les chansons d’attaque, des roulements de tambours, des sanglots de femmes, et l’éclat de rire ténébreux des meurt-de-faim. Elle était démesurée et vivante; et, comme du dos d’une bête électrique, il en sortait un pétillement de foudres. L’esprit de révolution couvrait de son nuage ce sommet où grondait cette voix du peuple qui ressemble à la voix de Dieu; une majesté étrange se dégageait de cette titanique hottée de gravats. C’était un tas d’ordures et c’était le Sinaï.

Comme nous l’avons dit plus haut, elle attaquait au nom de la Révolution, quoi? la Révolution. Elle, cette barricade, le hasard, le désordre, l’effarement, le malentendu, l’inconnu, elle avait en face d’elle l’assemblée constituante, la souveraineté du peuple, le suffrage universel, la nation, la République; et c’était la Carmagnole défiant la Marseillaise.

Défi insensé, mais héroïque, car ce vieux faubourg est un héros.

Le faubourg et sa redoute se prêtaient main-forte. Le faubourg s’épaulait à la redoute, la redoute s’acculait au faubourg. La vaste barricade s’étalait comme une falaise où venait se briser la stratégie des généraux d’Afrique. Ses cavernes, ses excroissances, ses verrues, ses gibbosités, grimaçaient, pour ainsi dire, et ricanaient sous la fumée. La mitraille s’y évanouissait dans l’informe; les obus s’y enfonçaient, s’y engloutissaient, s’y engouffraient; les boulets n’y réussissaient qu’à trouer des trous; à quoi bon canonner le chaos? Et les régiments, accoutumés aux plus farouches visions de la guerre, regardaient d’un œil inquiet cette espèce de redoute bête fauve, par le hérissement sanglier, et par l’énormité montagne.

À un quart de lieue de là, de l’angle de la rue du Temple qui débouche sur le boulevard près du Château-d’Eau, si l’on avançait hardiment la tête en dehors de la pointe formée par la devanture du magasin Dallemagne, on apercevait au loin, au delà du canal, dans la rue qui monte les rampes de Belleville, au point culminant de la montée, une muraille étrange atteignant au deuxième étage des façades, sorte de trait d’union des maisons de droite aux maisons de gauche, comme si la rue avait replié d’elle-même son plus haut mur pour se fermer brusquement. Ce mur était bâti avec des pavés. Il était droit, correct, froid, perpendiculaire, nivelé à l’équerre, tiré au cordeau, aligné au fil à plomb. Le ciment y manquait sans doute, mais comme à de certains murs romains, sans troubler sa rigide architecture. À sa hauteur on devinait sa profondeur. L’entablement était mathématiquement parallèle au soubassement. On distinguait d’espace en espace, sur sa surface grise, des meurtrières presque invisibles qui ressemblaient à des fils noirs. Ces meurtrières étaient séparées les unes des autres par des intervalles égaux. La rue était déserte à perte de vue. Toutes les fenêtres et toutes les portes fermées. Au fond se dressait ce barrage qui faisait de la rue un cul-de-sac; mur immobile et tranquille; on n’y voyait personne, on n’y entendait rien; pas un cri, pas un bruit, pas un souffle. Un sépulcre.

L’éblouissant soleil de juin inondait de lumière cette chose terrible.

C’était la barricade du faubourg du Temple.

Dès qu’on arrivait sur le terrain et qu’on l’apercevait, il était impossible, même aux plus hardis, de ne pas devenir pensif devant cette apparition mystérieuse. C’était ajusté, emboîté, imbriqué, rectiligne, symétrique, et funèbre. Il y avait là de la science et des ténèbres. On sentait que le chef de cette barricade était un géomètre ou un spectre. On regardait cela et l’on parlait bas.

De temps en temps, si quelqu’un, soldat, officier ou représentant du peuple, se hasardait à traverser la chaussée solitaire, on entendait un sifflement aigu et faible, et le passant tombait blessé ou mort, ou, s’il échappait, on voyait s’enfoncer dans quelque volet fermé, dans un entre-deux de moellons, dans le plâtre d’un mur, une balle. Quelquefois un biscaïen. Car les hommes de la barricade s’étaient fait de deux tronçons de tuyaux de fonte du gaz bouchés à un bout avec de l’étoupe et de la terre à poêle, deux petits canons. Pas de dépense de poudre inutile. Presque tout coup portait. Il y avait quelques cadavres çà et là, et des flaques de sang sur les pavés. Je me souviens d’un papillon blanc qui allait et venait dans la rue. L’été n’abdique pas.

Aux environs, le dessous des portes cochères était encombré de blessés.

On se sentait là visé par quelqu’un qu’on ne voyait point, et l’on comprenait que toute la longueur de la rue était couchée en joue.

Massés derrière l’espèce de dos d’âne que fait à l’entrée du faubourg du Temple le pont cintré du canal, les soldats de la colonne d’attaque observaient, graves et recueillis, cette redoute lugubre, cette immobilité, cette impassibilité, d’où la mort sortait. Quelques-uns rampaient à plat ventre jusqu’au haut de la courbe du pont en ayant soin que leurs shakos ne passassent point.

Le vaillant colonel Monteynard admirait cette barricade avec un frémissement. — Comme c’est bâti! disait-il à un représentant. Pas un pavé ne déborde de l’autre. C’est de la porcelaine. — En ce moment une balle lui brisa sa croix sur sa poitrine, et il tomba.

— Les lâches! disait-on. Mais qu’ils se montrent donc! qu’on les voie! ils n’osent pas! ils se cachent! — La barricade du faubourg du Temple, défendue par quatre-vingts hommes, attaquée par dix mille, tint trois jours. Le quatrième, on fit comme à Zaatcha et à Constantine, on perça les maisons, on vint par les toits, la barricade fut prise. Pas un des quatre-vingts lâches ne songea à fuir; tous y furent tués, excepté le chef, Barthélemy, dont nous parlerons tout à l’heure.

La barricade Saint-Antoine était le tumulte des tonnerres; la barricade du Temple était le silence. Il y avait entre ces deux redoutes la différence du formidable au sinistre. L’une semblait une gueule; l’autre un masque.

En admettant que la gigantesque et ténébreuse insurrection de juin fût composée d’une colère et d’une énigme, on sentait dans la première barricade le dragon et derrière la seconde le sphinx.

Ces deux forteresses avaient été édifiées par deux hommes nommés, l’un Cournet, l’autre Barthélemy. Cournet avait fait la barricade Saint-Antoine; Barthélemy la barricade du Temple. Chacune d’elles était l’image de celui qui l’avait bâtie.

Cournet était un homme de haute stature; il avait les épaules larges, la face rouge, le poing écrasant, le cœur hardi, l’âme loyale, l’œil sincère et terrible. Intrépide, énergique, irascible, orageux; le plus cordial des hommes, le plus redoutable des combattants. La guerre, la lutte, la mêlée, étaient son air respirable et le mettaient de belle humeur. Il avait été officier de marine, et, à ses gestes et à sa voix, on devinait qu'il sortait de l'océan et qu'il venait de la tempête; il continuait l'ouragan dans la bataille. Au génie près, il y avait en Cournet quelque chose de Danton, comme, à la divinité près, il y avait en Danton quelque chose d'Hercule.

Barthélemy, maigre, chétif, pâle, taciturne, était une espèce de gamin tragique qui, souffleté par un sergent de ville, le guetta, l'attendit, et le tua, et, à dix-sept ans, fut mis au bagne. Il en sortit, et fît cette barricade.

Plus tard, chose fatale, à Londres, proscrits tous deux, Barthélemy tua Cournet. Ce fut un duel funèbre. Quelque temps après, pris dans l'engrenage d'une de ces mystérieuses aventures où la passion est mêlée, catastrophes où la justice française voit des circonstances atténuantes et où la justice anglaise ne voit que la mort, Barthélemy fut pendu. La sombre construction sociale est ainsi faite que, grâce au dénûment matériel, grâce à l'obscurité morale, ce malheureux être qui contenait une intelligence, ferme à coup sûr, grande peut-être, commença par le bagne en France et finit par le gibet en Angleterre. Barthélemy, dans les occasions, n'arborait qu'un drapeau; le drapeau noir.

Chapitre II

Que faire dans l’abîme à moins que l’on ne cause?

Seize ans comptent dans la souterraine éducation de l’émeute, et juin 1848 en savait plus long que juin 1832. Aussi la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie n’était-elle qu’une ébauche et qu’un embryon, comparée aux deux barricades colosses que nous venons d’esquisser; mais, pour l’époque, elle était redoutable.

Les insurgés, sous l’œil d’Enjolras, car Marius ne regardait plus rien, avaient mis la nuit à profit. La barricade avait été non seulement réparée, mais augmentée. On l’avait exhaussée de deux pieds. Des barres de fer plantées dans les pavés ressemblaient à des lances en arrêt. Toutes sortes de décombres ajoutés et apportés de toutes parts compliquaient l’enchevêtrement extérieur. La redoute avait été savamment refaite en muraille au dedans et en broussaille au dehors.

On avait rétabli l’escalier de pavés qui permettait d’y monter comme à un mur de citadelle.

On avait fait le ménage de la barricade, désencombré la salle basse, pris la cuisine pour ambulance, achevé le pansement des blessés, recueilli la poudre éparse à terre et sur les tables, fondu des balles, fabriqué des cartouches, épluché de la charpie, distribué les armes tombées, nettoyé l’intérieur de la redoute, ramassé les débris, emporté les cadavres.

On déposa les morts en tas dans la ruelle Mondétour dont on était toujours maître. Le pavé a été longtemps rouge à cet endroit. Il y avait parmi les morts quatre gardes nationaux de la banlieue. Enjolras fit mettre de côté leurs uniformes.

Enjolras avait conseillé deux heures de sommeil. Un conseil d’Enjolras était une consigne. Pourtant, trois ou quatre seulement en profitèrent. Feuilly employa ces deux heures à la gravure de cette inscription sur le mur qui faisait face au cabaret:

VIVENT LES PEUPLES!

Ces trois mots, creusés dans le moellon avec un clou, se lisaient encore sur cette muraille en 1848.

Les trois femmes avaient profité du répit de la nuit pour disparaître définitivement; ce qui faisait respirer les insurgés plus à l’aise.

Elles avaient trouvé moyen de se réfugier dans quelque maison voisine.

La plupart des blessés pouvaient et voulaient encore combattre. Il y avait, sur une litière de matelas et de bottes de paille, dans la cuisine devenue l'ambulance, cinq hommes gravement atteints, dont deux gardes municipaux. Les gardes municipaux furent pansés les premiers.

Il ne resta plus dans la salle basse que Mabeuf sous son drap noir et Javert lié au poteau.

— C'est ici la salle des morts, dit Enjolras.

Dans l'intérieur de cette salle, à peine éclairée d'une chandelle, tout au fond, la table mortuaire étant derrière le poteau comme une barre horizontale, une sorte de grande croix vague résultait de Javert debout et de Mabeuf couché.

Le timon de l'omnibus, quoique tronqué par la fusillade, était encore assez debout pour qu'on pût y accrocher un drapeau.

Enjolras, qui avait cette qualité d'un chef, de toujours faire ce qu'il disait, attacha à cette hampe l'habit troué et sanglant du vieillard tué.

Aucun repas n'était plus possible. Il n'y avait ni pain ni viande. Les cinquante hommes de la barricade, depuis seize heures qu'ils étaient là, avaient eu vite épuisé les maigres provisions du cabaret. À un instant donné, toute barricade qui tient devient inévitablement le radeau de la Méduse. Il fallut se résigner à la faim. On était aux premières heures de cette journée spartiate du 6 juin où, dans la barricade Saint-Merry, Jeanne, entouré d'insurgés qui demandaient du pain, à tous ces combattants criant: À manger! répondait: Pourquoi? il est trois heures. À quatre heures nous serons morts.

Comme on ne pouvait plus manger, Enjolras défendit de boire. Il interdit le vin et rationna l'eau-de-vie.

On avait trouvé dans la cave une quinzaine de bouteilles pleines, hermétiquement cachetées. Enjolras et Combeferre les examinèrent. Combeferre en remontant dit: — C'est du vieux fonds du père Hucheloup qui a commencé par être épicier. — Cela doit être du vrai vin, observa Bossuet. Il est heureux que Grantaire dorme. S'il était debout, on aurait de la peine à sauver ces bouteilles-là. — Enjolras, malgré les murmures, mit son veto sur les quinze bouteilles, et afin que personne n'y touchât et qu'elles fussent comme sacrées, il les fit placer sous la table où gisait le père Mabeuf.

Vers deux heures du matin, on se compta. Ils étaient encore trente-sept.

Le jour commençait à paraître. On venait d'éteindre la torche qui avait été replacée dans son alvéole de pavés. L'intérieur de la barricade, cette espèce de petite cour prise sur la rue, était noyé de ténèbres et ressemblait, à travers la vague horreur crépusculaire, au pont d'un navire désemparé. Les combattants allant et venant s'y mouvaient comme des formes noires. Au-dessus de cet effrayant nid d'ombre, les étages des maisons muettes s'ébauchaient lividement; tout en haut les cheminées blêmissaient. Le ciel avait cette charmante nuance indécise qui est peut-être le blanc et peut-être le bleu. Des oiseaux y volaient avec des cris de bonheur. La haute maison qui faisait le fond de la barricade, étant tournée vers le levant, avait sur son toit un reflet rose. À la lucarne du troisième étage, le vent du matin agitait les cheveux gris sur la tête de l'homme mort.

— Je suis charmé qu'on ait éteint la torche, disait Courfeyrac à Feuilly. Cette torche effarée au vent m'ennuyait. Elle avait l'air d'avoir peur. La lumière des torches ressemble à la sagesse des lâches; elle éclaire mal, parce qu'elle tremble.

L'aube éveille les esprits comme les oiseaux; tous causaient.

Joly, voyant un chat rôder sur une gouttière, en extrayait la philosophie.

— Qu'est-ce que le chat? s'écriait-il. C'est un correctif. Le bon Dieu, ayant fait la souris, a dit: Tiens, j'ai fait une bêtise. Et il a fait le chat. Le chat c'est l'erratum de la souris. La souris, plus le chat, c'est l'épreuve revue et corrigée de la création.

Combeferre, entouré d'étudiants et d'ouvriers, parlait des morts, de Jean Prouvaire, de Bahorel, de Mabeuf, et même du Cabuc, et de la tristesse sévère d'Enjolras. Il disait:

— Harmodius et Aristogiton, Brutus, Chéréas, Stephanus, Cromwell, Charlotte Corday, Sand, tous ont eu, après le coup, leur moment d'angoisse. Notre cœur est si frémissant et la vie humaine est un tel mystère que, même dans un meurtre civique, même dans un meurtre libérateur, s'il y en a, le remords d'avoir frappé un homme dépasse la joie d'avoir servi le genre humain.

Et, ce sont là les méandres de la parole échangée, une minute après, par une transition venue des vers de Jean Prouvaire, Combeferre comparait entre eux les traducteurs des Géorgiques, Raux à Cournand, Cournand à Delille, indiquant les quelques passages traduits par Malfilâtre, particulièrement les prodiges de la mort de César; et par ce mot, César, la causerie revenait à Brutus.

— César, dit Combeferre, est tombé justement. Cicéron a été sévère pour César, et il a eu raison. Cette sévérité-là n'est point la diatribe. Quand Zoïle insulte Homère, quand Mævius insulte Virgile, quand Visé insulte Molière, quand Pope insulte Shakespeare, quand Fréron insulte Voltaire, c'est une vieille loi d'envie et de haine qui s'exécute; les génies attirent l'injure, les grands hommes sont toujours plus ou moins aboyés. Mais Zoïle et Cicéron, c'est deux. Cicéron est un justicier par la pensée de même que Brutus est un justicier par l'épée. Je blâme, quant à moi, cette dernière justice-là, le glaive; mais l'antiquité l'admettait. César, violateur du Rubicon, conférant, comme venant de lui, les dignités qui venaient du peuple, ne se levant pas à l'entrée du sénat, faisait, comme dit Eutrope, des choses de roi et presque de tyran, regia ac pene tyrannica. C'était un grand homme; tant pis, ou tant mieux; la leçon est plus haute. Ses vingt-trois blessures me touchent moins que le crachat au front de Jésus-Christ. César est poignardé par les sénateurs; Christ est souffleté par les valets. À plus d'outrage, on sent le dieu.

Bossuet, dominant les causeurs du haut d'un tas de pavés, s'écriait, la carabine à la main:

— Ô Cydathenæum, ô Myrrhinus, ô Probalinthe, ô grâces de l'AEantide! Oh! qui me donnera de prononcer les vers d'Homère comme un Grec de Laurium ou d'Édaptéon!

Chapitre III

Éclaircissement et assombrissement

Enjolras était allé faire une reconnaissance. Il était sorti par la ruelle Mondétour en serpentant le long des maisons.

Les insurgés, disons-le, étaient pleins d'espoir. La façon dont ils avaient repoussé l'attaque de la nuit leur faisait presque dédaigner d'avance l'attaque du point du jour. Ils l'attendaient et en souriaient. Ils ne doutaient pas plus de leur succès que de leur cause. D'ailleurs un secours allait évidemment leur venir. Ils y comptaient. Avec cette facilité de prophétie triomphante qui est une des forces du Français combattant, ils divisaient en trois phases certaines la journée qui allait s'ouvrir: à six heures du matin, un régiment, «qu'on avait travaillé», tournerait; à midi, l'insurrection de tout Paris; au coucher du soleil, la révolution.

On entendait le tocsin de Saint-Merry qui ne s'était pas tu une minute depuis la veille; preuve que l'autre barricade, la grande, celle de Jeanne, tenait toujours.

Toutes ces espérances s'échangeaient d'un groupe à l'autre dans une sorte de chuchotement gai et redoutable qui ressemblait au bourdonnement de guerre d'une ruche d'abeilles.

Enjolras reparut. Il revenait de sa sombre promenade d'aigle dans l'obscurité extérieure. Il écouta un instant toute cette joie les bras croisés, une main sur sa bouche. Puis, frais et rose dans la blancheur grandissante du matin, il dit:

— Toute l'armée de Paris donne. Un tiers de cette armée pèse sur la barricade où vous êtes. De plus la garde nationale. J'ai distingué les shakos du cinquième de ligne et les guidons de la sixième légion. Vous serez attaqués dans une heure. Quant au peuple, il a bouillonné hier, mais ce matin il ne bouge pas. Rien à attendre, rien à espérer. Pas plus un faubourg qu'un régiment. Vous êtes abandonnés.

Ces paroles tombèrent sur le bourdonnement des groupes, et y firent l'effet que fait sur un essaim la première goutte de l'orage. Tous restèrent muets. Il y eut un moment d'inexprimable angoisse où l'on eût entendu voler la mort.

Ce moment fut court.

Une voix, du fond le plus obscur des groupes, cria à Enjolras:

— Soit. Élevons la barricade à vingt pieds de haut, et restons-y tous. Citoyens, faisons la protection des cadavres. Montrons que, si le peuple abandonne les républicains, les républicains n'abandonnent pas le peuple.

Cette parole dégageait du pénible nuage des anxiétés individuelles la pensée de tous. Une acclamation enthousiaste l'accueillit.

On n'a jamais su le nom de l'homme qui avait parlé ainsi; c'était quelque porte-blouse ignoré, un inconnu, un oublié, un passant héros, ce grand anonyme toujours mêlé aux crises humaines et aux genèses sociales qui, à un instant donné, dit d'une façon suprême le mot décisif, et qui s'évanouit dans les ténèbres après avoir représenté une minute, dans la lumière d'un éclair, le peuple et Dieu.

Cette résolution inexorable était tellement dans l'air du 6 juin 1832 que, presque à la même heure, dans la barricade de Saint-Merry, les insurgés poussaient cette clameur demeurée historique et consignée au procès: Qu'on vienne à notre secours ou qu'on n'y vienne pas, qu'importe! Faisons-nous tuer ici jusqu'au dernier.

Comme on voit, les deux barricades, quoique matériellement isolées, communiquaient.

Chapitre IV

Cinq de moins, un de plus

Après que l’homme quelconque, qui décrétait «la protestation des cadavres», eut parlé et donné la formule de l’âme commune, de toutes les bouches sortit un cri étrangement satisfait et terrible, funèbre par le sens et triomphal par l’accent:

— Vive la mort! Restons ici tous.

— Pourquoi tous? dit Enjolras.

— Tous! tous!

Enjolras reprit:

— La position est bonne, la barricade est belle. Trente hommes suffisent. Pourquoi en sacrifier quarante?

Ils répliquèrent:

— Parce que pas un ne voudra s’en aller.

— Citoyens, criait Enjolras, et il y avait dans sa voix une vibration presque irritée, la République n’est pas assez riche en hommes pour faire des dépenses inutiles. La gloriole est un gaspillage. Si, pour quelques-uns, le devoir est de s’en aller, ce devoir-là doit être fait comme un autre.

Enjolras, l’homme principe, avait sur ses coreligionnaires cette sorte de toute-puissance qui se dégage de l’absolu. Cependant, quelle que fût cette omnipotence, on murmura.

Chef jusque dans le bout des ongles, Enjolras, voyant qu’on murmurait, insista. Il reprit avec hauteur:

— Que ceux qui craignent de n’être plus que trente le disent.

Les murmures redoublèrent.

— D’ailleurs, observa une voix dans un groupe, s’en aller, c’est facile à dire. La barricade est cernée.

— Pas du côté des halles, dit Enjolras. La rue Mondétour est libre, et par la rue des Prêcheurs on peut gagner le marché des Innocents.

— Et là, reprit une autre voix du groupe, on sera pris. On tombera dans quelque grand’garde de la ligne ou de la banlieue. Ils verront passer un homme en blouse et en casquette. D’où viens-tu, toi? serais-tu pas de la barricade? Et on vous regarde les mains. Tu sens la poudre. Fusillé.

Enjolras, sans répondre, toucha l’épaule de Combeferre, et tous deux entrèrent dans la salle basse.

Ils ressortirent un moment après. Enjolras tenait dans ses deux mains étendues les quatre uniformes qu’il avait fait réserver. Combeferre le suivait portant les buffleteries et les shakos.

— Avec cet uniforme, dit Enjolras, on se mêle aux rangs et l’on s’échappe. Voici toujours pour quatre.

Et il jeta sur le sol dépavé les quatre uniformes.

Aucun ébranlement ne se faisait dans le stoïque auditoire. Combeferre prit la parole.

— Allons, dit-il, il faut avoir un peu de pitié. Savez-vous de quoi il est question ici? Il est question des femmes. Voyons. Y a-t-il des femmes, oui ou non? y a-t-il des enfants, oui ou non? y a-t-il, oui ou non, des mères, qui poussent des berceaux du pied et qui ont des tas de petits autour d’elles? Que celui de vous qui n’a jamais vu le sein d’une nourrice lève la main. Ah! vous voulez vous faire tuer, je le veux aussi, moi qui vous parle, mais je ne veux pas sentir des fantômes de femmes qui se tordent les bras autour de moi. Mourez, soit, mais ne faites pas mourir. Des suicides comme celui qui va s’accomplir ici sont sublimes, mais le suicide est étroit, et ne veut pas d’extension; et dès qu’il touche à vos proches, le suicide s’appelle meurtre. Songez aux petites têtes blondes, et songez aux cheveux blancs. Écoutez, tout à l’heure, Enjolras, il vient de me le dire, a vu au coin de la rue du Cygne une croisée éclairée, une chandelle à une pauvre fenêtre, au cinquième, et sur la vitre l’ombre toute branlante d’une tête de vieille femme qui avait l’air d’avoir passé la nuit et d’attendre. C’est peut-être la mère de l’un de vous. Eh bien, qu’il s’en aille, celui-là, et qu’il se dépêche d’aller dire à sa mère: Mère, me voilà! Qu’il soit tranquille, on fera la besogne ici tout de même. Quand on soutient ses proches de son travail, on n’a plus le droit de se sacrifier. C’est déserter la famille, cela. Et ceux qui ont des filles, et ceux qui ont des sœurs! Y pensez-vous? Vous vous faites tuer, vous voilà morts, c’est bon, et demain? Des jeunes filles qui n’ont pas de pain, cela est terrible. L’homme mendie, la femme vend. Ah! ces charmants êtres si gracieux et si doux qui ont des bonnets de fleurs, qui chantent, qui jasent, qui emplissent la maison de chasteté, qui sont comme un parfum vivant, qui prouvent l’existence des anges dans le ciel par la pureté des vierges sur la terre, cette Jeanne, cette Lise, cette Mimi, ces adorables et honnêtes créatures qui sont votre bénédiction et votre orgueil, ah mon Dieu, elles vont avoir faim! Que voulez-vous que je vous dise? Il y a un marché de chair humaine, et ce n’est pas avec vos mains d’ombres, frémissantes autour d’elles, que vous les empêcherez d’y entrer! Songez à la rue, songez au pavé couvert de passants, songez aux boutiques devant lesquelles des femmes vont et viennent décolletées et dans la boue. Ces femmes-là aussi ont été pures. Songez à vos sœurs, ceux qui en ont. La misère, la prostitution, les sergents de ville, Saint-Lazare, voilà où vont tomber ces délicates belles filles, ces fragiles merveilles de pudeur, de gentillesse et de beauté, plus fraîches que les lilas du mois de mai. Ah! vous vous êtes fait tuer! ah! vous n’êtes plus là! C’est bien; vous avez voulu soustraire le peuple à la royauté, vous donnez vos filles à la police. Amis, prenez garde, ayez de la compassion. Les femmes, les malheureuses femmes, on n’a pas l’habitude d’y songer beaucoup. On se fie sur ce que les femmes n’ont pas reçu l’éducation des hommes, on les empêche de lire, on les empêche de penser, on les empêche de s’occuper de politique; les empêcherez-vous d’aller ce soir à la morgue et de reconnaître vos cadavres? Voyons, il faut que ceux qui ont des familles soient bons enfants et nous donnent une poignée de main et s’en aillent, et nous laissent faire ici l’affaire tout seuls. Je sais bien qu’il faut du courage pour s’en aller, c’est difficile; mais plus c’est difficile, plus c’est méritoire. On dit: J’ai un fusil, je suis à la barricade, tant pis, j’y reste. Tant pis, c’est bientôt dit. Mes amis, il y a un lendemain, vous n’y serez pas à ce lendemain, mais vos familles y seront. Et que de souffrances! Tenez, un joli enfant bien portant qui a des joues comme une pomme, qui babille, qui jacasse, qui jabote, qui rit, qu’on sent frais sous le baiser, savez-vous ce que cela devient quand c’est abandonné? J’en ai vu un, tout petit, haut comme cela. Son père était mort. De pauvres gens l’avaient recueilli par charité, mais ils n’avaient pas de pain pour eux-mêmes. L’enfant avait toujours faim. C’était l’hiver. Il ne pleurait pas. On le voyait aller près du poêle où il n’y avait jamais de feu et dont le tuyau, vous savez, était mastiqué avec de la terre jaune. L’enfant détachait avec ses petits doigts un peu de cette terre et la mangeait. Il avait la respiration rauque, la face livide, les jambes molles, le ventre gros. Il ne disait rien. On lui parlait, il ne répondait pas. Il est mort. On l’a apporté mourir à l’hospice Necker, où je l’ai vu. J’étais interne à cet hospice-là. Maintenant, s’il y a des pères parmi vous, des pères qui ont pour bonheur de se promener le dimanche en tenant dans leur bonne main robuste la petite main de leur enfant, que chacun de ces pères se figure que cet enfant-là est le sien. Ce pauvre môme, je me le rappelle, il me semble que je le vois, quand il a été nu sur la table d'anatomie, ses côtes faisaient saillie sous sa peau comme les fosses sous l'herbe d'un cimetière. On lui a trouvé une espèce de boue dans l'estomac. Il avait de la cendre dans les dents. Allons, tâtons-nous en conscience et prenons conseil de notre cœur. Les statistiques constatent que la mortalité des enfants abandonnés est de cinquante-cinq pour cent. Je le répète, il s'agit des femmes, il s'agit des mères, il s'agit des jeunes filles, il s'agit des mioches. Est-ce qu'on vous parle de vous? On sait bien ce que vous êtes; on sait bien que vous êtes tous des braves, parbleu! on sait bien que vous avez tous dans l'âme la joie et la gloire de donner votre vie pour la grande cause; on sait bien que vous vous sentez élus pour mourir utilement et magnifiquement, et que chacun de vous tient à sa part du triomphe. À la bonne heure. Mais vous n'êtes pas seuls en ce monde. Il y a d'autres êtres auxquels il faut penser. Il ne faut pas être égoïstes.

Tous baissèrent la tête d'un air sombre.

Étranges contradictions du cœur humain à ses moments les plus sublimes! Combeferre, qui parlait ainsi, n'était pas orphelin. Il se souvenait des mères des autres, et il oubliait la sienne. Il allait se faire tuer. Il était «égoïste».

Marius, à jeun, fiévreux, successivement sorti de toutes les espérances, échoué dans la douleur, le plus sombre des naufrages, saturé d'émotions violentes, et sentant la fin venir, s'était de plus en plus enfoncé dans cette stupeur visionnaire qui précède toujours l'heure fatale volontairement acceptée.

Un physiologiste eût pu étudier sur lui les symptômes croissants de cette absorption fébrile connue et classée par la science, et qui est à la souffrance ce que la volupté est au plaisir. Le désespoir aussi a son extase. Marius en était là. Il assistait à tout comme du dehors; ainsi que nous l'avons dit, les choses qui se passaient devant lui, lui semblaient lointaines; il distinguait l'ensemble, mais n'apercevait point les détails. Il voyait les allants et venants à travers un flamboiement. Il entendait les voix parler comme au fond d'un abîme.

Cependant ceci l'émut. Il y avait dans cette scène une pointe qui perça jusqu'à lui, et qui le réveilla. Il n'avait plus qu'une idée, mourir, et il ne voulait pas s'en distraire; mais il songea, dans son somnambulisme funèbre, qu'en se perdant, il n'est pas défendu de sauver quelqu'un.

Il éleva la voix:

— Enjolras et Combeferre ont raison, dit-il; pas de sacrifice inutile. Je me joins à eux, et il faut se hâter. Combeferre vous a dit les choses décisives. Il y en a parmi vous qui ont des familles, des mères, des sœurs, des femmes, des enfants. Que ceux-là sortent des rangs.

Personne ne bougea.

— Les hommes mariés et les soutiens de famille hors des rangs! répéta Marius.

Son autorité était grande. Enjolras était bien le chef de la barricade, mais Marius en était le sauveur.

— Je l'ordonne! cria Enjolras.

— Je vous en prie, dit Marius.

Alors, remués par la parole de Combeferre, ébranlés par l'ordre d'Enjolras, émus par la prière de Marius, ces hommes héroïques commencèrent à se dénoncer les uns les autres. — C'est vrai, disait un jeune à un homme fait. Tu es père de famille. Va-t'en. — C'est plutôt toi, répondait l'homme, tu as tes deux sœurs que tu nourris. — Et une lutte inouïe éclatait. C'était à qui ne se laisserait pas mettre à la porte du tombeau.

— Dépêchons, dit Courfeyrac, dans un quart d'heure il ne serait plus temps.

— Citoyens, poursuivit Enjolras, c'est ici la République, et le suffrage universel règne. Désignez vous-mêmes ceux qui doivent s'en aller.

On obéit. Au bout de quelques minutes, cinq étaient unanimement désignés, et sortaient des rangs.

— Ils sont cinq! s'écria Marius.

Il n'y avait que quatre uniformes.

— Eh bien, reprirent les cinq, il faut qu'un reste.

Et ce fut à qui resterait, et à qui trouverait aux autres des raisons de ne pas rester. La généreuse querelle recommença.

— Toi, tu as une femme qui t'aime. — Toi, tu as ta vieille mère. — Toi, tu n'as plus ni père ni mère, qu'est-ce que tes trois petits frères vont devenir? — Toi, tu es père de cinq enfants. — Toi, tu as le droit de vivre, tu as dix-sept ans, c'est trop tôt.

Ces grandes barricades révolutionnaires étaient des rendez-vous d'héroïsmes. L'invraisemblable y était simple. Ces hommes ne s'étonnaient pas les uns les autres.

— Faites vite, répétait Courfeyrac.

On cria des groupes à Marius:

— Désignez, vous, celui qui doit rester.

— Oui, dirent les cinq, choisissez. Nous vous obéirons.

Marius ne croyait plus à une émotion possible. Cependant à cette idée, choisir un homme pour la mort, tout son sang reflua vers son cœur. Il eût pâli, s'il eût pu pâlir encore.

Il s'avança vers les cinq qui lui souriaient, et chacun, l'œil plein de cette grande flamme qu'on voit au fond de l'histoire sur les Thermopyles, lui criait.

— Moi! moi! moi!

Et Marius, stupidement, les compta; ils étaient toujours cinq! Puis son regard s'abaissa sur les quatre uniformes.

En cet instant, un cinquième uniforme tomba, comme du ciel, sur les quatre autres.

Le cinquième homme était sauvé.

Marius leva les yeux et reconnut M. Fauchelevent.

Jean Valjean venait d'entrer dans la barricade.

Soit renseignement pris, soit instinct, soit hasard, il arrivait par la ruelle Mondétour. Grâce à son habit de garde national, il avait passé aisément.

La vedette placée par les insurgés dans la rue Mondétour, n'avait point à donner le signal d'alarme pour un garde national seul. Elle l'avait laissé s'engager dans la rue en se disant: c'est un renfort probablement, ou au pis aller un prisonnier. Le moment était trop grave pour que la sentinelle pût se distraire de son devoir et de son poste d'observation.

Au moment où Jean Valjean était entré dans la redoute, personne ne l'avait remarqué, tous les yeux étant fixés sur les cinq choisis et sur les quatre uniformes. Jean Valjean, lui, avait vu et entendu, et, silencieusement, il s'était dépouillé de son habit et l'avait jeté sur le tas des autres.

L'émotion fut indescriptible.

— Quel est cet homme? demanda Bossuet.

— C'est, répondit Combeferre, un homme qui sauve les autres.

Marius ajouta d'une voix grave:

— Je le connais.

Cette caution suffisait à tous.

Enjolras se tourna vers Jean Valjean.

— Citoyen, soyez le bienvenu.

Et il ajouta:

— Vous savez qu’on va mourir.

Jean Valjean, sans répondre, aida l’insurgé qu’il sauvait à revêtir son uniforme.

Chapitre V

Quel horizon on voit du haut de la barricade

La situation de tous, dans cette heure fatale et dans ce lieu inexorable, avait comme résultante et comme sommet la mélancolie suprême d’Enjolras.

Enjolras avait en lui la plénitude de la révolution; il était incomplet pourtant, autant que l’absolu peut l’être; il tenait trop de Saint-Just, et pas assez d’Anacharsis Cloots; cependant son esprit, dans la société des Amis de l’A B C, avait fini par subir une certaine aimantation des idées de Combeferre; depuis quelque temps, il sortait peu à peu de la forme étroite du dogme et se laissait aller aux élargissements du progrès, et il en était venu à accepter, comme évolution définitive et magnifique, la transformation de la grande république française en immense république humaine. Quant aux moyens immédiats, une situation violente étant donnée, il les voulait violents; en cela, il ne variait pas; et il était resté de cette école épique et redoutable que résume ce mot: Quatre-vingt-treize.

Enjolras était debout sur l’escalier de pavés, un de ses coudes sur le canon de sa carabine. Il songeait; il tressaillait, comme à des passages de souffles; les endroits où est la mort ont de ces effets de trépieds. Il sortait de ses prunelles, pleines du regard intérieur, des espèces de feux étouffés. Tout à coup, il dressa la tête, ses cheveux blonds se renversèrent en arrière comme ceux de l’ange sur le sombre quadrige fait d’étoiles, ce fut comme une crinière de lion effarée en flamboiement d’auréole, et Enjolras s’écria:

— Citoyens, vous représentez-vous l’avenir? Les rues des villes inondées de lumières, des branches vertes sur les seuils, les nations sœurs, les hommes justes, les vieillards bénissant les enfants, le passé aimant le présent, les penseurs en pleine liberté, les croyants en pleine égalité, pour religion le ciel, Dieu prêtre direct, la conscience humaine devenue l’autel, plus de haines, la fraternité de l’atelier et de l’école, pour pénalité et pour récompense la notoriété, à tous le travail, pour tous le droit, sur tous la paix, plus de sang versé, plus de guerres, les mères heureuses! Dompter la matière, c’est le premier pas; réaliser l’idéal, c’est le second. Réfléchissez à ce qu’a déjà fait le progrès. Jadis les premières races humaines voyaient avec terreur passer devant leurs yeux l’hydre qui soufflait sur les eaux, le dragon qui vomissait du feu, le griffon qui était le monstre de l’air et qui volait avec les ailes d'un aigle et les griffes d'un tigre; bêtes effrayantes qui étaient au-dessus de l'homme. L'homme cependant a tendu ses pièges, les pièges sacrés de l'intelligence, et il a fini par y prendre les monstres.

Nous avons dompté l'hydre, et elle s'appelle le steamer; nous avons dompté le dragon, et il s'appelle la locomotive; nous sommes sur le point de dompter le griffon, nous le tenons déjà, et il s'appelle le ballon. Le jour où cette œuvre prométhéenne sera terminée et où l'homme aura définitivement attelé à sa volonté la triple Chimère antique, l'hydre, le dragon et le griffon, il sera maître de l'eau, du feu et de l'air, et il sera pour le reste de la création animée ce que les anciens dieux étaient jadis pour lui. Courage, et en avant! Citoyens, où allons-nous? À la science faite gouvernement, à la force des choses devenue seule force publique, à la loi naturelle ayant sa sanction et sa pénalité en elle-même et se promulguant par l'évidence, à un lever de vérité correspondant au lever du jour. Nous allons à l'union des peuples; nous allons à l'unité de l'homme. Plus de fictions; plus de parasites. Le réel gouverné par le vrai, voilà le but. La civilisation tiendra ses assises au sommet de l'Europe, et plus tard au centre des continents, dans un grand parlement de l'intelligence. Quelque chose de pareil s'est vu déjà. Les amphictyons avaient deux séances par an, l'une à Delphes, lieu des dieux, l'autre aux Thermopyles, lieu des héros. L'Europe aura ses amphictyons; le globe aura ses amphictyons. La France porte cet avenir sublime dans ses flancs. C'est là la gestation du dix-neuvième siècle. Ce qu'avait ébauché la Grèce est digne d'être achevé par la France. Écoute-moi, toi Feuilly, vaillant ouvrier, homme du peuple, hommes des peuples. Je te vénère. Oui, tu vois nettement les temps futurs, oui, tu as raison. Tu n'avais ni père ni mère, Feuilly; tu as adopté pour mère l'humanité et pour père le droit. Tu vas mourir ici, c'est-à-dire triompher. Citoyens, quoi qu'il arrive aujourd'hui, par notre défaite aussi bien que par notre victoire, c'est une révolution que nous allons faire. De même que les incendies éclairent toute la ville, les révolutions éclairent tout le genre humain. Et quelle révolution ferons-nous? Je viens de le dire, la révolution du Vrai. Au point de vue politique, il n'y a qu'un seul principe — la souveraineté de l'homme sur lui-même. Cette souveraineté de moi sur moi s'appelle Liberté. Là où deux ou plusieurs de ces souverainetés s'associent commence l'État. Mais dans cette association il n'y a nulle abdication. Chaque souveraineté concède une certaine quantité d'elle-même pour former le droit commun. Cette quantité est la même pour tous. Cette identité de concession que chacun fait à tous s'appelle Égalité.

Le droit commun n’est pas autre chose que la protection de tous rayonnant sur le droit de chacun. Cette protection de tous sur chacun s’appelle Fraternité. Le point d’intersection de toutes ces souverainetés qui s’agrègent s’appelle Société. Cette intersection étant une jonction, ce point est un nœud. De là ce qu’on appelle le lien social. Quelques-uns disent contrat social, ce qui est la même chose, le mot contrat étant étymologiquement formé avec l’idée de lien. Entendons-nous sur l’égalité; car, si la liberté est le sommet, l’égalité est la base. L’égalité, citoyens, ce n’est pas toute la végétation à niveau, une société de grands brins d’herbe et de petits chênes; un voisinage de jalousies s’entre-châtrant; c’est, civilement, toutes les aptitudes ayant la même ouverture; politiquement, tous les votes ayant le même poids; religieusement, toutes les consciences ayant le même droit. L’Égalité a un organe: l’instruction gratuite et obligatoire. Le droit à l’alphabet, c’est par là qu’il faut commencer. L’école primaire imposée à tous, l’école secondaire offerte à tous, c’est là la loi. De l’école identique sort la société égale. Oui, enseignement! Lumière! lumière! tout vient de la lumière et tout y retourne. Citoyens, le dix-neuvième siècle est grand, mais le vingtième siècle sera heureux. Alors plus rien de semblable à la vieille histoire; on n’aura plus à craindre, comme aujourd’hui, une conquête, une invasion, une usurpation, une rivalité de nations à main armée, une interruption de civilisation dépendant d’un mariage de rois, une naissance dans les tyrannies héréditaires, un partage de peuples par congrès, un démembrement par écroulement de dynastie, un combat de deux religions se rencontrant de front, comme deux boucs de l’ombre, sur le pont de l’infini; on n’aura plus à craindre la famine, l’exploitation, la prostitution par détresse, la misère par chômage, et l’échafaud, et le glaive, et les batailles, et tous les brigandages du hasard dans la forêt des événements. On pourrait presque dire: il n’y aura plus d’événements. On sera heureux. Le genre humain accomplira sa loi comme le globe terrestre accomplit la sienne; l’harmonie se rétablira entre l’âme et l’astre. L’âme gravitera autour de la vérité comme l’astre autour de la lumière. Amis, l’heure où nous sommes et où je vous parle est une heure sombre; mais ce sont là les achats terribles de l’avenir. Une révolution est un péage. Oh! le genre humain sera délivré, relevé et consolé! Nous le lui affirmons sur cette barricade. D’où poussera-t-on le cri d’amour, si ce n’est du haut du sacrifice? Ô mes frères, c’est ici le lieu de jonction de ceux qui pensent et de ceux qui souffrent; cette barricade n’est faite ni de pavés, ni de poutres, ni de ferrailles; elle est faite de deux monceaux, un monceau d’idées et un monceau de douleurs. La misère y rencontre l’idéal. Le jour y embrasse la nuit et lui dit: Je vais mourir avec toi et tu vas renaître avec moi. De l’étreinte de toutes les désolations jaillit la foi. Les souffrances apportent ici leur agonie, et les idées leur immortalité. Cette agonie et cette immortalité vont se mêler et composer notre mort. Frères, qui meurt ici meurt dans le rayonnement de l’avenir, et nous entrons dans une tombe toute pénétrée d’aurore.

Enjolras s’interrompit plutôt qu’il ne se tut; ses lèvres remuaient silencieusement comme s’il continuait de se parler à lui-même, ce qui fit qu’attentifs, et pour tâcher de l’entendre encore, ils le regardèrent. Il n’y eut pas d’applaudissements; mais on chuchota longtemps. La parole étant souffle, les frémissements d’intelligences ressemblent à des frémissements de feuilles.

Chapitre VI

Marius hagard, Javert laconique

Disons ce qui se passait dans la pensée de Marius.

Qu’on se souvienne de sa situation d’âme. Nous venons de le rappeler, tout n’était plus pour lui que vision. Son appréciation était trouble. Marius, insistons-y, était sous l’ombre des grandes ailes ténébreuses ouvertes sur les agonisants. Il se sentait entré dans le tombeau, il lui semblait qu’il était déjà de l’autre côté de la muraille, et il ne voyait plus les faces des vivants qu’avec les yeux d’un mort.

Comment M. Fauchelevent était-il là? Pourquoi y était-il? Qu’y venait-il faire? Marius ne s’adressa point toutes ces questions. D’ailleurs, notre désespoir ayant cela de particulier qu’il enveloppe autrui comme nous-mêmes, il lui semblait logique que tout le monde vînt mourir.

Seulement il songea à Cosette avec un serrement de cœur.

Du reste M. Fauchevelent ne lui parla pas, ne le regarda pas, et n’eut pas même l’air d’entendre lorsque Marius éleva la voix pour dire: Je le connais.

Quant à Marius, cette attitude de M. Fauchelevent le soulageait, et si l’on pouvait employer un tel mot pour de telles impressions, nous dirions, lui plaisait. Il s’était toujours senti une impossibilité absolue d’adresser la parole à cet homme énigmatique qui était à la fois pour lui équivoque et imposant. Il y avait en outre très longtemps qu’il ne l’avait vu; ce qui, pour la nature timide et réservée de Marius, augmentait encore l’impossibilité.

Les cinq hommes désignés sortirent de la barricade par la ruelle Mondétour; ils ressemblaient parfaitement à des gardes nationaux. Un d’eux s’en alla en pleurant. Avant de partir, ils embrassèrent ceux qui restaient.

Quand les cinq hommes renvoyés à la vie furent partis, Enjolras pensa au condamné à mort. Il entra dans la salle basse. Javert, lié au pilier, songeait.

— Te faut-il quelque chose? lui demanda Enjolras.

Javert répondit:

— Quand me tuerez-vous?

— Attends. Nous avons besoin de toutes nos cartouches en ce moment.

— Alors, donnez-moi à boire, dit Javert.

Enjolras lui présenta lui-même un verre d’eau, et, comme Javert était garrotté, il l’aida à boire.

— Est-ce là tout? reprit Enjolras.

— Je suis mal à ce poteau, répondit Javert. Vous n'êtes pas tendres de m'avoir laissé passer la nuit là. Liez-moi comme il vous plaira, mais vous pouvez bien me coucher sur une table comme l'autre.

Et d'un mouvement de tête il désignait le cadavre de M. Mabeuf.

Il y avait, on s'en souvient, au fond de la salle une grande et longue table sur laquelle on avait fondu des balles et fait des cartouches. Toutes les cartouches étant faites et toute la poudre étant employée, cette table était libre.

Sur l'ordre d'Enjolras, quatre insurgés délièrent Javert du poteau. Tandis qu'on le déliait, un cinquième lui tenait une bayonnette appuyée sur la poitrine. On lui laissa les mains attachées derrière le dos, on lui mit aux pieds une corde à fouet mince et solide qui lui permettait de faire des pas de quinze pouces comme à ceux qui vont monter à l'échafaud, et on le fit marcher jusqu'à la table au fond de la salle où on l'étendit, étroitement lié par le milieu du corps.

Pour plus de sûreté, au moyen d'une corde fixée au cou, on ajouta au système de ligatures qui lui rendaient toute évasion impossible cette espèce de lien, appelé dans les prisons martingale, qui part de la nuque, se bifurque sur l'estomac, et vient rejoindre les mains après avoir passé entre les jambes.

Pendant qu'on garrottait Javert, un homme, sur le seuil de la porte, le considérait avec une attention singulière. L'ombre que faisait cet homme fit tourner la tête à Javert. Il leva les yeux et reconnut Jean Valjean. Il ne tressaillit même pas, abaissa fièrement la paupière, et se borna à dire: C'est tout simple.

Chapitre VII

La situation s'aggrave

Le jour croissait rapidement. Mais pas une fenêtre ne s'ouvrait, pas une porte ne s'entre-bâillait; c'était l'aurore, non le réveil. L'extrémité de la rue de la Chanvrerie opposée à la barricade avait été évacuée par les troupes, comme nous l'avons dit; elle semblait libre et s'ouvrait aux passants avec une tranquillité sinistre. La rue Saint-Denis était muette comme l'avenue des Sphinx à Thèbes. Pas un être vivant dans les carrefours que blanchissait un reflet de soleil. Rien n'est lugubre comme cette clarté des rues désertes.

On ne voyait rien, mais on entendait. Il se faisait à une certaine distance un mouvement mystérieux. Il était évident que l'instant critique arrivait. Comme la veille au soir les vedettes se replièrent; mais cette fois toutes.

La barricade était plus forte que lors de la première attaque. Depuis le départ des cinq, on l'avait exhaussée encore.

Sur l'avis de la vedette qui avait observé la région des halles, Enjolras, de peur d'une surprise par derrière, prit une résolution grave. Il fit barricader le petit boyau de la ruelle Mondétour resté libre jusqu'alors. On dépava pour cela quelques longueurs de maisons de plus. De cette façon, la barricade, murée sur trois rues, en avant sur la rue de la Chanvrerie, à gauche sur la rue du Cygne et de la Petite-Truanderie, à droite sur la rue Mondétour, était vraiment presque inexpugnable; il est vrai qu'on y était fatalement enfermé. Elle avait trois fronts, mais n'avait plus d'issue. — Forteresse, mais souricière, dit Courfeyrac en riant.

Enjolras fit entasser près de la porte du cabaret une trentaine de pavés, «arrachés de trop», disait Bossuet.

Le silence était maintenant si profond du côté d'où l'attaque devait venir qu'Enjolras fit reprendre à chacun le poste de combat.

On distribua à tous une ration d'eau-de-vie.

Rien n'est plus curieux qu'une barricade qui se prépare à un assaut. Chacun choisit sa place comme au spectacle. On s'accote, on s'accoude, on s'épaule. Il y en a qui se font des stalles avec des pavés. Voilà un coin de mur qui gêne, on s'en éloigne; voici un redan qui peut protéger, on s'y abrite. Les gauchers sont précieux; ils prennent les places incommodes aux autres. Beaucoup s'arrangent pour combattre assis. On veut être à l'aise pour tuer et confortablement pour mourir. Dans la funeste guerre de juin 1848, un insurgé qui avait un tir redoutable et qui se battait du haut d'une terrasse sur un toit, s'y était fait apporter un fauteuil Voltaire; un coup de mitraille vint l'y trouver.

Sitôt que le chef a commandé le branle-bas de combat, tous les mouvements désordonnés cessent; plus de tiraillements de l'un à l'autre; plus de coteries; plus d'aparté; plus de bande à part; tout ce qui est dans les esprits converge et se change en attente de l'assaillant. Une barricade avant le danger, chaos; dans le danger, discipline. Le péril fait l'ordre.

Dès qu'Enjolras eut pris sa carabine à deux coups et se fut placé à une espèce de créneau qu'il s'était réservé, tous se turent. Un pétillement de petits bruits secs retentit confusément le long de la muraille de pavés. C'était les fusils qu'on armait.

Du reste, les attitudes étaient plus fières et plus confiantes que jamais; l'excès du sacrifice est un affermissement; ils n'avaient plus l'espérance, mais ils avaient le désespoir. Le désespoir, dernière arme, qui donne la victoire quelquefois; Virgile l'a dit. Les ressources suprêmes sortent des résolutions extrêmes. S'embarquer dans la mort, c'est parfois le moyen d'échapper au naufrage; et le couvercle du cercueil devient une planche de salut.

Comme la veille au soir, toutes les attentions étaient tournées, et on pourrait presque dire appuyées, sur le bout de la rue, maintenant éclairé et visible.

L'attente ne fut pas longue. Le remuement recommença distinctement du côté de Saint-Leu, mais cela ne ressemblait pas au mouvement de la première attaque. Un clapotement de chaînes, le cahotement inquiétant d'une masse, un cliquetis d'airain sautant sur le pavé, une sorte de fracas solennel, annoncèrent qu'une ferraille sinistre s'approchait. Il y eut un tressaillement dans les entrailles de ces vieilles rues paisibles, percées et bâties pour la circulation féconde des intérêts et des idées, et qui ne sont pas faites pour le roulement monstrueux des roues de la guerre.

La fixité des prunelles de tous les combattants sur l'extrémité de la rue devint farouche.

Une pièce de canon apparut.

Les artilleurs poussaient la pièce; elle était dans son encastrement de tir; l'avant-train avait été détaché; deux soutenaient l'affût, quatre étaient aux roues, d'autres suivaient avec le caisson. On voyait la mèche allumée.

— Feu! cria Enjolras.

Toute la barricade fit feu, la détonation fut effroyable; une avalanche de fumée couvrit et effaça la pièce et les hommes; après quelques secondes le nuage se dissipa, et le canon et les hommes reparurent; les servants de la pièce achevaient de la rouler en face de la barricade lentement, correctement, et sans se hâter. Pas un n'était atteint. Puis le chef de pièce, pesant sur la culasse pour élever le tir, se mit à pointer le canon avec la gravité d'un astronome qui braque une lunette.

— Bravo les canonniers! cria Bossuet.

Et toute la barricade battit des mains.

Un moment après, carrément posée au beau milieu de la rue, à cheval sur le ruisseau, la pièce était en batterie. Une gueule formidable était ouverte sur la barricade.

— Allons, gai! fit Courfeyrac. Voilà le brutal. Après la chiquenaude, le coup de poing. L'armée étend vers nous sa grosse patte. La barricade va être sérieusement secouée. La fusillade tâte, le canon prend.

— C'est une pièce de huit, nouveau modèle, en bronze, ajouta Combeferre. Ces pièces-là, pour peu qu'on dépasse la proportion de dix parties d'étain sur cent de cuivre, sont sujettes à éclater. L'excès d'étain les fait trop tendres. Il arrive alors qu'elles ont des caves et des chambres dans la lumière. Pour obvier à ce danger et pouvoir forcer la charge, il faudrait peut-être en revenir au procédé du quatorzième siècle, le cerclage, et émenaucher extérieurement la pièce d'une suite d'anneaux d'acier sans soudure, depuis la culasse jusqu'au tourillon. En attendant, on remédie comme on peut au défaut; on parvient à reconnaître où sont les trous et les caves dans la lumière d'un canon au moyen du chat. Mais il y a un meilleur moyen, c'est l'étoile mobile de Gribeauval.

— Au seizième siècle, observa Bossuet, on rayait les canons.

— Oui, répondit Combeferre, cela augmente la puissance balistique, mais diminue la justesse de tir. En outre, dans le tir à courte distance, la trajectoire n'a pas toute la roideur désirable, la parabole s'exagère, le chemin du projectile n'est plus assez rectiligne pour qu'il puisse frapper tous les objets intermédiaires, nécessité de combat pourtant, dont l'importance croît avec la proximité de l'ennemi et la précipitation du tir. Ce défaut de tension de la courbe du projectile dans les canons rayés du seizième siècle tenait à la faiblesse de la charge; les faibles charges, pour cette espèce d'engins, sont imposées par des nécessités balistiques, telles, par exemple, que la conservation des affûts. En somme, le canon, ce despote, ne peut pas tout ce qu’il veut; la force est une grosse faiblesse. Un boulet de canon ne fait que six cents lieues par heure; la lumière fait soixante-dix mille lieues par seconde. Telle est la supériorité de Jésus-Christ sur Napoléon.

— Rechargez les armes, dit Enjolras.

De quelle façon le revêtement de la barricade allait-il se comporter sous le boulet? Le coup ferait-il brèche? Là était la question. Pendant que les insurgés rechargeaient les fusils, les artilleurs chargeaient le canon.

L’anxiété était profonde dans la redoute.

Le coup partit, la détonation éclata.

— Présent! cria une voix joyeuse.

Et en même temps que le boulet sur la barricade, Gavroche s’abattit dedans.

Il arrivait du côté de la rue du Cygne et il avait lestement enjambé la barricade accessoire qui faisait front au dédale de la Petite-Truanderie.

Gavroche fit plus d’effet dans la barricade que le boulet.

Le boulet s’était perdu dans le fouillis des décombres. Il avait tout au plus brisé une roue de l’omnibus, et achevé la vieille charrette Anceau. Ce que voyant, la barricade se mit à rire.

— Continuez, cria Bossuet aux artilleurs.

Chapitre VIII

Les artilleurs se font prendre au sérieux

On entoura Gavroche.

Mais il n’eut le temps de rien raconter. Marius, frissonnant, le prit à part.

— Qu’est-ce que tu viens faire ici?

— Tiens! dit l’enfant. Et vous?

Et il regarda fixement Marius avec son effronterie épique. Ses deux yeux s’agrandissaient de la clarté fière qui était dedans.

Ce fut avec un accent sévère que Marius continua:

— Qui est-ce qui te disait de revenir? As-tu au moins remis ma lettre à son adresse?

Gavroche n’était point sans quelque remords à l’endroit de cette lettre. Dans sa hâte de revenir à la barricade, il s’en était défait plutôt qu’il ne l’avait remise. Il était forcé de s’avouer à lui-même qu’il l’avait confiée un peu légèrement à cet inconnu dont il n’avait même pu distinguer le visage. Il est vrai que cet homme était nu-tête, mais cela ne suffisait pas. En somme, il se faisait à ce sujet de petites remontrances intérieures et il craignait les reproches de Marius. Il prit, pour se tirer d’affaire, le procédé le plus simple; il mentit abominablement.

— Citoyen, j’ai remis la lettre au portier. La dame dormait. Elle aura la lettre en se réveillant.

Marius, en envoyant cette lettre, avait deux buts, dire adieu à Cosette et sauver Gavroche. Il dut se contenter de la moitié de ce qu’il voulait.

L’envoi de sa lettre, et la présence de M. Fauchelevent dans la barricade, ce rapprochement s’offrit à son esprit. Il montra à Gavroche M. Fauchelevent:

— Connais-tu cet homme?

— Non, dit Gavroche.

Gavroche, en effet, nous venons de le rappeler, n’avait vu Jean Valjean que la nuit.

Les conjectures troubles et maladives qui s’étaient ébauchées dans l’esprit de Marius se dissipèrent. Connaissait-il les opinions de M. Fauchelevent? M. Fauchelevent était républicain peut-être. De là sa présence toute simple dans ce combat.

Cependant Gavroche était déjà à l'autre bout de la barricade criant: mon fusil!

Courfeyrac le lui fit rendre.

Gavroche prévint «les camarades», comme il les appelait, que la barricade était bloquée. Il avait eu grand'peine à arriver. Un bataillon de ligne, dont les faisceaux étaient dans la Petite-Truanderie, observait le côté de la rue du Cygne; du côté opposé, la garde municipale occupait la rue des Prêcheurs. En face, on avait le gros de l'armée.

Ce renseignement donné, Gavroche ajouta: — Je vous autorise à leur flanquer une pile indigne. Cependant Enjolras à son créneau, l'oreille tendue, épiait.

Les assaillants, peu contents sans doute du coup à boulet, ne l'avaient pas répété.

Une compagnie d'infanterie de ligne était venue occuper l'extrémité de la rue, en arrière de la pièce. Les soldats dépavaient la chaussée et y construisaient avec les pavés une petite muraille basse, une façon d'épaulement qui n'avait guère plus de dix-huit pouces de hauteur et qui faisait front à la barricade. À l'angle de gauche de cet épaulement, on voyait la tête de colonne d'un bataillon de la banlieue, massé rue Saint-Denis.

Enjolras, au guet, crut distinguer le bruit particulier qui se fait quand on retire des caissons les boîtes à mitraille, et il vit le chef de pièce changer le pointage et incliner légèrement la bouche du canon à gauche. Puis les canonniers se mirent à charger la pièce. Le chef de pièce saisit lui-même le boutefeu et l'approcha de la lumière.

— Baissez la tête, ralliez le mur! cria Enjolras, et tous à genoux le long de la barricade!

Les insurgés, épars devant le cabaret et qui avaient quitté leur poste de combat à l'arrivée de Gavroche, se ruèrent pêle-mêle vers la barricade; mais avant que l'ordre d'Enjolras fût exécuté, la décharge se fit avec le râle effrayant d'un coup de mitraille. C'en était un en effet.

La charge avait été dirigée sur la coupure de la redoute, y avait ricoché sur le mur, et ce ricochet épouvantable avait fait deux morts et trois blessés.

Si cela continuait, la barricade n'était plus tenable. La mitraille entrait.

Il y eut une rumeur de consternation.

— Empêchons toujours le second coup, dit Enjolras.

Et, abaissant sa carabine, il ajusta le chef de pièce qui, en ce moment, penché sur la culasse du canon, rectifiait et fixait définitivement le pointage.

Ce chef de pièce était un beau sergent de canonniers, tout jeune, blond, à la figure très douce, avec l’air intelligent propre à cette arme prédestinée et redoutable qui, à force de se perfectionner dans l’horreur, doit finir par tuer la guerre.

Combeferre, debout près d’Enjolras, considérait ce jeune homme.

— Quel dommage! dit Combeferre. La hideuse chose que ces boucheries! Allons, quand il n’y aura plus de rois, il n’y aura plus de guerre. Enjolras, tu vises ce sergent, tu ne le regardes pas. Figure-toi que c’est un charmant jeune homme, il est intrépide, on voit qu’il pense, c’est très instruit, ces jeunes gens de l’artillerie; il a un père, une mère, une famille, il aime probablement, il a tout au plus vingt-cinq ans, il pourrait être ton frère.

— Il l’est, dit Enjolras.

— Oui, reprit Combeferre, et le mien aussi. Eh bien, ne le tuons pas.

— Laisse-moi. Il faut ce qu’il faut.

Et une larme coula lentement sur la joue de marbre d’Enjolras.

En même temps il pressa la détente de sa carabine. L’éclair jaillit. L’artilleur tourna deux fois sur lui-même, les bras étendus devant lui et la tête levée comme pour aspirer l’air, puis se renversa le flanc sur la pièce et y resta sans mouvement. On voyait son dos du centre duquel sortait tout droit un flot de sang. La balle lui avait traversé la poitrine de part en part. Il était mort.

Il fallut l’emporter et le remplacer. C’étaient en effet quelques minutes de gagnées.

Chapitre IX

Emploi de ce vieux talent de braconnier et de ce coup de fusil infaillible qui a influé sur la condamnation 1796

Les avis se croisaient dans la barricade. Le tir de la pièce allait recommencer. On n'en avait pas pour un quart d'heure avec cette mitraille. Il était absolument nécessaire d'amortir les coups.

Enjolras jeta ce commandement:

— Il faut mettre là un matelas.

— On n'en a pas, dit Combeferre, les blessés sont dessus.

Jean Valjean, assis à l'écart sur une borne, à l'angle du cabaret, son fusil entre les jambes, n'avait jusqu'à cet instant pris part à rien de ce qui se passait. Il semblait ne pas entendre les combattants dire autour de lui: Voilà un fusil qui ne fait rien.

À l'ordre donné par Enjolras, il se leva.

On se souvient qu'à l'arrivée du rassemblement rue de la Chanvrerie, une vieille femme, prévoyant les balles, avait mis son matelas devant sa fenêtre. Cette fenêtre, fenêtre de grenier, était sur le toit d'une maison à six étages située un peu en dehors de la barricade. Le matelas, posé en travers, appuyé par le bas sur deux perches à sécher le linge, était soutenu en haut par deux cordes qui, de loin, semblaient deux ficelles et qui se rattachaient à des clous plantés dans les chambranles de la mansarde. On voyait ces deux cordes distinctement sur le ciel comme des cheveux.

— Quelqu'un peut-il me prêter une carabine à deux coups? dit Jean Valjean.

Enjolras, qui venait de recharger la sienne, la lui tendit.

Jean Valjean ajusta la mansarde et tira.

Une des deux cordes du matelas était coupée.

Le matelas ne pendait plus que par un fil.

Jean Valjean lâcha le second coup. La deuxième corde fouetta la vitre de la mansarde. Le matelas glissa entre les deux perches et tomba dans la rue.

La barricade applaudit.

Toutes les voix crièrent:

— Voilà un matelas.

— Oui, dit Combeferre, mais qui l'ira chercher?

Le matelas en effet était tombé en dehors de la barricade, entre les assiégés et les assiégeants. Or, la mort du sergent de canonniers ayant exaspéré la troupe, les soldats, depuis quelques instants, s'étaient couchés à plat ventre derrière la ligne de pavés qu'ils avaient élevée, et, pour suppléer au silence forcé de la pièce qui se taisait en attendant que son service fût réorganisé, ils avaient ouvert le feu contre la barricade. Les insurgés ne répondaient pas à cette mousqueterie, pour épargner les munitions. La fusillade se brisait à la barricade; mais la rue, qu'elle remplissait de balles, était terrible.

Jean Valjean sortit de la coupure, entra dans la rue, traversa l'orage de balles, alla au matelas, le ramassa, le chargea sur son dos, et revint dans la barricade.

Lui-même mit le matelas dans la coupure. Il l'y fixa contre le mur de façon que les artilleurs ne le vissent pas.

Cela fait, on attendit le coup de mitraille.

Il ne tarda pas.

Le canon vomit avec un rugissement son paquet de chevrotines. Mais il n'y eut pas de ricochet. La mitraille avorta sur le matelas. L'effet prévu était obtenu. La barricade était préservée.

— Citoyen, dit Enjolras à Jean Valjean, la République vous remercie.

Bossuet admirait et riait. Il s'écria:

— C'est immoral qu'un matelas ait tant de puissance. Triomphe de ce qui plie sur ce qui foudroie. Mais c'est égal, gloire au matelas qui annule un canon!

Chapitre X

Aurore

En ce moment-là, Cosette se réveillait.

Sa chambre était étroite, propre, discrète, avec une longue croisée au levant sur l’arrière-cour de la maison.

Cosette ne savait rien de ce qui se passait dans Paris. Elle n’était point là la veille et elle était déjà rentrée dans sa chambre quand Toussaint avait dit: Il paraît qu’il y a du train.

Cosette avait dormi peu d’heures, mais bien. Elle avait eu de doux rêves, ce qui tenait peut-être un peu à ce que son petit lit était très blanc. Quelqu’un qui était Marius lui était apparu dans de la lumière. Elle se réveilla avec du soleil dans les yeux, ce qui d’abord lui fit l’effet de la continuation du songe.

Sa première pensée sortant de ce rêve fut riante. Cosette se sentit toute rassurée. Elle traversait, comme Jean Valjean quelques heures auparavant, cette réaction de l’âme qui ne veut absolument pas du malheur. Elle se mit à espérer de toutes ses forces sans savoir pourquoi. Puis un serrement de cœur lui vint. — Voilà trois jours qu’elle n’avait vu Marius. Mais elle se dit qu’il devait avoir reçu sa lettre, qu’il savait où elle était, et qu’il avait tant d’esprit, et qu’il trouverait moyen d’arriver jusqu’à elle. — Et cela certainement aujourd’hui, et peut-être ce matin même. — Il faisait grand jour, mais le rayon de lumière était très horizontal, elle pensa qu’il était de très bonne heure; qu’il fallait se lever pourtant; pour recevoir Marius.

Elle sentait qu’elle ne pouvait vivre sans Marius, et que par conséquent cela suffisait, et que Marius viendrait. Aucune objection n’était recevable. Tout cela était certain. C’était déjà assez monstrueux d’avoir souffert trois jours. Marius absent trois jours, c’était horrible au bon Dieu. Maintenant, cette cruelle taquinerie d’en haut était une épreuve traversée. Marius allait arriver, et apporterait une bonne nouvelle. Ainsi est faite la jeunesse; elle essuie vite ses yeux; elle trouve la douleur inutile et ne l’accepte pas. La jeunesse est le sourire de l’avenir devant un inconnu qui est lui-même. Il lui est naturel d’être heureuse. Il semble que sa respiration soit faite d’espérance.

Du reste, Cosette ne pouvait parvenir à se rappeler ce que Marius lui avait dit au sujet de cette absence qui ne devait durer qu’un jour, et quelle explication il lui en avait donnée. Tout le monde a remarqué avec quelle adresse une monnaie qu’on laisse tomber à terre court se cacher, et quel art elle a de se rendre introuvable. Il y a des pensées qui nous jouent le même tour; elles se blottissent dans un coin de notre cerveau; c’est fini; elles sont perdues; impossible de remettre la mémoire dessus. Cosette se dépitait quelque peu du petit effort inutile que faisait son souvenir. Elle se disait que c’était bien mal à elle et bien coupable d’avoir oublié des paroles prononcées par Marius.

Elle sortit du lit et fit les deux ablutions de l’âme et du corps, sa prière et sa toilette.

On peut à la rigueur introduire le lecteur dans une chambre nuptiale, non dans une chambre virginale. Le vers l’oserait à peine, la prose ne le doit pas.

C’est l’intérieur d’une fleur encore close, c’est une blancheur dans l’ombre, c’est la cellule intime d’un lis fermé qui ne doit pas être regardé par l’homme tant qu’il n’a pas été regardé par le soleil. La femme en bouton est sacrée. Ce lit innocent qui se découvre, cette adorable demi-nudité qui a peur d’elle-même, ce pied blanc qui se réfugie dans une pantoufle, cette gorge qui se voile devant un miroir comme si ce miroir était une prunelle, cette chemise qui se hâte de remonter et de cacher l’épaule pour un meuble qui craque ou pour une voiture qui passe, ces cordons noués, ces agrafes accrochées, ces lacets tirés, ces tressaillements, ces petits frissons de froid et de pudeur, cet effarouchement exquis de tous les mouvements, cette inquiétude presque ailée là où rien n’est à craindre, les phases successives du vêtement aussi charmantes que les nuages de l’aurore, il ne sied point que tout cela soit raconté, et c’est déjà trop de l’indiquer.

L’œil de l’homme doit être plus religieux encore devant le lever d’une jeune fille que devant le lever d’une étoile. La possibilité d’atteindre doit tourner en augmentation de respect. Le duvet de la pêche, la cendre de la prune, le cristal radié de la neige, l’aile du papillon poudrée de plumes, sont des choses grossières auprès de cette chasteté qui ne sait pas même qu’elle est chaste. La jeune fille n’est qu’une lueur de rêve et n’est pas encore une statue. Son alcôve est cachée dans la partie sombre de l’idéal. L’indiscret toucher du regard brutalise cette vague pénombre. Ici, contempler, c’est profaner.

Nous ne montrerons donc rien de tout ce suave petit remue-ménage du réveil de Cosette.

Un conte d'orient dit que la rose avait été faite par Dieu blanche, mais qu'Adam l'ayant regardée au moment où elle s'entrouvrait, elle eut honte et devint rose. Nous sommes de ceux qui se sentent interdits devant les jeunes filles et les fleurs, les trouvant vénérables.

Cosette s'habilla bien vite, se peigna, se coiffa, ce qui était fort simple en ce temps-là où les femmes n'enflaient pas leurs boucles et leurs bandeaux avec des coussinets et des tonnelets et ne mettaient point de crinolines dans leurs cheveux. Puis elle ouvrit la fenêtre et promena ses yeux partout autour d'elle, espérant découvrir quelque peu de la rue, un angle de maison, un coin de pavés, et pouvoir guetter là Marius. Mais on ne voyait rien du dehors. L'arrière-cour était enveloppée de murs assez hauts, et n'avait pour échappée que quelques jardins. Cosette déclara ces jardins hideux; pour la première fois de sa vie elle trouva des fleurs laides. Le moindre bout de ruisseau du carrefour eût été bien mieux son affaire. Elle prit le parti de regarder le ciel, comme si elle pensait que Marius pouvait venir aussi de là.

Subitement, elle fondit en larmes. Non que ce fût mobilité d'âme; mais, des espérances coupées d'accablement, c'était sa situation. Elle sentit confusément on ne sait quoi d'horrible. Les choses passent dans l'air en effet. Elle se dit qu'elle n'était sûre de rien, que se perdre de vue, c'était se perdre; et l'idée que Marius pourrait bien lui revenir du ciel, lui apparut, non plus charmante, mais lugubre.

Puis, tels sont ces nuages, le calme lui revint, et l'espoir, et une sorte de sourire inconscient, mais confiant en Dieu.

Tout le monde était encore couché dans la maison. Un silence provincial régnait. Aucun volet n'était poussé. La loge du portier était fermée. Toussaint n'était pas levée, et Cosette pensa tout naturellement que son père dormait. Il fallait qu'elle eût bien souffert, et qu'elle souffrit bien encore, car elle se disait que son père avait été méchant; mais elle comptait sur Marius. L'éclipse d'une telle lumière était décidément impossible. Elle pria. Par instants elle entendait à une certaine distance des espèces de secousses sourdes, et elle disait: C'est singulier qu'on ouvre et qu'on ferme les portes cochères de si bonne heure. C'étaient les coups de canon qui battaient la barricade.

Il y avait, à quelques pieds au-dessous de la croisée de Cosette, dans la vieille corniche toute noire du mur, un nid de martinets; l'encorbellement de ce nid faisait un peu saillie au-delà de la corniche si bien que d’en haut on pouvait voir le dedans de ce petit paradis. La mère y était, ouvrant ses ailes en éventail sur sa couvée; le père voletait, s’en allait, puis revenait, rapportant dans son bec de la nourriture et des baisers. Le jour levant dorait cette chose heureuse, la grande loi Multipliez était là souriante et auguste, et ce doux mystère s’épanouissait dans la gloire du matin. Cosette, les cheveux dans le soleil, l’âme dans les chimères, éclairée par l’amour au dedans et par l’aurore au dehors, se pencha comme machinalement, et, sans presque oser s’avouer qu’elle pensait en même temps à Marius, se mit à regarder ces oiseaux, cette famille, ce mâle et cette femelle, cette mère et ces petits, avec le profond trouble qu’un nid donne à une vierge.

Chapitre XI

Le coup de fusil qui ne manque rien et qui ne tue personne

Le feu des assaillants continuait. La mousqueterie et la mitraille alternaient, sans grand ravage à la vérité. Le haut de la façade de Corinthe souffrait seul; la croisée du premier étage et les mansardes du toit, criblées de chevrotines et de biscayens, se déformaient lentement. Les combattants qui s’y étaient postés avaient dû s’effacer. Du reste, ceci est une tactique de l’attaque des barricades; tirailler longtemps, afin d’épuiser les munitions des insurgés, s’ils font la faute de répliquer. Quand on s’aperçoit, au ralentissement de leur feu, qu’ils n’ont plus ni balles ni poudre, on donne l’assaut. Enjolras n’était pas tombé dans ce piège; la barricade ne ripostait point.

À chaque feu de peloton, Gavroche se gonflait la joue avec sa langue, signe de haut dédain.

— C’est bon, disait-il, déchirez de la toile. Nous avons besoin de charpie.

Courfeyrac interpellait la mitraille sur son peu d’effet et disait au canon:

— Tu deviens diffus, mon bonhomme.

Dans la bataille on s’intrigue comme au bal. Il est probable que ce silence de la redoute commençait à inquiéter les assiégeants et à leur faire craindre quelque incident inattendu, et qu’ils sentirent le besoin de voir clair à travers ce tas de pavés et de savoir ce qui se passait derrière cette muraille impassible qui recevait les coups sans y répondre. Les insurgés aperçurent subitement un casque qui brillait au soleil sur un toit voisin. Un pompier était adossé à une haute cheminée et semblait là en sentinelle. Son regard plongeait à pic dans la barricade.

— Voilà un surveillant gênant, dit Enjolras.

Jean Valjean avait rendu la carabine d’Enjolras, mais il avait son fusil.

Sans dire un mot, il ajusta le pompier, et, une seconde après, le casque, frappé d’une balle, tombait bruyamment dans la rue. Le soldat effaré se hâta de disparaître.

Un deuxième observateur prit sa place. Celui-ci était un officier. Jean Valjean, qui avait rechargé son fusil, ajusta le nouveau venu, et envoya le casque de l’officier rejoindre le casque du soldat. L’officier n’insista pas, et se retira très vite. Cette fois l’avis fut compris. Personne ne reparut sur le toit; et l’on renonça à espionner la barricade.

— Pourquoi n’avez-vous pas tué l’homme? demanda Bossuet à Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean ne répondit pas.

Chapitre XII

Le désordre partisan de l’ordre

Bossuet murmura à l’oreille de Combeferre:

— Il n’a pas répondu à ma question.

— C’est un homme qui fait de la bonté à coups de fusil, dit Combeferre.

Ceux qui ont gardé quelque souvenir de cette époque déjà lointaine savent que la garde nationale de la banlieue était vaillante contre les insurrections. Elle fut particulièrement acharnée et intrépide aux journées de juin 1832. Tel bon cabaretier de Pantin, des Vertus ou de la Cunette, dont l’émeute faisait chômer «l’établissement», devenait léonin en voyant sa salle de danse déserte, et se faisait tuer pour sauver l’ordre représenté par la guinguette. Dans ce temps à la fois bourgeois et héroïque, en présence des idées qui avaient leurs chevaliers, les intérêts avaient leurs paladins. Le prosaïsme du mobile n’ôtait rien à la bravoure du mouvement. La décroissance d’une pile d’écus faisait chanter à des banquiers la Marseillaise. On versait lyriquement son sang pour le comptoir; et l’on défendait avec un enthousiasme lacédémonien la boutique, cet immense diminutif de la patrie.

Au fond, disons-le, il n’y avait rien dans tout cela que de très sérieux. C’étaient les éléments sociaux qui entraient en lutte, en attendant le jour où ils entreront en équilibre.

Un autre signe de ce temps, c’était l’anarchie mêlée au gouvernementalisme (nom barbare du parti correct). On était pour l’ordre avec indiscipline. Le tambour battait inopinément, sur le commandement de tel colonel de la garde nationale, des rappels de caprice; tel capitaine allait au feu par inspiration; tel garde national se battait «d’idée», et pour son propre compte. Dans les minutes de crise, dans les «journées», on prenait conseil moins de ses chefs que de ses instincts. Il y avait dans l’armée de l’ordre de véritables guérilleros, les uns d’épée comme Fannicot, les autres de plume comme Henri Fonfrède.

La civilisation, malheureusement représentée à cette époque plutôt par une agrégation d’intérêts que par un groupe de principes, était ou se croyait en péril; elle poussait le cri d’alarme; chacun, se faisant centre, la défendait, la secourait et la protégeait, à sa tête; et le premier venu prenait sur lui de sauver la société.

Le zèle parfois allait jusqu'à l'extermination. Tel peloton de gardes nationaux se constituait de son autorité privée conseil de guerre, et jugeait et exécutait en cinq minutes un insurgé prisonnier. C'est une improvisation de cette sorte qui avait tué Jean Prouvaire. Féroce loi de Lynch, qu'aucun parti n'a le droit de reprocher aux autres, car elle est appliquée par la république en Amérique comme par la monarchie en Europe. Cette loi de Lynch se compliquait de méprises. Un jour d'émeute, un jeune poète, nommé Paul-Aimé Garnier, fut poursuivi place Royale, la bayonnette aux reins, et n'échappa qu'en se réfugiant sous la porte cochère du numéro 6. On criait: — En voilà encore un de ces Saint-Simoniens! et l'on voulait le tuer. Or, il avait sous le bras un volume des mémoires du duc de Saint-Simon. Un garde national avait lu sur ce livre le mot: Saint-Simon, et avait crié: À mort!

Le 6 juin 1832, une compagnie de gardes nationaux de la banlieue, commandée par le capitaine Fannicot, nommé plus haut, se fit, par fantaisie et bon plaisir, décimer rue de la Chanvrerie. Le fait, si singulier qu'il soit, a été constaté par l'instruction judiciaire ouverte à la suite de l'insurrection de 1832. Le capitaine Fannicot, bourgeois impatient et hardi, espèce de condottiere de l'ordre, de ceux que nous venons de caractériser, gouvernementaliste fanatique et insoumis, ne put résister à l'attrait de faire feu avant l'heure et à l'ambition de prendre la barricade à lui tout seul, c'est-à-dire avec sa compagnie. Exaspéré par l'apparition successive du drapeau rouge et du vieil habit qu'il prit pour le drapeau noir, il blâmait tout haut les généraux et les chefs de corps, lesquels tenaient conseil, ne jugeaient pas que le moment de l'assaut décisif fût venu, et laissaient, suivant une expression célèbre de l'un d'eux, «l'insurrection cuire dans son jus». Quant à lui, il trouvait la barricade mûre, et, comme ce qui est mûr doit tomber, il essaya.

Il commandait à des hommes résolus comme lui, «à des enragés», a dit un témoin. Sa compagnie, celle-là même qui avait fusillé le poète Jean Prouvaire, était la première du bataillon posté à l'angle de la rue. Au moment où l'on s'y attendait le moins, le capitaine lança ses hommes contre la barricade. Ce mouvement, exécuté avec plus de bonne volonté que de stratégie, coûta cher à la compagnie Fannicot. Avant qu'elle fût arrivée aux deux tiers de la rue, une décharge générale de la barricade l'accueillit.

Quatre, les plus audacieux, qui couraient en tête, furent foudroyés à bout portant au pied même de la redoute, et cette courageuse cohue de gardes nationaux, gens très braves, mais qui n'avaient point la ténacité militaire, dut se replier, après quelque hésitation, en laissant quinze cadavres sur le pavé. L'instant d'hésitation donna aux insurgés le temps de recharger les armes, et une seconde décharge, très meurtrière, atteignit la compagnie avant qu'elle eût pu regagner l'angle de la rue, son abri. Un moment, elle fut prise entre deux mitrailles, et elle reçut la volée de la pièce en batterie qui, n'ayant pas d'ordre, n'avait pas discontinué son feu. L'intrépide et imprudent Fannicot fut un des morts de cette mitraille. Il fut tué par le canon, c'est-à-dire par l'ordre.

Cette attaque, plus furieuse que sérieuse, irrita Enjolras.

— Les imbéciles! dit-il. Ils font tuer leurs hommes, et ils nous usent nos munitions, pour rien.

Enjolras parlait comme un vrai général d'émeute qu'il était. L'insurrection et la répression ne luttent point à armes égales. L'insurrection, promptement épuisable, n'a qu'un nombre de coups à tirer et qu'un nombre de combattants à dépenser. Une giberne vidée, un homme tué, ne se remplacent pas. La répression, ayant l'armée, ne compte pas les hommes, et, ayant Vincennes, ne compte pas les coups. La répression a autant de régiments que la barricade a d'hommes, et autant d'arsenaux que la barricade a de cartouchières. Aussi sont-ce là des luttes d'un contre cent, qui finissent toujours par l'écrasement des barricades; à moins que la révolution, surgissant brusquement, ne vienne jeter dans la balance son flamboyant glaive d'archange. Cela arrive. Alors tout se lève, les pavés entrent en bouillonnement, les redoutes populaires pullulent, Paris tressaille souverainement, le quid divinum se dégage, un 10 août est dans l'air, un 29 juillet est dans l'air, une prodigieuse lumière apparaît, la gueule béante de la force recule, et l'armée, ce lion, voit devant elle, debout et tranquille, ce prophète, la France.

Chapitre XIII

Lueurs qui passent

Dans le chaos de sentiments et de passions qui défendent une barricade, il y a de tout; il y a de la bravoure, de la jeunesse, du point d'honneur, de l'enthousiasme, de l'idéal, de la conviction, de l'acharnement de joueur, et surtout, des intermittences d'espoir.

Une de ces intermittences, un de ces vagues frémissements d'espérance traversa subitement, à l'instant le plus inattendu, la barricade de la Chanvrerie.

— Écoutez, s'écria brusquement Enjolras toujours aux aguets, il me semble que Paris s'éveille.

Il est certain que, dans la matinée du 6 juin, l'insurrection eut, pendant une heure ou deux, une certaine recrudescence. L'obstination du tocsin de Saint-Merry ranima quelques velléités. Rue du Poirier, rue des Gravilliers, des barricades s'ébauchèrent. Devant la porte Saint-Martin, un jeune homme, armé d'une carabine, attaqua seul un escadron de cavalerie. À découvert, en plein boulevard, il mit un genou à terre, épaula son arme, tira, tua le chef d'escadron, et se retourna en disant: En voilà encore un qui ne nous fera plus de mal. Il fut sabré. Rue Saint-Denis, une femme tirait sur la garde municipale de derrière une jalousie baissée. On voyait à chaque coup trembler les feuilles de la jalousie. Un enfant de quatorze ans fut arrêté rue de la Cossonnerie avec ses poches pleines de cartouches. Plusieurs postes furent attaqués. À l'entrée de la rue Bertin-Poirée, une fusillade très vive et tout à fait imprévue accueillit un régiment de cuirassiers, en tête duquel marchait le général Cavaignac de Baragne. Rue Planche-Mibray, on jeta du haut des toits sur la troupe de vieux tessons de vaisselle et des ustensiles de ménage; mauvais signe; et quand on rendit compte de ce fait au maréchal Soult, le vieux lieutenant de Napoléon devint rêveur, se rappelant le mot de Suchet à Saragosse: Nous sommes perdus quand les vieilles femmes nous vident leur pot de chambre sur la tête.

Ces Symptômes généraux qui se manifestaient au moment où l'on croyait l'émeute localisée, cette fièvre de colère qui reprenait le dessus, ces flammèches qui volaient çà et là au-dessus de ces masses profondes de combustible qu'on nomme les faubourgs de Paris, tout cet ensemble inquiéta les chefs militaires. On se hâta d'éteindre ces commencements d'incendie. On retarda, jusqu'à ce que ces pétillements fussent étouffés, l'attaque des barricades Maubuée, de la Chanvrerie et de Saint-Merry, afin de n'avoir plus affaire qu'à elles, et de pouvoir tout finir d'un coup. Des colonnes furent lancées dans les rues en fermentation, balayant les grandes, sondant les petites, à droite, à gauche, tantôt avec précaution et lentement, tantôt au pas de charge. La troupe enfonçait les portes des maisons d'où l'on avait tiré; en même temps des manœuvres de cavalerie dispersaient les groupes des boulevards. Cette répression ne se fit pas sans rumeur et sans ce fracas tumultueux propre aux chocs d'armée et de peuple. C'était là ce qu'Enjolras, dans les intervalles de la canonnade et de la mousqueterie, saisissait. En outre, il avait vu au bout de la rue passer des blessés sur des civières, et il disait à Courfeyrac: — Ces blessés-là ne viennent pas de chez nous.

L'espoir dura peu; la lueur s'éclipsa vite. En moins d'une demi-heure, ce qui était dans l'air s'évanouit, ce fut comme un éclair sans foudre, et les insurgés sentirent retomber sur eux cette espèce de chape de plomb que l'indifférence du peuple jette sur les obstinés abandonnés.

Le mouvement général qui semblait s'être vaguement dessiné avait avorté; et l'attention du ministre de la guerre et la stratégie des généraux pouvaient se concentrer maintenant sur les trois ou quatre barricades restées debout.

Le soleil montait sur l'horizon.

Un insurgé interpella Enjolras:

— On a faim ici. Est-ce que vraiment nous allons mourir comme ça sans manger?

Enjolras, toujours accoudé à son créneau, sans quitter des yeux l'extrémité de la rue, fit un signe de tête affirmatif.

Chapitre XIV

Où on lira le nom de la maîtresse d’Enjolras

Courfeyrac, assis sur un pavé à côté d’Enjolras, continuait d’insulter le canon, et chaque fois que passait, avec son bruit monstrueux, cette sombre nuée de projectiles qu’on appelle la mitraille, il l’accueillait par une bouffée d’ironie.

— Tu t’époumones, mon pauvre vieux brutal, tu me fais de la peine, tu perds ton vacarme. Ce n’est pas du tonnerre, ça. C’est de la toux.

Et l’on riait autour de lui.

Courfeyrac et Bossuet, dont la vaillante belle humeur croissait avec le péril, remplaçaient, comme madame Scarron, la nourriture par la plaisanterie, et, puisque le vin manquait, versaient à tous de la gaîté.

— J’admire Enjolras, disait Bossuet. Sa témérité impassible m’émerveille. Il vit seul, ce qui le rend peut-être un peu triste; Enjolras se plaint de sa grandeur qui l’attache au veuvage. Nous autres, nous avons tous plus ou moins des maîtresses qui nous rendent fous, c’est-à-dire braves. Quand on est amoureux comme un tigre, c’est bien le moins qu’on se batte comme un lion. C’est une façon de nous venger des traits que nous font mesdames nos grisettes. Roland se fait tuer pour faire bisquer Angélique. Tous nos héroïsmes viennent de nos femmes. Un homme sans femme, c’est un pistolet sans chien; c’est la femme qui fait partir l’homme. Eh bien, Enjolras n’a pas de femme. Il n’est pas amoureux, et il trouve le moyen d’être intrépide. C’est une chose inouïe qu’on puisse être froid comme la glace et hardi comme le feu.

Enjolras ne paraissait pas écouter, mais quelqu’un qui eût été près de lui l’eût entendu murmurer à demi-voix: Patria.

Bossuet riait encore quand Courfeyrac s’écria:

— Du nouveau!

Et, prenant une voix d’huissier qui annonce, il ajouta:

— Je m’appelle Pièce de Huit.

En effet, un nouveau personnage venait d’entrer en scène. C’était une deuxième bouche à feu.

Les artilleurs firent rapidement la manœuvre de force, et mirent cette seconde pièce en batterie près de la première.

Ceci ébauchait le dénoûment.

Quelques instants après, les deux pièces, vivement servies, tiraient de front contre la redoute; les feux de peloton de la ligne et de la banlieue soutenaient l’artillerie.

On entendait une autre canonnade à quelque distance. En même temps que deux pièces s’acharnaient sur la redoute de la rue de la Chanvrerie, deux autres bouches à feu, braquées, l’une rue Saint-Denis, l’autre rue Aubry-le-Boucher, criblaient la barricade Saint-Merry. Les quatre canons se faisaient lugubrement écho.

Les aboiements des sombres chiens de la guerre se répondaient.

Des deux pièces qui battaient maintenant la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie, l’une tirait à mitraille, l’autre à boulet.

La pièce qui tirait à boulet était pointée un peu haut et le tir était calculé de façon que le boulet frappait le bord extrême de l’arête supérieure de la barricade, l’écrêtait, et émiettait les pavés sur les insurgés en éclats de mitraille.

Ce procédé de tir avait pour but d’écarter les combattants du sommet de la redoute, et de les contraindre à se pelotonner dans l’intérieur; c’est-à-dire que cela annonçait l’assaut.

Une fois les combattants chassés du haut de la barricade par le boulet et des fenêtres du cabaret par la mitraille, les colonnes d’attaque pourraient s’aventurer dans la rue sans être visées, peut-être même sans être aperçues, escalader brusquement la redoute, comme la veille au soir, et, qui sait? la prendre par surprise.

— Il faut absolument diminuer l’incommodité de ces pièces, dit Enjolras, et il cria: «Feu sur les artilleurs!» Tous étaient prêts. La barricade, qui se taisait depuis si longtemps, fit feu éperdument, sept ou huit décharges se succédèrent avec une sorte de rage et de joie, la rue s’emplit d’une fumée aveuglante, et, au bout de quelques minutes, à travers cette brume toute rayée de flamme, on put distinguer confusément les deux tiers des ailleurs couchés sous les roues des canons. Ceux qui étaient restés debout continuaient de servir les pièces avec une tranquillité sévère; mais le feu était ralenti.

— Voilà qui va bien, dit Bossuet à Enjolras. Succès.

Enjolras hocha la tête et répondit:

— Encore un quart d’heure de ce succès, et il n’y aura plus dix cartouches dans la barricade.

Il paraît que Gavroche entendit ce mot.

Chapitre XV

Gavroche dehors

Courfeyrac tout à coup aperçut quelqu’un au bas de la barricade, dehors, dans la rue, sous les balles.

Gavroche avait pris un panier à bouteilles, dans le cabaret, était sorti par la coupure, et était paisiblement occupé à vider dans son panier les gibernes pleines de cartouches des gardes nationaux tués sur le talus de la redoute.

— Qu’est-ce que tu fais là? dit Courfeyrac.

Gavroche leva le nez:

— Citoyen, j’emplis mon panier.

— Tu ne vois donc pas la mitraille?

Gavroche répondit:

— Eh bien, il pleut. Après?

Courfeyrac cria:

— Rentre!

— Tout à l’heure, fit Gavroche.

Et, d’un bond, il s’enfonça dans la rue.

On se souvient que la compagnie Fannicot, en se retirant, avait laissé derrière elle une traînée de cadavres.

Une vingtaine de morts gisaient çà et là dans toute la longueur de la rue sur le pavé. Une vingtaine de gibernes pour Gavroche. Une provision de cartouches pour la barricade.

La fumée était dans la rue comme un brouillard. Quiconque a vu un nuage tombé dans une gorge de montagnes entre deux escarpements à pic, peut se figurer cette fumée resserrée et comme épaissie par deux sombres lignes de hautes maisons. Elle montait lentement et se renouvelait sans cesse; de là un obscurcissement graduel qui blêmissait même le plein jour. C’est à peine si, d’un bout à l’autre de la rue, pourtant fort courte, les combattants s’apercevaient.

Cet obscurcissement, probablement voulu et calculé par les chefs qui devaient diriger l’assaut de la barricade, fut utile à Gavroche.

Sous les plis de ce voile de fumée, et grâce à sa petitesse, il put s’avancer assez loin dans la rue sans être vu. Il dévalisa les sept ou huit premières gibernes sans grand danger.

Il rampait à plat ventre, galopait à quatre pattes, prenait son panier aux dents, se tordait, glissait, ondulait, serpentait d’un mort à l’autre, et vidait la giberne ou la cartouchière comme un singe ouvre une noix.

De la barricade, dont il était encore assez près, on n’osait lui crier de revenir, de peur d’appeler l’attention sur lui.

Sur un cadavre, qui était un caporal, il trouva une poire à poudre.

— Pour la soif, dit-il, en la mettant dans sa poche. À force d’aller en avant, il parvint au point où le brouillard de la fusillade devenait transparent.

Si bien que les tirailleurs de la ligne rangés et à l’affût derrière leur levée de pavés, et les tirailleurs de la banlieue massés à l’angle de la rue, se montrèrent soudainement quelque chose qui remuait dans la fumée.

Au moment où Gavroche débarrassait de ses cartouches un sergent gisant près d’une borne, une balle frappa le cadavre.

— Fichtre! fit Gavroche. Voilà qu’on me tue mes morts.

Une deuxième balle fit étinceler le pavé à côté de lui. Une troisième renversa son panier.

Gavroche regarda, et vit que cela venait de la banlieue.

Il se dressa tout droit, debout, les cheveux au vent, les mains sur les hanches, l’œil fixé sur les gardes nationaux qui tiraient, et il chanta:

On est laid à Nanterre,
C’est la faute à Voltaire,
Et bête à Palaiseau,
C’est la faute à Rousseau.

Puis il ramassa son panier, y remit, sans en perdre une seule, les cartouches qui en étaient tombées, et, avançant vers la fusillade, alla dépouiller une autre giberne. Là une quatrième balle le manqua encore. Gavroche chanta:

Je ne suis pas notaire,
C’est la faute à Voltaire,
Je suis petit oiseau,
C’est la faute à Rousseau.

Une cinquième balle ne réussit qu’à tirer de lui un troisième couplet:

Joie est mon caractère,
C’est la faute à Voltaire,
Misère est mon trousseau,
C’est la faute à Rousseau.

Cela continua ainsi quelque temps.

Le spectacle était épouvantable et charmant. Gavroche, fusillé, taquinait la fusillade. Il avait l’air de s’amuser beaucoup. C’était le moineau becquetant les chasseurs. Il répondait à chaque décharge par un couplet. On le visait sans cesse, on le manquait toujours. Les gardes nationaux et les soldats riaient en l’ajustant. Il se couchait, puis se redressait, s’effaçait dans un coin de porte, puis bondissait, disparaissait, reparaissait, se sauvait, revenait, ripostait à la mitraille par des pieds de nez, et cependant pillait les cartouches, vidait les gibernes et remplissait son panier. Les insurgés, haletants d’anxiété, le suivaient des yeux. La barricade tremblait; lui, il chantait. Ce n’était pas un enfant, ce n’était pas un homme; c’était un étrange gamin fée. On eût dit le nain invulnérable de la mêlée. Les balles couraient après lui, il était plus leste qu’elles. Il jouait on ne sait quel effrayant jeu de cache-cache avec la mort; chaque fois que la face camarde du spectre s’approchait, le gamin lui donnait une pichenette.

Une balle pourtant, mieux ajustée ou plus traître que les autres, finit par atteindre l’enfant feu follet. On vit Gavroche chanceler, puis il s’affaissa. Toute la barricade poussa un cri; mais il y avait de l’Antée dans ce pygmée; pour le gamin toucher le pavé, c’est comme pour le géant toucher la terre; Gavroche n’était tombé que pour se redresser; il resta assis sur son séant, un long filet de sang rayait son visage, il éleva ses deux bras en l’air, regarda du côté d’où était venu le coup, et se mit à chanter.

Je suis tombé par terre,
C’est la faute à Voltaire,
Le nez dans le ruisseau,
C’est la faute à....

Il n’acheva point. Une seconde balle du même tireur l’arrêta court. Cette fois il s’abattit la face contre le pavé, et ne remua plus. Cette petite grande âme venait de s’envoler.

Chapitre XVI

Comment de frère on devient père

Il y avait en ce moment-là même dans le jardin du Luxembourg — car le regard du drame doit être présent partout, — deux enfants qui se tenaient par la main. L'un pouvait avoir sept ans, l'autre cinq. La pluie les ayant mouillés, ils marchaient dans les allées du côté du soleil; l'aîné conduisait le petit; ils étaient en haillons et pâles; ils avaient un air d'oiseaux fauves. Le plus petit disait: J'ai bien faim.

L'aîné, déjà un peu protecteur, conduisait son frère de la main gauche et avait une baguette dans sa main droite.

Ils étaient seuls dans le jardin. Le jardin était désert, les grilles étaient fermées par mesure de police à cause de l'insurrection. Les troupes qui y avaient bivouaqué en étaient sorties pour les besoins du combat.

Comment ces enfants étaient-ils là? Peut-être s'étaient-ils évadés de quelque corps de garde entrebâillé; peut-être aux environs, à la barrière d'Enfer, ou sur l'esplanade de l'Observatoire, ou dans le carrefour voisin dominé par le fronton où on lit: invenerunt parvulum pannis involutum, y avait-il quelque baraque de saltimbanques dont ils s'étaient enfuis; peut-être avaient-ils, la veille au soir, trompé l'œil des inspecteurs du jardin à l'heure de la clôture, et avaient-ils passé la nuit dans quelqu'une de ces guérites où on lit les journaux? Le fait est qu'ils étaient errants et qu'ils semblaient libres. Être errant et sembler libre, c'est être perdu. Ces pauvres petits étaient perdus en effet.

Ces deux enfants étaient ceux-là mêmes dont Gavroche avait été en peine, et que le lecteur se rappelle. Enfants des Thénardier, en location chez la Magnon, attribués à M. Gillenormand, et maintenant feuilles tombées de toutes ces branches sans racines, et roulées sur la terre par le vent.

Leurs vêtements, propres du temps de la Magnon et qui lui servaient de prospectus vis-à-vis de M. Gillenormand, étaient devenus guenilles.

Ces êtres appartenaient désormais à la statistique des «Enfants Abandonnés» que la police constate, ramasse, égare et retrouve sur le pavé de Paris.

Il fallait le trouble d'un tel jour pour que ces petits misérables fussent dans ce jardin. Si les surveillants les eussent aperçus, ils eussent chassé ces haillons. Les petits pauvres n’entrent pas dans les jardins publics: pourtant on devrait songer que, comme enfants, ils ont droit aux fleurs.

Ceux-ci étaient là, grâce aux grilles fermées. Ils étaient en contravention. Ils s’étaient glissés dans le jardin, et ils y étaient restés. Les grilles fermées ne donnent pas congé aux inspecteurs, la surveillance est censée continuer, mais elle s’amollit et se repose; et les inspecteurs, émus eux aussi par l’anxiété publique et plus occupés du dehors que du dedans, ne regardaient plus le jardin, et n’avaient pas vu les deux délinquants.

Il avait plu la veille, et même un peu le matin. Mais en juin les ondées ne comptent pas. C’est à peine si l’on s’aperçoit, une heure après un orage, que cette belle journée blonde a pleuré. La terre en été est aussi vite sèche que la joue d’un enfant.

À cet instant du solstice, la lumière du plein midi est, pour ainsi dire, poignante. Elle prend tout. Elle s’applique et se superpose à la terre avec une sorte de succion. On dirait que le soleil a soif. Une averse est un verre d’eau; une pluie est tout de suite bue. Le matin tout ruisselait, l’après-midi tout poudroie.

Rien n’est admirable comme une verdure débarbouillée par la pluie et essuyée par le rayon; c’est de la fraîcheur chaude. Les jardins et les prairies, ayant de l’eau dans leurs racines et du soleil dans leurs fleurs, deviennent des cassolettes d’encens et fument de tous leurs parfums à la fois. Tout rit, chante et s’offre. On se sent doucement ivre. Le printemps est un paradis provisoire; le soleil aide à faire patienter l’homme.

Il y a des êtres qui n’en demandent pas davantage; vivants qui, ayant l’azur du ciel, disent: c’est assez! songeurs absorbés dans le prodige, puisant dans l’idolâtrie de la nature l’indifférence du bien et du mal, contemplateurs du cosmos radieusement distraits de l’homme, qui ne comprennent pas qu’on s’occupe de la faim de ceux-ci, de la soif de ceux-là, de la nudité du pauvre en hiver, de la courbure lymphatique d’une petite épine dorsale, du grabat, du grenier, du cachot, et des haillons des jeunes filles grelottantes, quand on peut rêver sous les arbres; esprits paisibles et terribles, impitoyablement satisfaits. Chose étrange, l’infini leur suffît. Ce grand besoin de l’homme, le fini, qui admet l’embrassement, ils l’ignorent. Le fini, qui admet le progrès, ce travail sublime, ils n’y songent pas. L’indéfini, qui naît de la combinaison humaine et divine de l’infini et du fini, leur échappe. Pourvu qu’ils soient face à face avec l’immensité, ils sourient. Jamais la joie, toujours l’extase. S’abîmer, voilà leur vie. L’histoire de l’humanité pour eux n’est qu’un plan parcellaire; Tout n’y est pas; le vrai Tout reste en dehors; à quoi bon s’occuper de ce détail, l’homme? L’homme souffre, c’est possible; mais regardez donc Aldebaran qui se lève! La mère n’a plus de lait, le nouveau-né se meurt, je n’en sais rien, mais considérez donc cette rosace merveilleuse que fait une rondelle de l’aubier du sapin examinée au microscope! comparez-moi la plus belle malines à cela! Ces penseurs oublient d’aimer. Le zodiaque réussit sur eux au point de les empêcher de voir l’enfant qui pleure. Dieu leur éclipse l’âme. C’est là une famille d’esprits, à la fois petits et grands. Horace en était, Goethe en était, La Fontaine peut-être; magnifiques égoïstes de l’infini, spectateurs tranquilles de la douleur, qui ne voient pas Néron s’il fait beau, auxquels le soleil cache le bûcher, qui regarderaient guillotiner en y cherchant un effet de lumière, qui n’entendent ni le cri, ni le sanglot, ni le râle, ni le tocsin, pour qui tout est bien puisqu’il y a le mois de mai, qui, tant qu’il y aura des nuages de pourpre et d’or au-dessus de leur tête, se déclarent contents, et qui sont déterminés à être heureux jusqu’à épuisement du rayonnement des astres et du chant des oiseaux.

Ce sont de radieux ténébreux. Ils ne se doutent pas qu’ils sont à plaindre. Certes, ils le sont. Qui ne pleure pas ne voit pas. Il faut les admirer et les plaindre, comme on plaindrait et comme on admirerait un être à la fois nuit et jour qui n’aurait pas d’yeux sous les sourcils et qui aurait un astre au milieu du front.

L’indifférence de ces penseurs, c’est là, selon quelques-uns, une philosophie supérieure. Soit; mais dans cette supériorité il y a de l’infirmité. On peut être immortel et boiteux; témoin Vulcain. On peut être plus qu’homme et moins qu’homme. L’incomplet immense est dans la nature. Qui sait si le soleil n’est pas un aveugle?

Mais alors, quoi! à qui se fier? Solem quis dicere falsum audeat? Ainsi de certains génies eux-mêmes, de certains Très-Hauts humains, des hommes astres, pourraient se tromper? Ce qui est là-haut, au faîte, au sommet, au zénith, ce qui envoie sur la terre tant de clarté, verrait peu, verrait mal, ne verrait pas? Cela n’est-il pas désespérant? Non. Mais qu’y a-t-il donc au-dessus du soleil? Le dieu.

Le 6 juin 1832, vers onze heures du matin, le Luxembourg, solitaire et dépeuplé, était charmant. Les quinconces et les parterres s’envoyaient dans la lumière des baumes et des éblouissements. Les branches, folles à la clarté de midi, semblaient chercher à s’embrasser. Il y avait dans les sycomores un tintamarre de fauvettes, les passereaux triomphaient, les pique-bois grimpaient le long des marronniers en donnant de petits coups de bec dans les trous de l'écorce. Les plates-bandes acceptaient la royauté légitime des lys; le plus auguste des parfums, c'est celui qui sort de la blancheur. On respirait l'odeur poivrée des œillets. Les vieilles corneilles de Marie de Médicis étaient amoureuses dans les grands arbres. Le soleil dorait, empourprait et allumait les tulipes, qui ne sont autre chose que toutes les variétés de la flamme, faites fleurs. Tout autour des bancs de tulipes tourbillonnaient les abeilles, étincelles de ces fleurs flammes. Tout était grâce et gaîté, même la pluie prochaine; cette récidive, dont les muguets et les chèvrefeuilles devaient profiter, n'avait rien d'inquiétant; les hirondelles faisaient la charmante menace de voler bas. Qui était là aspirait du bonheur; la vie sentait bon; toute cette nature exhalait la candeur, le secours, l'assistance, la paternité, la caresse, l'aurore. Les pensées qui tombaient du ciel étaient douces comme une petite main d'enfant qu'on baise.

Les statues sous les arbres, nues et blanches, avaient des robes d'ombre trouées de lumière; ces déesses étaient toutes déguenillées de soleil; il leur pendait des rayons de tous les côtés. Autour du grand bassin, la terre était déjà séchée au point d'être presque brûlée. Il faisait assez de vent pour soulever çà et là de petites émeutes de poussière. Quelques feuilles jaunes, restées du dernier automne, se poursuivaient joyeusement, et semblaient gaminer.

L'abondance de la clarté avait on ne sait quoi de rassurant. Vie, sève, chaleur, effluves, débordaient; on sentait sous la création l'énormité de la source; dans tous ces souffles pénétrés d'amour, dans ce va-et-vient de réverbérations et de reflets, dans cette prodigieuse dépense de rayons, dans ce versement indéfini d'or fluide, on sentait la prodigalité de l'inépuisable; et, derrière cette splendeur comme derrière un rideau de flamme, on entrevoyait Dieu, ce millionnaire d'étoiles.

Grâce au sable, il n'y avait pas une tache de boue; grâce à la pluie, il n'y avait pas un grain de cendre. Les bouquets venaient de se laver; tous les velours, tous les satins, tous les vernis, tous les ors, qui sortent de la terre sous forme de fleurs, étaient irréprochables. Cette magnificence était propre. Le grand silence de la nature heureuse emplissait le jardin. Silence céleste compatible avec mille musiques, roucoulements de nids, bourdonnements d'essaims, palpitations du vent. Toute l'harmonie de la saison s'accomplissait dans un gracieux ensemble; les entrées et les sorties du printemps avaient lieu dans l’ordre voulu; les lilas finissaient, les jasmins commençaient; quelques fleurs étaient attardées, quelques insectes en avance; l’avant-garde des papillons rouges de juin fraternisait avec l’arrière-garde des papillons blancs de mai. Les platanes faisaient peau neuve. La brise creusait des ondulations dans l’énormité magnifique des marronniers. C’était splendide. Un vétéran de la caserne voisine qui regardait à travers la grille disait: Voilà le printemps au port d’armes et en grande tenue.

Toute la nature déjeunait; la création était à table; c’était l’heure; la grande nappe bleue était mise au ciel et la grande nappe verte sur la terre; le soleil éclairait à giorno. Dieu servait le repas universel. Chaque être avait sa pâture ou sa pâtée. Le ramier trouvait du chènevis, le pinson trouvait du millet, le chardonneret trouvait du mouron, le rouge-gorge trouvait des vers, l’abeille trouvait des fleurs, la mouche trouvait des infusoires, le verdier trouvait des mouches. On se mangeait bien un peu les uns les autres, ce qui est le mystère du mal mêlé au bien; mais pas une bête n’avait l’estomac vide.

Les deux petits abandonnés étaient parvenus près du grand bassin, et, un peu troublés par toute cette lumière, ils tâchaient de se cacher, instinct du pauvre et du faible devant la magnificence, même impersonnelle; et ils se tenaient derrière la baraque des cygnes.

Çà et là, par intervalles, quand le vent donnait, on entendait confusément des cris, une rumeur, des espèces de râles tumultueux qui étaient des fusillades, et des frappements sourds qui étaient des coups de canon. Il y avait de la fumée au-dessus des toits du côté des halles. Une cloche, qui avait l’air d’appeler, sonnait au loin.

Ces enfants ne semblaient pas percevoir ces bruits. Le petit répétait de temps en temps à demi-voix: J’ai faim.

Presque au même instant que les deux enfants, un autre couple s’approchait du grand bassin. C’était un bonhomme de cinquante ans qui menait par la main un bonhomme de six ans. Sans doute le père avec son fils. Le bonhomme de six ans tenait une grosse brioche.

À cette époque, de certaines maisons riveraines, rue Madame et rue d’Enfer, avaient une clef du Luxembourg dont jouissaient les locataires quand les grilles étaient fermées, tolérance supprimée depuis. Ce père et ce fils sortaient sans doute d’une de ces maisons-là.

Les deux petits pauvres regardèrent venir ce «monsieur» et se cachèrent un peu plus.

Celui-ci était un bourgeois. Le même peut-être qu'un jour Marius, à travers sa fièvre d'amour, avait entendu, près de ce même grand bassin, conseillant à son fils «d'éviter les excès». Il avait l'air affable et altier, et une bouche qui, ne se fermant pas, souriait toujours. Ce sourire mécanique, produit par trop de mâchoire et trop peu de peau, montre les dents plutôt que l'âme. L'enfant, avec sa brioche mordue qu'il n'achevait pas, semblait gavé. L'enfant était vêtu en garde national à cause de l'émeute, et le père était resté habillé en bourgeois à cause de la prudence.

Le père et le fils s'étaient arrêtés près du bassin où s'ébattaient les deux cygnes. Ce bourgeois paraissait avoir pour les cygnes une admiration spéciale. Il leur ressemblait en ce sens qu'il marchait comme eux.

Pour l'instant les cygnes nageaient, ce qui est leur talent principal, et ils étaient superbes.

Si les deux petits pauvres eussent écouté et eussent été d'âge à comprendre, ils eussent pu recueillir les paroles d'un homme grave. Le père disait au fils:

— Le sage vit content de peu. Regarde-moi, mon fils. Je n'aime pas le faste. Jamais on ne me voit avec des habits chamarrés d'or et de pierreries; je laisse ce faux éclat aux âmes mal organisées.

Ici les cris profonds qui venaient du côté des halles éclatèrent avec un redoublement de cloche et de rumeur.

— Qu'est-ce que c'est que cela? demanda l'enfant.

Le père répondit:

— Ce sont des saturnales.

Tout à coup, il aperçut les deux petits déguenillés, immobiles derrière la maisonnette verte des cygnes.

— Voilà le commencement, dit-il.

Et après un silence il ajouta:

— L'anarchie entre dans ce jardin.

Cependant le fils mordit la brioche, la recracha, et brusquement se mit à pleurer.

— Pourquoi pleures-tu? demanda le père.

— Je n'ai plus faim, dit l'enfant.

Le sourire du père s'accentua.

— On n'a pas besoin de faim pour manger un gâteau.

— Mon gâteau m'ennuie. Il est rassis.

— Tu n'en veux plus?

— Non.

Le père lui montra les cygnes.

— Jette-le à ces palmipèdes.

L’enfant hésita. On ne veut plus de son gâteau; ce n’est pas une raison pour le donner.

Le père poursuivit:

— Sois humain. Il faut avoir pitié des animaux.

Et, prenant à son fils le gâteau, il le jeta dans le bassin.

Le gâteau tomba assez près du bord.

Les cygnes étaient loin, au centre du bassin, et occupés à quelque proie. Ils n’avaient vu ni le bourgeois, ni la brioche.

Le bourgeois, sentant que le gâteau risquait de se perdre, et ému de ce naufrage inutile, se livra à une agitation télégraphique qui finit par attirer l’attention des cygnes.

Ils aperçurent quelque chose qui surnageait, virèrent de bord comme des navires qu’ils sont, et se dirigèrent vers la brioche lentement, avec la majesté béate qui convient à des bêtes blanches.

— Les cygnes comprennent les signes, dit le bourgeois, heureux d’avoir de l’esprit.

En ce moment le tumulte lointain de la ville eut encore un grossissement subit. Cette fois, ce fut sinistre. Il y a des bouffées de vent qui parlent plus distinctement que d’autres. Celle qui soufflait en cet instant-là apporta nettement des roulements de tambour, des clameurs, des feux de peloton, et les répliques lugubres du tocsin et du canon. Ceci coïncida avec un nuage noir qui cacha brusquement le soleil.

Les cygnes n’étaient pas encore arrivés à la brioche.

— Rentrons, dit le père, on attaque les Tuileries. Il ressaisit la main de son fils. Puis il continua:

— Des Tuileries au Luxembourg, il n’y a que la distance qui sépare la royauté de la pairie; ce n’est pas loin. Les coups de fusil vont pleuvoir.

Il regarda le nuage.

— Et peut-être aussi la pluie elle-même va pleuvoir; le ciel s’en mêle; la branche cadette est condamnée. Rentrons vite.

— Je voudrais voir les cygnes manger la brioche, dit l’enfant.

Le père répondit:

— Ce serait une imprudence.

Et il emmena son petit bourgeois.

Le fils, regrettant les cygnes, tourna la tête vers le bassin jusqu’à ce qu’un coude des quinconces le lui eût caché.

Cependant, en même temps que les cygnes, les deux petits errants s’étaient approchés de la brioche. Elle flottait sur l’eau. Le plus petit regardait le gâteau, le plus grand regardait le bourgeois qui s’en allait.

Le père et le fils entrèrent dans le labyrinthe d’allées qui mène au grand escalier du massif d’arbres du côté de la rue Madame.

Dès qu’ils ne furent plus en vue, l’aîné se coucha vivement à plat ventre sur le rebord arrondi du bassin, et, s’y cramponnant de la main gauche, penché sur l’eau, presque prêt à y tomber, étendit avec sa main droite sa baguette vers le gâteau. Les cygnes, voyant l’ennemi, se hâtèrent, et en se hâtant firent un effet de poitrail utile au petit pêcheur; l’eau devant les cygnes reflua, et l’une de ces molles ondulations concentriques poussa doucement la brioche vers la baguette de l’enfant. Comme les cygnes arrivaient, la baguette toucha le gâteau. L’enfant donna un coup vif, ramena la brioche, effraya les cygnes, saisit le gâteau, et se redressa. Le gâteau était mouillé; mais ils avaient faim et soif. L’aîné fit deux parts de la brioche, une grosse et une petite, prit la petite pour lui, donna la grosse à son petit frère, et lui dit:

— Colle-toi ça dans le fusil.

Chapitre XVII

Mortuus pater filium moriturum expectat

Marius s’était élancé hors de la barricade. Combeferre l’avait suivi. Mais il était trop tard. Gavroche était mort. Combeferre rapporta le panier de cartouches Marius rapporta l’enfant.

Hélas! pensait-il, ce que le père avait fait pour son père, il le rendait au fils; seulement Thénardier avait rapporté son père vivant; lui, il rapportait l’enfant mort.

Quand Marius rentra dans la redoute avec Gavroche dans ses bras, il avait, comme l’enfant, le visage inondé de sang.

À l’instant où il s’était baissé pour ramasser Gavroche, une balle lui avait effleuré le crâne; il ne s’en était pas aperçu.

Courfeyrac défit sa cravate et en banda le front de Marius.

On déposa Gavroche sur la même table que Mabeuf, et l’on étendit sur les deux corps le châle noir. Il y en eut assez pour le vieillard et pour l’enfant.

Combeferre distribua les cartouches du panier qu’il avait rapporté.

Cela donnait à chaque homme quinze coups à tirer.

Jean Valjean était toujours à la même place, immobile sur sa borne. Quand Combeferre lui présenta ses quinze cartouches, il secoua la tête.

— Voilà un rare excentrique, dit Combeferre bas à Enjolras. Il trouve moyen de ne pas se battre dans cette barricade.

— Ce qui ne l’empêche pas de la défendre, répondit Enjolras.

— L’héroïsme a ses originaux, reprit Combeferre.

Et Courfeyrac, qui avait entendu, ajouta:

— C’est un autre genre que le père Mabeuf.

Chose qu’il faut noter, le feu qui battait la barricade en troublait à peine l’intérieur. Ceux qui n’ont jamais traversé le tourbillon de ces sortes de guerre, ne peuvent se faire aucune idée des singuliers moments de tranquillité mêlés à ces convulsions. On va et vient, on cause, on plaisante, on flâne. Quelqu’un que nous connaissons a entendu un combattant lui dire au milieu de la mitraille: Nous sommes ici comme à un déjeuner de garçons. La redoute de la rue de la Chanvrerie, nous le répétons, semblait au dedans fort calme. Toutes les péripéties et toutes les phases avaient été ou allaient être épuisées. La position, de critique, était devenue menaçante, et, de menaçante, allait probablement devenir désespérée. À mesure que la situation s’assombrissait, la lueur héroïque empourprait de plus en plus la barricade. Enjolras, grave, la dominait, dans l’attitude d’un jeune Spartiate dévouant son glaive nu au sombre génie Epidotas.

Combeferre, le tablier sur le ventre, pansait les blessés; Bossuet et Feuilly faisaient des cartouches avec la poire à poudre cueillie par Gavroche sur le caporal mort, et Bossuet disait à Feuilly: Nous allons bientôt prendre la diligence pour une autre planète; Courfeyrac, sur les quelques pavés qu’il s’était réservés près d’Enjolras, disposait et rangeait tout un arsenal, sa canne à épée, son fusil, deux pistolets d’arçon et un coup de poing, avec le soin d’une jeune fille qui met en ordre un petit dunkerque. Jean Valjean, muet, regardait le mur en face de lui. Un ouvrier s’assujettissait sur la tête avec une ficelle un large chapeau de paille de la mère Hucheloup, de peur des coups de soleil, disait-il. Les jeunes gens de la Cougourde d’Aix devisaient gaîment entre eux, comme s’ils avaient hâte de parler patois une dernière fois. Joly, qui avait décroché le miroir de la veuve Hucheloup, y examinait sa langue. Quelques combattants, ayant découvert des croûtes de pain, à peu près moisies, dans un tiroir, les mangeaient avidement. Marius était inquiet de ce que son père allait lui dire.

Chapitre XVIII

Le vautour devenu proie

Insistons sur un fait psychologique propre aux barricades. Rien de ce qui caractérise cette surprenante guerre des rues ne doit être omis.

Quelle que soit cette étrange tranquillité intérieure dont nous venons de parler, la barricade, pour ceux qui sont dedans, n’en reste pas moins vision.

Il y a de l’apocalypse dans la guerre civile, toutes les brumes de l’inconnu se mêlent à ces flamboiements farouches, les révolutions sont sphinx, et quiconque a traversé une barricade croit avoir traversé un songe.

Ce qu’on ressent dans ces lieux-là, nous l’avons indiqué à propos de Marius, et nous en verrons les conséquences, c’est plus et c’est moins que de la vie. Sorti d’une barricade, on ne sait plus ce qu’on y a vu. On a été terrible, on l’ignore. On a été entouré d’idées combattantes qui avaient des faces humaines; on a eu la tête dans de la lumière d’avenir. Il y avait des cadavres couchés et des fantômes debout. Les heures étaient colossales et semblaient des heures d’éternité. On a vécu dans la mort. Des ombres ont passé. Qu’était-ce? On a vu des mains où il y avait du sang; c’était un assourdissement épouvantable, c’était aussi un affreux silence; il y avait des bouches ouvertes qui criaient, et d’autres bouches ouvertes qui se taisaient; on était dans de la fumée, dans de la nuit peut-être. On croit avoir touché au suintement sinistre des profondeurs inconnues; on regarde quelque chose de rouge qu’on a dans les ongles. On ne se souvient plus.

Revenons à la rue de la Chanvrerie.

Tout à coup, entre deux décharges, on entendit le son lointain d’une heure qui sonnait.

— C’est midi, dit Combeferre.

Les douze coups n’étaient pas sonnés qu’Enjolras se dressait tout debout, et jetait du haut de la barricade cette clameur tonnante:

— Montez des pavés dans la maison. Garnissez-en le rebord de la fenêtre et des mansardes. La moitié des hommes aux fusils, l’autre moitié aux pavés. Pas une minute à perdre.

Un peloton de sapeurs-pompiers, la hache à l’épaule, venait d’apparaître en ordre de bataille à l’extrémité de la rue.

Ceci ne pouvait être qu’une tête de colonne; et de quelle colonne? de la colonne d’attaque évidemment; les sapeurs-pompiers chargés de démolir la barricade devant toujours précéder les soldats chargés de l’escalader.

On touchait évidemment à l’instant que M. de Clermont-Tonnerre, en 1822, appelait «le coup de collier».

L’ordre d’Enjolras fut exécuté avec la hâte correcte propre aux navires et aux barricades, les deux seuls lieux de combat d’où l’évasion soit impossible. En moins d’une minute, les deux tiers des pavés qu’Enjolras avait fait entasser à la porte de Corinthe furent montés au premier étage et au grenier, et, avant qu’une deuxième minute fût écoulée, ces pavés, artistement posés l’un sur l’autre, muraient jusqu’à moitié de la hauteur la fenêtre du premier et les lucarnes des mansardes. Quelques intervalles, ménagés soigneusement par Feuilly, principal constructeur, pouvaient laisser passer des canons de fusil. Cet armement des fenêtres put se faire d’autant plus facilement que la mitraille avait cessé. Les deux pièces tiraient maintenant à boulet sur le centre du barrage afin d’y faire une trouée, et, s’il était possible, une brèche, pour l’assaut.

Quand les pavés, destinés à la défense suprême, furent en place, Enjolras fit porter au premier étage les bouteilles qu’il avait placées sous la table où était Mabeuf.

— Qui donc boira cela? lui demanda Bossuet.

— Eux, répondit Enjolras.

Puis on barricada la fenêtre d’en bas, et l’on tint toutes prêtes les traverses de fer qui servaient à barrer intérieurement la nuit la porte du cabaret.

La forteresse était complète. La barricade était le rempart, le cabaret était le donjon.

Des pavés qui restaient, on boucha la coupure.

Comme les défenseurs d’une barricade sont toujours obligés de ménager les munitions, et que les assiégeants le savent, les assiégeants combinent leurs arrangements avec une sorte de loisir irritant, s’exposent avant l’heure au feu, mais en apparence plus qu’en réalité, et prennent leurs aises. Les apprêts d’attaque se font toujours avec une certaine lenteur méthodique; après quoi, la foudre.

Cette lenteur permit à Enjolras de tout revoir et de tout perfectionner. Il sentait que puisque de tels hommes allaient mourir, leur mort devait être un chef-d’œuvre.

Il dit à Marius: — Nous sommes les deux chefs. Je vais donner les derniers ordres au dedans. Toi, reste dehors et observe.

Marius se posta en observation sur la crête de la barricade.

Enjolras fit clouer la porte de la cuisine qui, on s'en souvient, était l'ambulance.

— Pas d'éclaboussures sur les blessés, dit-il.

Il donna ses dernières instructions dans la salle basse d'une voix brève, mais profondément tranquille; Feuilly écoutait et répondait au nom de tous.

— Au premier étage, tenez des haches prêtes pour couper l'escalier. Les a-t-on?

— Oui, dit Feuilly.

— Combien?

— Deux haches et un merlin.

— C'est bien. Nous sommes vingt-six combattants debout. Combien y a-t-il de fusils?

— Trente-quatre.

— Huit de trop. Tenez ces fusils chargés comme les autres, et sous la main. Aux ceintures les sabres et les pistolets. Vingt hommes à la barricade. Six embusqués aux mansardes et à la fenêtre du premier pour faire feu sur les assaillants à travers les meurtrières des pavés. Qu'il ne reste pas ici un seul travailleur inutile. Tout à l'heure, quand le tambour battra la charge, que les vingt d'en bas se précipitent à la barricade. Les premiers arrivés seront les mieux placés.

Ces dispositions faites, il se tourna vers Javert, et lui dit:

— Je ne t'oublie pas.

Et, posant sur la table un pistolet, il ajouta:

— Le dernier qui sortira d'ici cassera la tête à cet espion.

— Ici? demanda une voix.

— Non, ne mêlons pas ce cadavre aux nôtres. On peut enjamber la petite barricade sur la ruelle Mondétour. Elle n'a que quatre pieds de haut. L'homme est bien garrotté. On l'y mènera, et on l'y exécutera.

Quelqu'un, en ce moment-là, était plus impassible qu'Enjolras; c'était Javert.

Ici Jean Valjean apparut.

Il était confondu dans le groupe des insurgés. Il en sortit, et dit à Enjolras:

— Vous êtes le commandant?

— Oui.

— Vous m’avez remercié tout à l’heure.

— Au nom de la République. La barricade a deux sauveurs: Marius Pontmercy et vous.

— Pensez-vous que je mérite une récompense?

— Certes.

— Eh bien, j’en demande une.

— Laquelle?

— Brûler moi-même la cervelle à cet homme-là.

Javert leva la tête, vit Jean Valjean, eut un mouvement imperceptible, et dit:

— C’est juste.

Quant à Enjolras, il s’était mis à recharger sa carabine; il promena ses yeux autour de lui:

— Pas de réclamations?

Et il se tourna vers Jean Valjean:

— Prenez le mouchard.

Jean Valjean, en effet, prit possession de Javert en s’asseyant sur l’extrémité de la table. Il saisit le pistolet, et un faible cliquetis annonça qu’il venait de l’armer.

Presque au même instant, on entendit une sonnerie de clairons.

— Alerte! cria Marius du haut de la barricade.

Javert se mit à rire de ce rire sans bruit qui lui était propre, et, regardant fixement les insurgés, leur dit:

— Vous n’êtes guère mieux portants que moi.

— Tous dehors! cria Enjolras.

Les insurgés s’élancèrent en tumulte, et, en sortant, reçurent dans le dos, qu’on nous passe l’expression, cette parole de Javert:

— À tout à l’heure!

Chapitre XIX

Jean Valjean se venge

Quand Jean Valjean fut seul avec Javert, il défit la corde qui assujettissait le prisonnier par le milieu du corps, et dont le nœud était sous la table. Après quoi, il lui fit signe de se lever.

Javert obéit, avec cet indéfinissable sourire où se condense la suprématie de l’autorité enchaînée.

Jean Valjean prit Javert par la martingale comme on prendrait une bête de somme par la bricole, et, l’entraînant après lui, sortit du cabaret, lentement, car Javert, entravé aux jambes, ne pouvait faire que de très petits pas.

Jean Valjean avait le pistolet au poing.

Ils franchirent ainsi le trapèze intérieur de la barricade. Les insurgés, tout à l’attaque imminente, tournaient le dos.

Marius, seul, placé de côté à l’extrémité gauche du barrage, les vit passer. Ce groupe du patient et du bourreau s’éclaira de la lueur sépulcrale qu’il avait dans l’âme.

Jean Valjean fit escalader, avec quelque peine, à Javert garrotté, mais sans le lâcher un seul instant, le petit retranchement de la ruelle Mondétour.

Quand ils eurent enjambé ce barrage, ils se trouvèrent seuls tous les deux dans la ruelle. Personne ne les voyait plus. Le coude des maisons les cachait aux insurgés. Les cadavres retirés de la barricade faisaient un monceau terrible à quelques pas.

On distinguait dans le tas des morts une face livide, une chevelure dénouée, une main percée, et un sein de femme demi-nu. C’était Éponine.

Javert considéra obliquement cette morte, et, profondément calme, dit à demi-voix:

— Il me semble que je connais cette fille-là.

Puis il se tourna vers Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean mit le pistolet sous son bras, et fixa sur Javert un regard qui n’avait pas besoin de paroles pour dire: — Javert, c’est moi.

Javert répondit:

— Prends ta revanche.

Jean Valjean tira de son gousset un couteau, et l’ouvrit.

— Un surin! s'écria Javert. Tu as raison. Cela te convient mieux.

Jean Valjean coupa la martingale que Javert avait au cou, puis il coupa les cordes qu'il avait aux poignets, puis se baissant, il coupa la ficelle qu'il avait aux pieds et, se redressant, il lui dit:

— Vous êtes libre.

Javert n'était pas facile à étonner. Cependant, tout maître qu'il était de lui, il ne put se soustraire à une commotion. Il resta béant et immobile.

Jean Valjean poursuivit:

— Je ne crois pas que je sorte d'ici. Pourtant, si, par hasard, j'en sortais, je demeure, sous le nom de Fauchelevent, rue de l'Homme-Armé, numéro sept.

Javert eut un froncement de tige qui lui entrouvrit un coin de la bouche, et il murmura entre ses dents:

— Prends garde.

— Allez, dit Jean Valjean.

Javert reprit:

— Tu as dit Fauchelevent, rue de l'Homme-Armé?

— Numéro sept.

Javert répéta à demi-voix: — Numéro sept.

Il reboutonna sa redingote, remit de la roideur militaire entre ses deux épaules, fit demi-tour, croisa les bras en soutenant son menton dans une de ses mains, et se mit à marcher dans la direction des halles. Jean Valjean le suivait des yeux. Après quelques pas, Javert se retourna, et cria à Jean Valjean:

— Vous m'ennuyez. Tuez-moi plutôt.

Javert ne s'apercevait pas lui-même qu'il ne tutoyait plus Jean Valjean:

— Allez-vous-en, dit Jean Valjean.

Javert s'éloigna à pas lents. Un moment après, il tourna l'angle de la rue des Prêcheurs.

Quand Javert eut disparu, Jean Valjean déchargea le pistolet en l'air.

Puis il rentra dans la barricade et dit:

— C'est fait.

Cependant voici ce qui s'était passé:

Marius, plus occupé du dehors que du dedans, n'avait pas jusque-là regardé attentivement l'espion garrotté au fond obscur de la salle basse.

Quand il le vit au grand jour, enjambant la barricade pour aller mourir, il le reconnut. Un souvenir subit lui entra dans l'esprit. Il se rappela l'inspecteur de la rue de Pontoise, et les deux pistolets qu'il lui avait remis et dont il s'était servi lui Marius, dans cette barricade même; et non seulement il se rappela la figure, mais il se rappela le nom.

Ce souvenir pourtant était brumeux et trouble comme toutes ses idées. Ce ne fut pas une affirmation qu'il se fit, ce fut une question qu'il s'adressa: — Est-ce que ce n'est pas là cet inspecteur de police qui m'a dit s'appeler Javert?

Peut-être était-il encore temps d'intervenir pour cet homme? Mais il fallait d'abord savoir si c'était bien ce Javert.

Marius interpella Enjolras qui venait de se placer à l'autre bout de la barricade.

— Enjolras?

— Quoi?

— Comment s'appelle cet homme-là?

— Qui?

— L'agent de police. Sais-tu son nom?

— Sans doute. Il nous l'a dit.

— Comment s'appelle-t-il?

— Javert.

Marius se dressa.

En ce moment on entendit le coup de pistolet.

Jean Valjean reparut et cria: C'est fait.

Un froid sombre traversa le cœur de Marius.

Chapitre XX

Les morts ont raison et les vivants n’ont pas tort

L’agonie de la barricade allait commencer.

Tout concourait à la majesté tragique de cette minute suprême; mille fracas mystérieux dans l’air, le souffle des masses armées mises en mouvement dans des rues qu’on ne voyait pas, le galop intermittent de la cavalerie, le lourd ébranlement des artilleries en marche, les feux de peloton et les canonnades se croisant dans le dédale de Paris, les fumées de la bataille montant toutes dorées au-dessus des toits, on ne sait quels cris lointains vaguement terribles, des éclairs de menace partout, le tocsin de Saint-Merry qui maintenant avait l’accent du sanglot, la douceur de la saison, la splendeur du ciel plein de soleil et de nuages, la beauté du jour et l’épouvantable silence des maisons.

Car, depuis la veille, les deux rangées de maisons de la rue de la Chanvrerie étaient devenues deux murailles; murailles farouches. Portes fermées, fenêtres fermées, volets fermés.

Dans ces temps-là, si différents de ceux où nous sommes, quand l’heure était venue où le peuple voulait en finir avec une situation qui avait trop duré, avec une charte octroyée ou avec un pays légal, quand la colère universelle était diffuse dans l’atmosphère, quand la ville consentait au soulèvement de ses pavés, quand l’insurrection faisait sourire la bourgeoisie en lui chuchotant son mot d’ordre à l’oreille, alors l’habitant, pénétré d’émeute, pour ainsi dire, était l’auxiliaire du combattant, et la maison fraternisait avec la forteresse improvisée qui s’appuyait sur elle. Quand la situation n’était pas mûre, quand l’insurrection n’était décidément pas consentie, quand la masse désavouait le mouvement, c’en était fait des combattants, la ville se changeait en désert autour de la révolte, les âmes se glaçaient, les asiles se muraient, et la rue se faisait défilé pour aider l’armée à prendre la barricade.

On ne fait pas marcher un peuple par surprise plus vite qu’il ne veut. Malheur à qui tente de lui forcer la main! Un peuple ne se laisse pas faire. Alors il abandonne l’insurrection à elle-même. Les insurgés deviennent des pestiférés. Une maison est un escarpement, une porte est un refus, une façade est un mur. Ce mur voit, entend, et ne veut pas. Il pourrait s’entrouvrir et vous sauver. Non. Ce mur, c’est un juge. Il vous regarde et vous condamne. Quelle sombre chose que ces maisons fermées! Elles semblent mortes, elles sont vivantes. La vie, qui y est comme suspendue, y persiste. Personne n’en est sorti depuis vingt-quatre heures, mais personne n’y manque. Dans l’intérieur de cette roche, on va, on vient, on se couche, on se lève; on y est en famille; on y boit et on y mange; on y a peur, chose terrible! La peur excuse cette inhospitalité redoutable; elle y mêle l’effarement, circonstance atténuante. Quelquefois même, et cela s’est vu, la peur devient passion; l’effroi peut se changer en furie, comme la prudence en rage; de là ce mot si profond: Les enragés de modérés. Il y a des flamboiements d’épouvante suprême d’où sort, comme une fumée lugubre, la colère. — Que veulent ces gens-là? ils ne sont jamais contents. Ils compromettent les hommes paisibles. Comme si l’on n’avait pas assez de révolutions comme cela! Qu’est-ce qu’ils sont venus faire ici? Qu’ils s’en tirent. Tant pis pour eux. C’est leur faute. Ils n’ont que ce qu’ils méritent. Cela ne nous regarde pas. Voilà notre pauvre rue criblée de balles. C’est un tas de vauriens. Surtout n’ouvrez pas la porte. — Et la maison prend une figure de tombe. L’insurgé devant cette porte agonise; il voit arriver la mitraille et les sabres nus; s’il crie, il sait qu’on l’écoute, mais qu’on ne viendra pas; il y a là des murs qui pourraient le protéger, il y a là des hommes qui pourraient le sauver, et ces murs ont des oreilles de chair, et ces hommes ont des entrailles de pierre.

Qui accuser?

Personne, et tout le monde.

Les temps incomplets où nous vivons.

C’est toujours à ses risques et périls que l’utopie se transforme en insurrection, et se fait de protestation philosophique protestation armée, et de Minerve Pallas. L’utopie qui s’impatiente et devient émeute sait ce qui l’attend; presque toujours elle arrive trop tôt. Alors elle se résigne, et accepte stoïquement, au lieu du triomphe, la catastrophe. Elle sert, sans se plaindre, et en les disculpant même, ceux qui la renient, et sa magnanimité est de consentir à l’abandon. Elle est indomptable contre l’obstacle et douce envers l’ingratitude.

Est-ce l’ingratitude d’ailleurs?

Oui, au point de vue du genre humain.

Non, au point de vue de l’individu.

Le progrès est le mode de l’homme. La vie générale du genre humain s’appelle le Progrès; le pas collectif du genre humain s’appelle le Progrès. Le progrès marche; il fait le grand voyage humain et terrestre vers le céleste et le divin; il a ses haltes où il rallie le troupeau attardé; il a ses stations où il médite, en présence de quelque Chanaan splendide dévoilant tout à coup son horizon; il a ses nuits où il dort; et c’est une des poignantes anxiétés du penseur de voir l’ombre sur l’âme humaine et de tâter dans les ténèbres, sans pouvoir le réveiller, le progrès endormi.

— Dieu est peut-être mort, disait un jour à celui qui écrit ces lignes Gérard de Nerval, confondant le progrès avec Dieu, et prenant l’interruption du mouvement pour la mort de l’Être.

Qui désespère a tort. Le progrès se réveille infailliblement, et, en somme, on pourrait dire qu’il a marché même endormi, car il a grandi. Quand on le revoit debout, on le retrouve plus haut. Être toujours paisible, cela ne dépend pas plus du progrès que du fleuve; n’y élevez point de barrage, n’y jetez pas de rocher; l’obstacle fait écumer l’eau et bouillonner l’humanité. De là des troubles; mais après ces troubles, on reconnaît qu’il y a du chemin de fait. Jusqu’à ce que l’ordre, qui n’est autre chose que la paix universelle, soit établi, jusqu’à ce que l’harmonie et l’unité règnent, le progrès aura pour étapes les révolutions.

Qu’est-ce donc que le Progrès? Nous venons de le dire. La vie permanente des peuples.

Or, il arrive quelquefois que la vie momentanée des individus fait résistance à la vie éternelle du genre humain.

Avouons-le sans amertume, l’individu a son intérêt distinct, et peut sans forfaiture stipuler pour cet intérêt et le défendre; le présent a sa quantité excusable d’égoïsme; la vie momentanée a son droit, et n’est pas tenue de se sacrifier sans cesse à l’avenir. La génération qui a actuellement son tour de passage sur la terre n’est pas forcée de l’abréger pour les générations, ses égales après tout, qui auront leur tour plus tard. — J’existe, murmure ce quelqu’un qui se nomme Tous. Je suis jeune et je suis amoureux, je suis vieux et je veux me reposer, je suis père de famille, je travaille, je prospère, je fais de bonnes affaires, j’ai des maisons à louer, j’ai de l’argent sur l’État, je suis heureux, j’ai femme et enfants, j’aime tout cela, je désire vivre, laissez-moi tranquille. — De là, à de certaines heures, un froid profond sur les magnanimes avant-gardes du genre humain.

L’utopie d’ailleurs, convenons-en, sort de sa sphère radieuse en faisant la guerre. Elle, la vérité de demain, elle emprunte son procédé, la bataille, au mensonge d’hier. Elle, l’avenir, elle agit comme le passé. Elle, l’idée pure, elle devient voie de fait. Elle complique son héroïsme d’une violence dont il est juste qu’elle réponde; violence d’occasion et d’expédient, contraire aux principes, et dont elle est fatalement punie. L’utopie insurrection combat, le vieux code militaire au poing; elle fusille les espions, elle exécute les traîtres, elle supprime des êtres vivants et les jette dans les ténèbres inconnues. Elle se sert de la mort, chose grave. Il semble que l’utopie n’ait plus foi dans le rayonnement, sa force irrésistible et incorruptible. Elle frappe avec le glaive. Or, aucun glaive n’est simple. Toute épée a deux tranchants; qui blesse avec l’un se blesse à l’autre.

Cette réserve faite, et faite en toute sévérité, il nous est impossible de ne pas admirer, qu’ils réussissent ou non, les glorieux combattants de l’avenir, les confesseurs de l’utopie. Même quand ils avortent, ils sont vénérables, et c’est peut-être dans l’insuccès qu’ils ont plus de majesté. La victoire, quand elle est selon le progrès, mérite l’applaudissement des peuples; mais une défaite héroïque mérite leur attendrissement. L’une est magnifique, l’autre est sublime. Pour nous, qui préférons le martyre au succès, John Brown est plus grand que Washington, et Pisacane est plus grand que Garibaldi.

Il faut bien que quelqu’un soit pour les vaincus.

On est injuste pour ces grands essayeurs de l’avenir quand ils avortent.

On accuse les révolutionnaires de semer l’effroi. Toute barricade semble attentat. On incrimine leurs théories, on suspecte leur but, on redoute leur arrière-pensée, on dénonce leur conscience. On leur reproche d’élever, d’échafauder et d’entasser contre le fait social régnant un monceau de misères, de douleurs, d’iniquités, de griefs, de désespoirs, et d’arracher des bas-fonds des blocs de ténèbres pour s’y créneler et y combattre. On leur crie: Vous dépavez l’enfer! Ils pourraient répondre: C’est pour cela que notre barricade est faite de bonnes intentions.

Le mieux, certes, c’est la solution pacifique. En somme, convenons-en, lorsqu’on voit le pavé, on songe à l’ours, et c’est une bonne volonté dont la société s’inquiète. Mais il dépend de la société de se sauver elle-même; c’est à sa propre bonne volonté que nous faisons appel. Aucun remède violent n’est nécessaire. Étudier le mal à l’amiable, le constater, puis le guérir. C’est à cela que nous la convions.

Quoi qu’il en soit, même tombés, surtout tombés, ils sont augustes, ces hommes qui, sur tous les points de l’univers, l’œil fixé sur la France, luttent pour la grande œuvre avec la logique inflexible de l’idéal; ils donnent leur vie en pur don pour le progrès; ils accomplissent la volonté de la providence; ils font un acte religieux. À l’heure dite, avec autant de désintéressement qu’un acteur qui arrive à sa réplique, obéissant au scénario divin, ils entrent dans le tombeau. Et ce combat sans espérance, et cette disparition stoïque, ils l’acceptent pour amener à ses splendides et suprêmes conséquences universelles le magnifique mouvement humain irrésistiblement commencé le 14 juillet 1789. Ces soldats sont des prêtres. La Révolution française est un geste de Dieu.

Du reste il y a, et il convient d’ajouter cette distinction aux distinctions déjà indiquées dans un autre chapitre, il y a les insurrections acceptées qui s’appellent révolutions; il y a les révolutions refusées qui s’appellent émeutes. Une insurrection qui éclate, c’est une idée qui passe son examen devant le peuple. Si le peuple laisse tomber sa boule noire, l’idée est fruit sec, l’insurrection est échauffourée.

L’entrée en guerre à toute sommation et chaque fois que l’utopie le désire n’est pas le fait des peuples. Les nations n’ont pas toujours et à toute heure le tempérament des héros et des martyrs.

Elles sont positives. À priori, l’insurrection leur répugne; premièrement, parce qu’elle a souvent pour résultat une catastrophe, deuxièmement, parce qu’elle a toujours pour point de départ une abstraction.

Car, et ceci est beau, c’est toujours pour l’idéal, et pour l’idéal seul que se dévouent ceux qui se dévouent. Une insurrection est un enthousiasme. L’enthousiasme peut se mettre en colère; de là les prises d’armes. Mais toute insurrection qui couche en joue un gouvernement ou un régime vise plus haut. Ainsi, par exemple, insistons-y, ce que combattaient les chefs de l’insurrection de 1832, et en particulier les jeunes enthousiastes de la rue de la Chanvrerie, ce n’était pas précisément Louis-Philippe. La plupart, causant à cœur ouvert, rendaient justice aux qualités de ce roi mitoyen à la monarchie et à la révolution; aucun ne le haïssait. Mais ils attaquaient la branche cadette du droit divin dans Louis-Philippe comme ils en avaient attaqué la branche aînée dans Charles X; et ce qu’ils voulaient renverser en renversant la royauté en France, nous l’avons expliqué, c’était l’usurpation de l’homme sur l’homme et du privilège sur le droit dans l’univers entier. Paris sans roi a pour contre-coup le monde sans despotes. Ils raisonnaient de la sorte. Leur but était lointain sans doute, vague peut-être, et reculant devant l’effort; mais grand.

Cela est ainsi. Et l’on se sacrifie pour ces visions, qui, pour les sacrifiés, sont des illusions presque toujours, mais des illusions auxquelles, en somme, toute la certitude humaine est mêlée. L’insurgé poétise et dore l’insurrection. On se jette dans ces choses tragiques en se grisant de ce qu’on va faire. Qui sait? on réussira peut-être. On est le petit nombre; on a contre soi toute une armée; mais on défend le droit, la loi naturelle, la souveraineté de chacun sur soi-même qui n’a pas d’abdication possible, la justice, la vérité, et au besoin on mourra comme les trois cents Spartiates. On ne songe pas à Don Quichotte, mais à Léonidas. Et l’on va devant soi, et, une fois engagé, on ne recule plus, et l’on se précipite tête baissée, ayant pour espérance une victoire inouïe, la révolution complétée, le progrès remis en liberté, l’agrandissement du genre humain, la délivrance universelle; et pour pis aller les Thermopyles.

Ces passes d’armes pour le progrès échouent souvent, et nous venons de dire pourquoi. La foule est rétive à l’entraînement des paladins. Ces lourdes masses, les multitudes, fragiles à cause de leur pesanteur même, craignent les aventures; et il y a de l’aventure dans l’idéal.

D’ailleurs, qu’on ne l’oublie pas, les intérêts sont là, peu amis de l’idéal et du sentimental. Quelquefois l’estomac paralyse le cœur.

La grandeur et la beauté de la France, c’est qu’elle prend moins de ventre que les autres peuples; elle se noue plus aisément la corde aux reins. Elle est la première éveillée, la dernière endormie. Elle va en avant. Elle est chercheuse.

Cela tient à ce qu’elle est artiste.

L’idéal n’est autre chose que le point culminant de la logique, de même que le beau n’est autre chose que la cime du vrai. Les peuples artistes sont aussi les peuples conséquents. Aimer la beauté, c’est voir la lumière. C’est ce qui fait que le flambeau de l’Europe, c’est-à-dire de la civilisation, a été porté d’abord par la Grèce, qui l’a passé à l’Italie, qui l’a passé à la France. Divins peuples éclaireurs! Vitaï lampada tradunt.

Chose admirable, la poésie d’un peuple est l’élément de son progrès. La quantité de civilisation se mesure à la quantité d’imagination. Seulement un peuple civilisateur doit rester un peuple mâle. Corinthe, oui; Sybaris, non. Qui s’effémine s’abâtardit. Il ne faut être ni dilettante, ni virtuose; mais il faut être artiste. En matière de civilisation, il ne faut pas raffiner, mais il faut sublimer. À cette condition, on donne au genre humain le patron de l’idéal.

L’idéal moderne a son type dans l’art, et son moyen dans la science. C’est par la science qu’on réalisera cette vision auguste des poètes: le beau social. On refera l’Eden par A + B. Au point où la civilisation est parvenue, l’exact est un élément nécessaire du splendide, et le sentiment artiste est non seulement servi, mais complété par l’organe scientifique; le rêve doit calculer. L’art, qui est le conquérant, doit avoir pour point d’appui la science, qui est le marcheur. La solidité de la monture importe. L’esprit moderne, c’est le génie de la Grèce ayant pour véhicule le génie de l’Inde; Alexandre sur l’éléphant.

Les races pétrifiées dans le dogme ou démoralisées par le lucre sont impropres à la conduite de la civilisation. La génuflexion devant l’idole ou devant l’écu atrophie le muscle qui marche et la volonté qui va. L’absorption hiératique ou marchande amoindrit le rayonnement d’un peuple, abaisse son horizon en abaissant son niveau, et lui retire cette intelligence à la fois humaine et divine du but universel, qui fait les nations missionnaires. Babylone n’a pas d’idéal; Carthage n’a pas d’idéal. Athènes et Rome ont et gardent, même à travers toute l’épaisseur nocturne des siècles, des auréoles de civilisation.

La France est de la même qualité de peuple que la Grèce et l’Italie. Elle est athénienne par le beau et romaine par le grand. En outre, elle est bonne. Elle se donne. Elle est plus souvent que les autres peuples en humeur de dévouement et de sacrifice. Seulement, cette humeur la prend et la quitte. Et c’est là le grand péril pour ceux qui courent quand elle ne veut que marcher, ou qui marchent quand elle veut s’arrêter. La France a ses rechutes de matérialisme, et, à de certains instants, les idées qui obstruent ce cerveau sublime n’ont plus rien qui rappelle la grandeur française et sont de la dimension d’un Missouri et d’une Caroline du Sud. Qu’y faire? La géante joue la naine; l’immense France a ses fantaisies de petitesse. Voilà tout.

À cela rien à dire. Les peuples comme les astres ont le droit d’éclipse. Et tout est bien, pourvu que la lumière revienne et que l’éclipse ne dégénère pas en nuit. Aube et résurrection sont synonymes. La réapparition de la lumière est identique à la persistance du moi.

Constatons ces faits avec calme. La mort sur la barricade, ou la tombe dans l’exil, c’est pour le dévouement un en-cas acceptable. Le vrai nom du dévouement, c’est désintéressement. Que les abandonnés se laissent abandonner, que les exilés se laissent exiler, et bornons-nous à supplier les grands peuples de ne pas reculer trop loin quand ils reculent. Il ne faut pas, sous prétexte de retour à la raison, aller trop avant dans la descente.

La matière existe, la minute existe, les intérêts existent, le ventre existe; mais il ne faut pas que le ventre soit la seule sagesse. La vie momentanée a son droit, nous l'admettons, mais la vie permanente a le sien. Hélas! être monté, cela n'empêche pas de tomber. On voit ceci dans l'histoire plus souvent qu'on ne voudrait. Une nation est illustre; elle goûte à l'idéal, puis elle mord dans la fange, et elle trouve cela bon; et si on lui demande d'où vient qu'elle abandonne Socrate pour Falstaff, elle répond: C'est que j'aime les hommes d'état.

Un mot encore avant de rentrer dans la mêlée.

Une bataille comme celle que nous racontons en ce moment n'est autre chose qu'une convulsion vers l'idéal. Le progrès entravé est maladif, et il a de ces tragiques épilepsies. Cette maladie du progrès, la guerre civile, nous avons dû la rencontrer sur notre passage. C'est là une des phases fatales, à la fois acte et entr'acte, de ce drame dont le pivot est un damné social, et dont le titre véritable est: le Progrès.

Le Progrès!

Ce cri que nous jetons souvent est toute notre pensée; et, au point de ce drame où nous sommes, l'idée qu'il contient ayant encore plus d'une épreuve à subir, il nous est permis peut-être, sinon d'en soulever le voile, du moins d'en laisser transparaître nettement la lueur.

Le livre que le lecteur a sous les yeux en ce moment, c'est, d'un bout à l'autre, dans son ensemble et dans ses détails, quelles que soient les intermittences, les exceptions ou les défaillances, la marche du mal au bien, de l'injuste au juste, du faux au vrai, de la nuit au jour, de l'appétit à la conscience, de la pourriture à la vie, de la bestialité au devoir, de l'enfer au ciel, du néant à Dieu. Point de départ: la matière, point d'arrivée: l'âme. L'hydre au commencement, l'ange à la fin.

Chapitre XXI

Les héros

Tout à coup le tambour battit la charge.

L’attaque fut l’ouragan. La veille, dans l’obscurité, la barricade avait été approchée silencieusement comme par un boa. À présent, en plein jour, dans cette rue évasée, la surprise était décidément impossible, la vive force d’ailleurs s’était démasquée, le canon avait commencé le rugissement, l’armée se rua sur la barricade. La furie était maintenant l’habileté. Une puissante colonne d’infanterie de ligne, coupée à intervalles égaux de garde nationale et de garde municipale à pied, et appuyée sur des masses profondes qu’on entendait sans les voir, déboucha dans la rue au pas de course, tambour battant, clairon sonnant, bayonnettes croisées, sapeurs en tête, et, imperturbable sous les projectiles, arriva droit sur la barricade avec le poids d’une poutre d’airain sur un mur.

Le mur tint bon.

Les insurgés firent feu impétueusement. La barricade escaladée eut une crinière d’éclairs. L’assaut fut si forcené qu’elle fut un moment inondée d’assaillants; mais elle secoua les soldats ainsi que le lion les chiens, et elle ne se couvrit d’assiégeants que comme la falaise d’écume, pour reparaître l’instant d’après, escarpée, noire et formidable.

La colonne, forcée de se replier, resta massée dans la rue, à découvert, mais terrible, et riposta à la redoute par une mousqueterie effrayante. Quiconque a vu un feu d’artifice se rappelle cette gerbe faite d’un croisement de foudres qu’on appelle le bouquet. Qu’on se représente ce bouquet, non plus vertical, mais horizontal, portant une balle, une chevrotine ou un biscaïen à la pointe de chacun de ses jets de feu, et égrenant la mort dans ses grappes de tonnerres. La barricade était là-dessous.

Des deux parts résolution égale. La bravoure était là presque barbare et se compliquait d’une sorte de férocité héroïque qui commençait par le sacrifice de soi-même. C’était l’époque où un garde national se battait comme un zouave. La troupe voulait en finir; l’insurrection voulait lutter. L’acceptation de l’agonie en pleine jeunesse et en pleine santé fait de l’intrépidité une frénésie. Chacun dans cette mêlée avait le grandissement de l’heure suprême. La rue se jonchа de cadavres.

La barricade avait à l’une de ses extrémités Enjolras et à l’autre Marius. Enjolras, qui portait toute la barricade dans sa tête, se réservait et s’abritait; trois soldats tombèrent l’un après l’autre sous son créneau sans l’avoir même aperçu; Marius combattait à découvert. Il se faisait point de mire. Il sortait du sommet de la redoute plus qu’à mi-corps. Il n’y a pas de plus violent prodigue qu’un avare qui prend le mors aux dents; il n’y a pas d’homme plus effrayant dans l’action qu’un songeur. Marius était formidable et pensif. Il était dans la bataille comme dans un rêve. On eût dit un fantôme qui fait le coup de fusil.

Les cartouches des assiégés s’épuisaient; leurs sarcasmes non. Dans ce tourbillon du sépulcre où ils étaient, ils riaient.

Courfeyrac était nu-tête.

— Qu’est-ce que tu as donc fait de ton chapeau? lui demanda Bossuet.

Courfeyrac répondit:

— Ils ont fini par me l’emporter à coups de canon.

Ou bien ils disaient des choses hautaines.

— Comprend-on, s’écriait amèrement Feuilly, ces hommes — (et il citait les noms, des noms connus, célèbres même, quelques-uns de l’ancienne armée) — qui avaient promis de nous rejoindre et fait serment de nous aider, et qui s’y étaient engagés d’honneur, et qui sont nos généraux, et qui nous abandonnent!

Et Combeferre se bornait à répondre avec un grave sourire:

— Il y a des gens qui observent les règles de l’honneur comme on observe les étoiles, de très loin.

L’intérieur de la barricade était tellement semé de cartouches déchirées qu’on eût dit qu’il y avait neigé.

Les assaillants avaient le nombre; les insurgés avaient la position. Ils étaient au haut d’une muraille, et ils foudroyaient à bout portant les soldats trébuchant dans les morts et les blessés et empêtrés dans l’escarpement. Cette barricade, construite comme elle l’était et admirablement contre-butée, était vraiment une de ces situations où une poignée d’hommes tient en échec une légion. Cependant, toujours recrutée et grossissant sous la pluie de balles, la colonne d’attaque se rapprochait inexorablement, et maintenant, peu à peu, pas à pas, mais avec certitude, l’amenée serrait la barricade comme la vis le pressoir.

Les assauts se succédèrent. L’horreur alla grandissant.

Alors éclata, sur ce tas de pavés, dans cette rue de la Chanvrerie, une lutte digne d’une muraille de Troie. Ces hommes hâves, déguenillés, épuisés, qui n’avaient pas mangé depuis vingt-quatre heures, qui n’avaient pas dormi, qui n’avaient plus que quelques coups à tirer, qui tâtaient leurs poches vides de cartouches, presque tous blessés, la tête ou le bras bandé d’un linge rouillé et noirâtre, ayant dans leurs habits des trous d’où le sang coulait, à peine armés de mauvais fusils et de vieux sabres ébréchés, devinrent des Titans. La barricade fut dix fois abordée, assaillie, escaladée, et jamais prise.

Pour se faire une idée de cette lutte, il faudrait se figurer le feu mis à un tas de courages terribles, et qu’on regarde l’incendie. Ce n’était pas un combat, c’était le dedans d’une fournaise; les bouches y respiraient de la flamme; les visages y étaient extraordinaires, la forme humaine y semblait impossible, les combattants y flamboyaient, et c’était formidable de voir aller et venir dans cette fumée rouge ces salamandres de la mêlée. Les scènes successives et simultanées de cette tuerie grandiose, nous renonçons à les peindre. L’épopée seule a le droit de remplir douze mille vers avec une bataille.

On eût dit cet enfer du brahmanisme, le plus redoutable des dix-sept abîmes, que le Véda appelle la Forêt des Épées.

On se battait corps à corps, pied à pied, à coups de pistolet, à coups de sabre, à coups de poing, de loin, de près, d’en haut, d’en bas, de partout, des toits de la maison, des fenêtres du cabaret, des soupiraux des caves où quelques-uns s’étaient glissés. Ils étaient un contre soixante. La façade de Corinthe, à demi démolie, était hideuse. La fenêtre, tatouée de mitraille, avait perdu vitres et châssis, et n’était plus qu’un trou informe, tumultueusement bouché avec des pavés. Bossuet fut tué; Feuilly fut tué; Courfeyrac fut tué; Joly fut tué; Combeferre, traversé de trois coups de bayonnette dans la poitrine au moment où il relevait un soldat blessé, n’eut que le temps de regarder le ciel, et expira.

Marius, toujours combattant, était si criblé de blessures, particulièrement à la tête, que son visage disparaissait dans le sang et qu’on eût dit qu’il avait la face couverte d’un mouchoir rouge.

Enjolras seul n’était pas atteint. Quand il n’avait plus d’arme, il tendait la main à droite ou à gauche et un insurgé lui mettait une lame quelconque au poing. Il n’avait plus qu’un tronçon de quatre épées; une de plus que François Ier à Marignan.

Homère dit: «Diomède égorge Axyle, fils de Teuthranis, qui habitait l’heureuse Arisba; Euryale, fils de Mécistée, extermine Drésos, et Opheltios, Ésèpe, et ce Pédasus que la naïade Abarbarée conçut de l’irréprochable Boucolion; Ulysse renverse Pidyte de Percose; Antiloque, Ablère; Polypætès, Astyale; Polydamas, Otos de Cyllène, et Teucer, Arétaon. Méganthios meurt sous les coups de pique d’Euripyle. Agamemnon, roi des héros, terrasse Élatos né dans la ville escarpée que baigne le sonore fleuve Satnoïs.» Dans nos vieux poèmes de gestes, Esplandian attaque avec une bisaiguë de feu le marquis géant Swantibore, lequel se défend en lapidant le chevalier avec des tours qu’il déracine. Nos anciennes fresques murales nous montrent les deux ducs de Bretagne et de Bourbon, armés, armoriés et timbrés en guerre, à cheval, et s’abordant, la hache d’armes à la main, masqués de fer, bottés de fer, gantés de fer, l’un caparaçonné d’hermine, l’autre drapé d’azur; Bretagne avec son lion entre les deux cornes de sa couronne, Bourbon casqué d’une monstrueuse fleur de lys à visière. Mais pour être superbe, il n’est pas nécessaire de porter, comme Yvon, le morion ducal, d’avoir au poing, comme Esplandian, une flamme vivante, ou, comme Phylès, père de Polydamas, d’avoir rapporté d’Éphyre une bonne armure, présent du roi des hommes Euphète; il suffit de donner sa vie pour une conviction ou pour une loyauté. Ce petit soldat naïf, hier paysan de la Beauce ou du Limousin, qui rôde, le coupe-chou au côté, autour des bonnes d’enfants dans le Luxembourg, ce jeune étudiant pâle penché sur une pièce d’anatomie ou sur un livre, blond adolescent qui fait sa barbe avec des ciseaux, prenez-les tous les deux, soufflez-leur un souffle de devoir, mettez-les en face l’un de l’autre dans le carrefour Boucherat ou dans le cul-de-sac Planche-Mibray, et que l’un combatte pour son drapeau, et que l’autre combatte pour son idéal, et qu’ils s’imaginent tous les deux combattre pour la patrie; la lutte sera colossale; et l’ombre que feront, dans le grand champ épique où se débat l’humanité, ce pioupiou et ce carabin aux prises, égalera l’ombre que jette Mégaryon, roi de la Lycie pleine de tigres, étreignant corps à corps l’immense Ajax, égal aux dieux.

Chapitre XXII

Pied à pied

Quand il n'y eut plus de chefs vivants qu'Enjolras et Marius aux deux extrémités de la barricade, le centre, qu'avaient si longtemps soutenu Courfeyrac, Joly, Bossuet, Feuilly et Combeferre, plia. Le canon, sans faire de brèche praticable, avait assez largement échancré le milieu de la redoute; là, le sommet de la muraille avait disparu sous le boulet, et s'était écroulé; et les débris, qui étaient tombés, tantôt à l'intérieur, tantôt à l'extérieur, avaient fini, en s'amoncelant, par faire, des deux côtés du barrage, deux espèces de talus, l'un au dedans, l'autre au dehors. Le talus extérieur offrait à l'abordage un plan incliné.

Un suprême assaut y fut tenté et cet assaut réussit. La masse hérissée de bayonnettes et lancée au pas gymnastique arriva irrésistible, et l'épais front de bataille de la colonne d'attaque apparut dans la fumée au haut de l'escarpement. Cette fois c'était fini. Le groupe d'insurgés qui défendait le centre recula pêle-mêle.

Alors le sombre amour de la vie se réveilla chez quelques-uns. Couchés en joue par cette forêt de fusils, plusieurs ne voulurent plus mourir. C'est là une minute où l'instinct de la conservation pousse des hurlements et où la bête reparaît dans l'homme. Ils étaient acculés à la haute maison à six étages qui faisait le fond de la redoute. Cette maison pouvait être le salut. Cette maison était barricadée et comme murée du haut en bas. Avant que la troupe de ligne fût dans l'intérieur de la redoute, une porte avait le temps de s'ouvrir et de se fermer, la durée d'un éclair suffisait pour cela, et la porte de cette maison, entre-bâillée brusquement et refermée tout de suite, pour ces désespérés c'était la vie. En arrière de cette maison, il y avait les rues, la fuite possible, l'espace. Ils se mirent à frapper contre cette porte à coups de crosse et à coups de pied, appelant, criant, suppliant, joignant les mains. Personne n'ouvrit. De la lucarne du troisième étage, la tête morte les regardait.

Mais Enjolras et Marius, et sept ou huit ralliés autour d'eux, s'étaient élancés et les protégeaient. Enjolras avait crié aux soldats: N'avancez pas! et un officier n'ayant pas obéi, Enjolras avait tué l'officier. Il était maintenant dans la petite cour intérieure de la redoute, adossé à la maison de Corinthe, l’épée d’une main, la carabine de l’autre, tenant ouverte la porte du cabaret qu’il barrait aux assaillants. Il cria aux désespérés: — il n’y a qu’une porte ouverte. Celle-ci. — Et, les couvrant de son corps, faisant à lui seul face à un bataillon, il les fit passer derrière lui. Tous s’y précipitèrent. Enjolras, exécutant avec sa carabine, dont il se servait maintenant comme d’une canne, ce que les bâtonnistes appellent la rose couverte, rabattit les bayonnettes autour de lui et devant lui, et entra le dernier; et il y eut un instant horrible, les soldats voulant pénétrer, les insurgés voulant fermer. La porte fut close avec une telle violence qu’en se remboîtant dans son cadre, elle laissa voir coupés et collés à son chambranle les cinq doigts d’un soldat qui s’y était cramponné.

Marius était resté dehors. Un coup de feu venait de lui casser la clavicule; il sentit qu’il s’évanouissait et qu’il tombait. En ce moment, les yeux déjà fermés, il eut la commotion d’une main vigoureuse qui le saisissait, et son évanouissement, dans lequel il se perdit, lui laissa à peine le temps de cette pensée mêlée au suprême souvenir de Cosette: — Je suis fait prisonnier. Je serai fusillé.

Enjolras, ne voyant pas Marius parmi les réfugiés du cabaret, eut la même idée. Mais ils étaient à cet instant où chacun n’a que le temps de songer à sa propre mort. Enjolras assujettit la barre de la porte, et la verrouilla, et en ferma à double tour la serrure et le cadenas, pendant qu’on la battait furieusement au dehors, les soldats à coups de crosse, les sapeurs à coups de hache. Les assaillants s’étaient groupés sur cette porte. C’était maintenant le siège du cabaret qui commençait.

Les soldats, disons-le, étaient pleins de colère.

La mort du sergent d’artillerie les avait irrités, et puis, chose plus funeste, pendant les quelques heures qui avaient précédé l’attaque, il s’était dit parmi eux que les insurgés mutilaient les prisonniers, et qu’il y avait dans le cabaret le cadavre d’un soldat sans tête. Ce genre de rumeurs fatales est l’accompagnement ordinaire des guerres civiles, et ce fut un faux bruit de cette espèce qui causa plus tard la catastrophe de la rue Transnonain.

Quand la porte fut barricadée, Enjolras dit aux autres:

— Vendons-nous cher.

Puis il s’approcha de la table où étaient étendus Mabeuf et Gavroche. On voyait sous le drap noir deux formes droites et rigides, l’une grande, l’autre petite, et les deux visages se dessinaient vaguement sous les plis froids du suaire. Une main sortait de dessous le linceul et pendait vers la terre. C’était celle du vieillard.

Enjolras se pencha et baisa cette main vénérable, de même que la veille il avait baisé le front.

C’étaient les deux seuls baisers qu’il eût donnés dans sa vie.

Abrégeons. La barricade avait lutté comme une porte de Thèbes, le cabaret lutta comme une maison de Saragosse. Ces résistances-là sont bourrues. Pas de quartier. Pas de parlementaire possible. On veut mourir pourvu qu’on tue. Quand Suchet dit: — Capitulez, Palafox répond: «Après la guerre au canon, la guerre au couteau.» Rien ne manqua à la prise d’assaut du cabaret Hucheloup; ni les pavés pleuvant de la fenêtre et du toit sur les assiégeants et exaspérant les soldats par d’horribles écrasements, ni les coups de feu des caves et des mansardes, ni la fureur de l’attaque, ni la rage de la défense, ni enfin, quand la porte céda, les démences frénétiques de l’extermination. Les assaillants, en se ruant dans le cabaret, les pieds embarrassés dans les panneaux de la porte enfoncée et jetée à terre, n’y trouvèrent pas un combattant. L’escalier en spirale, coupé à coups de hache, gisait au milieu de la salle basse, quelques blessés achevaient d’expirer, tout ce qui n’était pas tué était au premier étage, et là, par le trou du plafond, qui avait été l’entrée de l’escalier, un feu terrifiant éclata. C’étaient les dernières cartouches. Quand elles furent brûlées, quand ces agonisants redoutables n’eurent plus ni poudre ni balles, chacun prit à la main deux de ces bouteilles réservées par Enjolras et dont nous avons parlé, et ils tinrent tête à l’escalade avec ces massues effroyablement fragiles. C’étaient des bouteilles d’eau-forte. Nous disons telles qu’elles sont ces choses sombres du carnage. L’assiégé, hélas, fait arme de tout. Le feu grégeois n’a pas déshonoré Archimède; la poix bouillante n’a pas déshonoré Bayard. Toute la guerre est de l’épouvante, et il n’y a rien à y choisir. La mousqueterie des assiégeants, quoique gênée et de bas en haut, était meurtrière. Le rebord du trou du plafond fut bientôt entouré de têtes mortes d’où ruisselaient de longs fils rouges et fumants. Le fracas était inexprimable; une fumée enfermée et brûlante faisait presque la nuit sur ce combat. Les mots manquent pour dire l’horreur arrivée à ce degré. Il n’y avait plus d’hommes dans cette lutte maintenant infernale. Ce n’étaient plus des géants contre des colosses. Cela ressemblait plus à Milton et à Dante qu’à Homère. Des démons attaquaient, des spectres résistaient.

C’était l’héroïsme monstre.

Chapitre XXIII

Oreste à jeun et Pylade ivre

Enfin, se faisant la courte échelle, s'aidant du squelette de l'escalier, grimpant aux murs, s'accrochant au plafond, écharpant, au bord de la trappe même, les derniers qui résistaient, une vingtaine d'assiégeants, soldats, gardes nationaux, gardes municipaux, pêle-mêle, la plupart défigurés par des blessures au visage dans cette ascension redoutable, aveuglés par le sang, furieux, devenus sauvages, firent irruption dans la salle du premier étage. Il n'y avait plus là qu'un seul qui fût debout, Enjolras. Sans cartouches, sans épée, il n'avait plus à la main que le canon de sa carabine dont il avait brisé la crosse sur la tête de ceux qui entraient. Il avait mis le billard entre les assaillants et lui; il avait reculé à l'angle de la salle, et là, l'œil fier, la tête haute, ce tronçon d'arme au poing, il était encore assez inquiétant pour que le vide se fût fait autour de lui. Un cri s'éleva:

— C'est le chef. C'est lui qui a tué l'artilleur. Puisqu'il s'est mis là, il y est bien. Qu'il y reste. Fusillons-le sur place.

— Fusillez-moi, dit Enjolras.

Et, jetant le tronçon de sa carabine, et croisant les bras, il présenta sa poitrine.

L'audace de bien mourir émeut toujours les hommes. Dès qu'Enjolras eut croisé les bras, acceptant la fin, l'assourdissement de la lutte cessa dans la salle, et ce chaos s'apaisa subitement dans une sorte de solennité sépulcrale. Il semblait que la majesté menaçante d'Enjolras désarmé et immobile pesât sur ce tumulte, et que, rien que par l'autorité de son regard tranquille, ce jeune homme, qui seul n'avait pas une blessure, superbe, sanglant, charmant, indifférent comme un invulnérable, contraignît cette cohue sinistre à le tuer avec respect. Sa beauté, en ce moment-là augmentée de sa fierté, était un resplendissement, et, comme s'il ne pouvait pas plus être fatigué que blessé, après les effrayantes vingt-quatre heures qui venaient de s'écouler, il était vermeil et rose. C'était de lui peut-être que parlait le témoin qui disait plus tard devant le conseil de guerre: «Il y avait un insurgé que j'ai entendu nommer Apollon.» Un garde national qui visait Enjolras abaissa son arme en disant: «Il me semble que je vais fusiller une fleur.»

Douze hommes se formèrent en peloton à l'angle opposé à Enjolras, et apprêtèrent leurs fusils en silence.

Puis un sergent cria: — Joue.

Un officier intervint.

— Attendez.

Et s'adressant à Enjolras:

— Voulez-vous qu'on vous bande les yeux?

— Non.

— Est-ce bien vous qui avez tué le sergent d'artillerie?

— Oui.

Depuis quelques instants Grantaire s'était réveillé.

Grantaire, on s'en souvient, dormait depuis la veille dans la salle haute du cabaret, assis sur une chaise, affaissé sur une table.

Il réalisait, dans toute son énergie, la vieille métaphore: ivre mort. Le hideux philtre absinthe-stout-alcool l'avait jeté en léthargie. Sa table étant petite et ne pouvant servir à la barricade, on la lui avait laissée. Il était toujours dans la même posture, la poitrine pliée sur la table, la tête appuyée à plat sur les bras, entouré de verres, de chopes et de bouteilles. Il dormait de cet écrasant sommeil de l'ours engourdi et de la sangsue repue. Rien n'y avait fait, ni la fusillade, ni les boulets, ni la mitraille qui pénétrait par la croisée dans la salle où il était, ni le prodigieux vacarme de l'assaut. Seulement, il répondait quelquefois au canon par un ronflement. Il semblait attendre là qu'une balle vînt lui épargner la peine de se réveiller. Plusieurs cadavres gisaient autour de lui; et, au premier coup d'œil, rien ne le distinguait de ces dormeurs profonds de la mort.

Le bruit n'éveille pas un ivrogne, le silence le réveille. Cette singularité a été plus d'une fois observée. La chute de tout, autour de lui, augmentait l'anéantissement de Grantaire; l'écroulement le berçait. — L'espèce de halte que fit le tumulte devant Enjolras fut une secousse pour ce pesant sommeil. C'est l'effet d'une voiture au galop qui s'arrête court. Les assoupis s'y réveillent. Grantaire se dressa en sursaut, étendit les bras, se frotta les yeux, regarda, bâilla, et comprit.

L'ivresse qui finit ressemble à un rideau qui se déchire. On voit, en bloc et d'un seul coup d'œil, tout ce qu'elle cachait. Tout s'offre subitement à la mémoire; et l'ivrogne qui ne sait rien de ce qui s'est passé depuis vingt-quatre heures, n'a pas achevé d'ouvrir les paupières, qu'il est au fait. Les idées lui reviennent avec une lucidité brusque; l'effacement de l'ivresse, sorte de buée qui aveuglait le cerveau, se dissipe, et fait place à la claire et nette obsession des réalités.

Relégué qu'il était dans son coin et comme abrité derrière le billard, les soldats, l'œil fixé sur Enjolras, n'avaient pas même aperçu Grantaire, et le sergent se préparait à répéter l'ordre: En joue! quand tout à coup ils entendirent une voix forte crier à côté d'eux:

— Vive la République! J'en suis.

Grantaire s'était levé.

L'immense lueur de tout le combat qu'il avait manqué, et dont il n'avait pas été, apparut dans le regard éclatant de l'ivrogne transfiguré.

Il répéta: Vive la République! traversa la salle d'un pas ferme, et alla se placer devant les fusils debout près d'Enjolras.

— Faites-en deux d'un coup, dit-il.

Et, se tournant vers Enjolras avec douceur, il lui dit:

— Permets-tu?

Enjolras lui serra la main en souriant.

Ce sourire n'était pas achevé que la détonation éclata.

Enjolras, traversé de huit coups de feu, resta adossé au mur comme si les balles l'y eussent cloué. Seulement il pencha la tête.

Grantaire, foudroyé, s'abattit à ses pieds.

Quelques instants après, les soldats délogeaient les derniers insurgés réfugiés au haut de la maison. Ils tiraillaient à travers un treillis de bois dans le grenier. On se battait dans les combles. On jetait des corps par les fenêtres, quelques-uns vivants. Deux voltigeurs, qui essayaient de relever l'omnibus fracassé, étaient tués de deux coups de carabine tirés des mansardes. Un homme en blouse en était précipité, un coup de bayonnette dans le ventre, et râlait à terre. Un soldat et un insurgé glissaient ensemble sur le talus de tuiles du toit, et ne voulaient pas se lâcher, et tombaient, se tenant embrassés d'un embrassement féroce. Lutte pareille dans la cave. Cris, coups de feu, piétinement farouche. Puis le silence. La barricade était prise.

Les soldats commencèrent la fouille des maisons d'alentour et la poursuite des fuyards.

Chapitre XXIV

Prisonnier

Marius était prisonnier en effet. Prisonnier de Jean Valjean.

La main qui l’avait étreint par derrière au moment où il tombait, et dont, en perdant connaissance, il avait senti le saisissement, était celle de Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean n’avait pris au combat d’autre part que de s’y exposer. Sans lui, à cette phase suprême de l’agonie, personne n’eût songé aux blessés. Grâce à lui, partout présent dans le carnage comme une providence, ceux qui tombaient étaient relevés, transportés dans la salle basse, et pansés. Dans les intervalles, il réparait la barricade. Mais rien qui pût ressembler à un coup, à une attaque, ou même à une défense personnelle, ne sortit de ses mains. Il se taisait et secourait. Du reste, il avait à peine quelques égratignures. Les balles n’avaient pas voulu de lui. Si le suicide faisait partie de ce qu’il avait rêvé en venant dans ce sépulcre, de ce côté-là il n’avait point réussi. Mais nous doutons qu’il eût songé au suicide, acte irréligieux.

Jean Valjean, dans la nuée épaisse du combat, n’avait pas l’air de voir Marius; le fait est qu’il ne le quittait pas des yeux. Quand un coup de feu renversa Marius, Jean Valjean bondit avec une agilité de tigre, s’abattit sur lui comme sur une proie, et l’emporta.

Le tourbillon de l’attaque était en cet instant-là si violemment concentré sur Enjolras et sur la porte du cabaret que personne ne vit Jean Valjean, soutenant dans ses bras Marius évanoui, traverser le champ dépavé de la barricade et disparaître derrière l’angle de la maison de Corinthe.

On se rappelle cet angle qui faisait une sorte de cap dans la rue; il garantissait des balles et de la mitraille, et des regards aussi, quelques pieds carrés de terrain. Il y a ainsi parfois dans les incendies une chambre qui ne brûle point, et dans les mers les plus furieuses, en deçà d’un promontoire ou au fond d’un cul-de-sac d’écueils, un petit coin tranquille. C’était dans cette espèce de repli du trapèze intérieur de la barricade qu’Éponine avait agonisé.

Là Jean Valjean s’arrêta, il laissa glisser à terre Marius, s’adossa au mur et jeta les yeux autour de lui.

La situation était épouvantable.

Pour l’instant, pour deux ou trois minutes peut-être, ce pan de muraille était un abri; mais comment sortir de ce massacre? Il se rappelait l’angoisse où il s’était trouvé rue Polonceau, huit ans auparavant, et de quelle façon il était parvenu à s’échapper; c’était difficile alors, aujourd’hui c’était impossible. Il avait devant lui cette implacable et sourde maison à six étages qui ne semblait habitée que par l’homme mort penché à sa fenêtre; il avait à sa droite la barricade assez basse qui fermait la Petite-Truanderie; enjamber cet obstacle paraissait facile, mais on voyait au-dessus de la crête du barrage une rangée de pointes de bayonnettes. C’était la troupe de ligne, postée au delà de cette barricade, et aux aguets. Il était évident que franchir la barricade c’était aller chercher un feu de peloton, et que toute tête qui se risquerait à dépasser le haut de la muraille de pavés servirait de cible à soixante coups de fusil. Il avait à sa gauche le champ du combat. La mort était derrière l’angle du mur.

Que faire?

Un oiseau seul eût pu se tirer de là.

Et il fallait se décider sur-le-champ, trouver un expédient, prendre un parti. On se battait à quelques pas de lui; par bonheur tous s’acharnaient sur un point unique, sur la porte du cabaret; mais qu’un soldat, un seul, eût l’idée de tourner la maison, ou de l’attaquer en flanc, tout était fini.

Jean Valjean regarda la maison en face de lui, il regarda la barricade à côté de lui, puis il regarda la terre, avec la violence de l’extrémité suprême, éperdu, et comme s’il eût voulu y faire un trou avec ses yeux.

À force de regarder, on ne sait quoi de vaguement saisissable dans une telle agonie se dessina et prit forme à ses pieds, comme si c’était une puissance du regard de faire éclore la chose demandée. Il aperçut à quelques pas de lui, au bas du petit barrage si impitoyablement gardé et guetté au dehors, sous un écroulement de pavés qui la cachait en partie, une grille de fer posée à plat et de niveau avec le sol. Cette grille, faite de forts barreaux transversaux, avait environ deux pieds carrés. L’encadrement de pavés qui la maintenait avait été arraché, et elle était comme descellée. À travers les barreaux on entrevoyait une ouverture obscure, quelque chose de pareil au conduit d’une cheminée ou au cylindre d’une citerne. Jean Valjean s’élança. Sa vieille science des évasions lui monta au cerveau comme une clarté. Écarter les pavés, soulever la grille, charger sur ses épaules Marius inerte comme un corps mort, descendre, avec ce fardeau sur les reins, en s’aidant des coudes et des genoux, dans cette espèce de puits heureusement peu profond, laisser retomber au-dessus de sa tête la lourde trappe de fer sur laquelle les pavés ébranlés croulèrent de nouveau, prendre pied sur une surface dallée à trois mètres au-dessous du sol, cela fut exécuté comme ce qu’on fait dans le délire, avec une force de géant et une rapidité d’aigle; cela dura quelques minutes à peine.

Jean Valjean se trouva, avec Marius toujours évanoui, dans une sorte de long corridor souterrain.

Là, paix profonde, silence absolu, nuit.

L’impression qu’il avait autrefois éprouvée en tombant de la rue dans le couvent, lui revint. Seulement, ce qu’il emportait aujourd’hui, ce n’était plus Cosette; c’était Marius.

C’est à peine maintenant s’il entendait au-dessus de lui, comme un vague murmure, le formidable tumulte du cabaret pris d’assaut.

Livre deuxième — L’intestin de Léviathan

Chapitre I

La terre appauvrie par la mer

Paris jette par an vingt-cinq millions à l’eau. Et ceci sans métaphore. Comment, et de quelle façon? jour et nuit. Dans quel but? sans aucun but. Avec quelle pensée? sans y penser. Pourquoi faire? pour rien. Au moyen de quel organe? au moyen de son intestin. Quel est son intestin? c’est son égout.

Vingt-cinq millions, c’est le plus modéré des chiffres approximatifs que donnent les évaluations de la science spéciale.

La science, après avoir longtemps tâtonné, sait aujourd’hui que le plus fécondant et le plus efficace des engrais, c’est l’engrais humain. Les Chinois, disons-le à notre honte, le savaient avant nous. Pas un paysan chinois, c’est Eckeberg qui le dit, ne va à la ville sans rapporter, aux deux extrémités de son bambou, deux seaux pleins de ce que nous nommons immondices. Grâce à l’engrais humain, la terre en Chine est encore aussi jeune qu’au temps d’Abraham. Le froment chinois rend jusqu’à cent vingt fois la semence. Il n’est aucun guano comparable en fertilité au détritus d’une capitale. Une grande ville est le plus puissant des stercoraires. Employer la ville à fumer la plaine, ce serait une réussite certaine. Si notre or est fumier, en revanche, notre fumier est or.

Que fait-on de cet or fumier? On le balaye à l’abîme.

On expédie à grands frais des convois de navires afin de récolter au pôle austral la fiente des pétrels et des pingouins, et l’incalculable élément d’opulence qu’on a sous la main, on l’envoie à la mer. Tout l’engrais humain et animal que le monde perd, rendu à la terre au lieu d’être jeté à l’eau, suffirait à nourrir le monde.

Ces tas d’ordures du coin des bornes, ces tombereaux de boue cahotés la nuit dans les rues, ces affreux tonneaux de la voirie, ces fétides écoulements de fange souterraine que le pavé vous cache, savez-vous ce que c’est? C’est de la prairie en fleur, c’est de l’herbe verte, c’est du serpolet et du thym et de la sauge, c’est du gibier, c’est du bétail, c’est le mugissement satisfait des grands bœufs le soir, c’est du foin parfumé, c’est du blé doré, c’est du pain sur votre table, c’est du sang chaud dans vos veines, c’est de la santé, c'est de la joie, c'est de la vie. Ainsi le veut cette création mystérieuse qui est la transformation sur la terre et la transfiguration dans le ciel.

Rendez cela au grand creuset; votre abondance en sortira. La nutrition des plaines fait la nourriture des hommes.

Vous êtes maîtres de perdre cette richesse, et de me trouver ridicule par-dessus le marché. Ce sera là le chef-d'œuvre de votre ignorance.

La statistique a calculé que la France à elle seule fait tous les ans à l'Atlantique par la bouche de ses rivières un versement d'un demi-milliard. Notez ceci: avec ces cinq cents millions on payerait le quart des dépenses du budget. L'habileté de l'homme est telle qu'il aime mieux se débarrasser de ces cinq cents millions dans le ruisseau. C'est la substance même du peuple qu'emportent, ici goutte à goutte, là à flots, le misérable vomissement de nos égouts dans les fleuves et le gigantesque vomissement de nos fleuves dans l'océan. Chaque hoquet de nos cloaques nous coûte mille francs. À cela deux résultats: la terre appauvrie et l'eau empestée. La faim sortant du sillon et la maladie sortant du fleuve.

Il est notoire, par exemple, qu'à cette heure, la Tamise empoisonne Londres.

Pour ce qui est de Paris, on a dû, dans ces derniers temps, transporter la plupart des embouchures d'égouts en aval au-dessous du dernier pont.

Un double appareil tubulaire, pourvu de soupapes et d'écluses de chasse, aspirant et refoulant, un système de drainage élémentaire, simple comme le poumon de l'homme, et qui est déjà en pleine fonction dans plusieurs communes d'Angleterre, suffirait pour amener dans nos villes l'eau pure des champs et pour renvoyer dans nos champs l'eau riche des villes, et ce facile va-et-vient, le plus simple du monde, retiendrait chez nous les cinq cents millions jetés dehors. On pense à autre chose.

Le procédé actuel fait le mal en voulant faire le bien. L'intention est bonne, le résultat est triste. On croit expurger la ville, on étiole la population. Un égout est un malentendu. Quand partout le drainage, avec sa fonction double, restituant ce qu'il prend, aura remplacé l'égout, simple lavage appauvrissant, alors, ceci étant combiné avec les données d'une économie sociale nouvelle, le produit de la terre sera décuplé, et le problème de la misère sera singulièrement atténué. Ajoutez la suppression des parasitismes, il sera résolu.

En attendant, la richesse publique s'en va à la rivière, et le coulage a lieu. Coulage est le mot. L'Europe se ruine de la sorte par épuisement.

Quant à la France, nous venons de dire son chiffre. Or, Paris contenant le vingt-cinquième de la population française totale, et le guano parisien étant le plus riche de tous, on reste au-dessous de la vérité en évaluant à vingt-cinq millions la part de perte de Paris dans le demi-milliard que la France refuse annuellement. Ces vingt-cinq millions, employés en assistance et en jouissance, doubleraient la splendeur de Paris. La ville les dépense en cloaques. De sorte qu'on peut dire que la grande prodigalité de Paris, sa fête merveilleuse, sa Folie-Beaujon, son orgie, son ruissellement d'or à pleines mains, son faste, son luxe, sa magnificence, c'est son égout.

C'est de cette façon que, dans la cécité d'une mauvaise économie politique, on noie et on laisse aller à vau-l'eau et se perdre dans les gouffres le bien-être de tous. Il devrait y avoir des filets de Saint-Cloud pour la fortune publique.

Économiquement, le fait peut se résumer ainsi: Paris panier percé.

Paris, cette cité modèle, ce patron des capitales bien faites dont chaque peuple tâche d'avoir une copie, cette métropole de l'idéal, cette patrie auguste de l'initiative, de l'impulsion et de l'essai, ce centre et ce lieu des esprits, cette ville nation, cette ruche de l'avenir, ce composé merveilleux de Babylone et de Corinthe, ferait, au point de vue que nous venons de signaler, hausser les épaules à un paysan du Fo-Kian.

Imitez Paris, vous vous ruinerez.

Au reste, particulièrement en ce gaspillage immémorial et insensé, Paris lui-même imite.

Ces surprenantes inepties ne sont pas nouvelles; ce n'est point là de la sottise jeune. Les anciens agissaient comme les modernes. «Les cloaques de Rome, dit Liebig, ont absorbé tout le bien-être du paysan romain.» Quand la campagne de Rome fut ruinée par l'égout romain, Rome épuisa l'Italie, et quand elle eut mis l'Italie dans son cloaque, elle y versa la Sicile, puis la Sardaigne, puis l'Afrique. L'égout de Rome a engouffré le monde. Ce cloaque offrait son engloutissement à la cité et à l'univers. Urbi et orbi. Ville éternelle, égout insondable.

Pour ces choses-là comme pour d'autres, Rome donne l'exemple.

Cet exemple, Paris le suit, avec toute la bêtise propre aux villes d'esprit.

Pour les besoins de l'opération sur laquelle nous venons de nous expliquer, Paris a sous lui un autre Paris; un Paris d'égouts; lequel a ses rues, ses carrefours, ses places, ses impasses, ses artères, et sa circulation, qui est de la fange, avec la forme humaine de moins.

Car il ne faut rien flatter, pas même un grand peuple; là où il y a tout, il y a l'ignominie à côté de la sublimité; et, si Paris contient Athènes, la ville de lumière, Tyr, la ville de puissance, Sparte, la ville de vertu, Ninive, la ville de prodige, il contient aussi Lutèce, la ville de boue.

D'ailleurs le cachet de sa puissance est là aussi, et la titanique sentine de Paris réalise, parmi les monuments, cet idéal étrange réalisé dans l'humanité par quelques hommes tels que Machiavel, Bacon et Mirabeau, le grandiose abject.

Le sous-sol de Paris, si l'œil pouvait en pénétrer la surface, présenterait l'aspect d'un madrépore colossal. Une éponge n'a guère plus de pertuis et de couloirs que la motte de terre de six lieues de tour sur laquelle repose l'antique grande ville. Sans parler des catacombes, qui sont une cave à part, sans parler de l'inextricable treillis des conduits du gaz, sans compter le vaste système tubulaire de la distribution d'eau vive qui aboutit aux bornes-fontaines, les égouts à eux seuls font sous les deux rives un prodigieux réseau ténébreux; labyrinthe qui a pour fil sa pente.

Là apparaît, dans la brume humide, le rat, qui semble le produit de l'accouchement de Paris.

Chapitre II

L’histoire ancienne de l’égout

Qu’on s’imagine Paris ôté comme un couvercle, le réseau souterrain des égouts, vu à vol d’oiseau, dessinera sur les deux rives une espèce de grosse branche greffée au fleuve. Sur la rive droite l’égout de ceinture sera le tronc de cette branche, les conduits secondaires seront les rameaux et les impasses seront les ramuscules.

Cette figure n’est que sommaire et à demi exacte, l’angle droit, qui est l’angle habituel de ce genre de ramifications souterraines, étant très rare dans la végétation.

On se fera une image plus ressemblante de cet étrange plan géométral en supposant qu’on voie à plat sur un fond de ténèbres quelque bizarre alphabet d’orient brouillé comme un fouillis, et dont les lettres difformes seraient soudées les unes aux autres, dans un pêle-mêle apparent et comme au hasard, tantôt par leurs angles, tantôt par leurs extrémités.

Les sentines et les égouts jouaient un grand rôle au Moyen-Âge, au Bas-Empire et dans ce vieil Orient. La peste y naissait, les despotes y mouraient. Les multitudes regardaient presque avec une crainte religieuse ces lits de pourriture, monstrueux berceaux de la Mort. La fosse aux vermines de Bénarès n’est pas moins vertigineuse que la fosse aux lions de Babylone. Téglath-Phalasar, au dire des livres rabbiniques, jurait par la sentine de Ninive, C’est de l’égout de Munster que Jean de Leyde faisait sortir sa fausse lune, et c’est du puits-cloaque de Kekhscheb que son ménechme oriental, Mokannâ, le prophète voilé du Khorassan, faisait sortir son faux soleil.

L’histoire des hommes se reflète dans l’histoire des cloaques. Les gémonies racontaient Rome. L’égout de Paris a été une vieille chose formidable. Il a été sépulcre, il a été asile. Le crime, l’intelligence, la protestation sociale, la liberté de conscience, la pensée, le vol, tout ce que les lois humaines poursuivent ou ont poursuivi, s’est caché dans ce trou; les maillotins au quatorzième siècle, les tire-laine au quinzième, les huguenots au seizième, les illuminés de Morin au dix-septième, les chauffeurs au dix-huitième. Il y a cent ans, le coup de poignard nocturne en sortait, le filou en danger y glissait; le bois avait la caverne, Paris avait l’égout. La truanderie, cette picareria gauloise, acceptait l’égout comme succursale de la Cour des Miracles, et le soir, narquoise et féroce, rentrait sous le vomitoire Maubuée comme dans une alcôve.

Il était tout simple que ceux qui avaient pour lieu de travail quotidien le cul-de-sac Vide-Gousset ou la rue Coupe-Gorge eussent pour domicile nocturne le ponceau du Chemin-Vert ou le cagnard Hurepoix. De là un fourmillement de souvenirs. Toutes sortes de fantômes hantent ces longs corridors solitaires; partout la putridité et le miasme; çà et là un soupirail où Villon dedans cause avec Rabelais dehors.

L’égout, dans l’ancien Paris, est le rendez-vous de tous les épuisements et de tous les essais. L’économie politique y voit un détritus, la philosophie sociale y voit un résidu.

L’égout, c’est la conscience de la ville. Tout y converge, et s’y confronte. Dans ce lieu livide, il y a des ténèbres, mais il n’y a plus de secrets. Chaque chose a sa forme vraie, ou du moins sa forme définitive. Le tas d’ordures a cela pour lui qu’il n’est pas menteur. La naïveté s’est réfugiée là. Le masque de Basile s’y trouve, mais on en voit le carton, et les ficelles, et le dedans comme le dehors, et il est accentué d’une boue honnête. Le faux nez de Scapin l’avoisine. Toutes les malpropretés de la civilisation, une fois hors de service, tombent dans cette fosse de vérité où aboutit l’immense glissement social. Elles s’y engloutissent, mais elles s’y étalent. Ce pêle-mêle est une confession. Là, plus de fausse apparence, aucun plâtrage possible, l’ordure ôte sa chemise, dénudation absolue, déroute des illusions et des mirages, plus rien que ce qui est, faisant la sinistre figure de ce qui finit. Réalité et disparition. Là, un cul de bouteille avoue l’ivrognerie, une anse de panier raconte la domesticité; là, le trognon de pomme qui a eu des opinions littéraires redevient le trognon de pomme; l’effigie du gros sou se vert-de-grise franchement, le crachat de Caïphe rencontre le vomissement de Falstaff, le louis d’or qui sort du tripot heurte le clou où pend le bout de corde du suicide, un foetus livide roule enveloppé dans des paillettes qui ont dansé le mardi gras dernier à l’Opéra, une toque qui a jugé les hommes se vautre près d’une pourriture qui a été la jupe de Margoton; c’est plus que de la fraternité, c’est du tutoiement. Tout ce qui se fardait se barbouille. Le dernier voile est arraché. Un égout est un cynique. Il dit tout.

Cette sincérité de l’immondice nous plaît, et repose l’âme. Quand on a passé son temps à subir sur la terre le spectacle des grands airs que prennent la raison d’état, le serment, la sagesse politique, la justice humaine, les probités professionnelles, les austérités de situation, les robes incorruptibles, cela soulage d’entrer dans un égout et de voir de la fange qui en convient.

Cela enseigne en même temps. Nous l’avons dit tout à l’heure, l’histoire passe par l’égout. Les Saint-Barthélemy y filtrent goutte à goutte entre les pavés. Les grands assassinats publics, les boucheries politiques et religieuses, traversent ce souterrain de la civilisation et y poussent leurs cadavres. Pour l’œil du songeur, tous les meurtriers historiques sont là, dans la pénombre hideuse, à genoux, avec un pan de leur suaire pour tablier, épongeant lugubrement leur besogne. Louis XI y est avec Tristan, François Ier y est avec Duprat, Charles IX y est avec sa mère, Richelieu y est avec Louis XIII, Louvois y est, Letellier y est, Hébert et Maillard y sont, grattant les pierres et tâchant de faire disparaître la trace de leurs actions. On entend sous ces voûtes le balai de ces spectres. On y respire la fétidité énorme des catastrophes sociales. On voit dans des coins des miroitements rougeâtres. Il coule là une eau terrible où se sont lavées des mains sanglantes.

L’observateur social doit entrer dans ces ombres. Elles font partie de son laboratoire. La philosophie est le microscope de la pensée. Tout veut la fuir, mais rien ne lui échappe. Tergiverser est inutile. Quel côté de soi montre-t-on en tergiversant? le côté honte. La philosophie poursuit de son regard probe le mal, et ne lui permet pas de s’évader dans le néant. Dans l’effacement des choses qui disparaissent, dans le rapetissement des choses qui s’évanouissent, elle reconnaît tout. Elle reconstruit la pourpre d’après le haillon et la femme d’après le chiffon. Avec le cloaque elle refait la ville; avec la boue elle refait les mœurs. Du tesson elle conclut l’amphore, ou la cruche. Elle reconnaît à une empreinte d’ongle sur un parchemin la différence qui sépare la juiverie de la Judengasse de la juiverie du Ghetto. Elle retrouve dans ce qui reste ce qui a été, le bien, le mal, le faux, le vrai, la tache de sang du palais, le pâté d’encre de la caverne, la goutte de suif du lupanar, les épreuves subies, les tentations bien venues, les orgies vomies, le pli qu’ont fait les caractères en s’abaissant, la trace de la prostitution dans les âmes que leur grossièreté en faisait capables, et sur la veste des portefaix de Rome la marque du coup de coude de Messaline.

Chapitre III

Bruneseau

L'égout de Paris, au moyen âge, était légendaire. Au seizième siècle Henri II essaya un sondage qui avorta. Il n'y a pas cent ans, le cloaque, Mercier l'atteste, était abandonné à lui-même et devenait ce qu'il pouvait.

Tel était cet ancien Paris, livré aux querelles, aux indécisions et aux tâtonnements. Il fut longtemps assez bête. Plus tard, 89 montra comment l'esprit vient aux villes. Mais, au bon vieux temps, la capitale avait peu de tête; elle ne savait faire ses affaires ni moralement ni matériellement, et pas mieux balayer les ordures que les abus. Tout était obstacle, tout faisait question. L'égout, par exemple, était réfractaire à tout itinéraire. On ne parvenait pas plus à s'orienter dans la voirie qu'à s'entendre dans la ville; en haut l'inintelligible, en bas l'inextricable; sous la confusion des langues il y avait la confusion des caves; Dédale doublait Babel.

Quelquefois, l'égout de Paris se mêlait de déborder, comme si ce Nil méconnu était subitement pris de colère. Il y avait, chose infâme, des inondations d'égout. Par moments, cet estomac de la civilisation digérait mal, le cloaque refluait dans le gosier de la ville, et Paris avait l'arrière-goût de sa fange. Ces ressemblances de l'égout avec le remords avaient du bon; c'étaient des avertissements; fort mal pris du reste; la ville s'indignait que sa boue eût tant d'audace, et n'admettait pas que l'ordure revînt. Chassez-la mieux.

L'inondation de 1802 est un des souvenirs actuels des Parisiens de quatre-vingts ans. La fange se répandit en croix place des Victoires, où est la statue de Louis XIV; elle entra rue Saint-Honoré par les deux bouches d'égout des Champs-Élysées, rue Saint-Florentin par l'égout Saint-Florentin, rue Pierre-à-Poisson par l'égout de la Sonnerie, rue Popincourt par l'égout du Chemin-Vert, rue de la Roquette par l'égout de la rue de Lappe; elle couvrit le caniveau de la rue des Champs-Élysées jusqu'à une hauteur de trente-cinq centimètres; et, au midi, par le vomitoire de la Seine faisant sa fonction en sens inverse, elle pénétra rue Mazarine, rue de l'Échaudé, et rue des Marais, où elle s'arrêta à une longueur de cent neuf mètres, précisément à quelques pas de la maison qu'avait habitée Racine, respectant, dans le dix-septième siècle, le poète plus que le roi. Elle atteignit son maximum de profondeur rue Saint-Pierre où elle s’éleva à trois pieds au-dessus des dalles de la gargouille, et son maximum d’étendue rue Saint-Sabin où elle s’étala sur une longueur de deux cent trente-huit mètres.

Au commencement de ce siècle, l’égout de Paris était encore un lieu mystérieux. La boue ne peut jamais être bien famée; mais ici le mauvais renom allait jusqu’à l’effroi. Paris savait confusément qu’il avait sous lui une cave terrible. On en parlait comme de cette monstrueuse souille de Thèbes où fourmillaient des scolopendres de quinze pieds de long et qui eût pu servir de baignoire à Béhémoth. Les grosses bottes des égoutiers ne s’aventuraient jamais au delà de certains points connus. On était encore très voisin du temps où les tombereaux des boueurs, du haut desquels Sainte-Foix fraternisait avec le marquis de Créqui, se déchargeaient tout simplement dans l’égout. Quant au curage, on confiait cette fonction aux averses, qui encombraient plus qu’elles ne balayaient. Rome laissait encore quelque poésie à son cloaque et l’appelait Gémonies; Paris insultait le sien et l’appelait le Trou punais. La science et la superstition étaient d’accord pour l’horreur. Le Trou punais ne répugnait pas moins à l’hygiène qu’à la légende. Le Moine bourru était éclos sous la voussure fétide de l’égout Mouffetard; les cadavres des Marmousets avaient été jetés dans l’égout de la Barillerie; Fagon avait attribué la redoutable fièvre maligne de 1685 au grand hiatus de l’égout du Marais qui resta béant jusqu’en 1833 rue Saint-Louis presque en face de l’enseigne du Messager galant. La bouche d’égout de la rue de la Mortellerie était célèbre par les pestes qui en sortaient; avec sa grille de fer à pointes qui simulait une rangée de dents, elle était dans cette rue fatale comme une gueule de dragon soufflant l’enfer sur les hommes. L’imagination populaire assaisonnait le sombre évier parisien d’on ne sait quel hideux mélange d’infini. L’égout était sans fond. L’égout, c’était le barathrum. L’idée d’explorer ces régions lépreuses ne venait pas même à la police. Tenter cet inconnu, jeter la sonde dans cette ombre, aller à la découverte dans cet abîme, qui l’eût osé? C’était effrayant. Quelqu’un se présenta pourtant. Le cloaque eut son Christophe Colomb.

Un jour, en 1805, dans une de ces rares apparitions que l’empereur faisait à Paris, le ministre de l’intérieur, un Decrès ou un Crétet quelconque, vint au petit lever du maître. On entendait dans le Carrousel le traînement des sabres de tous ces soldats extraordinaires de la grande république et du grand empire; il y avait encombrement de héros à la porte de Napoléon; hommes du Rhin, de l’Escaut, de l’Adige et du Nil; compagnons de Joubert, de Desaix, de Marceau, de Hoche, de Kléber; aérostiers de Fleurus, grenadiers de Mayence, pontonniers de Gênes, hussards que les Pyramides avaient regardés, artilleurs qu'avait éclaboussés le boulet de Junot, cuirassiers qui avaient pris d'assaut la flotte à l'ancre dans le Zuyderzée; les uns avaient suivi Bonaparte sur le pont de Lodi, les autres avaient accompagné Murat dans la tranchée de Mantoue, les autres avaient devancé Lannes dans le chemin creux de Montebello. Toute l'armée d'alors était là, dans la cour des Tuileries, représentée par une escouade ou par un peloton, et gardant Napoléon au repos; et c'était l'époque splendide où la grande armée avait derrière elle Marengo et devant elle Austerlitz. — Sire, dit le ministre de l'intérieur à Napoléon, j'ai vu hier l'homme le plus intrépide de votre empire. — Qu'est-ce que cet homme? dit brusquement l'empereur, et qu'est-ce qu'il a fait? — Il veut faire une chose, sire. — Laquelle? — Visiter les égouts de Paris.

Cet homme existait et se nommait Bruneseau.

Chapitre IV

Détails ignorés

La visite eut lieu. Ce fut une campagne redoutable; une bataille nocturne contre la peste et l’asphyxie. Ce fut en même temps un voyage de découvertes. Un des survivants de cette exploration, ouvrier intelligent, très jeune alors, en racontait encore il y a quelques années les curieux détails que Bruneseau crut devoir omettre dans son rapport au préfet de police, comme indignes du style administratif. Les procédés désinfectants étaient à cette époque très rudimentaires. À peine Bruneseau eut-il franchi les premières articulations du réseau souterrain, que huit des travailleurs sur vingt refusèrent d’aller plus loin. L’opération était compliquée; la visite entraînait le curage; il fallait donc curer, et en même temps arpenter: noter les entrées d’eau, compter les grilles et les bouches, détailler les branchements, indiquer les courants à points de partage, reconnaître les circonscriptions respectives des divers bassins, sonder les petits égouts greffés sur l’égout principal, mesurer la hauteur sous clef de chaque couloir, et la largeur, tant à la naissance des voûtes qu’à fleur du radier, enfin déterminer les ordonnées du nivellement au droit de chaque entrée d’eau, soit du radier de l’égout, soit du sol de la rue. On avançait péniblement. Il n’était pas rare que les échelles de descente plongeassent dans trois pieds de vase. Les lanternes agonisaient dans les miasmes. De temps en temps on emportait un égoutier évanoui. À de certains endroits, précipice. Le sol s’était effondré, le dallage avait croulé, l’égout s’était changé en puits perdu; on ne trouvait plus le solide; un homme disparut brusquement; on eut grand’peine à le retirer. Par le conseil de Fourcroy, on allumait de distance en distance, dans les endroits suffisamment assainis, de grandes cages pleines d’étoupe imbibée de résine. La muraille, par places, était couverte de fongus difformes, et l’on eût dit des tumeurs, la pierre elle-même semblait malade dans ce milieu irrespirable.

Bruneseau, dans son exploration, procéda d’amont en aval. Au point de partage des deux conduites d’eau du Grand-Hurleur, il déchiffra sur une pierre en saillie la date 1550; cette pierre indiquait la limite où s’était arrêté Philibert Delorme, chargé par Henri II de visiter la voirie souterraine de Paris. Cette pierre était la marque du seizième siècle à l’égout. Bruneseau retrouva la main-d’œuvre du dix-septième dans le conduit du Ponceau et dans le conduit de la rue Vieille-du-Temple, voûtés entre 1600 et 1650, et la main-d’œuvre du dix-huitième dans la section ouest du canal collecteur, encaissée et voûtée en 1740. Ces deux voûtes, surtout la moins ancienne, celle de 1740, étaient plus lézardées et plus décrépites que la maçonnerie de l’égout de ceinture, laquelle datait de 1412, époque où le ruisseau d’eau vive de Ménilmontant fut élevé à la dignité de grand égout de Paris, avancement analogue à celui d’un paysan qui deviendrait premier valet de chambre du roi; quelque chose comme Gros-Jean transformé en Lebel.

On crut reconnaître çà et là, notamment sous le Palais de justice, des alvéoles d’anciens cachots pratiqués dans l’égout même. In pace hideux. Un carcan de fer pendait dans l’une de ces cellules. On les mura toutes. Quelques trouvailles furent bizarres; entre autres le squelette d’un orang-outang disparu du Jardin des plantes en 1800, disparition probablement connexe à la fameuse et incontestable apparition du diable rue des Bernardins dans la dernière année du dix-huitième siècle. Le pauvre diable avait fini par se noyer dans l’égout.

Sous le long couloir cintré qui aboutit à l’Arche-Marion, une hotte de chiffonnier, parfaitement conservée, fit l’admiration des connaisseurs. Partout, la vase, que les égoutiers en étaient venus à manier intrépidement, abondait en objets précieux, bijoux d’or et d’argent, pierreries, monnaies. Un géant qui eût filtré ce cloaque eût eu dans son tamis la richesse des siècles. Au point de partage des deux branchements de la rue du Temple et de la rue Sainte-Avoye, on ramassa une singulière médaille huguenote en cuivre, portant d’un côté un porc coiffé d’un chapeau de cardinal et de l’autre un loup la tiare en tête.

La rencontre la plus surprenante fut à l’entrée du Grand Égout. Cette entrée avait été autrefois fermée par une grille dont il ne restait plus que les gonds. À l’un de ces gonds pendait une sorte de loque informe et souillée qui, sans doute arrêtée là au passage, y flottait dans l’ombre et achevait de s’y déchiqueter. Bruneseau approcha sa lanterne et examina ce lambeau. C’était de la batiste très fine, et l’on distinguait à l’un des coins moins rongé que le reste une couronne héraldique brodée au-dessus de ces sept lettres: LAVBESP. La couronne était une couronne de marquis et les sept lettres signifiaient Laubespine. On reconnut que ce qu’on avait sous les yeux était un morceau du linceul de Marat. Marat, dans sa jeunesse, avait eu des amours. C’était quand il faisait partie de la maison du comte d’Artois en qualité de médecin des écuries. De ces amours, historiquement constatés, avec une grande dame, il lui était resté ce drap de lit. Épave ou souvenir. À sa mort, comme c'était le seul linge un peu fin qu'il eût chez lui, on l'y avait enseveli. De vieilles femmes avaient emmailloté pour la tombe, dans ce lange où il y avait eu de la volupté, le tragique Ami du Peuple.

Bruneseau passa outre. On laissa cette guenille où elle était; on ne l'acheva pas. Fut-ce mépris ou respect? Marat méritait les deux. Et puis, la destinée y était assez empreinte pour qu'on hésitât à y toucher. D'ailleurs, il faut laisser aux choses du sépulcre la place qu'elles choisissent. En somme, la relique était étrange. Une marquise y avait dormi; Marat y avait pourri; elle avait traversé le Panthéon pour aboutir aux rats d'égout. Ce chiffon d'alcôve, dont Watteau eût jadis joyeusement dessiné tous les plis, avait fini par être digne du regard fixe de Dante.

La visite totale de la voirie immonditielle souterraine de Paris dura sept ans, de 1805 à 1812. Tout en cheminant, Bruneseau désignait, dirigeait et mettait à fin des travaux considérables; en 1808, il abaissait le radier du Ponceau, et, créant partout des lignes nouvelles, il poussait l'égout, en 1809, sous la rue Saint-Denis jusqu'à la fontaine des Innocents; en 1810, sous la rue Froidmanteau et sous la Salpêtrière, en 1811, sous la rue Neuve-des-Petits-Pères, sous la rue du Mail, sous la rue de l'Écharpe, sous la place Royale, en 1812, sous la rue de la Paix et sous la chaussée d'Antin. En même temps, il faisait désinfecter et assainir tout le réseau. Dès la deuxième année, Bruneseau s'était adjoint son gendre Nargaud.

C'est ainsi qu'au commencement de ce siècle la vieille société cura son double-fond et fit la toilette de son égout. Ce fut toujours cela de nettoyé.

Tortueux, crevassé, dépavé, craquelé, coupé de fondrières, cahoté par des coudes bizarres, montant et descendant sans logique, fétide, sauvage, farouche, submergé d'obscurité, avec des cicatrices sur ses dalles et des balafres sur ses murs, épouvantable, tel était, vu rétrospectivement, l'antique égout de Paris. Ramifications en tous sens, croisements de tranchées, branchements, pattes d'oie, étoiles comme dans les sapes, cæcums, culs-de-sac, voûtes salpêtrées, puisards infects, suintements dartreux sur les parois, gouttes tombant des plafonds, ténèbres; rien n'égalait l'horreur de cette vieille crypte exutoire, appareil digestif de Babylone, antre, fosse, gouffre percé de rues, taupinière titanique où l'esprit croit voir rôder à travers l'ombre, dans de l'ordure qui a été de la splendeur, cette énorme taupe aveugle, le passé.

Ceci, nous le répétons, c’était l’égout d’autrefois.

Chapitre V

Progrès actuel

Aujourd’hui l’égout est propre, froid, droit, correct. Il réalise presque l’idéal de ce qu’on entend en Angleterre par le mot «respectable». Il est convenable et grisâtre; tiré au cordeau; on pourrait presque dire à quatre épingles. Il ressemble à un fournisseur devenu conseiller d’État. On y voit presque clair. La fange s’y comporte décemment. Au premier abord, on le prendrait volontiers pour un de ces corridors souterrains si communs jadis et si utiles aux fuites de monarques et de princes, dans cet ancien bon temps «où le peuple aimait ses rois». L’égout actuel est un bel égout; le style pur y règne; le classique alexandrin rectiligne qui, chassé de la poésie, paraît s’être réfugié dans l’architecture, semble mêlé à toutes les pierres de cette longue voûte ténébreuse et blanchâtre; chaque dégorgeoir est une arcade; la rue de Rivoli fait école jusque dans le cloaque. Au reste, si la ligne géométrique est quelque part à sa place, c’est à coup sûr dans la tranchée stercoraire d’une grande ville. Là, tout doit être subordonné au chemin le plus court. L’égout a pris aujourd’hui un certain aspect officiel. Les rapports mêmes de police dont il est quelquefois l’objet ne lui manquent plus de respect. Les mots qui le caractérisent dans le langage administratif sont relevés et dignes. Ce qu’on appelait boyau, on l’appelle galerie; ce qu’on appelait trou, on l’appelle regard. Villon ne reconnaîtrait plus son antique logis en-cas. Ce réseau de caves a bien toujours son immémoriale population de rongeurs, plus pullulante que jamais; de temps en temps, un rat, vieille moustache, risque sa tête à la fenêtre de l’égout et examine les Parisiens; mais cette vermine elle-même s’apprivoise, satisfaite qu’elle est de son palais souterrain. Le cloaque n’a plus rien de sa férocité primitive. La pluie, qui salissait l’égout d’autrefois, lave l’égout d’à présent. Ne vous y fiez pas trop pourtant. Les miasmes l’habitent encore. Il est plutôt hypocrite qu’irréprochable. La préfecture de police et la commission de salubrité ont eu beau faire. En dépit de tous les procédés d’assainissement, il exhale une vague odeur suspecte, comme Tartuffe après la confession.

Convenons-en, comme, à tout prendre, le balayage est un hommage que l’égout rend à la civilisation, et comme, à ce point de vue, la conscience de

Tartuffe est un progrès sur l’étable d’Augias, il est certain que l’égout de Paris s’est amélioré.

C’est plus qu’un progrès; c’est une transmutation. Entre l’égout ancien et l’égout actuel, il y a une révolution. Qui a fait cette révolution?

L’homme que tout le monde oublie et que nous avons nommé, Bruneseau.

Chapitre VI

Progrès futur

Le creusement de l’égout de Paris n’a pas été une petite besogne. Les dix derniers siècles y ont travaillé sans le pouvoir terminer, pas plus qu’ils n’ont pu finir Paris. L’égout, en effet, reçoit tous les contre-coups de la croissance de Paris. C’est, dans la terre, une sorte de polype ténébreux aux mille antennes qui grandit dessous en même temps que la ville dessus. Chaque fois que la ville perce une rue, l’égout allonge un bras. La vieille monarchie n’avait construit que vingt-trois mille trois cents mètres d’égouts; c’est là que Paris en était le 1er janvier 1806. À partir de cette époque, dont nous reparlerons tout à l’heure, l’œuvre a été utilement et énergiquement reprise et continuée; Napoléon a bâti, ces chiffres sont curieux, quatre mille huit cent quatre mètres; Louis XVIII, cinq mille sept cent neuf; Charles X, dix mille huit cent trente-six; Louis-Philippe, quatre-vingt-neuf mille vingt; la République de 1848, vingt-trois mille trois cent quatre-vingt-un; le régime actuel, soixante-dix mille cinq cents; en tout, à l’heure qu’il est, deux cent vingt-six mille six cent dix mètres, soixante lieues d’égout; entrailles énormes de Paris. Ramification obscure, toujours en travail; construction ignorée et immense.

Comme on le voit, le dédale souterrain de Paris est aujourd’hui plus que décuple de ce qu’il était au commencement du siècle. On se figure malaisément tout ce qu’il a fallu de persévérance et d’efforts pour amener ce cloaque au point de perfection relative où il est maintenant. C’était à grand’peine que la vieille prévôté monarchique et, dans les dix dernières années du dix-huitième siècle, la mairie révolutionnaire étaient parvenues à forer les cinq lieues d’égouts qui existaient avant 1806. Tous les genres d’obstacles entravaient cette opération, les uns propres à la nature du sol, les autres inhérents aux préjugés mêmes de la population laborieuse de Paris. Paris est bâti sur un gisement étrangement rebelle à la pioche, à la houe, à la sonde, au maniement humain. Rien de plus difficile à percer et à pénétrer que cette formation géologique à laquelle se superpose la merveilleuse formation historique nommée Paris; dès que, sous une forme quelconque, le travail s’engage et s’aventure dans cette nappe d’alluvions, les résistances souterraines abondent. Ce sont des argiles liquides, des sources vives, des roches dures, de ces vases molles et profondes que la science spéciale appelle moutardes. Le pic avance laborieusement dans des lames calcaires alternées de filets de glaises très minces et de couches schisteuses aux feuillets incrustés d'écailles d'huîtres contemporaines des océans préadamites. Parfois un ruisseau crève brusquement une voûte commencée et inonde les travailleurs; ou c'est une coulée de marne qui se fait jour et se rue avec la furie d'une cataracte, brisant comme verre les plus grosses poutres de soutènement. Tout récemment, à la Villette, quand il a fallu, sans interrompre la navigation et sans vider le canal, faire passer l'égout collecteur sous le canal Saint-Martin, une fissure s'est faite dans la cuvette du canal, l'eau a abondé subitement dans le chantier souterrain, au delà de toute la puissance des pompes d'épuisement; il a fallu faire chercher par un plongeur la fissure qui était dans le goulet du grand bassin, et on ne l'a point bouchée sans peine. Ailleurs, près de la Seine, et même assez loin du fleuve, comme par exemple à Belleville, Grande-Rue et passage Lumière, on rencontre des sables sans fond où l'on s'enlise et où un homme peut fondre à vue d'œil. Ajoutez l'asphyxie par les miasmes, l'ensevelissement par les éboulements, les effondrements subits. Ajoutez le typhus, dont les travailleurs s'imprègnent lentement. De nos jours, après avoir creusé la galerie de Clichy, avec banquette pour recevoir une conduite maîtresse d'eau de l'Ourcq, travail exécuté en tranchée, à dix mètres de profondeur; après avoir, à travers les éboulements, à l'aide des fouilles, souvent putrides, et des étrésillonnements, voûté la Bièvre du boulevard de l'Hôpital jusqu'à la Seine; après avoir, pour délivrer Paris des eaux torrentielles de Montmartre et pour donner écoulement à cette mare fluviale de neuf hectares qui croupissait près de la barrière des Martyrs; après avoir, disons-nous, construit la ligne d'égouts de la barrière Blanche au chemin d'Aubervilliers, en quatre mois, jour et nuit, à une profondeur de onze mètres; après avoir, chose qu'on n'avait pas vue encore, exécuté souterrainement un égout rue Barre-du-Bec, sans tranchée, à six mètres au-dessous du sol, le conducteur Monnot est mort. Après avoir voûté trois mille mètres d'égouts sur tous les points de la ville, de la rue Traversière-Saint-Antoine à la rue de Lourcine, après avoir, par le branchement de l'Arbalète, déchargé des inondations pluviales le carrefour Censier-Mouffetard, après avoir bâti l'égout Saint-Georges sur enrochement et béton dans des sables fluides, après avoir dirigé le redoutable abaissement de radier du branchement Notre-Dame-de-Nazareth, l'ingénieur Duleau est mort. Il n’y a pas de bulletin pour ces actes de bravoure-là, plus utiles pourtant que la tuerie bête des champs de bataille.

Les égouts de Paris, en 1832, étaient loin d’être ce qu’ils sont aujourd’hui. Bruneseau avait donné le branle, mais il fallait le choléra pour déterminer la vaste reconstruction qui a eu lieu depuis. Il est surprenant de dire, par exemple, qu’en 1821, une partie de l’égout de ceinture, dit Grand Canal, comme à Venise, croupissait encore à ciel ouvert, rue des Gourdes. Ce n’est qu’en 1823 que la ville de Paris a trouvé dans son gousset les deux cent soixante-six mille quatre-vingts francs six centimes nécessaires à la couverture de cette turpitude. Les trois puits absorbants du Combat, de la Cunette et de Saint-Mandé, avec leurs dégorgeoirs, leurs appareils, leurs puisards et leurs branchements dépuratoires, ne datent que de 1836. La voirie intestinale de Paris a été refaite à neuf et, comme nous l’avons dit, plus que décuplée depuis un quart de siècle.

Il y a trente ans, à l’époque de l’insurrection des 5 et 6 juin, c’était encore, dans beaucoup d’endroits, presque l’ancien égout. Un très grand nombre de rues, aujourd’hui bombées, étaient alors des chaussées fendues. On voyait très souvent, au point déclive où les versants d’une rue ou d’un carrefour aboutissaient, de larges grilles carrées à gros barreaux dont le fer luisait fourbu par les pas de la foule, dangereuses et glissantes aux voitures et faisant abattre les chevaux. La langue officielle des ponts et chaussées donnait à ces points déclives et à ces grilles le nom expressif de cassis. En 1832, dans une foule de rues, rue de l’Étoile, rue Saint-Louis, rue du Temple, rue Vieille-du-Temple, rue Notre-Dame-de-Nazareth, rue Folie-Méricourt, quai aux Fleurs, rue du Petit-Musc, rue de Normandie, rue Pont-aux-Biches, rue des Marais, faubourg Saint-Martin, rue Notre-Dame-des-Victoires, faubourg Montmartre, rue Grange-Batelière, aux Champs-Élysées, rue Jacob, rue de Tournon, le vieux cloaque gothique montrait encore cyniquement ses gueules. C’étaient d’énormes hiatus de pierre à cagnards, quelquefois entourés de bornes, avec une effronterie monumentale.

Paris, en 1806, en était encore presque au chiffre d’égouts constaté en mai 1663: cinq mille trois cent vingt-huit toises. Après Bruneseau, le 1^er^ janvier 1832, il en avait quarante mille trois cents mètres. De 1806 à 1831, on avait bâti annuellement, en moyenne, sept cent cinquante mètres; depuis on a construit tous les ans huit et même dix mille mètres de galeries, en maçonnerie de petits matériaux à bain de chaux hydraulique sur fondation de béton. À deux cents francs le mètre, les soixante lieues d’égouts du Paris actuel représentent quarante-huit millions.

Outre le progrès économique que nous avons indiqué en commençant, de graves problèmes d’hygiène publique se rattachent à cette immense question: l’égout de Paris.

Paris est entre deux nappes, une nappe d’eau et une nappe d’air. La nappe d’eau, gisante à une assez grande profondeur souterraine, mais déjà tâtée par deux forages, est fournie par la couche de grès vert située entre la craie et le calcaire jurassique; cette couche peut être représentée par un disque de vingt-cinq lieues de rayon; une foule de rivières et de ruisseaux y suintent; on boit la Seine, la Marne, l’Yonne, l’Oise, l’Aisne, le Cher, la Vienne et la Loire dans un verre d’eau du puits de Grenelle. La nappe d’eau est salubre, elle vient du ciel d’abord, de la terre ensuite; la nappe d’air est malsaine, elle vient de l’égout. Tous les miasmes du cloaque se mêlent à la respiration de la ville; de là cette mauvaise haleine. L’air pris au-dessus d’un fumier, ceci a été scientifiquement établi, est plus pur que l’air pris au-dessus de Paris. Dans un temps donné, le progrès aidant, les mécanismes se perfectionnant, et la clarté se faisant, on emploiera la nappe d’eau à purifier la nappe d’air. C’est-à-dire à laver l’égout. On sait que par lavage de l’égout, nous entendons restitution de la fange à la terre; renvoi du fumier au sol et de l’engrais aux champs. Il y aura, par ce simple fait, pour toute la communauté sociale, diminution de misère et augmentation de santé. À l’heure où nous sommes, le rayonnement des maladies de Paris va à cinquante lieues autour du Louvre, pris comme moyeu de cette route pestilentielle.

On pourrait dire que, depuis dix siècles, le cloaque est la maladie de Paris. L’égout est le vice que la ville a dans le sang. L’instinct populaire ne s’y est jamais trompé. Le métier d’égoutier était autrefois presque aussi périlleux, et presque aussi répugnant au peuple, que le métier d’équarrisseur si longtemps frappé d’horreur et abandonné au bourreau. Il fallait une haute paye pour décider un maçon à disparaître dans cette sape fétide; l’échelle du puisatier hésitait à s’y plonger; on disait proverbialement: descendre dans l’égout, c’est entrer dans la fosse; et toutes sortes de légendes hideuses, nous l’avons dit, couvraient d’épouvante ce colossal évier; sentine redoutée qui a la trace des révolutions du globe comme des révolutions des hommes, et où l’on trouve des vestiges de tous les cataclysmes depuis le coquillage du déluge jusqu’au haillon de Marat.

Livre troisième — La boue, mais l’âme

Chapitre I

Le cloaque et ses surprises

C’est dans l’égout de Paris que se trouvait Jean Valjean.

Ressemblance de plus de Paris avec la mer. Comme dans l’océan, le plongeur peut y disparaître.

La transition était inouïe. Au milieu même de la ville, Jean Valjean était sorti de la ville; et, en un clin d’œil, le temps de lever un couvercle et de le refermer, il avait passé du plein jour à l’obscurité complète, de midi à minuit, du fracas au silence, du tourbillon des tonnerres à la stagnation de la tombe, et, par une péripétie bien plus prodigieuse encore que celle de la rue Polonceau, du plus extrême péril à la sécurité la plus absolue.

Chute brusque dans une cave; disparition dans l’oubliette de Paris; quitter cette rue où la mort était partout pour cette espèce de sépulcre où il y avait la vie; ce fut un instant étrange. Il resta quelques secondes comme étourdi; écoutant, stupéfait. La chausse-trape du salut s’était subitement ouverte sous lui. La bonté céleste l’avait en quelque sorte pris par trahison. Adorables embuscades de la providence!

Seulement le blessé ne remuait point, et Jean Valjean ne savait pas si ce qu’il emportait dans cette fosse était un vivant ou un mort.

Sa première sensation fut l’aveuglement. Brusquement il ne vit plus rien. Il lui sembla aussi qu’en une minute il était devenu sourd. Il n’entendait plus rien. Le frénétique orage de meurtre qui se déchaînait à quelques pieds au-dessus de lui n’arrivait jusqu’à lui, nous l’avons dit, grâce à l’épaisseur de terre qui l’en séparait, qu’éteint et indistinct, et comme une rumeur dans une profondeur. Il sentait que c’était solide sous ses pieds; voilà tout; mais cela suffisait. Il étendit un bras, puis l’autre, et toucha le mur des deux côtés, et reconnut que le couloir était étroit; il glissa, et reconnut que la dalle était mouillée. Il avança un pied avec précaution, craignant un trou, un puisard, quelque gouffre; il constata que le dallage se prolongeait. Une bouffée de fétidité l’avertit du lieu où il était.

Au bout de quelques instants, il n’était plus aveugle. Un peu de lumière tombait du soupirail par où il s’était glissé, et son regard s’était fait à cette cave. Il commença à distinguer quelque chose. Le couloir où il s’était terré, nul autre mot n’exprime mieux la situation, était muré derrière lui. C’était un de ces culs-de-sac que la langue spéciale appelle branchements. Devant lui, il y avait un autre mur, un mur de nuit. La clarté du soupirail expirait à dix ou douze pas du point où était Jean Valjean, et faisait à peine une blancheur blafarde sur quelques mètres de la paroi humide de l’égout. Au delà l’opacité était massive; y pénétrer paraissait horrible, et l’entrée y semblait un engloutissement. On pouvait s’enfoncer pourtant dans cette muraille de brume, et il le fallait. Il fallait même se hâter. Jean Valjean songea que cette grille, aperçue par lui sous les pavés, pouvait l’être par les soldats, et que tout tenait à ce hasard. Ils pouvaient descendre eux aussi dans ce puits et le fouiller. Il n’y avait pas une minute à perdre. Il avait déposé Marius sur le sol, il le ramassa, ceci est encore le mot vrai, le reprit sur ses épaules et se mit en marche. Il entra résolument dans cette obscurité.

La réalité est qu’ils étaient moins sauvés que Jean Valjean ne le croyait. Des périls d’un autre genre et non moins grands les attendaient peut-être. Après le tourbillon fulgurant du combat, la caverne des miasmes et des pièges; après le chaos, le cloaque. Jean Valjean était tombé d’un cercle de l’enfer dans l’autre.

Quand il eut fait cinquante pas, il fallut s’arrêter. Une question se présenta. Le couloir aboutissait à un autre boyau qu’il rencontrait transversalement. Là s’offraient deux voies. Laquelle prendre? fallait-il tourner à gauche ou à droite? Comment s’orienter dans ce labyrinthe noir? Ce labyrinthe, nous l’avons fait remarquer, a un fil; c’est sa pente. Suivre la pente, c’est aller à la rivière.

Jean Valjean le comprit sur-le-champ.

Il se dit qu’il était probablement dans l’égout des Halles; que, s’il choisissait la gauche et suivait la pente, il arriverait avant un quart d’heure à quelque embouchure sur la Seine entre le Pont-au-Change et le Pont-Neuf, c’est-à-dire à une apparition en plein jour sur le point le plus peuplé de Paris. Peut-être aboutirait-il à quelque cagnard de carrefour. Stupeur des passants de voir deux hommes sanglants sortir de terre sous leurs pieds. Survenue des sergents de ville, prise d’armes du corps de garde voisin. On serait saisi avant d’être sorti. Il valait mieux s’enfoncer dans le dédale, se fier à cette noirceur, et s’en remettre à la providence quant à l’issue.

Il remonta la pente et prit à droite.

Quand il eut tourné l’angle de la galerie, la lointaine lueur du soupirail disparut, le rideau d’obscurité retomba sur lui et il redevint aveugle. Il n’en avança pas moins, et aussi rapidement qu’il put. Les deux bras de Marius étaient passés autour de son cou et les pieds pendaient derrière lui. Il tenait les deux bras d’une main et tâtait le mur de l’autre. La joue de Marius touchait la sienne et s’y collait, étant sanglante. Il sentait couler sur lui et pénétrer sous ses vêtements un ruisseau tiède qui venait de Marius. Cependant une chaleur humide à son oreille que touchait la bouche du blessé indiquait de la respiration, et par conséquent de la vie. Le couloir où Jean Valjean cheminait maintenant était moins étroit que le premier. Jean Valjean y marchait assez péniblement. Les pluies de la veille n’étaient pas encore écoulées et faisaient un petit torrent au centre du radier, et il était forcé de se serrer contre le mur pour ne pas avoir les pieds dans l’eau. Il allait ainsi ténébreusement. Il ressemblait aux êtres de nuit tâtonnant dans l’invisible et souterrainement perdus dans les veines de l’ombre.

Pourtant, peu à peu, soit que des soupiraux lointains envoyassent un peu de lueur flottante dans cette brume opaque, soit que ses yeux s’accoutumassent à l’obscurité, il lui revint quelque vision vague, et il recommença à se rendre confusément compte, tantôt de la muraille à laquelle il touchait, tantôt de la voûte sous laquelle il passait. La pupille se dilate dans la nuit et finit par y trouver du jour, de même que l’âme se dilate dans le malheur et finit par y trouver Dieu.

Se diriger était malaisé.

Le tracé des égouts répercute, pour ainsi dire, le tracé des rues qui lui est superposé. Il y avait dans le Paris d’alors deux mille deux cents rues. Qu’on se figure là-dessous cette forêt de branches ténébreuses qu’on nomme l’égout. Le système d’égouts existant à cette époque, mis bout à bout, eût donné une longueur de onze lieues. Nous avons dit plus haut que le réseau actuel, grâce à l’activité spéciale des trente dernières années, n’a pas moins de soixante lieues.

Jean Valjean commença par se tromper. Il crut être sous la rue Saint-Denis, et il était fâcheux qu’il n’y fût pas. Il y a sous la rue Saint-Denis un vieil égout en pierre qui date de Louis XIII et qui va droit à l’égout collecteur dit Grand Égout, avec un seul coude, à droite, à la hauteur de l’ancienne cour des Miracles, et un seul embranchement, l’égout Saint-Martin, dont les quatre bras se coupent en croix. Mais le boyau de la Petite-Truanderie dont l’entrée était près du cabaret de Corinthe n’a jamais communiqué avec le souterrain de la rue Saint-Denis; il aboutit à l’égout Montmartre et c’est là que Jean Valjean était engagé. Là, les occasions de se perdre abondaient. L’égout Montmartre est un des plus dédaléens du vieux réseau. Heureusement Jean Valjean avait laissé derrière lui l’égout des Halles dont le plan géométral figure une foule de mâts de perroquet enchevêtrés; mais il avait devant lui plus d’une rencontre embarrassante et plus d’un coin de rue — car ce sont des rues — s’offrant dans l’obscurité comme un point d’interrogation: premièrement, à sa gauche, le vaste égout Plâtrière, espèce de casse-tête chinois, poussant et brouillant son chaos de T et de Z sous l’hôtel des Postes et sous la rotonde de la halle aux blés jusqu’à la Seine où il se termine en Y; deuxièmement, à sa droite, le corridor courbe de la rue du Cadran avec ses trois dents qui sont autant d’impasses; troisièmement, à sa gauche, l’embranchement du Mail, compliqué, presque à l’entrée, d’une espèce de fourche, et allant de zigzag en zigzag aboutir à la grande crypte exutoire du Louvre tronçonnée et ramifiée dans tous les sens; enfin, à droite, le couloir cul-de-sac de la rue des Jeûneurs, sans compter de petits réduits çà et là, avant d’arriver à l’égout de ceinture, lequel seul pouvait le conduire à quelque issue assez lointaine pour être sûre.

Si Jean Valjean eût eu quelque notion de tout ce que nous indiquons ici, il se fût vite aperçu, rien qu’en tâtant la muraille, qu’il n’était pas dans la galerie souterraine de la rue Saint-Denis. Au lieu de la vieille pierre de taille, au lieu de l’ancienne architecture, hautaine et royale jusque dans l’égout, avec radier et assises courantes en granit et mortier de chaux grasse, laquelle coûtait huit cents livres la toise, il eût senti sous sa main le bon marché contemporain, l’expédient économique, la meulière à bain de mortier hydraulique sur couche de béton qui coûte deux cents francs le mètre, la maçonnerie bourgeoise dite à petits matériaux; mais il ne savait rien de tout cela.

Il allait devant lui, avec anxiété, mais avec calme, ne voyant rien, ne sachant rien, plongé dans le hasard, c’est-à-dire englouti dans la providence.

Par degrés, disons-le, quelque horreur le gagnait. L’ombre qui l’enveloppait entrait dans son esprit. Il marchait dans une énigme. Cet aqueduc du cloaque est redoutable; il s’entre-croise vertigineusement. C’est une chose lugubre d’être pris dans ce Paris de ténèbres. Jean Valjean était obligé de trouver et presque d’inventer sa route sans la voir. Dans cet inconnu, chaque pas qu’il risquait pouvait être le dernier. Comment sortirait-il de là? Trouverait-il une issue? La trouverait-il à temps? Cette colossale éponge souterraine aux alvéoles de pierre se laisserait-elle pénétrer et percer? Y rencontrerait-on quelque nœud inattendu d’obscurité? Arriverait-on à l’inextricable et à l’infranchissable? Marius y mourrait-il d’hémorragie, et lui de faim? Finiraient-ils par se perdre là tous les deux, et par faire deux squelettes dans un coin de cette nuit? Il l’ignorait. Il se demandait tout cela et ne pouvait se répondre. L’intestin de Paris est un précipice. Comme le prophète, il était dans le ventre du monstre.

Il eut brusquement une surprise. À l’instant le plus imprévu, et sans avoir cessé de marcher en ligne droite, il s’aperçut qu’il ne montait plus; l’eau du ruisseau lui battait les talons au lieu de lui venir sur la pointe des pieds. L’égout maintenant descendait. Pourquoi? Allait-il donc arriver soudainement à la Seine? Ce danger était grand, mais le péril de reculer l’était plus encore. Il continua d’avancer.

Ce n’était point vers la Seine qu’il allait. Le dos d’âne que fait le sol de Paris sur la rive droite vide un de ses versants dans la Seine et l’autre dans le Grand Égout. La crête de ce dos d’âne qui détermine la division des eaux dessine une ligne très capricieuse. Le point culminant, qui est le lieu de partage des écoulements, est, dans l’égout Sainte-Avoye, au delà de la rue Michel-le-Comte, dans l’égout du Louvre, près des boulevards, et dans l’égout Montmartre, près des Halles. C’est à ce point culminant que Jean Valjean était arrivé. Il se dirigeait vers l’égout de ceinture; il était dans le bon chemin. Mais il n’en savait rien.

Chaque fois qu’il rencontrait un embranchement, il en tâtait les angles, et s’il trouvait l’ouverture qui s’offrait moins large que le corridor où il était, il n’entrait pas et continuait sa route, jugeant avec raison que toute voie plus étroite devait aboutir à un cul-de-sac et ne pouvait que l’éloigner du but, c’est-à-dire de l’issue. Il évita ainsi le quadruple piège qui lui était tendu dans l’obscurité par les quatre dédales que nous venons d’énumérer.

À un certain moment il reconnut qu’il sortait de dessous le Paris pétrifié par l’émeute, où les barricades avaient supprimé la circulation et qu’il rentrait sous le Paris vivant et normal. Il eut subitement au-dessus de sa tête comme un bruit de foudre, lointain, mais continu. C’était le roulement des voitures.

Il marchait depuis une demi-heure environ, du moins au calcul qu’il faisait en lui-même, et n’avait pas encore songé à se reposer; seulement il avait changé la main qui soutenait Marius. L’obscurité était plus profonde que jamais, mais cette profondeur le rassurait.

Tout à coup il vit son ombre devant lui. Elle se découpait sur une faible rougeur presque indistincte qui empourprait vaguement le radier à ses pieds et la voûte sur sa tête, et qui glissait à sa droite et à sa gauche sur les deux murailles visqueuses du corridor. Stupéfait, il se retourna.

Derrière lui, dans la partie du couloir qu'il venait de dépasser, à une distance qui lui parut immense, flamboyait, rayant l'épaisseur obscure, une sorte d'astre horrible qui avait l'air de le regarder.

C'était la sombre étoile de la police qui se levait dans l'égout.

Derrière cette étoile remuaient confusément huit ou dix formes noires, droites, indistinctes, terribles.

Chapitre II

Explication

Dans la journée du 6 juin, une battue des égouts avait été ordonnée. On craignit qu'ils ne fussent pris pour refuge par les vaincus, et le préfet Gisquet dut fouiller le Paris occulte pendant que le général Bugeaud balayait le Paris public; double opération connexe qui exigea une double stratégie de la force publique représentée en haut par l'armée et en bas par la police. Trois pelotons d'agents et d'égoutiers explorèrent la voirie souterraine de Paris, le premier, rive droite, le deuxième, rive gauche, le troisième, dans la Cité.

Les agents étaient armés de carabines, de casse-tête, d'épées et de poignards.

Ce qui était en ce moment dirigé sur Jean Valjean, c'était la lanterne de la ronde de la rive droite.

Cette ronde venait de visiter la galerie courbe et les trois impasses qui sont sous la rue du Cadran. Pendant qu'elle promenait son falot au fond de ces impasses, Jean Valjean avait rencontré sur son chemin l'entrée de la galerie, l'avait reconnue plus étroite que le couloir principal et n'y avait point pénétré. Il avait passé outre. Les hommes de police, en ressortant de la galerie du Cadran, avaient cru entendre un bruit de pas dans la direction de l'égout de ceinture. C'étaient les pas de Jean Valjean en effet. Le sergent chef de ronde avait élevé sa lanterne, et l'escouade s'était mise à regarder dans le brouillard du côté d'où était venu le bruit.

Ce fut pour Jean Valjean une minute inexprimable.

Heureusement, s'il voyait bien la lanterne, la lanterne le voyait mal. Elle était la lumière et il était l'ombre. Il était très loin, et mêlé à la noirceur du lieu. Il se rencogna le long du mur et s'arrêta.

Du reste, il ne se rendait pas compte de ce qui se mouvait là derrière lui. L'insomnie, le défaut de nourriture, les émotions, l'avaient fait passer, lui aussi, à l'état visionnaire. Il voyait un flamboiement, et autour de ce flamboiement, des larves. Qu'était-ce? Il ne comprenait pas.

Jean Valjean s'étant arrêté, le bruit avait cessé.

Les hommes de la ronde écoutaient et n'entendaient rien, ils regardaient et ne voyaient rien. Ils se consultèrent.

Il y avait à cette époque sur ce point de l’égout Montmartre une espèce de carrefour dit de service qu’on a supprimé depuis à cause du petit lac intérieur qu’y formait en s’y engorgeant dans les forts orages, le torrent des eaux pluviales. La ronde put se pelotonner dans ce carrefour.

Jean Valjean vit ces larves faire une sorte de cercle. Ces têtes de dogues se rapprochèrent et chuchotèrent.

Le résultat de ce conseil tenu par les chiens de garde fut qu’on s’était trompé, qu’il n’y avait pas eu de bruit, qu’il n’y avait là personne, qu’il était inutile de s’engager dans l’égout de ceinture, que ce serait du temps perdu, mais qu’il fallait se hâter d’aller vers Saint-Merry, que s’il y avait quelque chose à faire et quelque «bousingot» à dépister, c’était dans ce quartier-là.

De temps en temps les partis remettent des semelles neuves à leurs vieilles injures. En 1832, le mot bousingot faisait l’intérim entre le mot jacobin qui était éculé, et le mot démagogue alors presque inusité et qui a fait depuis un si excellent service.

Le sergent donna l’ordre d’obliquer à gauche vers le versant de la Seine. S’ils eussent eu l’idée de se diviser en deux escouades et d’aller dans les deux sens, Jean Valjean était saisi. Cela tint à ce fil. Il est probable que les instructions de la préfecture, prévoyant un cas de combat et les insurgés en nombre, défendaient à la ronde de se morceler. La ronde se remit en marche, laissant derrière elle Jean Valjean. De tout ce mouvement Jean Valjean ne perçut rien, sinon l’éclipse de la lanterne qui se retourna subitement.

Avant de s’en aller, le sergent, pour l’acquit de la conscience de la police, déchargea sa carabine du côté qu’on abandonnait, dans la direction de Jean Valjean. La détonation roula d’écho en écho dans la crypte comme le borborygme de ce boyau titanique. Un plâtras qui tomba dans le ruisseau et fit clapoter l’eau à quelques pas de Jean Valjean, l’avertit que la balle avait frappé la voûte au-dessus de sa tête.

Des pas mesurés et lents résonnèrent quelque temps sur le radier, de plus en plus amortis par l’augmentation progressive de l’éloignement, le groupe des formes noires s’enfonça, une lueur oscilla et flotta, faisant à la voûte un cintre rougeâtre qui décrut, puis disparut, le silence redevint profond, l’obscurité redevint complète, la cécité et la surdité reprirent possession des ténèbres; et Jean Valjean, n’osant encore remuer, demeura longtemps adossé au mur, l’oreille tendue, la prunelle dilatée, regardant l’évanouissement de cette patrouille de fantômes.

Chapitre III

L’homme filé

Il faut rendre à la police de ce temps-là cette justice que, même dans les plus graves conjonctures publiques, elle accomplissait imperturbablement son devoir de voirie et de surveillance. Une émeute n’était point à ses yeux un prétexte pour laisser aux malfaiteurs la bride sur le cou, et pour négliger la société par la raison que le gouvernement était en péril. Le service ordinaire se faisait correctement à travers le service extraordinaire, et n’en était pas troublé. Au milieu d’un incalculable événement politique commencé, sous la pression d’une révolution possible, sans se laisser distraire par l’insurrection et la barricade, un agent «filait» un voleur.

C’était précisément quelque chose de pareil qui se passait dans l’après-midi du 6 juin au bord de la Seine, sur la berge de la rive droite, un peu au delà du pont des Invalides.

Il n’y a plus là de berge aujourd’hui. L’aspect des lieux a changé.

Sur cette berge, deux hommes séparés par une certaine distance semblaient s’observer, l’un évitant l’autre. Celui qui allait en avant tâchait de s’éloigner, celui qui venait par derrière tâchait de se rapprocher.

C’était comme une partie d’échecs qui se jouait de loin et silencieusement. Ni l’un ni l’autre ne semblait se presser, et ils marchaient lentement tous les deux, comme si chacun d’eux craignait de faire par trop de hâte doubler le pas à son partenaire.

On eût dit un appétit qui suit une proie, sans avoir l’air de le faire exprès. La proie était sournoise et se tenait sur ses gardes.

Les proportions voulues entre la fouine traquée et le dogue traqueur étaient observées. Celui qui tâchait d’échapper avait peu d’encolure et une chétive mine; celui qui tâchait d’empoigner, gaillard de haute stature, était de rude aspect et devait être de rude rencontre.

Le premier, se sentant le plus faible, évitait le second; mais il l’évitait d’une façon profondément furieuse; qui eût pu l’observer eût vu dans ses yeux la sombre hostilité de la fuite, et toute la menace qu’il y a dans la crainte.

La berge était solitaire; il n’y avait point de passant; pas même de batelier ni de débardeur dans les chalands amarrés çà et là.

On ne pouvait apercevoir aisément ces deux hommes que du quai en face, et pour qui les eût examinés à cette distance, l'homme qui allait devant eût apparu comme un être hérissé, déguenillé et oblique, inquiet et grelottant sous une blouse en haillons, et l'autre comme une personne classique et officielle, portant la redingote de l'autorité boutonnée jusqu'au menton.

Le lecteur reconnaîtrait peut-être ces deux hommes, s'il les voyait de plus près.

Quel était le but du dernier?

Probablement d'arriver à vêtir le premier plus chaudement.

Quand un homme habillé par l'État poursuit un homme en guenilles, c'est afin d'en faire aussi un homme habillé par l'État. Seulement la couleur est toute la question. Être habillé de bleu, c'est glorieux; être habillé de rouge, c'est désagréable.

Il y a une pourpre d'en bas.

C'est probablement quelque désagrément et quelque pourpre de ce genre que le premier désirait esquiver.

Si l'autre le laissait marcher devant et ne le saisissait pas encore, c'était, selon toute apparence, dans l'espoir de le voir aboutir à quelque rendez-vous significatif et à quelque groupe de bonne prise. Cette opération délicate s'appelle «la filature».

Ce qui rend cette conjecture tout à fait probable, c'est que l'homme boutonné, apercevant de la berge sur le quai un fiacre qui passait à vide, fit signe au cocher; le cocher comprit, reconnut évidemment à qui il avait affaire, tourna bride et se mit à suivre au pas du haut du quai les deux hommes. Ceci ne fut pas aperçu du personnage louche et déchiré qui allait en avant.

Le fiacre roulait le long des arbres des Champs-Élysées. On voyait passer au-dessus du parapet le buste du cocher, son fouet à la main.

Une des instructions secrètes de la police aux agents contient cet article: — «Avoir toujours à portée une voiture de place, en cas».

Tout en manœuvrant chacun de leur côté avec une stratégie irréprochable, ces deux hommes approchaient d'une rampe du quai descendant jusqu'à la berge qui permettait alors aux cochers de fiacre arrivant de Passy de venir à la rivière faire boire leurs chevaux. Cette rampe a été supprimée depuis, pour la symétrie; les chevaux crèvent de soif, mais l'œil est flatté.

Il était vraisemblable que l’homme en blouse allait monter par cette rampe afin d’essayer de s’échapper dans les Champs-Élysées, lieu orné d’arbres, mais en revanche fort croisé d’agents de police, et où l’autre aurait aisément main-forte.

Ce point du quai est fort peu éloigné de la maison apportée de Moret à Paris en 1824 par le colonel Brack, et dite maison de François Ier. Un corps de garde est là tout près.

À la grande surprise de son observateur, l’homme traqué ne prit point par la rampe de l’abreuvoir. Il continua de s’avancer sur la berge le long du quai.

Sa position devenait visiblement critique.

À moins de se jeter à la Seine, qu’allait-il faire?

Aucun moyen désormais de remonter sur le quai; plus de rampe et pas d’escalier; et l’on était tout près de l’endroit, marqué par le coude de la Seine vers le pont d’Iéna, où la berge, de plus en plus rétrécie, finissait en langue mince et se perdait sous l’eau. Là, il allait inévitablement se trouver bloqué entre le mur à pic à sa droite, la rivière à gauche et en face, et l’autorité sur ses talons.

Il est vrai que cette fin de la berge était masquée au regard par un monceau de déblais de six à sept pieds de haut, produit d’on ne sait quelle démolition. Mais cet homme espérait-il se cacher utilement derrière ce tas de gravats qu’il suffisait de tourner? L’expédient eût été puéril. Il n’y songeait certainement pas. L’innocence des voleurs ne va point jusque-là.

Le tas de déblais faisait au bord de l’eau une sorte d’éminence qui se prolongeait en promontoire jusqu’à la muraille du quai.

L’homme suivi arriva à cette petite colline et la doubla, de sorte qu’il cessa d’être aperçu par l’autre.

Celui-ci, ne voyant pas, n’était pas vu; il en profita pour abandonner toute dissimulation et pour marcher très rapidement. En quelques instants il fut au monceau de déblais et le tourna. Là, il s’arrêta stupéfait. L’homme qu’il chassait n’était plus là.

Éclipse totale de l’homme en blouse.

La berge n’avait guère à partir du monceau de déblais qu’une longueur d’une trentaine de pas, puis elle plongeait sous l’eau qui venait battre le mur du quai.

Le fuyard n’aurait pu se jeter à la Seine ni escalader le quai sans être vu par celui qui le suivait. Qu’était-il devenu?

L’homme à la redingote boutonnée marcha jusqu’à l’extrémité de la berge, et y resta un moment pensif, les poings convulsifs, l’œil furetant. Tout à coup il se frappa le front. Il venait d’apercevoir, au point où finissait la terre et où l’eau commençait, une grille de fer large et basse, cintrée, garnie d’une épaisse serrure et de trois gonds massifs. Cette grille, sorte de porte percée au bas du quai, s’ouvrait sur la rivière autant que sur la berge. Un ruisseau noirâtre passait dessous. Ce ruisseau se dégorgeait dans la Seine.

Au delà de ses lourds barreaux rouillés on distinguait une sorte de corridor voûté et obscur.

L’homme croisa les bras et regarda la grille d’un air de reproche.

Ce regard ne suffisant pas, il essaya de la pousser; il la secoua, elle résista solidement. Il était probable qu’elle venait d’être ouverte, quoiqu’on n’eût entendu aucun bruit, chose singulière d’une grille si rouillée; mais il était certain qu’elle avait été refermée. Cela indiquait que celui devant qui cette porte venait de tourner avait non un crochet, mais une clef.

Cette évidence éclata tout de suite à l’esprit de l’homme qui s’efforçait d’ébranler la grille et lui arracha cet épiphonème indigné:

— Voilà qui est fort! une clef du gouvernement!

Puis, se calmant immédiatement, il exprima tout un monde d’idées intérieures par cette bouffée de monosyllabes accentués presque ironiquement:

— Tiens! tiens! tiens! tiens!

Cela dit, espérant on ne sait quoi, ou voir ressortir l’homme, ou en voir entrer d’autres, il se posta aux aguets derrière le tas de déblais, avec la rage patiente du chien d’arrêt.

De son côté, le fiacre, qui se réglait sur toutes ses allures, avait fait halte au-dessus de lui près du parapet. Le cocher, prévoyant une longue station, emboîta le museau de ses chevaux dans le sac d’avoine humide en bas, si connu des Parisiens, auxquels les gouvernements, soit dit par parenthèse, le mettent quelquefois. Les rares passants du pont d’Iéna, avant de s’éloigner, tournaient la tête pour regarder un moment ces deux détails du paysage immobiles, l’homme sur la berge, le fiacre sur le quai.

Chapitre IV

Lui aussi porte sa croix

Jean Valjean avait repris sa marche et ne s’était plus arrêté. Cette marche était de plus en plus laborieuse. Le niveau de ces voûtes varie; la hauteur moyenne est d’environ cinq pieds six pouces, et a été calculée pour la taille d’un homme; Jean Valjean était forcé de se courber pour ne pas heurter Marius à la voûte; il fallait à chaque instant se baisser, puis se redresser, tâter sans cesse le mur. La moiteur des pierres et la viscosité du radier en faisaient de mauvais points d’appui, soit pour la main, soit pour le pied. Il trébuchait dans le hideux fumier de la ville. Les reflets intermittents des soupiraux n’apparaissaient qu’à de très longs intervalles, et si blêmes que le plein soleil y semblait clair de lune; tout le reste était brouillard, miasme, opacité, noirceur. Jean Valjean avait faim et soif; soif surtout; et c’est là, comme la mer, un lieu plein d’eau où l’on ne peut boire.

Sa force, qui était prodigieuse, on le sait, et fort peu diminuée par l’âge, grâce à sa vie chaste et sobre, commençait pourtant à fléchir. La fatigue lui venait, et la force en décroissant faisait croître le poids du fardeau. Marius, mort peut-être, pesait comme pèsent les corps inertes. Jean Valjean le soutenait de façon que la poitrine ne fût pas gênée et que la respiration pût toujours passer le mieux possible. Il sentait entre ses jambes le glissement rapide des rats. Un d’eux fut effaré au point de le mordre. Il lui venait de temps en temps par les bavettes des bouches de l’égout un souffle d’air frais qui le ranimait.

Il pouvait être trois heures de l’après-midi quand il arriva à l’égout de ceinture.

Il fut d’abord étonné de cet élargissement subit. Il se trouva brusquement dans une galerie dont ses mains étendues n’atteignaient point les deux murs et sous une voûte que sa tête ne touchait pas. Le Grand Égout en effet a huit pieds de large sur sept de haut.

Au point où l’égout Montmartre rejoint le Grand Égout, deux autres galeries souterraines, celle de la rue de Provence et celle de l’Abattoir, viennent faire un carrefour. Entre ces quatre voies, un moins sagace eût été indécis. Jean Valjean prit la plus large, c’est-à-dire l’égout de ceinture. Mais ici revenait la question: descendre, ou monter? Il pensa que la situation pressait, et qu’il fallait, à tout risque, gagner maintenant la Seine. En d’autres termes, descendre. Il tourna à gauche.

Bien lui en prit. Car ce serait une erreur de croire que l’égout de ceinture a deux issues, l’une vers Bercy, l’autre vers Passy, et qu’il est, comme l’indique son nom, la ceinture souterraine du Paris de la rive droite. Le Grand Égout, qui n’est, il faut s’en souvenir, autre chose que l’ancien ruisseau Ménilmontant, aboutit, si on le remonte, à un cul-de-sac, c’est-à-dire à son ancien point de départ, qui fut sa source, au pied de la butte Ménilmontant. Il n’a point de communication directe avec le branchement qui ramasse les eaux de Paris à partir du quartier Popincourt, et qui se jette dans la Seine par l’égout Amelot au-dessus de l’ancienne île Louviers. Ce branchement, qui complète l’égout collecteur, en est séparé, sous la rue Ménilmontant même, par un massif qui marque le point de partage des eaux en amont et en aval. Si Jean Valjean eût remonté la galerie, il fût arrivé, après mille efforts, épuisé de fatigue, expirant, dans les ténèbres, à une muraille. Il était perdu.

À la rigueur, en revenant un peu sur ses pas, en s’engageant dans le couloir des Filles-du-Calvaire, à la condition de ne pas hésiter à la patte d’oie souterraine du carrefour Boucherat, en prenant le corridor Saint-Louis, puis, à gauche, le boyau Saint-Gilles, puis en tournant à droite et en évitant la galerie Saint-Sébastien, il eût pu gagner l’égout Amelot, et de là, pourvu qu’il ne s’égarât point dans l’espèce d’F qui est sous la Bastille, atteindre l’issue sur la Seine près de l’Arsenal. Mais, pour cela, il eût fallu connaître à fond, et dans toutes ses ramifications et dans toutes ses percées, l’énorme madrépore de l’égout. Or, nous devons y insister, il ne savait rien de cette voirie effrayante où il cheminait; et, si on lui eût demandé dans quoi il était, il eût répondu: dans de la nuit.

Son instinct le servit bien. Descendre, c’était en effet le salut possible.

Il laissa à sa droite les deux couloirs qui se ramifient en forme de griffe sous la rue Laffitte et la rue Saint-Georges et le long corridor bifurqué de la chaussée d’Antin.

Un peu au-delà d’un affluent qui était vraisemblablement le branchement de la Madeleine, il fit halte. Il était très las. Un soupirail assez large, probablement le regard de la rue d’Anjou, donnait une lumière presque vive. Jean Valjean, avec la douceur de mouvements qu’aurait un frère pour son frère blessé, déposa Marius sur la banquette de l’égout. La face sanglante de Marius apparut sous la lueur blanche du soupirail comme au fond d’une tombe. Il avait les yeux fermés, les cheveux appliqués aux tempes comme des pinceaux séchés dans de la couleur rouge, les mains pendantes et mortes, les membres froids, du sang coagulé au coin des lèvres. Un caillot de sang s’était amassé dans le nœud de la cravate; la chemise entrait dans les plaies, le drap de l’habit frottait les coupures béantes de la chair vive. Jean Valjean, écartant du bout des doigts les vêtements, lui posa la main sur la poitrine; le cœur battait encore. Jean Valjean déchira sa chemise, banda les plaies le mieux qu’il put et arrêta le sang qui coulait; puis, se penchant dans ce demi-jour sur Marius toujours sans connaissance et presque sans souffle, il le regarda avec une inexprimable haine.

En dérangeant les vêtements de Marius, il avait trouvé dans les poches deux choses, le pain qui y était oublié depuis la veille, et le portefeuille de Marius. Il mangea le pain et ouvrit le portefeuille. Sur la première page, il trouva les quatre lignes écrites par Marius. On s’en souvient:

Jean Valjean lut, à la clarté du soupirail, ces quatre lignes, et resta un moment comme absorbé en lui-même, répétant à demi-voix: Rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, numéro six, monsieur Gillenormand. Il replaça le portefeuille dans la poche de Marius. Il avait mangé, la force lui était revenue; il reprit Marius sur son dos, lui appuya soigneusement la tête sur son épaule droite, et se remit à descendre l’égout.

Le Grand Égout, dirigé selon le thalweg de la vallée de Ménilmontant, a près de deux lieues de long. Il est pavé sur une notable partie de son parcours.

Ce flambeau du nom des rues de Paris dont nous éclairons pour le lecteur la marche souterraine de Jean Valjean, Jean Valjean ne l’avait pas. Rien ne lui disait quelle zone de la ville il traversait, ni quel trajet il avait fait. Seulement la pâleur croissante des flaques de lumière qu’il rencontrait de temps en temps lui indiqua que le soleil se retirait du pavé et que le jour ne tarderait pas à décliner; et le roulement des voitures au-dessus de sa tête, étant devenu de continu intermittent, puis ayant presque cessé, il en conclut qu’il n’était plus sous le Paris central et qu’il approchait de quelque région solitaire, voisine des boulevards extérieurs ou des quais extrêmes. Là où il y a moins de maisons et moins de rues, l’égout a moins de soupiraux.

L’obscurité s’épaississait autour de Jean Valjean. Il n’en continua pas moins d’avancer, tâtonnant dans l’ombre.

Cette ombre devint brusquement terrible.

Chapitre V

Pour le sable comme pour la femme il y a une finesse qui est perfidie

Il sentit qu’il entrait dans l’eau, et qu’il avait sous ses pieds, non plus du pavé, mais de la vase.

Il arrive parfois, sur de certaines côtes de Bretagne ou d’Écosse, qu’un homme, un voyageur ou un pêcheur, cheminant à marée basse sur la grève loin du rivage, s’aperçoit soudainement que depuis plusieurs minutes il marche avec quelque peine. La plage est sous ses pieds comme de la poix; la semelle s’y attache; ce n’est plus du sable, c’est de la glu. La grève est parfaitement sèche, mais à tous les pas qu’on fait, dès qu’on a levé le pied, l’empreinte qu’il laisse se remplit d’eau. L’œil, du reste, ne s’est aperçu d’aucun changement; l’immense plage est unie et tranquille, tout le sable a le même aspect, rien ne distingue le sol qui est solide du sol qui ne l’est plus; la petite nuée joyeuse des pucerons de mer continue de sauter tumultueusement sur les pieds du passant. L’homme suit sa route, va devant lui, appuie vers la terre, tâche de se rapprocher de la côte. Il n’est pas inquiet. Inquiet de quoi? Seulement il sent quelque chose comme si la lourdeur de ses pieds croissait à chaque pas qu’il fait. Brusquement, il enfonce. Il enfonce de deux ou trois pouces. Décidément il n’est pas dans la bonne route; il s’arrête pour s’orienter. Tout à coup il regarde à ses pieds. Ses pieds ont disparu. Le sable les couvre. Il retire ses pieds du sable, il veut revenir sur ses pas, il retourne en arrière; il enfonce plus profondément. Le sable lui vient à la cheville, il s’en arrache et se jette à gauche, le sable lui vient à mi-jambe, il se jette à droite, le sable lui vient aux jarrets. Alors il reconnaît avec une indicible terreur qu’il est engagé dans de la grève mouvante, et qu’il a sous lui le milieu effroyable où l’homme ne peut pas plus marcher que le poisson n’y peut nager. Il jette son fardeau s’il en a un, il s’allège comme un navire en détresse; il n’est déjà plus temps, le sable est au-dessus de ses genoux.

Il appelle, il agite son chapeau ou son mouchoir, le sable le gagne de plus en plus; si la grève est déserte, si la terre est trop loin, si le banc de sable est trop mal famé, s’il n’y a pas de héros dans les environs, c’est fini, il est condamné à l’enlisement. Il est condamné à cet épouvantable enterrement long, infaillible, implacable, impossible à retarder ni à hâter, qui dure des heures, qui n’en finit pas, qui vous prend debout, libre et en pleine santé, qui vous tire par les pieds, qui, à chaque effort que vous tentez, à chaque clameur que vous poussez, vous entraîne un peu plus bas, qui a l’air de vous punir de votre résistance par un redoublement d’étreinte, qui fait rentrer lentement l’homme dans la terre en lui laissant tout le temps de regarder l’horizon, les arbres, les campagnes vertes, les fumées des villages dans la plaine, les voiles des navires sur la mer, les oiseaux qui volent et qui chantent, le soleil, le ciel. L’enlisement, c’est le sépulcre qui se fait marée et qui monte du fond de la terre vers un vivant. Chaque minute est une ensevelisseuse inexorable. Le misérable essaye de s’asseoir, de se coucher, de ramper; tous les mouvements qu’il fait l’enterrent; il se redresse, il enfonce; il se sent engloutir; il hurle, implore, crie aux nuées, se tord les bras, désespère. Le voilà dans le sable jusqu’au ventre; le sable atteint la poitrine; il n’est plus qu’un buste. Il élève les mains, jette des gémissements furieux, crispe ses ongles sur la grève, veut se retenir à cette cendre, s’appuie sur les coudes pour s’arracher de cette gaine molle, sanglote frénétiquement; le sable monte. Le sable atteint les épaules, le sable atteint le cou; la face seule est visible maintenant. La bouche crie, le sable l’emplit; silence. Les yeux regardent encore, le sable les ferme; nuit. Puis le front décroît, un peu de chevelure frissonne au-dessus du sable; une main sort, troue la surface de la grève, remue et s’agite, et disparaît. Sinistre effacement d’un homme.

Quelquefois le cavalier s’enlise avec le cheval; quelquefois le charretier s’enlise avec la charrette; tout sombre sous la grève. C’est le naufrage ailleurs que dans l’eau. C’est la terre noyant l’homme. La terre, pénétrée d’océan, devient piège. Elle s’offre comme une plaine et s’ouvre comme une onde. L’abîme a de ces trahisons.

Cette funèbre aventure, toujours possible sur telle ou telle plage de la mer, était possible aussi, il y a trente ans, dans l’égout de Paris.

Avant les importants travaux commencés en 1833, la voirie souterraine de Paris était sujette à des effondrements subits.

L’eau s’infiltrait dans de certains terrains sous-jacents, particulièrement friables; le radier, qu’il fût de pavé, comme dans les anciens égouts, ou de chaux hydraulique sur béton, comme dans les nouvelles galeries, n’ayant plus de point d’appui, pliait. Un pli dans un plancher de ce genre, c’est une fente; une fente, c’est l’écroulement. Le radier croulait sur une certaine longueur. Cette crevasse, hiatus d’un gouffre de boue, s’appelait dans la langue spéciale fontis. Qu’est-ce qu’un fontis? C’est le sable mouvant des bords de la mer tout à coup rencontré sous terre; c’est la grève du mont Saint-Michel dans un égout. Le sol, détrempé, est comme en fusion; toutes ses molécules sont en suspension dans un milieu mou; ce n’est pas de la terre et ce n’est pas de l’eau. Profondeur quelquefois très grande. Rien de plus redoutable qu’une telle rencontre. Si l’eau domine, la mort est prompte, il y a engloutissement; si la terre domine, la mort est lente, il y a enlisement.

Se figure-t-on une telle mort? si l’enlisement est effroyable sur une grève de la mer, qu’est-ce dans le cloaque? Au lieu du plein air, de la pleine lumière, du grand jour, de ce clair horizon, de ces vastes bruits, de ces libres nuages d’où pleut la vie, de ces barques aperçues au loin, de cette espérance sous toutes les formes, des passants probables, du secours possible jusqu’à la dernière minute, au lieu de tout cela, la surdité, l’aveuglement, une voûte noire, un dedans de tombe déjà tout fait, la mort dans la bourbe sous un couvercle! l’étouffement lent par l’immondice, une boîte de pierre où l’asphyxie ouvre sa griffe dans la fange et vous prend à la gorge; la fétidité mêlée au râle; la vase au lieu de la grève, l’hydrogène sulfuré au lieu de l’ouragan, l’ordure au lieu de l’océan! et appeler, et grincer des dents, et se tordre, et se débattre, et agoniser, avec cette ville énorme qui n’en sait rien, et qu’on a au-dessus de sa tête!

Inexprimable horreur de mourir ainsi! La mort rachète quelquefois son atrocité par une certaine dignité terrible. Sur le bûcher, dans le naufrage, on peut être grand; dans la flamme comme dans l’écume, une attitude superbe est possible; on s’y transfigure en s’y abîmant. Mais ici point. La mort est malpropre. Il est humiliant d’expirer. Les suprêmes visions flottantes sont abjectes. Boue est synonyme de honte. C’est petit, laid, infâme. Mourir dans une tonne de malvoisie, comme Clarence, soit; dans la fosse du boueur, comme d’Escoubleau, c’est horrible. Se débattre là-dedans est hideux; en même temps qu’on agonise, on patauge. Il y a assez de ténèbres pour que ce soit l’enfer, et assez de fange pour que ce ne soit que le bourbier, et le mourant ne sait pas s’il va devenir spectre ou s’il va devenir crapaud.

Partout ailleurs le sépulcre est sinistre; ici il est difforme.

La profondeur des fontis variait, et leur longueur, et leur densité, en raison de la plus ou moins mauvaise qualité du sous-sol. Parfois un fontis était profond de trois ou quatre pieds, parfois de huit ou dix; quelquefois on ne trouvait pas le fond. La vase était ici presque solide, là presque liquide. Dans le fontis Lunière, un homme eût mis un jour à disparaître, tandis qu’il eût été dévoré en cinq minutes par le bourbier Phélippeaux. La vase porte plus ou moins selon son plus ou moins de densité. Une enfant se sauve où un homme se perd. La première loi de salut, c’est de se dépouiller de toute espèce de chargement. Jeter son sac d’outils, ou sa hotte ou son auge, c’était par là que commençait tout égoutier qui sentait le sol fléchir sous lui.

Les fontis avaient des causes diverses: friabilité du sol; quelque éboulement à une profondeur hors de la portée de l’homme; les violentes averses de l’été; l’ondée incessante de l’hiver; les longues petites pluies fines. Parfois le poids des maisons environnantes sur un terrain marneux ou sablonneux chassait les voûtes des galeries souterraines et les faisait gauchir, ou bien il arrivait que le radier éclatait et se fendait sous cette écrasante poussée. Le tassement du Panthéon a oblitéré de cette façon, il y a un siècle, une partie des caves de la montagne Sainte-Geneviève. Quand un égout s’effondrait sous la pression des maisons, le désordre, dans certaines occasions, se traduisait en haut dans la rue par une espèce d’écarts en dents de scie entre les pavés; cette déchirure se développait en ligne serpentante dans toute la longueur de la voûte lézardée, et alors, le mal étant visible, le remède pouvait être prompt. Il advenait aussi que souvent le ravage intérieur ne se révélait par aucune balafre au dehors. Et dans ce cas-là, malheur aux égoutiers. Entrant sans précaution dans l’égout défoncé, ils pouvaient s’y perdre. Les anciens registres font mention de quelques puisatiers ensevelis de la sorte dans les fontis. Ils donnent plusieurs noms; entre autres celui de l’égoutier qui s’enlisa dans un effondrement sous le cagnard de la rue Carême-Prenant, un nommé Blaise Poutrain; ce Blaise Poutrain était frère de Nicolas Poutrain qui fut le dernier fossoyeur du cimetière dit charnier des Innocents en 1785, époque où ce cimetière mourut.

Il y eut aussi ce jeune et charmant vicomte d’Escoubleau dont nous venons de parler, l’un des héros du siège de Lérida où l’on donna l’assaut en bas de soie, violons en tête. D’Escoubleau, surpris une nuit chez sa cousine, la duchesse de Sourdis, se noya dans une fondrière de l’égout Beautreillis où il s’était réfugié pour échapper au duc. Madame de Sourdis, quand on lui raconta cette mort, demanda son flacon, et oublia de pleurer à force de respirer des sels. En pareil cas, il n’y a pas d’amour qui tienne; le cloaque l’éteint. Héro refuse de laver le cadavre de Léandre. Thisbé se bouche le nez devant Pyrame et dit: Pouah!

Chapitre VI

Le fontis

Jean Valjean se trouvait en présence d’un fontis.

Ce genre d’écroulement était alors fréquent dans le sous-sol des Champs-Élysées, difficilement maniable aux travaux hydrauliques et peu conservateur des constructions souterraines à cause de son excessive fluidité. Cette fluidité dépasse l’inconsistance des sables même du quartier Saint-Georges, qui n’ont pu être vaincus que par un enrochement sur béton, et des couches glaiseuses infectées de gaz du quartier des Martyrs, si liquides que le passage n’a pu être pratiqué sous la galerie des Martyrs qu’au moyen d’un tuyau en fonte. Lorsqu’en 1836 on a démoli sous le faubourg Saint-Honoré, pour le reconstruire, le vieil égout en pierre où nous voyons en ce moment Jean Valjean engagé, le sable mouvant, qui est le sous-sol des Champs-Élysées jusqu’à la Seine, fit obstacle au point que l’opération dura près de six mois, au grand récri des riverains, surtout des riverains à hôtels et à carrosses. Les travaux furent plus que malaisés; ils furent dangereux. Il est vrai qu’il y eut quatre mois et demi de pluie et trois crues de la Seine.

Le fontis que Jean Valjean rencontrait avait pour cause l’averse de la veille. Un fléchissement du pavé mal soutenu par le sable sous-jacent avait produit un engorgement d’eau pluviale. L’infiltration s’étant faite, l’effondrement avait suivi. Le radier, disloqué, s’était affaissé dans la vase. Sur quelle longueur? Impossible de le dire. L’obscurité était là plus épaisse que partout ailleurs. C’était un trou de boue dans une caverne de nuit.

Jean Valjean sentit le pavé se dérober sous lui. Il entra dans cette fange. C’était de l’eau à la surface, de la vase au fond. Il fallait bien passer. Revenir sur ses pas était impossible. Marius était expirant, et Jean Valjean exténué. Où aller d’ailleurs? Jean Valjean avança. Du reste la fondrière parut peu profonde aux premiers pas. Mais à mesure qu’il avançait, ses pieds plongeaient. Il eut bientôt de la vase jusqu’à mi-jambe et de l’eau plus haut que les genoux. Il marchait, exhaussant de ses deux bras Marius le plus qu’il pouvait au-dessus de l’eau. La vase lui venait maintenant aux jarrets et l’eau à la ceinture. Il ne pouvait déjà plus reculer. Il enfonçait de plus en plus. Cette vase, assez dense pour le poids d’un homme, ne pouvait évidemment en porter deux. Marius et Jean Valjean eussent eu chance de s’en tirer, isolément. Jean Valjean continua d’avancer, soutenant ce mourant, qui était un cadavre peut-être.

L’eau lui venait aux aisselles; il se sentait sombrer; c’est à peine s’il pouvait se mouvoir dans la profondeur de bourbe où il était. La densité, qui était le soutien, était aussi l’obstacle. Il soulevait toujours Marius, et, avec une dépense de force inouïe, il avançait; mais il enfonçait. Il n’avait plus que la tête hors de l’eau, et ses deux bras élevant Marius. Il y a, dans les vieilles peintures du déluge, une mère qui fait ainsi de son enfant.

Il enfonça encore, il renversa sa face en arrière pour échapper à l’eau et pouvoir respirer; qui l’eût vu dans cette obscurité eût cru voir un masque flottant sur de l’ombre; il apercevait vaguement au-dessus de lui la tête pendante et le visage livide de Marius; il fit un effort désespéré, et lança son pied en avant; son pied heurta on ne sait quoi de solide. Un point d’appui. Il était temps.

Il se dressa et se tordit et s’enracina avec une sorte de furie sur ce point d’appui. Cela lui fit l’effet de la première marche d’un escalier remontant à la vie.

Ce point d’appui, rencontré dans la vase au moment suprême, était le commencement de l’autre versant du radier, qui avait plié sans se briser et s’était courbé sous l’eau comme une planche et d’un seul morceau. Les pavages bien construits font voûte et ont de ces fermetés-là. Ce fragment de radier, submergé en partie, mais solide, était une véritable rampe, et, une fois sur cette rampe, on était sauvé. Jean Valjean remonta ce plan incliné et arriva de l’autre côté de la fondrière.

En sortant de l’eau, il se heurta à une pierre et tomba sur les genoux. Il trouva que c’était juste, et y resta quelque temps, l’âme abîmée dans on ne sait quelle parole à Dieu.

Il se redressa, frissonnant, glacé, infect, courbé sous ce mourant qu’il traînait, tout ruisselant de fange, l’âme pleine d’une étrange clarté.

Chapitre VII

Quelque fois on échoue où l'on croit débarquer

Il se remit en route encore une fois.

Du reste, s'il n'avait pas laissé sa vie dans le fontis, il semblait y avoir laissé sa force. Ce suprême effort l'avait épuisé. Sa lassitude était maintenant telle, que tous les trois ou quatre pas, il était obligé de reprendre haleine, et s'appuyait au mur. Une fois, il dut s'asseoir sur la banquette pour changer la position de Marius, et il crut qu'il demeurerait là. Mais si sa vigueur était morte, son énergie ne l'était point. Il se releva.

Il marcha désespérément, presque vite, fit ainsi une centaine de pas, sans dresser la tête, presque sans respirer, et tout à coup se cogna au mur. Il était parvenu à un coude de l'égout, et, en arrivant tête basse au tournant, il avait rencontré la muraille. Il leva les yeux, et à l'extrémité du souterrain, là-bas, devant lui, loin, très loin, il aperçut une lumière. Cette fois, ce n'était pas la lumière terrible; c'était la lumière bonne et blanche. C'était le jour.

Jean Valjean voyait l'issue.

Une âme damnée qui, du milieu de la fournaise, apercevrait tout à coup la sortie de la géhenne, éprouverait ce qu'éprouva Jean Valjean. Elle volerait éperdument avec le moignon de ses ailes brûlées vers la porte radieuse. Jean Valjean ne sentit plus la fatigue, il ne sentit plus le poids de Marius, il retrouva ses jarrets d'acier, il courut plus qu'il ne marcha. À mesure qu'il approchait, l'issue se dessinait de plus en plus distinctement. C'était une arche cintrée, moins haute que la voûte qui se restreignait par degrés et moins large que la galerie qui se resserrait en même temps que la voûte s'abaissait. Le tunnel finissait en intérieur d'entonnoir; rétrécissement vicieux, imité des guichets de maisons de force, logique dans une prison, illogique dans un égout, et qui a été corrigé depuis.

Jean Valjean arriva à l'issue. Là, il s'arrêta.

C'était bien la sortie, mais on ne pouvait sortir.

L'arche était fermée d'une forte grille, et la grille, qui, selon toute apparence, tournait rarement sur ses gonds oxydés, était assujettie à son chambranle de pierre par une serrure épaisse qui, rouge de rouille, semblait une énorme brique. On voyait le trou de la clef, et le pêne robuste profondément plongé dans la gâche de fer. La serrure était visiblement fermée à double tour. C’était une de ces serrures de bastilles que le vieux Paris prodiguait volontiers.

Au delà de la grille, le grand air, la rivière, le jour, la berge très étroite, mais suffisante pour s’en aller, les quais lointains, Paris, ce gouffre où l’on se dérobe si aisément, le large horizon, la liberté. On distinguait à droite, en aval, le pont d’Iéna, et à gauche, en amont, le pont des Invalides; l’endroit eût été propice pour attendre la nuit et s’évader. C’était un des points les plus solitaires de Paris; la berge qui fait face au Gros-Caillou. Les mouches entraient et sortaient à travers les barreaux de la grille.

Il pouvait être huit heures et demie du soir. Le jour baissait.

Jean Valjean déposa Marius le long du mur sur la partie sèche du radier, puis marcha à la grille et crispa ses deux poings sur les barreaux; la secousse fut frénétique, l’ébranlement nul. La grille ne bougea pas. Jean Valjean saisit les barreaux l’un après l’autre, espérant pouvoir arracher le moins solide et s’en faire un levier pour soulever la porte ou pour briser la serrure. Aucun barreau ne remua. Les dents d’un tigre ne sont pas plus solides dans leurs alvéoles. Pas de levier; pas de pesée possible. L’obstacle était invincible. Aucun moyen d’ouvrir la porte.

Fallait-il donc finir là? Que faire? que devenir? Rétrograder; recommencer le trajet effrayant qu’il avait déjà parcouru; il n’en avait pas la force. D’ailleurs, comment traverser de nouveau cette fondrière d’où l’on ne s’était tiré que par miracle? Et après la fondrière, n’y avait-il pas cette ronde de police à laquelle, certes, on n’échapperait pas deux fois? Et puis, où aller? quelle direction prendre? Suivre la pente, ce n’était point aller au but. Arrivât-on à une autre issue, on la trouverait obstruée d’un tampon ou d’une grille. Toutes les sorties étaient indubitablement closes de cette façon. Le hasard avait descellé la grille par laquelle on était entré, mais évidemment toutes les autres bouches de l’égout étaient fermées. On n’avait réussi qu’à s’évader dans une prison.

C’était fini. Tout ce qu’avait fait Jean Valjean était inutile. L’épuisement aboutissait à l’avortement.

Ils étaient pris l’un et l’autre dans la sombre et immense toile de la mort, et Jean Valjean sentait courir sur ces fils noirs tressaillant dans les ténèbres l’épouvantable araignée.

Il tourna le dos à la grille, et tomba sur le pavé, plutôt terrassé qu’assis, près de Marius, toujours sans mouvement et sa tête s’affaissa entre ses genoux. Pas d’issue. C’était la dernière goutte de l’angoisse.

À qui songeait-il dans ce profond accablement? Ni à lui-même, ni à Marius. Il pensait à Cosette.

Chapitre VIII

Le pan de l’habit déchiré

Au milieu de cet anéantissement, une main se posa sur son épaule, et une voix qui parlait bas lui dit:

— Part à deux.

Quelqu’un dans cette ombre? Rien ne ressemble au rêve comme le désespoir. Jean Valjean crut rêver. Il n’avait point entendu de pas. Était-ce possible? Il leva les yeux.

Un homme était devant lui.

Cet homme était vêtu d’une blouse; il avait les pieds nus; il tenait ses souliers dans sa main gauche; il les avait évidemment ôtés pour pouvoir arriver jusqu’à Jean Valjean, sans qu’on l’entendît marcher.

Jean Valjean n’eut pas un moment d’hésitation. Si imprévue que fût la rencontre, cet homme lui était connu. Cet homme était Thénardier.

Quoique réveillé, pour ainsi dire, en sursaut, Jean Valjean, habitué aux alertes et aguerri aux coups inattendus qu’il faut parer vite, reprit possession sur-le-champ de toute sa présence d’esprit. D’ailleurs la situation ne pouvait empirer, un certain degré de détresse n’est plus capable de crescendo, et Thénardier lui-même ne pouvait ajouter de la noirceur à cette nuit.

Il y eut un instant d’attente.

Thénardier, élevant sa main droite à la hauteur de son front, s’en fit un abat-jour, puis il rapprocha les sourcils en clignant les yeux, ce qui, avec un léger pincement de la bouche, caractérise l’attention sagace d’un homme qui cherche à en reconnaître un autre. Il n’y réussit point. Jean Valjean, on vient de le dire, tournait le dos au jour, et était d’ailleurs si défiguré, si fangeux et si sanglant qu’en plein midi il eût été méconnaissable. Au contraire, éclairé de face par la lumière de la grille, clarté de cave, il est vrai, livide, mais précise dans sa lividité, Thénardier, comme dit l’énergique métaphore banale, sauta tout de suite aux yeux de Jean Valjean. Cette inégalité de conditions suffisait pour assurer quelque avantage à Jean Valjean dans ce mystérieux duel qui allait s’engager entre les deux situations et les deux hommes. La rencontre avait lieu entre Jean Valjean voilé et Thénardier démasqué.

Jean Valjean s’aperçut tout de suite que Thénardier ne le reconnaissait pas.

Ils se considérèrent un moment dans cette pénombre, comme s’ils se prenaient mesure. Thénardier rompit le premier le silence.

— Comment vas-tu faire pour sortir? Jean Valjean ne répondit pas.

Thénardier continua:

— Impossible de crocheter la porte. Il faut pourtant que tu t’en ailles d’ici.

— C’est vrai, dit Jean Valjean.

— Eh bien, part à deux.

— Que veux-tu dire?

— Tu as tué l’homme; c’est bien. Moi, j’ai la clef. Thénardier montrait du doigt Marius. Il poursuivit:

— Je ne te connais pas, mais je veux t’aider. Tu dois être un ami.

Jean Valjean commença à comprendre. Thénardier le prenait pour un assassin.

Thénardier reprit:

— Écoute, camarade. Tu n’as pas tué cet homme sans regarder ce qu’il avait dans ses poches. Donne-moi ma moitié. Je t’ouvre la porte.

Et, tirant à demi une grosse clef de dessous sa blouse toute trouée, il ajouta:

— Veux-tu voir comment est faite la clef des champs? Voilà.

Jean Valjean «demeura stupide», le mot est du vieux Corneille, au point de douter que ce qu’il voyait fût réel. C’était la providence apparaissant horrible, et le bon ange sortant de terre sous la forme de Thénardier.

Thénardier fourra son poing dans une large poche cachée sous sa blouse, en tira une corde et la tendit à Jean Valjean.

— Tiens, dit-il, je te donne la corde par-dessus le marché.

— Pourquoi faire, une corde?

— Il te faut aussi une pierre, mais tu en trouveras dehors. Il y a là un tas de gravats.

— Pourquoi faire, une pierre?

— Imbécile, puisque tu vas jeter le pantre à la rivière, il te faut une pierre et une corde, sans quoi ça flotterait sur l’eau.

Jean Valjean prit la corde. Il n’est personne qui n’ait de ces acceptations machinales.

Thénardier fit claquer ses doigts comme à l’arrivée d’une idée subite:

— Ah çà, camarade, comment as-tu fait pour te tirer là-bas de la fondrière? je n'ai pas osé m'y risquer. Peuh! tu ne sens pas bon.

Après une pause, il ajouta:

— Je te fais des questions, mais tu as raison de ne pas y répondre. C'est un apprentissage pour le fichu quart d'heure du juge d'instruction. Et puis, en ne parlant pas du tout, on ne risque pas de parler trop haut. C'est égal, parce que je ne vois pas ta figure et parce que je ne sais pas ton nom, tu aurais tort de croire que je ne sais pas qui tu es et ce que tu veux. Connu. Tu as un peu cassé ce monsieur; maintenant tu voudrais le serrer quelque part. Il te faut la rivière, le grand cache-sottise. Je vas te tirer d'embarras. Aider un bon garçon dans la peine, ça me botte.

Tout en approuvant Jean Valjean de se taire, il cherchait visiblement à le faire parler. Il lui poussa l'épaule, de façon à tâcher de le voir de profil, et s'écria sans sortir pourtant du médium où il maintenait sa voix:

— À propos de la fondrière, tu es un fier animal. Pourquoi n'y as-tu pas jeté l'homme?

Jean Valjean garda le silence.

Thénardier reprit en haussant jusqu'à sa pomme d'Adam la loque qui lui servait de cravate, geste qui complète l'air capable d'un homme sérieux:

— Au fait, tu as peut-être agi sagement. Les ouvriers demain en venant boucher le trou auraient, à coup sûr, trouvé le pantinois oublié là, et on aurait pu, fil à fil, brin à brin, pincer ta trace, et arriver jusqu'à toi. Quelqu'un a passé par l'égout. Qui? par où est-il sorti? l'a-t-on vu sortir? La police est pleine d'esprit. L'égout est traître, et vous dénonce. Une telle trouvaille est une rareté, cela appelle l'attention, peu de gens se servent de l'égout pour leurs affaires, tandis que la rivière est à tout le monde. La rivière, c'est la vraie fosse. Au bout d'un mois, on vous repêche l'homme aux filets de Saint-Cloud. Eh bien, qu'est-ce que cela fiche? c'est une charogne, quoi! Qui a tué cet homme? Paris. Et la justice n'informe même pas. Tu as bien fait.

Plus Thénardier était loquace, plus Jean Valjean était muet, Thénardier lui secoua de nouveau l'épaule.

— Maintenant, concluons l'affaire. Partageons. Tu as vu ma clef, montre-moi ton argent.

Thénardier était hagard, fauve, louche, un peu menaçant, pourtant amical.

Il y avait une chose étrange; les allures de Thénardier n’étaient pas simples; il n’avait pas l’air tout à fait à son aise; tout en n’affectant pas d’air mystérieux, il parlait bas; de temps en temps, il mettait son doigt sur sa bouche et murmurait: chut! Il était difficile de deviner pourquoi. Il n’y avait là personne qu’eux deux. Jean Valjean pensa que d’autres bandits étaient peut-être cachés dans quelque recoin, pas très loin, et que Thénardier ne se souciait pas de partager avec eux.

Thénardier reprit:

— Finissons. Combien le pantre avait-il dans ses profondes?

Jean Valjean se fouilla.

C’était, on s’en souvient, son habitude, d’avoir toujours de l’argent sur lui. La sombre vie d’expédients à laquelle il était condamné lui en faisait une loi. Cette fois pourtant il était pris au dépourvu. En mettant, la veille au soir, son uniforme de garde national, il avait oublié, lugubrement absorbé qu’il était, d’emporter son portefeuille. Il n’avait que quelque monnaie dans le gousset de son gilet. Cela se montait à une trentaine de francs. Il retourna sa poche, toute trempée de fange, et étala sur la banquette du radier un louis d’or, deux pièces de cinq francs et cinq ou six gros sous.

Thénardier avança la lèvre inférieure avec une torsion de cou significative.

— Tu l’as tué pour pas cher, dit-il.

Il se mit à palper, en toute familiarité, les poches de Jean Valjean et les poches de Marius. Jean Valjean, préoccupé surtout de tourner le dos au jour, le laissait faire. Tout en maniant l’habit de Marius, Thénardier, avec une dextérité d’escamoteur, trouva moyen d’en arracher, sans que Jean Valjean s’en aperçût, un lambeau qu’il cacha sous sa blouse, pensant probablement que ce morceau d’étoffe pourrait lui servir plus tard à reconnaître l’homme assassiné et l’assassin. Il ne trouva du reste rien de plus que les trente francs.

— C’est vrai, dit-il, l’un portant l’autre, vous n’avez pas plus que ça.

Et, oubliant son mot: part à deux, il prit tout.

Il hésita un peu devant les gros sous. Réflexion faite, il les prit aussi en grommelant:

— N’importe! c’est suriner les gens à trop bon marché.

Cela fait, il tira de nouveau la clef de dessous sa blouse.

— Maintenant, l’ami, il faut que tu sortes. C’est ici comme à la foire, on paye en sortant. Tu as payé, sors.

Et il se mit à rire.

Avait-il, en apportant à un inconnu l'aide de cette clef et en faisant sortir par cette porte un autre que lui, l'intention pure et désintéressée de sauver un assassin? c'est ce dont il est permis de douter.

Thénardier aida Jean Valjean à replacer Marius sur ses épaules, puis il se dirigea vers la grille sur la pointe de ses pieds nus, faisant signe à Jean Valjean de le suivre, il regarda au dehors, posa le doigt sur sa bouche, et demeura quelques secondes comme en suspens; l'inspection faite, il mit la clef dans la serrure. Le pêne glissa et la porte tourna. Il n'y eut ni craquement, ni grincement. Cela se fit très doucement. Il était visible que cette grille et ces gonds, huilés avec soin, s'ouvraient plus souvent qu'on ne l'eût pensé. Cette douceur était sinistre; on y sentait les allées et venues furtives, les entrées et les sorties silencieuses des hommes nocturnes, et les pas de loup du crime. L'égout était évidemment en complicité avec quelque bande mystérieuse. Cette grille taciturne était une receleuse.

Thénardier entre-bâilla la porte, livra tout juste passage à Jean Valjean, referma la grille, tourna deux fois la clef dans la serrure, et replongea dans l'obscurité, sans faire plus de bruit qu'un souffle. Il semblait marcher avec les pattes de velours du tigre. Un moment après, cette hideuse providence était rentrée dans l'invisible.

Jean Valjean se trouva dehors.

Chapitre IX

Marius fait l’effet d’être mort à quelqu’un qui s’y connaît

Il laissa glisser Marius sur la berge.

Ils étaient dehors!

Les miasmes, l’obscurité, l’horreur, étaient derrière lui. L’air salubre, pur, vivant, joyeux, librement respirable, l’inondait. Partout autour de lui le silence, mais le silence charmant du soleil couché en plein azur. Le crépuscule s’était fait; la nuit venait, la grande libératrice, l’amie de tous ceux qui ont besoin d’un manteau d’ombre pour sortir d’une angoisse. Le ciel s’offrait de toutes parts comme un calme énorme. La rivière arrivait à ses pieds avec le bruit d’un baiser. On entendait le dialogue aérien des nids qui se disaient bonsoir dans les ormes des Champs-Élysées. Quelques étoiles, piquant faiblement le bleu pâle du zénith et visibles à la seule rêverie, faisaient dans l’immensité de petits resplendissements imperceptibles. Le soir déployait sur la tête de Jean Valjean toutes les douceurs de l’infini.

C’était l’heure indécise et exquise qui ne dit ni oui ni non. Il y avait déjà assez de nuit pour qu’on pût s’y perdre à quelque distance, et encore assez de jour pour qu’on pût s’y reconnaître de près.

Jean Valjean fut pendant quelques secondes irrésistiblement vaincu par toute cette sérénité auguste et caressante; il y a de ces minutes d’oubli; la souffrance renonce à harceler le misérable; tout s’éclipse dans la pensée; la paix couvre le songeur comme une nuit; et sous le crépuscule qui rayonne, et à l’imitation du ciel qui s’illumine, l’âme s’étoile. Jean Valjean ne put s’empêcher de contempler cette vaste ombre claire qu’il avait au-dessus de lui; pensif, il prenait dans le majestueux silence du ciel éternel un bain d’extase et de prière. Puis, vivement, comme si le sentiment d’un devoir lui revenait, il se courba vers Marius, et, puisant de l’eau dans le creux de sa main, il lui en jeta doucement quelques gouttes sur le visage. Les paupières de Marius ne se soulevèrent pas; cependant sa bouche entrouverte respirait.

Jean Valjean allait plonger de nouveau sa main dans la rivière, quand tout à coup il sentit je ne sais quelle gêne, comme lorsqu’on a, sans le voir, quelqu’un derrière soi.

Nous avons déjà indiqué ailleurs cette impression, que tout le monde connaît.

Il se retourna.

Comme tout à l’heure, quelqu’un en effet était derrière lui.

Un homme de haute stature, enveloppé d’une longue redingote, les bras croisés, et portant dans son poing droit un casse-tête dont on voyait la pomme de plomb, se tenait debout à quelques pas en arrière de Jean Valjean accroupi sur Marius.

C’était, l’ombre aidant, une sorte d’apparition. Un homme simple en eût eu peur à cause du crépuscule, et un homme réfléchi à cause du casse-tête.

Jean Valjean reconnut Javert.

Le lecteur a deviné sans doute que le traqueur de Thénardier n’était autre que Javert. Javert, après sa sortie inespérée de la barricade, était allé à la préfecture de police, avait rendu verbalement compte au préfet en personne, dans une courte audience, puis avait repris immédiatement son service, qui impliquait, on se souvient de la note saisie sur lui, une certaine surveillance de la berge de la rive droite aux Champs-Élysées, laquelle depuis quelque temps éveillait l’attention de la police. Là, il avait aperçu Thénardier et l’avait suivi. On sait le reste.

On comprend aussi que cette grille, si obligeamment ouverte devant Jean Valjean, était une habileté de Thénardier. Thénardier sentait Javert toujours là; l’homme guetté a un flair qui ne le trompe pas; il fallait jeter un os à ce limier. Un assassin, quelle aubaine! C’était la part du feu, qu’il ne faut jamais refuser. Thénardier, en mettant dehors Jean Valjean à sa place, donnait une proie à la police, lui faisait lâcher sa piste, se faisait oublier dans une plus grosse aventure, récompensait Javert de son attente, ce qui flatte toujours un espion, gagnait trente francs, et comptait bien, quant à lui, s’échapper à l’aide de cette diversion.

Jean Valjean était passé d’un écueil à l’autre.

Ces deux rencontres coup sur coup, tomber de Thénardier en Javert, c’était rude.

Javert ne reconnut pas Jean Valjean qui, nous l’avons dit, ne se ressemblait plus à lui-même. Il ne décroisa pas les bras, assura son casse-tête dans son poing par un mouvement imperceptible, et dit d’une voix brève et calme:

— Qui êtes-vous?

— Moi.

— Qui, vous?

— Jean Valjean.

Javert mit le casse-tête entre ses dents, ploya les jarrets, inclina le torse, posa ses deux mains puissantes sur les épaules de Jean Valjean, qui s'y emboîtèrent comme dans deux étaux, l'examina, et le reconnut. Leurs visages se touchaient presque. Le regard de Javert était terrible.

Jean Valjean demeura inerte sous l'étreinte de Javert comme un lion qui consentirait à la griffe d'un lynx.

— Inspecteur Javert, dit-il, vous me tenez. D'ailleurs, depuis ce matin je me considère comme votre prisonnier. Je ne vous ai point donné mon adresse pour chercher à vous échapper. Prenez-moi. Seulement, accordez-moi une chose.

Javert semblait ne pas entendre. Il appuyait sur Jean Valjean sa prunelle fixe. Son menton froncé poussait ses lèvres vers son nez, signe de rêverie farouche. Enfin, il lâcha Jean Valjean, se dressa tout d'une pièce, reprit à plein poignet le casse-tête, et, comme dans un songe, murmura plutôt qu'il ne prononça cette question:

— Que faites-vous là? et qu'est-ce que c'est que cet homme?

Il continuait de ne plus tutoyer Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean répondit, et le son de sa voix parut réveiller Javert:

— C'est de lui précisément que je voulais vous parler. Disposez de moi comme il vous plaira; mais aidez-moi d'abord à le rapporter chez lui. Je ne vous demande que cela.

La face de Javert se contracta comme cela lui arrivait toutes les fois qu'on semblait le croire capable d'une concession. Cependant il ne dit pas non.

Il se courba de nouveau, tira de sa poche un mouchoir qu'il trempa dans l'eau, et essuya le front ensanglanté de Marius.

— Cet homme était à la barricade, dit-il à demi-voix et comme se parlant à lui-même. C'est celui qu'on appelait Marius.

Espion de première qualité, qui avait tout observé, tout écouté, tout entendu et tout recueilli, croyant mourir; qui épiait même dans l'agonie, et qui, accoudé sur la première marche du sépulcre, avait pris des notes.

Il saisit la main de Marius, cherchant le pouls.

— C'est un blessé, dit Jean Valjean.

— C'est un mort, dit Javert.

Jean Valjean répondit:

— Non. Pas encore.

— Vous l’avez donc apporté de la barricade ici? observa Javert.

Il fallait que sa préoccupation fût profonde pour qu’il n’insistât point sur cet inquiétant sauvetage par l’égout, et pour qu’il ne remarquât même pas le silence de Jean Valjean après sa question.

Jean Valjean, de son côté, semblait avoir une pensée unique. Il reprit:

— Il demeure au Marais, rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, chez son aïeul.... — Je ne sais plus le nom.

Jean Valjean fouilla dans l’habit de Marius, en tira le portefeuille, l’ouvrit à la page crayonnée par Marius, et le tendit à Javert.

Il y avait encore dans l’air assez de clarté flottante pour qu’on pût lire. Javert, en outre, avait dans l’œil la phosphorescence féline des oiseaux de nuit. Il déchiffra les quelques lignes écrites par Marius, et grommela:

— Gillenormand, rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, numéro 6.

Puis il cria:

— Cocher!

On se rappelle le fiacre qui attendait, en cas.

Javert garda le portefeuille de Marius.

Un moment après, la voiture, descendue par la rampe de l’abreuvoir, était sur la berge, Marius était déposé sur la banquette du fond, et Javert s’asseyait près de Jean Valjean sur la banquette de devant.

La portière refermée, le fiacre s’éloigna rapidement, remontant les quais dans la direction de la Bastille.

Ils quittèrent les quais et entrèrent dans les rues. Le cocher, silhouette noire sur son siège, fouettait ses chevaux maigres. Silence glacial dans le fiacre. Marius, immobile, le torse adossé au coin du fond, la tête abattue sur la poitrine, les bras pendants, les jambes roides, paraissait ne plus attendre qu’un cercueil; Jean Valjean semblait fait d’ombre, et Javert de pierre; et dans cette voiture pleine de nuit, dont l’intérieur, chaque fois qu’elle passait devant un réverbère, apparaissait lividement blêmi comme par un éclair intermittent, le hasard réunissait et semblait confronter lugubrement les trois immobilités tragiques, le cadavre, le spectre, la statue.

Chapitre X

Rentrée de l’enfant prodigue de sa vie

À chaque cahot du pavé, une goutte de sang tombait des cheveux de Marius.

Il était nuit close quand le fiacre arriva au numéro 6 de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire.

Javert mit pied à terre le premier, constata d’un coup d’œil le numéro au-dessus de la porte cochère, et, soulevant le lourd marteau de fer battu, historié à la vieille mode d’un bouc et d’un satyre qui s’affrontaient, frappa un coup violent. Le battant s’entr’ouvrit, et Javert le poussa. Le portier se montra à demi, bâillant, vaguement réveillé, une chandelle à la main.

Tout dormait dans la maison. On se couche de bonne heure au Marais; surtout les jours d’émeute. Ce bon vieux quartier, effarouché par la révolution, se réfugie dans le sommeil, comme les enfants, lorsqu’ils entendent venir Croquemitaine, cachent bien vite leur tête sous leur couverture.

Cependant Jean Valjean et le cocher tiraient Marius du fiacre, Jean Valjean le soutenant sous les aisselles et le cocher sous les jarrets.

Tout en portant Marius de la sorte, Jean Valjean glissa sa main sous les vêtements qui étaient largement déchirés, tâta la poitrine et s’assura que le cœur battait encore. Il battait même un peu moins faiblement, comme si le mouvement de la voiture avait déterminé une certaine reprise de la vie.

Javert interpella le portier du ton qui convient au gouvernement en présence du portier d’un factieux.

— Quelqu’un qui s’appelle Gillenormand?

— C’est ici. Que lui voulez-vous?

— On lui rapporte son fils.

— Son fils? dit le portier avec hébétement.

— Il est mort.

Jean Valjean, qui venait, déguenillé et souillé, derrière Javert, et que le portier regardait avec quelque horreur, lui fit signe de la tête que non.

Le portier ne parut comprendre ni le mot de Javert, ni le signe de Jean Valjean.

Javert continua:

— Il est allé à la barricade, et le voilà.

— À la barricade! s’écria le portier.

— Il s’est fait tuer. Allez réveiller le père.

Le portier ne bougeait pas.

— Allez donc! reprit Javert.

Et il ajouta:

— Demain il y aura ici de l’enterrement.

Pour Javert, les incidents habituels de la voie publique étaient classés catégoriquement, ce qui est le commencement de la prévoyance et de la surveillance, et chaque éventualité avait son compartiment; les faits possibles étaient en quelque sorte dans des tiroirs d’où ils sortaient, selon l’occasion, en quantités variables; il y avait, dans la rue, du tapage, de l’émeute, du carnaval, de l’enterrement.

Le portier se borna à réveiller Basque. Basque réveilla Nicolette; Nicolette réveilla la tante Gillenormand. Quant au grand-père, on le laissa dormir, pensant qu’il saurait toujours la chose assez tôt.

On monta Marius au premier étage, sans que personne, du reste, s’en aperçût dans les autres parties de la maison, et on le déposa sur un vieux canapé dans l’antichambre de M. Gillenormand; et, tandis que Basque allait chercher un médecin et que Nicolette ouvrait les armoires à linge, Jean Valjean sentit Javert qui lui touchait l’épaule. Il comprit, et redescendit, ayant derrière lui le pas de Javert qui le suivait.

Le portier les regarda partir comme il les avait regardés arriver, avec une somnolence épouvantée.

Ils remontèrent dans le fiacre, et le cocher sur son siège.

— Inspecteur Javert, dit Jean Valjean, accordez-moi encore une chose.

— Laquelle? demanda rudement Javert.

— Laissez-moi rentrer un moment chez moi. Ensuite vous ferez de moi ce que vous voudrez.

Javert demeura quelques instants silencieux, le menton rentré dans le collet de sa redingote, puis il baissa la vitre de devant.

— Cocher, dit-il, rue de l’Homme-Armé, numéro 7.

Chapitre XI

Ébranlement dans l’absolu

Ils ne desserrèrent plus les dents de tout le trajet.

Que voulait Jean Valjean? Achever ce qu’il avait commencé; avertir Cosette, lui dire où était Marius, lui donner peut-être quelque autre indication utile, prendre, s’il le pouvait, de certaines dispositions suprêmes. Quant à lui, quant à ce qui le concernait personnellement, c’était fini; il était saisi par Javert et n’y résistait pas; un autre que lui, en une telle situation, eût peut être vaguement songé à cette corde que lui avait donnée Thénardier et aux barreaux du premier cachot où il entrerait; mais, depuis l’évêque, il y avait dans Jean Valjean devant tout attentat, fût-ce contre lui-même, insistons-y, une profonde hésitation religieuse.

Le suicide, cette mystérieuse voie de fait sur l’inconnu, laquelle peut contenir dans une certaine mesure la mort de l’âme, était impossible à Jean Valjean.

À l’entrée de la rue de l’Homme-Armé, le fiacre s’arrêta, cette rue étant trop étroite pour que les voitures puissent y pénétrer. Javert et Jean Valjean descendirent.

Le cocher représenta humblement à «monsieur l’inspecteur» que le velours d’Utrecht de sa voiture était tout taché par le sang de l’homme assassiné et par la boue de l’assassin. C’était là ce qu’il avait compris. Il ajouta qu’une indemnité lui était due. En même temps, tirant de sa poche son livret, il pria monsieur l’inspecteur d’avoir la bonté de lui écrire dessus «un petit bout d’attestation comme quoi».

Javert repoussa le livret que lui tendait le cocher, et dit:

— Combien te faut-il, y compris ta station et la course?

— Il y a sept heures et quart, répondit le cocher, et mon velours était tout neuf. Quatre-vingts francs, monsieur l’inspecteur.

Javert tira de sa poche quatre napoléons et congédia le fiacre.

Jean Valjean pensa que l’intention de Javert était de le conduire à pied au poste des Blancs-Manteaux ou au poste des Archives, qui sont tout près.

Ils s’engagèrent dans la rue. Elle était, comme d’habitude, déserte. Javert suivait Jean Valjean. Ils arrivèrent au numéro 7. Jean Valjean frappa. La porte s’ouvrit.

— C’est bien, dit Javert. Montez.

Il ajouta avec une expression étrange et comme s’il faisait effort en parlant de la sorte:

— Je vous attends ici.

Jean Valjean regarda Javert. Cette façon de faire était peu dans les habitudes de Javert. Cependant, que Javert eût maintenant en lui une sorte de confiance hautaine, la confiance du chat qui accorde à la souris une liberté de la longueur de sa griffe, résolu qu’était Jean Valjean à se livrer et à en finir, cela ne pouvait le surprendre beaucoup. Il poussa la porte, entra dans la maison, cria au portier qui était couché et qui avait tiré le cordon de son lit: C’est moi! et monta l’escalier.

Parvenu au premier étage, il fit une pause. Toutes les voies douloureuses ont des stations. La fenêtre du palier, qui était une fenêtre-guillotine, était ouverte. Comme dans beaucoup d’anciennes maisons, l’escalier prenait jour et avait vue sur la rue. Le réverbère de la rue, situé précisément en face, jetait quelque lumière sur les marches, ce qui faisait une économie d’éclairage.

Jean Valjean, soit pour respirer, soit machinalement, mit la tête à cette fenêtre. Il se pencha sur la rue. Elle est courte et le réverbère l’éclairait d’un bout à l’autre. Jean Valjean eut un éblouissement de stupeur; il n’y avait plus personne.

Javert s’en était allé.

Chapitre XII

L'aïeul

Basque et le portier avaient transporté dans le salon Marius toujours étendu sans mouvement sur le canapé où on l'avait déposé en arrivant. Le médecin, qu'on avait été chercher, était accouru. La tante Gillenormand s'était levée.

La tante Gillenormand allait et venait, épouvantée, joignant les mains, et incapable de faire autre chose que de dire: Est-il Dieu possible! Elle ajoutait par moments: Tout va être confondu de sang! Quand la première horreur fut passée, une certaine philosophie de la situation se fit jour jusqu'à son esprit et se traduisit par cette exclamation: Cela devait finir comme ça! Elle n'alla point jusqu'au: Je l'avais bien dit! qui est d'usage dans les occasions de ce genre.

Sur l'ordre du médecin, un lit de sangle avait été dressé près du canapé. Le médecin examina Marius et, après avoir constaté que le pouls persistait, que le blessé n'avait à la poitrine aucune plaie pénétrante, et que le sang du coin des lèvres venait des fosses nasales, il le fit poser à plat sur le lit, sans oreiller, la tête sur le même plan que le corps, et même un peu plus basse, le buste nu, afin de faciliter la respiration. Mademoiselle Gillenormand, voyant qu'on déshabillait Marius, se retira. Elle se mit à dire son chapelet dans sa chambre.

Le torse n'était atteint d'aucune lésion intérieure; une balle, amortie par le portefeuille, avait dévié et fait le tour des côtes avec une déchirure hideuse, mais sans profondeur, et par conséquent sans danger. La longue marche souterraine avait achevé la dislocation de la clavicule cassée, et il y avait là de sérieux désordres. Les bras étaient sabrés. Aucune balafre ne défigurait le visage; la tête pourtant était comme couverte de hachures; que deviendraient ces blessures à la tête? s'arrêtaient-elles au cuir chevelu? entamaient-elles le crâne? On ne pouvait le dire encore. Un symptôme grave, c'est qu'elles avaient causé l'évanouissement, et l'on ne se réveille pas toujours de ces évanouissements-là. L'hémorragie, en outre, avait épuisé le blessé. À partir de la ceinture, le bas du corps avait été protégé par la barricade.

Basque et Nicolette déchiraient des linges et préparaient des bandes; Nicolette les cousait, Basque les roulait. La charpie manquant, le médecin avait provisoirement arrêté le sang des plaies avec des galettes d'ouate. À côté du lit, trois bougies brûlaient sur une table où la trousse de chirurgie était étalée. Le médecin lava le visage et les cheveux de Marius avec de l'eau froide. Un seau plein fut rouge en un instant. Le portier, sa chandelle à la main, éclairait.

Le médecin semblait songer tristement. De temps en temps, il faisait un signe de tête négatif, comme s'il répondait à quelque question qu'il s'adressait intérieurement. Mauvais signe pour le malade, ces mystérieux dialogues du médecin avec lui-même.

Au moment où le médecin essuyait la face et touchait légèrement du doigt les paupières toujours fermées, une porte s'ouvrit au fond du salon, et une longue figure pâle apparut.

C'était le grand-père.

L'émeute, depuis deux jours, avait fort agité, indigné et préoccupé M. Gillenormand. Il n'avait pu dormir la nuit précédente, et il avait eu la fièvre toute la journée. Le soir, il s'était couché de très bonne heure, recommandant qu'on verrouillât tout dans la maison, et, de fatigue, il s'était assoupi.

Les vieillards ont le sommeil fragile; la chambre de M. Gillenormand était contiguë au salon, et, quelques précautions qu'on eût prises, le bruit l'avait réveillé. Surpris de la fente de lumière qu'il voyait à sa porte, il était sorti de son lit et était venu à tâtons.

Il était sur le seuil, une main sur le bec-de-cane de la porte entre-bâillée, la tête un peu penchée en avant, et branlante, le corps serré dans une robe de chambre blanche, droite et sans plis comme un suaire, étonné; et il avait l'air d'un fantôme qui regarde dans un tombeau.

Il aperçut le lit, et sur le matelas ce jeune homme sanglant, blanc d'une blancheur de cire, les yeux fermés, la bouche ouverte, les lèvres blêmes, nu jusqu'à la ceinture, tailladé partout de plaies vermeilles, immobile, vivement éclairé.

L'aïeul eut de la tête aux pieds tout le frisson que peuvent avoir des membres ossifiés, ses yeux dont la cornée était jaune à cause du grand âge se voilèrent d'une sorte de miroitement vitreux, toute sa face prit en un instant les angles terreux d'une tête de squelette, ses bras tombèrent pendants comme si un ressort s'y fût brisé, et sa stupeur se traduisit par l'écartement des doigts de ses deux vieilles mains toutes tremblantes, ses genoux firent un angle en avant, laissant voir par l'ouverture de la robe de chambre ses pauvres jambes nues hérissées de poils blancs, et il murmura:

— Marius!

— Monsieur, dit Basque, on vient de rapporter monsieur. Il est allé à la barricade, et....

— Il est mort! cria le vieillard d'une voix terrible. Ah! le brigand!

Alors une sorte de transfiguration sépulcrale redressa ce centenaire droit comme un jeune homme.

— Monsieur, dit-il, c'est vous le médecin. Commencez par me dire une chose. Il est mort, n'est-ce pas?

Le médecin, au comble de l'anxiété, garda le silence.

M. Gillenormand se tordit les mains avec un éclat de rire effrayant.

— Il est mort! il est mort! Il s'est fait tuer aux barricades! en haine de moi! C'est contre moi qu'il a fait ça! Ah! buveur de sang! c'est comme cela qu'il me revient! Misère de ma vie, il est mort!

Il alla à la fenêtre, l'ouvrit toute grande comme s'il étouffait, et, debout devant l'ombre, il se mit à parler dans la rue à la nuit:

— Percé, sabré, égorgé, exterminé, déchiqueté, coupé en morceaux! voyez-vous ça, le gueux! Il savait bien que je l'attendais, et que je lui avais fait arranger sa chambre, et que j'avais mis au chevet de mon lit son portrait du temps qu'il était petit enfant! Il savait bien qu'il n'avait qu'à revenir, et que depuis des ans je le rappelais, et que je restais le soir au coin de mon feu les mains sur mes genoux ne sachant que faire, et que j'en étais imbécile! Tu savais bien cela, que tu n'avais qu'à rentrer, et qu'à dire: C'est moi, et que tu serais le maître de la maison, et que je t'obéirais, et que tu ferais tout ce que tu voudrais de ta vieille ganache de grand-père! Tu le savais bien, et tu as dit: Non, c'est un royaliste, je n'irai pas! Et tu es allé aux barricades, et tu t'es fait tuer par méchanceté! pour te venger de ce que je t'avais dit au sujet de monsieur le duc de Berry! C'est ça qui est infâme! Couchez-vous donc et dormez donc tranquillement! Il est mort. Voilà mon réveil.

Le médecin, qui commençait à être inquiet de deux côtés, quitta un moment Marius et alla à M. Gillenormand, et lui prit le bras. L'aïeul se retourna, le regarda avec des yeux qui semblaient agrandis et sanglants, et lui dit avec calme:

— Monsieur, je vous remercie. Je suis tranquille, je suis un homme, j'ai vu la mort de Louis XVI, je sais porter les événements. Il y a une chose qui est terrible, c’est de penser que ce sont vos journaux qui font tout le mal. Vous aurez des écrivassiers, des parleurs, des avocats, des orateurs, des tribunes, des discussions, des progrès, des lumières, des droits de l’homme, de la liberté de la presse, et voilà comment on vous rapportera vos enfants dans vos maisons! Ah! Marius! c’est abominable! Tué! mort avant moi! Une barricade! Ah! le bandit! Docteur, vous demeurez dans le quartier, je crois? Oh! je vous connais bien. Je vois de ma fenêtre passer votre cabriolet. Je vais vous dire. Vous auriez tort de croire que je suis en colère. On ne se met pas en colère contre un mort. Ce serait stupide. C’est un enfant que j’ai élevé. J’étais déjà vieux, qu’il était encore tout petit. Il jouait aux Tuileries avec sa petite pelle et sa petite chaise, et, pour que les inspecteurs ne grondassent pas, je bouchais à mesure avec ma canne les trous qu’il faisait dans la terre avec sa pelle. Un jour il a crié: À bas Louis XVIII! et s’en est allé. Ce n’est pas ma faute. Il était tout rose et tout blond. Sa mère est morte. Avez-vous remarqué que tous les petits enfants sont blonds? À quoi cela tient-il? C’est le fils d’un de ces brigands de la Loire, mais les enfants sont innocents des crimes de leurs pères. Je me le rappelle quand il était haut comme ceci. Il ne pouvait pas parvenir à prononcer les d. Il avait un parler si doux et si obscur qu’on eût cru un oiseau. Je me souviens qu’une fois, devant l’Hercule Farnèse, on faisait cercle pour s’émerveiller et l’admirer, tant il était beau, cet enfant! C’était une tête comme il y en a dans les tableaux. Je lui faisais ma grosse voix, je lui faisais peur avec ma canne, mais il savait bien que c’était pour rire. Le matin, quand il entrait dans ma chambre, je bougonnais, mais cela me faisait l’effet du soleil. On ne peut pas se défendre contre ces mioches-là. Ils vous prennent, ils vous tiennent, ils ne vous lâchent plus. La vérité est qu’il n’y avait pas d’amour comme cet enfant-là. Maintenant, qu’est-ce que vous dites de vos Lafayette, de vos Benjamin Constant, et de vos Tirecuir de Corcelles, qui me le tuent! Ça ne peut pas passer comme ça.

Il s’approcha de Marius toujours livide et sans mouvement, et auquel le médecin était revenu, et il recommença à se tordre les bras. Les lèvres blanches du vieillard remuaient, comme machinalement, et laissaient passer, comme des souffles dans un râle, des mots presque indistincts qu’on entendait à peine: — Ah! sans cœur! Ah! clubiste! Ah! scélérat! Ah! septembriseur! — Reproches à voix basse d’un agonisant à un cadavre.

Peu à peu, comme il faut toujours que les éruptions intérieures se fassent jour, l’enchaînement des paroles revint, mais l’aïeul paraissait n’avoir plus la force de les prononcer; sa voix était tellement sourde et éteinte qu'elle semblait venir de l'autre bord d'un abîme:

— Ça m'est bien égal, je vais mourir aussi, moi. Et dire qu'il n'y a pas dans Paris une drôlesse qui n'eût été heureuse de faire le bonheur de ce misérable! Un gredin qui, au lieu de s'amuser et de jouir de la vie, est allé se battre et s'est fait mitrailler comme une brute! Et pour qui, pourquoi? Pour la république! Au lieu d'aller danser à la Chaumière, comme c'est le devoir des jeunes gens! C'est bien la peine d'avoir vingt ans. La république, belle fichue sottise! Pauvres mères, faites donc de jolis garçons! Allons, il est mort. Ça fera deux enterrements sous la porte cochère. Tu t'es donc fait arranger comme cela pour les beaux yeux du général Lamarque! Qu'est-ce qu'il t'avait fait, ce général Lamarque! Un sabreur! un bavard! Se faire tuer pour un mort! S'il n'y a pas de quoi rendre fou! Comprenez cela! À vingt ans! Et sans retourner la tête pour regarder s'il ne laissait rien derrière lui! Voilà maintenant les pauvres vieux bonshommes qui sont forcés de mourir tout seuls. Crève dans ton coin, hibou! Eh bien, au fait, tant mieux, c'est ce que j'espérais, ça va me tuer net. Je suis trop vieux, j'ai cent ans, j'ai cent mille ans, il y a longtemps que j'ai le droit d'être mort. De ce coup-là, c'est fait. C'est donc fini, quel bonheur! À quoi bon lui faire respirer de l'ammoniaque et tout ce tas de drogues? Vous perdez votre peine, imbécile de médecin! Allez, il est mort, bien mort. Je m'y connais, moi qui suis mort aussi. Il n'a pas fait la chose à demi. Oui, ce temps-ci est infâme, infâme, infâme, et voilà ce que je pense de vous, de vos idées, de vos systèmes, de vos maîtres, de vos oracles, de vos docteurs, de vos garnements d'écrivains, de vos gueux de philosophes, et de toutes les révolutions qui effarouchent depuis soixante ans les nuées de corbeaux des Tuileries! Et puisque tu as été sans pitié en te faisant tuer comme cela, je n'aurai même pas de chagrin de ta mort, entends-tu, assassin!

En ce moment, Marius ouvrit lentement les paupières, et son regard, encore voilé par l'étonnement léthargique, s'arrêta sur M. Gillenormand.

— Marius! cria le vieillard. Marius! mon petit Marius! mon enfant! mon fils bien-aimé! Tu ouvres les yeux, tu me regardes, tu es vivant, merci!

Et il tomba évanoui.

Livre quatrième — Javert déraillé

Chapitre I

Javert déraillé

Javert s'était éloigné à pas lents de la rue de l'Homme-Armé.

Il marchait la tête baissée, pour la première fois de sa vie, et, pour la première fois de sa vie également, les mains derrière le dos.

Jusqu'à ce jour, Javert n'avait pris, dans les deux attitudes de Napoléon, que celle qui exprime la résolution, les bras croisés sur la poitrine, celle qui exprime l'incertitude, les mains derrière le dos, lui était inconnue. Maintenant, un changement s'était fait; toute sa personne, lente et sombre, était empreinte d'anxiété.

Il s'enfonça dans les rues silencieuses.

Cependant, il suivait une direction.

Il coupa par le plus court vers la Seine, gagna le quai des Ormes, longea le quai, dépassa la Grève, et s'arrêta, à quelque distance du poste de la place du Châtelet, à l'angle du pont Notre-Dame. La Seine fait là, entre le pont Notre-Dame et le Pont au Change d'une part, et d'autre part entre le quai de la Mégisserie et le quai aux Fleurs, une sorte de lac carré traversé par un rapide.

Ce point de la Seine est redouté des mariniers. Rien n'est plus dangereux que ce rapide, resserré à cette époque et irrité par les pilotis du moulin du pont, aujourd'hui démoli. Les deux ponts, si voisins l'un de l'autre, augmentent le péril; l'eau se hâte formidablement sous les arches. Elle y roule de larges plis terribles; elle s'y accumule et s'y entasse; le flot fait effort aux piles des ponts comme pour les arracher avec de grosses cordes liquides. Les hommes qui tombent là ne reparaissent pas; les meilleurs nageurs s'y noient.

Javert appuya ses deux coudes sur le parapet, son menton dans ses deux mains, et, pendant que ses ongles se crispaient machinalement dans l'épaisseur de ses favoris, il songea.

Une nouveauté, une révolution, une catastrophe, venait de se passer au fond de lui-même; et il y avait de quoi s'examiner.

Javert souffrait affreusement.

Depuis quelques heures Javert avait cessé d'être simple. Il était troublé; ce cerveau, si limpide dans sa cécité, avait perdu sa transparence; il y avait un nuage dans ce cristal. Javert sentait dans sa conscience le devoir se dédoubler, et il ne pouvait se le dissimuler. Quand il avait rencontré si inopinément Jean Valjean sur la berge de la Seine, il y avait eu en lui quelque chose du loup qui ressaisit sa proie et du chien qui retrouve son maître.

Il voyait devant lui deux routes également droites toutes deux, mais il en voyait deux; et cela le terrifiait, lui qui n'avait jamais connu dans sa vie qu'une ligne droite. Et, angoisse poignante, ces deux routes étaient contraires. L'une de ces deux lignes droites excluait l'autre. Laquelle des deux était la vraie?

Sa situation était inexprimable.

Devoir la vie à un malfaiteur, accepter cette dette et la rembourser, être, en dépit de soi-même, de plain-pied avec un repris de justice, et lui payer un service avec un autre service; se laisser dire: Va-t'en, et lui dire à son tour: Sois libre; sacrifier à des motifs personnels le devoir, cette obligation générale, et sentir dans ces motifs personnels quelque chose de général aussi, et de supérieur peut-être; trahir la société pour rester fidèle à sa conscience; que toutes ces absurdités se réalisassent et qu'elles vinssent s'accumuler sur lui-même, c'est ce dont il était atterré.

Une chose l'avait étonné, c'était que Jean Valjean lui eût fait grâce, et une chose l'avait pétrifié, c'était que, lui Javert, il eût fait grâce à Jean Valjean.

Où en était-il? Il se cherchait et ne se trouvait plus.

Que faire maintenant? Livrer Jean Valjean, c'était mal; laisser Jean Valjean libre, c'était mal. Dans le premier cas, l'homme de l'autorité tombait plus bas que l'homme du bagne; dans le second, un forçat montait plus haut que la loi et mettait le pied dessus. Dans les deux cas, déshonneur pour lui Javert. Dans tous les partis qu'on pouvait prendre, il y avait de la chute. La destinée a de certaines extrémités à pic sur l'impossible, et au delà desquelles la vie n'est plus qu'un précipice. Javert était à une de ces extrémités-là.

Une de ses anxiétés, c'était d'être contraint de penser. La violence même de toutes ces émotions contradictoires l'y obligeait. La pensée, chose inusitée pour lui, et singulièrement douloureuse.

Il y a toujours dans la pensée une certaine quantité de rébellion intérieure; et il s'irritait d'avoir cela en lui.

La pensée, sur n’importe quel sujet en dehors du cercle étroit de ses fonctions, eût été pour lui, dans tous les cas, une inutilité et une fatigue; mais la pensée sur la journée qui venait de s’écouler était une torture. Il fallait bien cependant regarder dans sa conscience après de telles secousses, et se rendre compte de soi-même à soi-même.

Ce qu’il venait de faire lui donnait le frisson. Il avait, lui Javert, trouvé bon de décider, contre tous les règlements de police, contre toute l’organisation sociale et judiciaire, contre le code tout entier, une mise en liberté; cela lui avait convenu; il avait substitué ses propres affaires aux affaires publiques; n’était-ce pas inqualifiable? Chaque fois qu’il se mettait en face de cette action sans nom qu’il avait commise, il tremblait de la tête aux pieds. À quoi se résoudre? Une seule ressource lui restait: retourner en hâte rue de l’Homme-Armé, et faire écrouer Jean Valjean. Il était clair que c’était cela qu’il fallait faire. Il ne pouvait.

Quelque chose lui barrait le chemin de ce côté-là.

Quelque chose? Quoi? Est-ce qu’il y a au monde autre chose que les tribunaux, les sentences exécutoires, la police et l’autorité? Javert était bouleversé.

Un galérien sacré! un forçat imprenable à la justice! et cela par le fait de Javert!

Que Javert et Jean Valjean, l’homme fait pour sévir, l’homme fait pour subir, que ces deux hommes, qui étaient l’un et l’autre la chose de la loi, en fussent venus à ce point de se mettre tous les deux au-dessus de la loi, est-ce que ce n’était pas effrayant?

Quoi donc! de telles énormités arriveraient et personne ne serait puni! Jean Valjean, plus fort que l’ordre social tout entier, serait libre, et lui Javert continuerait de manger le pain du gouvernement!

Sa rêverie devenait peu à peu terrible.

Il eût pu à travers cette rêverie se faire encore quelque reproche au sujet de l’insurgé rapporté rue des Filles-du-Calvaire; mais il n’y songeait pas. La faute moindre se perdait dans la plus grande. D’ailleurs cet insurgé était évidemment un homme mort, et, légalement, la mort éteint la poursuite.

Jean Valjean, c’était là le poids qu’il avait sur l’esprit.

Jean Valjean le déconcertait. Tous les axiomes qui avaient été les points d’appui de toute sa vie s’écroulaient devant cet homme. La générosité de Jean Valjean envers lui Javert l’accablait. D’autres faits, qu’il se rappelait et qu’il avait autrefois traités de mensonges et de folies, lui revenaient maintenant comme des réalités. M. Madeleine reparaissait derrière Jean Valjean, et les deux figures se superposaient de façon à n'en plus faire qu'une, qui était vénérable. Javert sentait que quelque chose d'horrible pénétrait dans son âme, l'admiration pour un forçat. Le respect d'un galérien, est-ce que c'est possible? Il en frémissait, et ne pouvait s'y soustraire. Il avait beau se débattre, il était réduit à confesser dans son for intérieur la sublimité de ce misérable. Cela était odieux.

Un malfaiteur bienfaisant, un forçat compatissant, doux, secourable, clément, rendant le bien pour le mal, rendant le pardon pour la haine, préférant la pitié à la vengeance, aimant mieux se perdre que de perdre son ennemi, sauvant celui qui l'a frappé, agenouillé sur le haut de la vertu, plus voisin de l'ange que de l'homme! Javert était contraint de s'avouer que ce monstre existait.

Cela ne pouvait durer ainsi.

Certes, et nous y insistons, il ne s'était pas rendu sans résistance à ce monstre, à cet ange infâme, à ce héros hideux, dont il était presque aussi indigné que stupéfait. Vingt fois, quand il était dans cette voiture face à face avec Jean Valjean, le titre légal avait rugi en lui. Vingt fois, il avait été tenté de se jeter sur Jean Valjean, de le saisir et de le dévorer, c'est-à-dire de l'arrêter. Quoi de plus simple en effet? Crier au premier poste devant lequel on passe: — Voilà un repris de justice en rupture de ban! appeler les gendarmes et leur dire: — Cet homme est pour vous! ensuite s'en aller, laisser là ce damné, ignorer le reste, et ne plus se mêler de rien. Cet homme est à jamais le prisonnier de la loi; la loi en fera ce qu'elle voudra. Quoi de plus juste? Javert s'était dit tout cela; il avait voulu passer outre, agir, appréhender l'homme, et, alors comme à présent, il n'avait pas pu; et chaque fois que sa main s'était convulsivement levée vers le collet de Jean Valjean, sa main, comme sous un poids énorme, était retombée, et il avait entendu au fond de sa pensée une voix, une étrange voix qui lui criait: — C'est bien. Livre ton sauveur. Ensuite fais apporter la cuvette de Ponce-Pilate, et lave-toi les griffes.

Puis sa réflexion tombait sur lui-même, et à côté de Jean Valjean grandi, il se voyait, lui Javert, dégradé.

Un forçat était son bienfaiteur!

Mais aussi pourquoi avait-il permis à cet homme de le laisser vivre? Il avait, dans cette barricade, le droit d'être tué. Il aurait dû user de ce droit.

Appeler les autres insurgés à son secours contre Jean Valjean, se faire fusiller de force, cela valait mieux.

Sa suprême angoisse, c’était la disparition de la certitude. Il se sentait déraciné. Le code n’était plus qu’un tronçon dans sa main. Il avait affaire à des scrupules d’une espèce inconnue. Il se faisait en lui une révélation sentimentale, entièrement distincte de l’affirmation légale, son unique mesure jusqu’alors. Rester dans l’ancienne honnêteté, cela ne suffisait plus. Tout un ordre de faits inattendus surgissait et le subjuguait. Tout un monde nouveau apparaissait à son âme, le bienfait accepté et rendu, le dévouement, la miséricorde, l’indulgence, les violences faites par la pitié à l’austérité, l’acception de personnes, plus de condamnation définitive, plus de damnation, la possibilité d’une larme dans l’œil de la loi, on ne sait quelle justice selon Dieu allant en sens inverse de la justice selon les hommes. Il apercevait dans les ténèbres l’effrayant lever d’un soleil moral inconnu; il en avait l’horreur et l’éblouissement. Hibou forcé à des regards d’aigle.

Il se disait que c’était donc vrai, qu’il y avait des exceptions, que l’autorité pouvait être décontenancée, que la règle pouvait rester court devant un fait, que tout ne s’encadrait pas dans le texte du code, que l’imprévu se faisait obéir, que la vertu d’un forçat pouvait tendre un piège à la vertu d’un fonctionnaire, que le monstrueux pouvait être divin, que la destinée avait de ces embuscades-là, et il songeait avec désespoir que lui-même n’avait pas été à l’abri d’une surprise.

Il était forcé de reconnaître que la bonté existait. Ce forçat avait été bon. Et lui-même, chose inouïe, il venait d’être bon. Donc il se dépravait.

Il se trouvait lâche. Il se faisait horreur.

L’idéal pour Javert, ce n’était pas d’être humain, d’être grand, d’être sublime; c’était d’être irréprochable.

Or, il venait de faillir.

Comment en était-il arrivé là? comment tout cela s’était-il passé? Il n’aurait pu se le dire à lui-même. Il prenait sa tête entre ses deux mains, mais il avait beau faire, il ne parvenait pas à se l’expliquer.

Il avait certainement toujours eu l’intention de remettre Jean Valjean à la loi, dont Jean Valjean était le captif, et dont lui, Javert, était l’esclave. Il ne s’était pas avoué un seul instant, pendant qu’il le tenait, qu’il eût la pensée de le laisser aller. C’était en quelque sorte à son insu que sa main s’était ouverte et l’avait lâché.

Toutes sortes de nouveautés énigmatiques s’entr’ouvraient devant ses yeux. Il s’adressait des questions, et il se faisait des réponses, et ses réponses l’effrayaient. Il se demandait: Ce forçat, ce désespéré, que j’ai poursuivi jusqu’à le persécuter, et qui m’a eu sous son pied, et qui pouvait se venger, et qui le devait tout à la fois pour sa rancune et pour sa sécurité, en me laissant la vie, en me faisant grâce, qu’a-t-il fait? Son devoir. Non. Quelque chose de plus. Et moi, en lui faisant grâce à mon tour, qu’ai-je fait? Mon devoir. Non. Quelque chose de plus. Il y a donc quelque chose de plus que le devoir? Ici il s’effarait; sa balance se disloquait; l’un des plateaux tombait dans l’abîme, l’autre s’en allait dans le ciel; et Javert n’avait pas moins d’épouvante de celui qui était en haut que de celui qui était en bas. Sans être le moins du monde ce qu’on appelle voltairien, ou philosophe, ou incrédule, respectueux au contraire, par instinct, pour l’église établie, il ne la connaissait que comme un fragment auguste de l’ensemble social; l’ordre était son dogme et lui suffisait; depuis qu’il avait l’âge d’homme et de fonctionnaire, il mettait dans la police à peu près toute sa religion; étant, et nous employons ici les mots sans la moindre ironie et dans leur acception la plus sérieuse, étant, nous l’avons dit, espion comme on est prêtre. Il avait un supérieur, M. Gisquet; il n’avait guère songé jusqu’à ce jour à cet autre supérieur, Dieu.

Ce chef nouveau, Dieu, il le sentait inopinément, et en était troublé.

Il était désorienté de cette présence inattendue; il ne savait que faire de ce supérieur-là, lui qui n’ignorait pas que le subordonné est tenu de se courber toujours, qu’il ne doit ni désobéir, ni blâmer, ni discuter, et que, vis-à-vis d’un supérieur qui l’étonne trop, l’inférieur n’a d’autre ressource que sa démission.

Mais comment s’y prendre pour donner sa démission à Dieu?

Quoi qu’il en fût, et c’était toujours là qu’il en revenait, un fait pour lui dominait tout, c’est qu’il venait de commettre une infraction épouvantable. Il venait de fermer les yeux sur un condamné récidiviste en rupture de ban. Il venait d’élargir un galérien. Il venait de voler aux lois un homme qui leur appartenait. Il avait fait cela. Il ne se comprenait plus. Il n’était pas sûr d’être lui-même. Les raisons mêmes de son action lui échappaient, il n’en avait que le vertige. Il avait vécu jusqu’à ce moment de cette foi aveugle qui engendre la probité ténébreuse. Cette foi le quittait, cette probité lui faisait défaut. Tout ce qu’il avait cru se dissipait. Des vérités dont il ne voulait pas l’obsédaient inexorablement. Il fallait désormais être un autre homme. Il souffrait les étranges douleurs d’une conscience brusquement opérée de la cataracte. Il voyait ce qu’il lui répugnait de voir. Il se sentait vidé, inutile, disloqué de sa vie passée, destitué, dissous. L’autorité était morte en lui. Il n’avait plus de raison d’être.

Situation terrible! être ému.

Être le granit, et douter! être la statue du châtiment fondue tout d’une pièce dans le moule de la loi, et s’apercevoir subitement qu’on a sous sa mamelle de bronze quelque chose d’absurde et de désobéissant qui ressemble presque à un cœur! en venir à rendre le bien pour le bien, quoiqu’on se soit dit jusqu’à ce jour que ce bien-là c’est le mal! être le chien de garde, et lécher! être la glace, et fondre! être la tenaille, et devenir une main! se sentir tout à coup des doigts qui s’ouvrent! lâcher prise, chose épouvantable!

L’homme projectile ne sachant plus sa route, et reculant!

Être obligé de s’avouer ceci: l’infaillibilité n’est pas infaillible, il peut y avoir de l’erreur dans le dogme, tout n’est pas dit quand un code a parlé, la société n’est pas parfaite, l’autorité est compliquée de vacillation, un craquement dans l’immuable est possible, les juges sont des hommes, la loi peut se tromper, les tribunaux peuvent se méprendre! voir une fêlure dans l’immense vitre bleue du firmament!

Ce qui se passait dans Javert, c’était le Fampoux d’une conscience rectiligne, la mise hors de voie d’une âme, l’écrasement d’une probité irrésistiblement lancée en ligne droite et se brisant à Dieu. Certes, cela était étrange. Que le chauffeur de l’ordre, que le mécanicien de l’autorité, monté sur l’aveugle cheval de fer à voie rigide, puisse être désarçonné par un coup de lumière! que l’incommutable, le direct, le correct, le géométrique, le passif, le parfait, puisse fléchir! qu’il y ait pour la locomotive un chemin de Damas!

Dieu, toujours intérieur à l’homme, et réfractaire, lui la vraie conscience, à la fausse, défense à l’étincelle de s’éteindre, ordre au rayon de se souvenir du soleil, injonction à l’âme de reconnaître le véritable absolu quand il se confronte avec l’absolu fictif, l’humanité imperdable, le cœur humain inamissible, ce phénomène splendide, le plus beau peut-être de nos prodiges intérieurs, Javert le comprenait-il? Javert le pénétrait-il? Javert s’en rendait-il compte? Évidemment non. Mais sous la pression de cet incompréhensible incontestable, il sentait son crâne s’entr’ouvrir.

Il était moins le transfiguré que la victime de ce prodige. Il le subissait, exaspéré. Il ne voyait dans tout cela qu'une immense difficulté d'être. Il lui semblait que désormais sa respiration était gênée à jamais.

Avoir sur sa tête de l'inconnu, il n'était pas accoutumé à cela.

Jusqu'ici tout ce qu'il avait au-dessus de lui avait été pour son regard une surface nette, simple, limpide; là rien d'ignoré, ni d'obscur; rien qui ne fût défini, coordonné, enchaîné, précis, exact, circonscrit, limité, fermé; tout prévu; l'autorité était une chose plane; aucune chute en elle, aucun vertige devant elle. Javert n'avait jamais vu de l'inconnu qu'en bas. L'irrégulier, l'inattendu, l'ouverture désordonnée du chaos, le glissement possible dans un précipice, c'était là le fait des régions inférieures, des rebelles, des mauvais, des misérables. Maintenant Javert se renversait en arrière, et il était brusquement effaré par cette apparition inouïe: un gouffre en haut.

Quoi donc! on était démantelé de fond en comble! on était déconcerté, absolument! À quoi se fier! Ce dont on était convaincu s'effondrait!

Quoi! le défaut de la cuirasse de la société pouvait être trouvé par un misérable magnanime! Quoi! un honnête serviteur de la loi pouvait se voir tout à coup pris entre deux crimes, le crime de laisser échapper un homme, et le crime de l'arrêter! Tout n'était pas certain dans la consigne donnée par l'état au fonctionnaire! Il pouvait y avoir des impasses dans le devoir! Quoi donc! tout cela était réel! était-il vrai qu'un ancien bandit, courbé sous les condamnations, pût se redresser et finir par avoir raison? était-ce croyable? y avait-il donc des cas où la loi devait se retirer devant le crime transfiguré en balbutiant des excuses?

Oui, cela était! et Javert le voyait! et Javert le touchait! et non seulement il ne pouvait le nier, mais il y prenait part. C'étaient des réalités. Il était abominable que les faits réels pussent arriver à une telle difformité.

Si les faits faisaient leur devoir, ils se borneraient à être les preuves de la loi; les faits, c'est Dieu qui les envoie. L'anarchie allait-elle donc maintenant descendre de là-haut?

Ainsi, — et dans le grossissement de l'angoisse, et dans l'illusion d'optique de la consternation, tout ce qui eût pu restreindre et corriger son impression s'effaçait, et la société, et le genre humain, et l'univers se résumaient désormais à ses yeux dans un linéament simple et terrible, — ainsi la pénalité, la chose jugée, la force due à la législation, les arrêts des cours souveraines, la magistrature, le gouvernement, la prévention et la répression, la sagesse officielle, l'infaillibilité légale, le principe d'autorité, tous les dogmes sur lesquels repose la sécurité politique et civile, la souveraineté, la justice, la logique découlant du code, l'absolu social, la vérité publique, tout cela, décombre, monceau, chaos; lui-même Javert, le guetteur de l'ordre, l'incorruptibilité au service de la police, la providence-dogue de la société, vaincu et terrassé; et sur toute cette ruine un homme debout, le bonnet vert sur la tête et l'auréole au front; voilà à quel bouleversement il en était venu; voilà la vision effroyable qu'il avait dans l'âme.

Que cela fût supportable. Non.

État violent, s'il en fut. Il n'y avait que deux manières d'en sortir. L'une d'aller résolûment à Jean Valjean, et de rendre au cachot l'homme du bagne. L'autre....

Javert quitta le parapet, et, la tête haute cette fois, se dirigea d'un pas ferme vers le poste indiqué par une lanterne à l'un des coins de la place du Châtelet.

Arrivé là, il aperçut par la vitre un sergent de ville, et entra. Rien qu'à la façon dont ils poussent la porte d'un corps de garde, les hommes de police se reconnaissent entre eux. Javert se nomma, montra sa carte au sergent, et s'assit à la table du poste où brûlait une chandelle. Il y avait sur la table une plume, un encrier de plomb, et du papier en cas pour les procès-verbaux éventuels et les consignations des rondes de nuit.

Cette table, toujours complétée par sa chaise de paille, est une institution; elle existe dans tous les postes de police; elle est invariablement ornée d'une soucoupe en buis pleine de sciure de bois et d'une grimace en carton pleine de pains à cacheter rouges, et elle est l'étage inférieur du style officiel. C'est à elle que commence la littérature de l'État.

Javert prit la plume et une feuille de papier et se mit à écrire. Voici ce qu'il écrivit:

QUELQUES OBSERVATIONS POUR LE BIEN DU SERVICE.

«Premièrement: je prie monsieur le préfet de jeter les yeux.

«Deuxièmement: les détenus arrivant de l'instruction ôtent leurs souliers et restent pieds nus sur la dalle pendant qu'on les fouille. Plusieurs toussent en rentrant à la prison. Cela entraîne des dépenses d'infirmerie.

«Troisièmement: la filature est bonne, avec relais des agents de distance en distance, mais il faudrait que, dans les occasions importantes, deux agents au moins ne se perdissent pas de vue, attendu que, si, pour une cause quelconque, un agent vient à faiblir dans le service, l’autre le surveille et le supplée.

«Quatrièmement: on ne s’explique pas pourquoi le règlement spécial de la prison des Madelonnettes interdit au prisonnier d’avoir une chaise, même en la payant.

«Cinquièmement: aux Madelonnettes, il n’y a que deux barreaux à la cantine, ce qui permet à la cantinière de laisser toucher sa main aux détenus.

«Sixièmement: les détenus, dits aboyeurs, qui appellent les autres détenus au parloir, se font payer deux sous par le prisonnier pour crier son nom distinctement. C’est un vol.

«Septièmement: pour un fil courant, on retient dix sous au prisonnier dans l’atelier des tisserands; c’est un abus de l’entrepreneur, puisque la toile n’est pas moins bonne.

«Huitièmement: il est fâcheux que les visitants de la Force aient à traverser la cour des mômes pour se rendre au parloir de Sainte-Marie-l’Égyptienne.

«Neuvièmement: il est certain qu’on entend tous les jours des gendarmes raconter dans la cour de la préfecture des interrogatoires de prévenus par les magistrats. Un gendarme, qui devrait être sacré, répéter ce qu’il a entendu dans le cabinet de l’instruction, c’est là un désordre grave.

«Dixièmement: Mme Henry est une honnête femme; sa cantine est fort propre; mais il est mauvais qu’une femme tienne le guichet de la souricière du secret. Cela n’est pas digne de la Conciergerie d’une grande civilisation.»

Javert écrivit ces lignes de son écriture la plus calme et la plus correcte, n’omettant pas une virgule, et faisant fermement crier le papier sous la plume. Au-dessous de la dernière ligne il signa:

«Javert.

«Inspecteur de 1ère classe.

«Au poste de la place du Châtelet.

«7 juin 1832, environ une heure du matin.»

Javert sécha l’encre fraîche sur le papier, le plia comme une lettre, le cacheta, écrivit au dos: Note pour l’administration, le laissa sur la table, et sortit du poste. La porte vitrée et grillée retomba derrière lui.

Il traversa de nouveau diagonalement la place du Châtelet, regagna le quai, et revint avec une précision automatique au point même qu’il avait quitté un quart d’heure auparavant; il s’y accouda, et se retrouva dans la même attitude sur la même dalle du parapet. Il semblait qu'il n'eût pas bougé.

L'obscurité était complète. C'était le moment sépulcral qui suit minuit. Un plafond de nuages cachait les étoiles. Le ciel n'était qu'une épaisseur sinistre. Les maisons de la Cité n'avaient plus une seule lumière; personne ne passait; tout ce qu'on apercevait des rues et des quais était désert; Notre-Dame et les tours du Palais de justice semblaient des linéaments de la nuit. Un réverbère rougissait la margelle du quai. Les silhouettes des ponts se déformaient dans la brume les unes derrière les autres. Les pluies avaient grossi la rivière.

L'endroit où Javert s'était accoudé était, on s'en souvient, précisément situé au-dessus du rapide de la Seine, à pic sur cette redoutable spirale de tourbillons qui se dénoue et se renoue comme une vis sans fin.

Javert pencha la tête et regarda. Tout était noir. On ne distinguait rien. On entendait un bruit d'écume; mais on ne voyait pas la rivière. Par instants, dans cette profondeur vertigineuse, une lueur apparaissait et serpentait vaguement, l'eau ayant cette puissance, dans la nuit la plus complète, de prendre la lumière on ne sait où et de la changer en couleuvre. La lueur s'évanouissait, et tout redevenait indistinct. L'immensité semblait ouverte là. Ce qu'on avait au-dessous de soi, ce n'était pas de l'eau, c'était du gouffre. Le mur du quai, abrupt, confus, mêlé à la vapeur, tout de suite dérobé, faisait l'effet d'un escarpement de l'infini.

On ne voyait rien, mais on sentait la froideur hostile de l'eau et l'odeur fade des pierres mouillées. Un souffle farouche montait de cet abîme. Le grossissement du fleuve plutôt deviné qu'aperçu, le tragique chuchotement du flot, l'énormité lugubre des arches du pont, la chute imaginable dans ce vide sombre, toute cette ombre était pleine d'horreur.

Javert demeura quelques minutes immobile, regardant cette ouverture de ténèbres; il considérait l'invisible avec une fixité qui ressemblait à de l'attention. L'eau bruissait. Tout à coup, il ôta son chapeau et le posa sur le rebord du quai. Un moment après, une figure haute et noire, que de loin quelque passant attardé eût pu prendre pour un fantôme, apparut debout sur le parapet, se courba vers la Seine, puis se redressa, et tomba droite dans les ténèbres; il y eut un clapotement sourd, et l'ombre seule fut dans le secret des convulsions de cette forme obscure disparue sous l'eau.

Livre cinquième — Le petit-fils et le grand-père

Chapitre I

Où l’on revoit l’arbre à l’emplâtre de zinc

Quelque temps après les événements que nous venons de raconter, le sieur Boulatruelle eut une émotion vive.

Le sieur Boulatruelle est ce cantonnier de Montfermeil qu’on a déjà entrevu dans les parties ténébreuses de ce livre.

Boulatruelle, on s’en souvient peut-être, était un homme occupé de choses troubles et diverses. Il cassait des pierres et endommageait des voyageurs sur la grande route. Terrassier et voleur, il avait un rêve, il croyait aux trésors enfouis dans la forêt de Montfermeil. Il espérait quelque jour trouver de l’argent dans la terre au pied d’un arbre; en attendant, il en cherchait volontiers dans les poches des passants.

Néanmoins, pour l’instant, il était prudent. Il venait de l’échapper belle. Il avait été, on le sait, ramassé dans le galetas Jondrette avec les autres bandits. Utilité d’un vice: son ivrognerie l’avait sauvé. On n’avait jamais pu éclaircir s’il était là comme voleur ou comme volé. Une ordonnance de non-lieu, fondée sur son état d’ivresse bien constaté dans la soirée du guet-apens, l’avait mis en liberté. Il avait repris la clef des bois. Il était revenu à son chemin de Gagny à Lagny faire, sous la surveillance administrative, de l’empierrement pour le compte de l’état, la mine basse, fort pensif, un peu refroidi pour le vol, qui avait failli le perdre, mais ne se tournant qu’avec plus d’attendrissement vers le vin, qui venait de le sauver.

Quant à l’émotion vive qu’il eut peu de temps après sa rentrée sous le toit de gazon de sa hutte de cantonnier, la voici:

Un matin, Boulatruelle, en se rendant comme d’habitude à son travail, et à son affût peut-être, un peu avant le point du jour, aperçut parmi les branches un homme dont il ne vit que le dos, mais dont l’encolure, à ce qui lui sembla, à travers la distance et le crépuscule, ne lui était pas tout à fait inconnue. Boulatruelle, quoique ivrogne, avait une mémoire correcte et lucide, arme défensive indispensable à quiconque est un peu en lutte avec l’ordre légal.

— Où diable ai-je vu quelque chose comme cet homme-là? se demanda-t-il.

Mais il ne put rien se répondre, sinon que cela ressemblait à quelqu'un dont il avait confusément la trace dans l'esprit.

Boulatruelle, du reste, en dehors de l'identité qu'il ne réussissait point à ressaisir, fit des rapprochements et des calculs. Cet homme n'était pas du pays. Il y arrivait. À pied, évidemment. Aucune voiture publique ne passe à ces heures-là à Montfermeil. Il avait marché toute la nuit. D'où venait-il? De pas loin. Car il n'avait ni havre-sac, ni paquet. De Paris sans doute. Pourquoi était-il dans ce bois? pourquoi y était-il à pareille heure? qu'y venait-il faire?

Boulatruelle songea au trésor. À force de creuser dans sa mémoire, il se rappela vaguement avoir eu déjà, plusieurs années auparavant, une semblable alerte au sujet d'un homme qui lui faisait bien l'effet de pouvoir être cet homme-là.

Tout en méditant, il avait, sous le poids même de sa méditation, baissé la tête, chose naturelle, mais peu habile. Quand il la releva, il n'y avait plus rien. L'homme s'était effacé dans la forêt et dans le crépuscule.

— Par le diantre, dit Boulatruelle, je le retrouverai.

Je découvrirai la paroisse de ce paroissien-là. Ce promeneur de patron-minette a un pourquoi, je le saurai. On n'a pas de secret dans mon bois sans que je m'en mêle.

Il prit sa pioche qui était fort aiguë.

— Voilà, grommela-t-il, de quoi fouiller la terre et un homme.

Et, comme on rattache un fil à un autre fil, emboîtant le pas de son mieux dans l'itinéraire que l'homme avait dû suivre, il se mit en marche à travers le taillis.

Quand il eut fait une centaine d'enjambées, le jour, qui commençait à se lever, l'aida. Des semelles empreintes sur le sable çà et là, des herbes foulées, des bruyères écrasées, de jeunes branches pliées dans les broussailles et se redressant avec une gracieuse lenteur comme les bras d'une jolie femme qui s'étire en se réveillant, lui indiquèrent une sorte de piste. Il la suivit puis il la perdit. Le temps s'écoulait. Il entra plus avant dans le bois et parvint sur une espèce d'éminence. Un chasseur matinal qui passait au loin sur un sentier en sifflant l'air de Guillery lui donna l'idée de grimper dans un arbre. Quoique vieux il était agile. Il y avait là un hêtre de grande taille, digne de Tityre et de Boulatruelle. Boulatruelle monta sur le hêtre, le plus haut qu'il put.

L’idée était bonne. En explorant la solitude du côté où le bois est tout à fait enchevêtré et farouche, Boulatruelle aperçut tout à coup l’homme.

À peine l’eut-il aperçu qu’il le perdit de vue.

L’homme entra, ou plutôt se glissa, dans une clairière assez éloignée, masquée par de grands arbres, mais que Boulatruelle connaissait très bien, pour y avoir remarqué près d’un gros tas de pierres meulières, un châtaignier malade pansé avec une plaque de zinc clouée à même sur l’écorce. Cette clairière est celle qu’on appelait autrefois le fonds Blaru. Le tas de pierres, destiné à on ne sait quel emploi, qu’on y voyait il y a trente ans, y est sans doute encore. Rien n’égale la longévité d’un tas de pierres, si ce n’est celle d’une palissade en planches. C’est là provisoirement. Quelle raison pour durer!

Boulatruelle, avec la rapidité de la joie, se laissa tomber de l’arbre plutôt qu’il n’en descendit. Le gîte était trouvé, il s’agissait de saisir la bête. Ce fameux trésor rêvé était probablement là.

Ce n’était pas une petite affaire d’arriver à cette clairière. Par les sentiers battus, qui font mille zigzags taquinants, il fallait un bon quart d’heure. En ligne droite, par le fourré, qui est là singulièrement épais, très épineux et très agressif, il fallait une grande demi-heure. C’est ce que Boulatruelle eut le tort de ne point comprendre. Il crut à la ligne droite; illusion d’optique respectable, mais qui perd beaucoup d’hommes. Le fourré, si hérissé qu’il fût, lui parut le bon chemin.

— Prenons par la rue de Rivoli des loups, dit-il.

Boulatruelle, accoutumé à aller de travers, fit cette fois la faute d’aller droit.

Il se jeta résolument dans la mêlée des broussailles.

Il eut affaire à des houx, à des orties, à des aubépines, à des églantiers, à des chardons, à des ronces fort irascibles. Il fut très égratigné.

Au bas du ravin, il trouva de l’eau qu’il fallut traverser.

Il arriva enfin à la clairière Blaru, au bout de quarante minutes, suant, mouillé, essoufflé, griffé, féroce.

Personne dans la clairière.

Boulatruelle courut au tas de pierres. Il était à sa place. On ne l’avait pas emporté.

Quant à l’homme, il s’était évanoui dans la forêt. Il s’était évadé. Où? de quel côté? dans quel fourré? Impossible de le deviner.

Et, chose poignante, il y avait derrière le tas de pierres, devant l’arbre à la plaque de zinc, de la terre toute fraîche remuée, une pioche oubliée ou abandonnée, et un trou.

Ce trou était vide.

— Voleur! cria Boulatruelle en montrant les deux poings à l’horizon.

Chapitre II

Marius, en sortant de la guerre civile, s’apprête à la guerre domestique

Marius fut longtemps ni mort, ni vivant. Il eut durant plusieurs semaines une fièvre accompagnée de délire, et d’assez graves symptômes cérébraux causés plutôt encore par les commotions des blessures à la tête que par les blessures elles-mêmes.

Il répéta le nom de Cosette pendant des nuits entières dans la loquacité lugubre de la fièvre et avec la sombre opiniâtreté de l’agonie. La largeur de certaines lésions fut un sérieux danger, la suppuration des plaies larges pouvant toujours se résorber, et par conséquent tuer le malade, sous de certaines influences atmosphériques; à chaque changement de temps, au moindre orage, le médecin était inquiet. — Surtout que le blessé n’ait aucune émotion, répétait-il. Les pansements étaient compliqués et difficiles, la fixation des appareils et des linges par le sparadrap n’ayant pas encore été imaginée à cette époque. Nicolette dépensa en charpie un drap de lit «grand comme un plafond», disait-elle. Ce ne fut pas sans peine que les lotions chlorurées et le nitrate d’argent vinrent à bout de la gangrène. Tant qu’il y eut péril, M. Gillenormand, éperdu au chevet de son petit-fils, fut comme Marius; ni mort ni vivant.

Tous les jours, et quelquefois deux fois par jour, un monsieur en cheveux blancs, fort bien mis, tel était le signalement donné par le portier, venait savoir des nouvelles du blessé, et déposait pour les pansements un gros paquet de charpie.

Enfin, le 7 septembre, quatre mois, jour pour jour, après la douloureuse nuit où on l’avait rapporté mourant chez son grand-père, le médecin déclara qu’il répondait de lui. La convalescence s’ébaucha. Marius dut pourtant rester encore plus de deux mois étendu sur une chaise longue à cause des accidents produits par la fracture de la clavicule. Il y a toujours comme cela une dernière plaie qui ne veut pas se fermer et qui éternise les pansements, au grand ennui du malade.

Du reste, cette longue maladie et cette longue convalescence le sauvèrent des poursuites. En France, il n’y a pas de colère, même publique, que six mois n’éteignent. Les émeutes, dans l’état où est la société, sont tellement la faute de tout le monde qu’elles sont suivies d’un certain besoin de fermer les yeux.

Ajoutons que l’inqualifiable ordonnance Gisquet, qui enjoignait aux médecins de dénoncer les blessés, ayant indigné l’opinion, et non seulement l’opinion, mais le roi tout le premier, les blessés furent couverts et protégés par cette indignation; et, à l’exception de ceux qui avaient été faits prisonniers dans le combat flagrant, les conseils de guerre n’osèrent en inquiéter aucun. On laissa donc Marius tranquille.

M. Gillenormand traversa toutes les angoisses d’abord, et ensuite toutes les extases. On eut beaucoup de peine à l’empêcher de passer toutes les nuits près du blessé; il fit apporter son grand fauteuil à côté du lit de Marius; il exigea que sa fille prît le plus beau linge de la maison pour en faire des bandes. Mademoiselle Gillenormand, en personne sage et aînée, trouva moyen d’épargner le beau linge, tout en laissant croire à l’aïeul qu’il était obéi. M. Gillenormand ne permit pas qu’on lui expliquât que pour faire de la charpie la batiste ne vaut pas la grosse toile, ni la toile neuve la toile usée. Il assistait à tous les pansements dont mademoiselle Gillenormand s’absentait pudiquement. Quand on coupait les chairs mortes avec des ciseaux, il disait: aïe! aïe! Rien n’était touchant comme de le voir tendre au blessé une tasse de tisane avec son doux tremblement sénile. Il accablait le médecin de questions. Il ne s’apercevait pas qu’il recommençait toujours les mêmes.

Le jour où le médecin lui annonça que Marius était hors de danger, le bonhomme fut en délire. Il donna trois louis de gratification à son portier. Le soir, en rentrant dans sa chambre, il dansa une gavotte, en faisant des castagnettes avec son pouce et son index, et il chanta une chanson que voici:

Jeanne est née à Fougère,
Vrai nid d’une bergère;
J’adore son jupon
Fripon.

Amour, tu viens en elle,
Car c’est dans sa prunelle
Que tu mets ton carquois,
Narquois!

Moi, je la chante, et j'aime
Plus que Diane même
Jeanne et ses durs tétons
Bretons.

Puis il se mit à genoux sur une chaise, et Basque, qui l'observait par la porte entrouverte, crut être sûr qu'il priait.

Jusque-là, il n'avait guère cru en Dieu.

À chaque nouvelle phase du mieux, qui allait se dessinant de plus en plus, l'aïeul extravaguait. Il faisait un tas d'actions machinales pleines d'allégresse, il montait et descendait les escaliers sans savoir pourquoi. Une voisine, jolie du reste, fut toute stupéfaite de recevoir un matin un gros bouquet; c'était M. Gillenormand qui le lui envoyait. Le mari fit une scène de jalousie. M. Gillenormand essayait de prendre Nicolette sur ses genoux. Il appelait Marius monsieur le baron. Il criait: Vive la république!

À chaque instant, il demandait au médecin: N'est-ce pas qu'il n'y a plus de danger? Il regardait Marius avec des yeux de grand'mère. Il le couvait quand il mangeait. Il ne se connaissait plus, il ne se comptait plus, Marius était le maître de la maison, il y avait de l'abdication dans sa joie, il était le petit-fils de son petit-fils.

Dans cette allégresse où il était, c'était le plus vénérable des enfants. De peur de fatiguer ou d'importuner le convalescent, il se mettait derrière lui pour lui sourire. Il était content, joyeux, ravi, charmant, jeune. Ses cheveux blancs ajoutaient une majesté douce à la lumière gaie qu'il avait sur le visage. Quand la grâce se mêle aux rides, elle est adorable. Il y a on ne sait quelle aurore dans la vieillesse épanouie.

Quant à Marius, tout en se laissant panser et soigner, il avait une idée fixe, Cosette.

Depuis que la fièvre et le délire l'avaient quitté, il ne prononçait plus ce nom, et l'on aurait pu croire qu'il n'y songeait plus. Il se taisait, précisément parce que son âme était là.

Il ne savait ce que Cosette était devenue, toute l'affaire de la rue de la Chanvrerie était comme un nuage dans son souvenir; des ombres presque indistinctes flottaient dans son esprit, Éponine, Gavroche, Mabeuf, les Thénardier, tous ses amis lugubrement mêlés à la fumée de la barricade; l'étrange passage de M. Fauchelevent dans cette aventure sanglante lui faisait l'effet d'une énigme dans une tempête; il ne comprenait rien à sa propre vie, il ne savait comment ni par qui il avait été sauvé, et personne ne le savait autour de lui; tout ce qu'on avait pu lui dire, c'est qu'il avait été rapporté la nuit dans un fiacre rue des Filles-du-Calvaire; passé, présent, avenir, tout n'était plus en lui que le brouillard d'une idée vague, mais il y avait dans cette brume un point immobile, un linéament net et précis, quelque chose qui était en granit, une résolution, une volonté: retrouver Cosette. Pour lui, l'idée de la vie n'était pas distincte de l'idée de Cosette, il avait décrété dans son cœur qu'il n'accepterait pas l'une sans l'autre, et il était inébranlablement décidé à exiger de n'importe qui voudrait le forcer à vivre, de son grand-père, du sort, de l'enfer, la restitution de son éden disparu.

Les obstacles, il ne se les dissimulait pas.

Soulignons ici un détail: il n'était point gagné et était peu attendri par toutes les sollicitudes et toutes les tendresses de son grand-père. D'abord il n'était pas dans le secret de toutes; ensuite, dans ses rêveries de malade, encore fiévreuses peut-être, il se défiait de ces douceurs-là comme d'une chose étrange et nouvelle ayant pour but de le dompter. Il y restait froid. Le grand-père dépensait en pure perte son pauvre vieux sourire. Marius se disait que c'était bon tant que lui Marius ne parlait pas et se laissait faire; mais que, lorsqu'il s'agirait de Cosette, il trouverait un autre visage, et que la véritable attitude de l'aïeul se démasquerait. Alors ce serait rude; recrudescence des questions de famille, confrontation des positions, tous les sarcasmes et toutes les objections à la fois, Fauchelevent, Coupelevent, la fortune, la pauvreté, la misère, la pierre au cou, l'avenir. Résistance violente; conclusion, refus. Marius se roidissait d'avance.

Et puis, à mesure qu'il reprenait vie, ses anciens griefs reparaissaient, les vieux ulcères de sa mémoire se rouvraient, il resongeait au passé, le colonel Pontmercy se replaçait entre M. Gillenormand et lui Marius, il se disait qu'il n'avait aucune vraie bonté à espérer de qui avait été si injuste et si dur pour son père. Et avec la santé il lui revenait une sorte d'âpreté contre son aïeul. Le vieillard en souffrait doucement.

M. Gillenormand, sans en rien témoigner d'ailleurs, remarquait que Marius, depuis qu'il avait été rapporté chez lui et qu'il avait repris connaissance, ne lui avait pas dit une seule fois mon père. Il ne disait point monsieur, cela est vrai; mais il trouvait moyen de ne dire ni l'un ni l'autre, par une certaine manière de tourner ses phrases.

Une crise approchait évidemment.

Comme il arrive presque toujours en pareil cas, Marius, pour s’essayer, escarmoucha avant de livrer bataille. Cela s’appelle tâter le terrain. Un matin il advint que M. Gillenormand, à propos d’un journal qui lui était tombé sous la main, parla légèrement de la Convention et lâcha un épiphonème royaliste sur Danton, Saint-Just et Robespierre.

— Les hommes de 93 étaient des géants, dit Marius avec sévérité. Le vieillard se tut et ne souffla point du reste de la journée.

Marius, qui avait toujours présent à l’esprit l’inflexible grand-père de ses premières années, vit dans ce silence une profonde concentration de colère, en augura une lutte acharnée, et augmenta dans les arrière-recoins de sa pensée ses préparatifs de combat.

Il arrêta qu’en cas de refus il arracherait ses appareils, disloquerait sa clavicule, mettrait à nu et à vif ce qu’il lui restait de plaies, et repousserait toute nourriture. Ses plaies, c’étaient ses munitions. Avoir Cosette ou mourir.

Il attendit le moment favorable avec la patience sournoise des malades.

Ce moment arriva.

Chapitre III

Marius attaque

Un jour, M. Gillenormand, tandis que sa fille mettait en ordre les fioles et les tasses sur le marbre de la commode, était penché sur Marius, et lui disait de son accent le plus tendre:

— Vois-tu, mon petit Marius, à ta place je mangerais maintenant plutôt de la viande que du poisson. Une sole frite, cela est excellent pour commencer une convalescence, mais, pour mettre le malade debout, il faut une bonne côtelette.

Marius, dont presque toutes les forces étaient revenues, les rassembla, se dressa sur son séant, appuya ses deux poings crispés sur les draps de son lit, regarda son grand-père en face, prit un air terrible et dit:

— Ceci m'amène à vous dire une chose.

— Laquelle?

— C'est que je veux me marier.

— Prévu, dit le grand-père. Et il éclata de rire.

— Comment, prévu?

— Oui, prévu. Tu l'auras, ta fillette.

Marius, stupéfait et accablé par l'éblouissement, trembla de tous ses membres.

M. Gillenormand continua:

— Oui, tu l'auras, ta belle jolie petite fille. Elle vient tous les jours sous la forme d'un vieux monsieur savoir de tes nouvelles. Depuis que tu es blessé, elle passe son temps à pleurer et à faire de la charpie. Je me suis informé. Elle demeure rue de l'Homme-Armé, numéro sept. Ah, nous y voilà! Ah! tu la veux. Eh bien, tu l'auras. Ça t'attrape. Tu avais fait ton petit complot, tu t'étais dit: — Je vais lui signifier cela carrément à ce grand-père, à cette momie de la régence et du directoire, à cet ancien beau, à ce Dorante devenu Géronte; il a eu ses légèretés aussi, lui, et ses amourettes, et ses grisettes, et ses Cosettes; il a fait son frou-frou, il a eu ses ailes, il a mangé du pain du printemps; il faudra bien qu'il s'en souvienne. Nous allons voir. Bataille. Ah! Tu prends le hanneton par les cornes. C'est bon. Je t'offre une côtelette, et tu me réponds: À propos, je veux me marier. C'est ça qui est une transition! Ah! tu avais compté sur de la bisbille. Tu ne savais pas que j’étais un vieux lâche. Qu’est-ce que tu dis de ça? Tu bisques. Trouver ton grand-père encore plus bête que toi, tu ne t’y attendais pas, tu perds le discours que tu devais me faire, monsieur l’avocat, c’est taquinant. Eh bien, tant pis, rage. Je fais ce que tu veux, ça te la coupe, imbécile! Écoute. J’ai pris des renseignements, moi aussi je suis sournois; elle est charmante, elle est sage, le lancier n’est pas vrai, elle a fait des tas de charpie, c’est un bijou; elle t’adore. Si tu étais mort, nous aurions été trois; sa bière aurait accompagné la mienne. J’avais bien eu l’idée, dès que tu as été mieux, de te la camper tout bonnement à ton chevet, mais il n’y a que dans les romans qu’on introduit tout de go les jeunes filles près du lit des jolis blessés qui les intéressent. Ça ne se fait pas. Qu’aurait dit ta tante? Tu étais tout nu les trois quarts du temps, mon bonhomme. Demande à Nicolette, qui ne t’a pas quitté une minute, s’il y avait moyen qu’une femme fût là. Et puis qu’aurait dit le médecin? Ça ne guérit pas la fièvre, une jolie fille. Enfin, c’est bon, n’en parlons plus, c’est dit, c’est fait, c’est bâclé, prends-la. Telle est ma férocité. Vois-tu, j’ai vu que tu ne m’aimais pas, j’ai dit: Qu’est-ce que je pourrais donc faire pour que cet animal-là m’aime? J’ai dit: Tiens, j’ai ma petite Cosette sous la main, je vais la lui donner, il faudra bien qu’il m’aime alors un peu, ou qu’il dise pourquoi. Ah! tu croyais que le vieux allait tempêter, faire la grosse voix, crier non, et lever la canne sur toute cette aurore. Pas du tout. Cosette, soit. Amour, soit. Je ne demande pas mieux. Monsieur, prenez la peine de vous marier. Sois heureux, mon enfant bien-aimé.

Cela dit, le vieillard éclata en sanglots.

Et il prit la tête de Marius, et il la serra dans ses deux bras contre sa vieille poitrine, et tous deux se mirent à pleurer. C’est là une des formes du bonheur suprême.

— Mon père! s’écria Marius.

— Ah! tu m’aimes donc? dit le vieillard.

Il y eut un moment ineffable. Ils étouffaient et ne pouvaient parler.

Enfin le vieillard bégaya:

— Allons! le voilà débouché. Il m’a dit: Mon père.

Marius dégagea sa tête des bras de l’aïeul, et dit doucement:

— Mais, mon père, à présent que je me porte bien, il me semble que je pourrais la voir.

— Prévu encore, tu la verras demain.

— Mon père!

— Quoi?

— Pourquoi pas aujourd'hui?

— Eh bien, aujourd'hui. Va pour aujourd'hui. Tu m'as dit trois fois «mon père», ça vaut bien ça. Je vais m'en occuper. On te l'amènera. Prévu, te dis-je. Ceci a déjà été mis en vers. C'est le dénouement de l'élégie du Jeune malade d'André Chénier, d'André Chénier qui a été égorgé par les scélér... — par les géants de 93.

M. Gillenormand crut apercevoir un léger froncement du sourcil de Marius, qui, en vérité, nous devons le dire, ne l'écoutait plus, envolé qu'il était dans l'extase, et pensant beaucoup plus à Cosette qu'à 1793. Le grand-père, tremblant d'avoir introduit si mal à propos André Chénier, reprit précipitamment:

— Égorgé n'est pas le mot. Le fait est que les grands génies révolutionnaires, qui n'étaient pas méchants, cela est incontestable, qui étaient des héros, pardi! trouvaient qu'André Chénier les gênait un peu, et qu'ils l'ont fait guillot.... — C'est-à-dire que ces grands hommes, le sept thermidor, dans l'intérêt du salut public, ont prié André Chénier de vouloir bien aller....

M. Gillenormand, pris à la gorge par sa propre phrase, ne put continuer; ne pouvant ni la terminer, ni la rétracter, pendant que sa fille arrangeait derrière Marius l'oreiller, bouleversé de tant d'émotions, le vieillard se jeta, avec autant de vitesse que son âge le lui permit, hors de la chambre à coucher, en repoussa la porte derrière lui, et, pourpre, étranglant, écumant, les yeux hors de la tête, se trouva nez à nez avec l'honnête Basque qui cirait les bottes dans l'antichambre. Il saisit Basque au collet et lui cria en plein visage avec fureur: — Par les cent mille Javottes du diable, ces brigands l'ont assassiné!

— Qui, monsieur?

— André Chénier!

— Oui, monsieur, dit Basque épouvanté.

Chapitre IV

Mademoiselle Gillenormand finit par ne plus trouver mauvais que M. Fauchelevent soit entré avec quelque chose sous le bras

Cosette et Marius se revirent.

Ce que fut l'épreuve, nous renonçons à le dire. Il y a des choses qu'il ne faut pas essayer de peindre; le soleil est du nombre.

Toute la famille, y compris Basque et Nicolette, était réunie dans la chambre de Marius au moment où Cosette entra.

Elle apparut sur le seuil; il semblait qu'elle était dans un nimbe.

Précisément à cet instant-là, le grand-père allait se moucher, il resta court, tenant son nez dans son mouchoir et regardant Cosette par-dessus.

— Adorable! s'écria-t-il.

Puis il se moucha bruyamment.

Cosette était enivrée, ravie, effrayée, au ciel. Elle était aussi effarouchée qu'on peut l'être par le bonheur. Elle balbutiait, toute pâle, toute rouge, voulant se jeter dans les bras de Marius, et n'osant pas. Honteuse d'aimer devant tout ce monde. On est sans pitié pour les amants heureux; on reste là quand ils auraient le plus envie d'être seuls. Ils n'ont pourtant pas du tout besoin des gens.

Avec Cosette et derrière elle, était entré un homme en cheveux blancs, grave, souriant néanmoins, mais d'un vague et poignant sourire. C'était «monsieur Fauchelevent»; c'était Jean Valjean.

Il était très bien mis, comme avait dit le portier, entièrement vêtu de noir et de neuf et en cravate blanche.

Le portier était à mille lieues de reconnaître dans ce bourgeois correct, dans ce notaire probable, l'effrayant porteur de cadavre qui avait surgi à sa porte dans la nuit du 7 juin, déguenillé, fangeux, hideux, hagard, la face masquée de sang et de boue, soutenant sous les bras Marius évanoui; cependant son flair de portier était éveillé. Quand M. Fauchelevent était arrivé avec Cosette, le portier n'avait pu s'empêcher de confier à sa femme cet aparté: Je ne sais pourquoi je me figure toujours que j'ai déjà vu ce visage-là.

M. Fauchelevent, dans la chambre de Marius, restait comme à l'écart près de la porte. Il avait sous le bras un paquet assez semblable à un volume in-octavo, enveloppé dans du papier. Le papier de l’enveloppe était verdâtre et semblait moisi.

— Est-ce que ce monsieur a toujours comme cela des livres sous le bras? demanda à voix basse à Nicolette mademoiselle Gillenormand qui n’aimait point les livres.

— Eh bien, répondit du même ton M. Gillenormand qui l’avait entendue, c’est un savant. Après? Est-ce sa faute? M. Boulard, que j’ai connu, ne marchait jamais sans un livre, lui non plus, et avait toujours comme cela un bouquin contre son cœur.

Et, saluant, il dit à haute voix:

— Monsieur Tranchelevent....

Le père Gillenormand ne le fit pas exprès, mais l’inattention aux noms propres était chez lui une manière aristocratique.

— Monsieur Tranchelevent, j’ai l’honneur de vous demander pour mon petit-fils, monsieur le baron Marius Pontmercy, la main de mademoiselle.

«Monsieur Tranchelevent» s’inclina.

— C’est dit, fit l’aïeul.

Et, se tournant vers Marius et Cosette, les deux bras étendus et bénissant, il cria:

— Permission de vous adorer.

Ils ne se le firent pas dire deux fois. Tant pis! le gazouillement commença. Ils se parlaient bas, Marius accoudé sur sa chaise longue, Cosette debout près de lui. — Ô mon Dieu! murmurait Cosette, je vous revois. C’est toi, c’est vous! Être allé se battre comme cela! Mais pourquoi? C’est horrible. Pendant quatre mois, j’ai été morte. Oh! que c’est méchant d’avoir été à cette bataille! Qu’est-ce que je vous avais fait? Je vous pardonne, mais vous ne le ferez plus. Tout à l’heure, quand on est venu nous dire de venir, j’ai encore cru que j’allais mourir, mais c’était de joie. J’étais si triste! Je n’ai pas pris le temps de m’habiller, je dois faire peur. Qu’est-ce que vos parents diront de me voir une collerette toute chiffonnée? Mais parlez donc! Vous me laissez parler toute seule. Nous sommes toujours rue de l’Homme-Armé. Il paraît que votre épaule, c’était terrible. On m’a dit qu’on pouvait mettre le poing dedans. Et puis il paraît qu’on a coupé les chairs avec des ciseaux. C’est ça qui est affreux. J’ai pleuré, je n’ai plus d’yeux. C’est drôle qu’on puisse souffrir comme cela. Votre grand-père a l’air très bon! Ne vous dérangez pas, ne vous mettez pas sur le coude, prenez garde, vous allez vous faire du mal. Oh! comme je suis heureuse!

C’est donc fini, le malheur! Je suis toute sotte. Je voulais vous dire des choses que je ne sais plus du tout. M’aimez-vous toujours? Nous demeurons rue de l’Homme-Armé. Il n’y a pas de jardin. J’ai fait de la charpie tout le temps; tenez, monsieur, regardez, c’est votre faute, j’ai un durillon aux doigts. — Ange! disait Marius.

Ange est le seul mot de la langue qui ne puisse s’user. Aucun autre mot ne résisterait à l’emploi impitoyable qu’en font les amoureux.

Puis, comme il y avait des assistants, ils s’interrompirent et ne dirent plus un mot, se bornant à se toucher tout doucement la main.

M. Gillenormand se tourna vers tous ceux qui étaient dans la chambre et cria:

— Parlez donc haut, vous autres. Faites du bruit, la cantonade. Allons, un peu de brouhaha, que diable! que ces enfants puissent jaser à leur aise.

Et, s’approchant de Marius et de Cosette, il leur dit tout bas:

— Tutoyez-vous. Ne vous gênez pas.

La tante Gillenormand assistait avec stupeur à cette irruption de lumière dans son intérieur vieillot. Cette stupeur n’avait rien d’agressif; ce n’était pas le moins du monde le regard scandalisé et envieux d’une chouette à deux ramiers; c’était l’œil bête d’une pauvre innocente de cinquante-sept ans; c’était la vie manquée regardant ce triomphe, l’amour.

— Mademoiselle Gillenormand aînée, lui disait son père, je t’avais bien dit que cela t’arriverait.

Il resta un moment silencieux et ajouta:

— Regarde le bonheur des autres.

Puis il se tourna vers Cosette:

— Qu’elle est jolie! qu’elle est jolie! C’est un Greuze. Tu vas donc avoir cela pour toi seul, polisson! Ah! mon coquin, tu l’échappes belle avec moi, tu es heureux, si je n’avais pas quinze ans de trop, nous nous battrions à l’épée à qui l’aurait. Tiens! je suis amoureux de vous, mademoiselle. C’est tout simple. C’est votre droit. Ah! la belle jolie charmante petite noce que cela va faire! C’est Saint-Denis du Saint-Sacrement qui est notre paroisse, mais j’aurai une dispense pour que vous vous épousiez à Saint-Paul. L’église est mieux. C’est bâti par les jésuites. C’est plus coquet. C’est vis-à-vis la fontaine du cardinal de Birague. Le chef-d’œuvre de l’architecture jésuite est à Namur. Ça s’appelle Saint-Loup. Il faudra y aller quand vous serez mariés. Cela vaut le voyage. Mademoiselle, je suis tout à fait de votre parti, je veux que les filles se marient, c’est fait pour ça. Il y a une certaine sainte Catherine que je voudrais voir toujours décoiffée. Rester fille, c’est beau, mais c’est froid. La Bible dit: Multipliez. Pour sauver le peuple, il faut Jeanne d’Arc; mais, pour faire le peuple, il faut la mère Gigogne. Donc, mariez-vous, les belles. Je ne vois vraiment pas à quoi bon rester fille? Je sais bien qu’on a une chapelle à part dans l’église et qu’on se rabat sur la confrérie de la Vierge; mais, sapristi, un joli mari, brave garçon, et, au bout d’un an, un gros mioche blond qui vous tette gaillardement, et qui a de bons plis de graisse aux cuisses, et qui vous tripote le sein à poignées dans ses petites pattes roses en riant comme l’aurore, cela vaut pourtant mieux que de tenir un cierge à vêpres et de chanter Turris eburnea!

Le grand-père fit une pirouette sur ses talons de quatre-vingt-dix ans, et se remit à parler, comme un ressort qui repart:

— Ainsi, bornant le cours de tes rêvasseries, Alcippe, il est donc vrai, dans peu tu te maries.

«À propos!

— Quoi? mon père?

— N’avais-tu pas un ami intime?

— Oui, Courfeyrac.

— Qu’est-il devenu?

— Il est mort.

— Ceci est bon.

Il s’assit près d’eux, fit asseoir Cosette, et prit leurs quatre mains dans ses vieilles mains ridées.

— Elle est exquise, cette mignonne. C’est un chef-d’œuvre, cette Cosette-là! Elle est très petite fille et très grande dame. Elle ne sera que baronne, c’est déroger; elle est née marquise. Vous a-t-elle des cils! Mes enfants, fichez-vous bien dans la caboche que vous êtes dans le vrai. Aimez-vous. Soyez-en bêtes. L’amour, c’est la bêtise des hommes et l’esprit de Dieu. Adorez-vous. Seulement, ajouta-t-il rembruni tout à coup, quel malheur! Voilà que j’y pense! Plus de la moitié de ce que j’ai est en viager; tant que je vivrai, cela ira encore, mais après ma mort, dans une vingtaine d’années d’ici, ah! mes pauvres enfants, vous n’aurez pas le sou! Vos belles mains blanches, madame la baronne, feront au diable l’honneur de le tirer par la queue.

Ici on entendit une voix grave et tranquille qui disait:

— Mademoiselle Euphrasie Fauchelevent a six cent mille francs.

C’était la voix de Jean Valjean.

Il n’avait pas encore prononcé une parole, personne ne semblait même plus savoir qu’il était là, et il se tenait debout et immobile derrière tous ces gens heureux.

— Qu’est-ce que c’est que mademoiselle Euphrasie en question? demanda le grand-père effaré.

— C’est moi, reprit Cosette.

— Six cent mille francs! répondit Gillenormand.

— Moins quatorze ou quinze mille francs peut-être, dit Jean Valjean.

Et il posa sur la table le paquet que la tante Gillenormand avait pris pour un livre.

Jean Valjean ouvrit lui-même le paquet; c’était une liasse de billets de banque. On les feuilleta et on les compta. Il y avait cinq cents billets de mille francs et cent soixante-huit de cinq cents. En tout cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatre mille francs.

— Voilà un bon livre, dit M. Gillenormand.

— Cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatre mille francs! murmura la tante.

— Ceci arrange bien des choses, n’est-ce pas, mademoiselle Gillenormand aînée, reprit l’aïeul. Ce diable de Marius, il vous a déniché dans l’arbre des rêves une grisette millionnaire! Fiez-vous donc maintenant aux amourettes des jeunes gens! Les étudiants trouvent des étudiantes de six cent mille francs. Chérubin travaille mieux que Rothschild.

— Cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatre mille francs! répétait à demi-voix mademoiselle Gillenormand. Cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatre! autant dire six cent mille, quoi!

Quant à Marius et à Cosette, ils se regardaient pendant ce temps-là; ils firent à peine attention à ce détail.

Chapitre V

Déposez plutôt votre argent dans telle forêt que chez tel notaire

On a sans doute compris, sans qu'il soit nécessaire de l'expliquer longuement, que Jean Valjean, après l'affaire Champmathieu, avait pu, grâce à sa première évasion de quelques jours, venir à Paris, et retirer à temps de chez Laffitte la somme gagnée par lui, sous le nom de monsieur Madeleine, à Montreuil-sur-Mer; et que, craignant d'être repris, ce qui lui arriva en effet peu de temps après, il avait caché et enfoui cette somme dans la forêt de Montfermeil au lieu dit le fonds Blaru. La somme, six cent trente mille francs, toute en billets de banque, avait peu de volume et tenait dans une boîte; seulement, pour préserver la boîte de l'humidité, il l'avait placée dans un coffret en chêne plein de copeaux de châtaignier. Dans le même coffret, il avait mis son autre trésor, les chandeliers de l'évêque. On se souvient qu'il avait emporté ces chandeliers en s'évadant de Montreuil-sur-mer. L'homme aperçu un soir une première fois par Boulatruelle, c'était Jean Valjean. Plus tard, chaque fois que Jean Valjean avait besoin d'argent, il venait en chercher à la clairière Blaru. De là les absences dont nous avons parlé. Il avait une pioche quelque part dans les bruyères, dans une cachette connue de lui seul. Lorsqu'il vit Marius convalescent, sentant que l'heure approchait où cet argent pourrait être utile, il était allé le chercher; et c'était encore lui que Boulatruelle avait vu dans le bois, mais cette fois le matin et non le soir. Boulatruelle hérita de la pioche.

La somme réelle était cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatre mille cinq cents francs. Jean Valjean retira les cinq cents francs pour lui. — Nous verrons après, pensa-t-il.

La différence entre cette somme et les six cent trente mille francs retirés de chez Laffitte représentait la dépense de dix années, de 1823 à 1833. Les cinq années de séjour au couvent n'avaient coûté que cinq mille francs.

Jean Valjean mit les deux flambeaux d'argent sur la cheminée où ils resplendirent à la grande admiration de Toussaint.

Du reste, Jean Valjean se savait délivré de Javert. On avait raconté devant lui, et il avait vérifié le fait dans le Moniteur, qui l'avait publié, qu'un inspecteur de police nommé Javert avait été trouvé noyé sous un bateau de blanchisseuses entre le Pont au Change et le Pont-Neuf, et qu'un écrit laissé par cet homme, d’ailleurs irréprochable et fort estimé de ses chefs, faisait croire à un accès d’aliénation mentale et à un suicide. — Au fait, pensa Jean Valjean, puisque, me tenant, il m’a laissé en liberté, c’est qu’il fallait qu’il fût déjà fou.

Chapitre VI

Les deux vieillards font tout, chacun à leur façon, pour que Cosette soit heureuse

On prépara tout pour le mariage. Le médecin consulté déclara qu'il pourrait avoir lieu en février. On était en décembre. Quelques ravissantes semaines de bonheur parfait s'écoulèrent.

Le moins heureux n'était pas le grand-père. Il restait des quarts d'heure en contemplation devant Cosette.

— L'admirable jolie fille! s'écriait-il. Et elle a l'air si douce et si bonne! Il n'y a pas à dire mamie mon cœur, c'est la plus charmante fille que j'aie vue de ma vie. Plus tard, ça vous aura des vertus avec odeur de violette. C'est une grâce, quoi! On ne peut que vivre noblement avec une telle créature. Marius, mon garçon, tu es baron, tu es riche, n'avocasse pas, je t'en supplie.

Cosette et Marius étaient passés brusquement du sépulcre au paradis. La transition avait été peu ménagée, et ils en auraient été étourdis s'ils n'en avaient été éblouis.

— Comprends-tu quelque chose à cela? disait Marius à Cosette.

— Non, répondait Cosette, mais il me semble que le bon Dieu nous regarde.

Jean Valjean fit tout, aplanit tout, concilia tout, rendit tout facile. Il se hâtait vers le bonheur de Cosette avec autant d'empressement, et, en apparence, de joie, que Cosette elle-même.

Comme il avait été maire, il sut résoudre un problème délicat, dans le secret duquel il était seul, l'état civil de Cosette. Dire crûment l'origine, qui sait? cela eût pu empêcher le mariage. Il tira Cosette de toutes les difficultés. Il lui arrangea une famille de gens morts, moyen sûr de n'encourir aucune réclamation. Cosette était ce qui restait d'une famille éteinte. Cosette n'était pas sa fille à lui, mais la fille d'un autre Fauchelevent. Deux frères Fauchelevent avaient été jardiniers au couvent du Petit-Picpus. On alla à ce couvent; les meilleurs renseignements et les plus respectables témoignages abondèrent; les bonnes religieuses, peu aptes et peu enclines à sonder les questions de paternité, et n'y entendant pas malice, n'avaient jamais su bien au juste duquel des deux Fauchelevent la petite Cosette était la fille. Elles dirent ce qu’on voulut, et le dirent avec zèle. Un acte de notoriété fut dressé. Cosette devint devant la loi mademoiselle Euphrasie Fauchelevent. Elle fut déclarée orpheline de père et de mère. Jean Valjean s’arrangea de façon à être désigné, sous le nom de Fauchelevent, comme tuteur de Cosette, avec M. Gillenormand comme subrogé tuteur.

Quant aux cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatre mille francs, c’était un legs fait à Cosette par une personne morte qui désirait rester inconnue. Le legs primitif avait été de cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatorze mille francs; mais dix mille francs avaient été dépensés pour l’éducation de mademoiselle Euphrasie, dont cinq mille francs payés au couvent même. Ce legs, déposé dans les mains d’un tiers, devait être remis à Cosette à sa majorité ou à l’époque de son mariage. Tout cet ensemble était fort acceptable, comme on voit, surtout avec un appoint de plus d’un demi-million. Il y avait bien çà et là quelques singularités, mais on ne les vit pas; un des intéressés avait les yeux bandés par l’amour, les autres par les six cent mille francs.

Cosette apprit qu’elle n’était pas la fille de ce vieux homme qu’elle avait si longtemps appelé père. Ce n’était qu’un parent; un autre Fauchelevent était son père véritable. Dans tout autre moment, cela l’eût navrée. Mais à l’heure ineffable où elle était, ce ne fut qu’un peu d’ombre, un rembrunissement, et elle avait tant de joie que ce nuage dura peu. Elle avait Marius. Le jeune homme arrivait, le bonhomme s’effaçait; la vie est ainsi.

Et puis, Cosette était habituée depuis de longues années à voir autour d’elle des énigmes; tout être qui a eu une enfance mystérieuse est toujours prêt à de certains renoncements.

Elle continua pourtant de dire à Jean Valjean: Père.

Cosette, aux anges, était enthousiasmée du père Gillenormand. Il est vrai qu’il la comblait de madrigaux et de cadeaux. Pendant que Jean Valjean construisait à Cosette une situation normale dans la société et une possession d’état inattaquable, M. Gillenormand veillait à la corbeille de noces. Rien ne l’amusait comme d’être magnifique. Il avait donné à Cosette une robe de guipure de Binche qui lui venait de sa propre grand’mère à lui. — Ces modes-là renaissent, disait-il, les antiquailles font fureur, et les jeunes femmes de ma vieillesse s’habillent comme les vieilles femmes de mon enfance.

Il dévalisait ses respectables commodes de laque de Coromandel à panse bombée qui n’avaient pas été ouvertes depuis des ans. — Confessons ces douairières, disait-il; voyons ce qu'elles ont dans la bedaine. Il violait bruyamment des tiroirs ventrus pleins des toilettes de toutes ses femmes, de toutes ses maîtresses, et de toutes ses aïeules. Pékins, damas, lampas, moires peintes, robes de gros de Tours flambé, mouchoirs des Indes brodés d'un or qui peut se laver, dauphines sans envers en pièces, points de Gênes et d'Alençon, parures en vieille orfèvrerie, bonbonnières d'ivoire ornées de batailles microscopiques, nippes, rubans, il prodiguait tout à Cosette. Cosette, émerveillée, éperdue d'amour pour Marius et effarée de reconnaissance pour M. Gillenormand, rêvait un bonheur sans bornes vêtu de satin et de velours. Sa corbeille de noces lui apparaissait soutenue par les séraphins. Son âme s'envolait dans l'azur avec des ailes de dentelle de Malines.

L'ivresse des amoureux n'était égalée, nous l'avons dit, que par l'extase du grand-père. Il y avait comme une fanfare dans la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire.

Chaque matin, nouvelle offrande de bric-à-brac du grand-père à Cosette. Tous les falbalas possibles s'épanouissaient splendidement autour d'elle.

Un jour Marius, qui, volontiers, causait gravement à travers son bonheur, dit à propos de je ne sais quel incident:

— Les hommes de la révolution sont tellement grands, qu'ils ont déjà le prestige des siècles, comme Caton et comme Phocion, et chacun d'eux semble une mémoire antique.

— Moire antique! s'écria le vieillard. Merci, Marius. C'est précisément l'idée que je cherchais.

Et le lendemain une magnifique robe de moire antique couleur thé s'ajoutait à la corbeille de Cosette.

Le grand-père extrayait de ces chiffons une sagesse.

— L'amour, c'est bien; mais il faut cela avec. Il faut de l'inutile dans le bonheur. Le bonheur, ce n'est que le nécessaire. Assaisonnez-le-moi énormément de superflu. Un palais et son cœur. Son cœur et le Louvre. Son cœur et les grandes eaux de Versailles. Donnez-moi ma bergère, et tâchez qu'elle soit duchesse. Amenez-moi Philis couronnée de bleuets et ajoutez-lui cent mille livres de rente. Ouvrez-moi une bucolique à perte de vue sous une colonnade de marbre. Je consens à la bucolique et aussi à la féerie de marbre et d'or. Le bonheur sec ressemble au pain sec. On mange, mais on ne dîne pas. Je veux du superflu, de l'inutile, de l'extravagant, du trop, de ce qui ne sert à rien. Je me souviens d'avoir vu dans la cathédrale de

Strasbourg une horloge haute comme une maison à trois étages qui marquait l’heure, qui avait la bonté de marquer l’heure, mais qui n’avait pas l’air faite pour cela; et qui, après avoir sonné midi ou minuit, midi, l’heure du soleil, minuit, l’heure de l’amour, ou toute autre heure qu’il vous plaira, vous donnait la lune et les étoiles, la terre et la mer, les oiseaux et les poissons, Phébus et Phébé, et une ribambelle de choses qui sortaient d’une niche, et les douze apôtres, et l’empereur Charles-Quint, et Éponine et Sabinus, et un tas de petits bonshommes dorés qui jouaient de la trompette, par-dessus le marché. Sans compter de ravissants carillons qu’elle éparpillait dans l’air à tout propos sans qu’on sût pourquoi. Un méchant cadran tout nu qui ne dit que les heures vaut-il cela? Moi je suis de l’avis de la grosse horloge de Strasbourg, et je la préfère au coucou de la Forêt-Noire.

M. Gillenormand déraisonnait spécialement à propos de la noce, et tous les trumeaux du dix-huitième siècle passaient pêle-mêle dans ses dithyrambes.

— Vous ignorez l’art des fêtes. Vous ne savez pas faire un jour de joie dans ce temps-ci, s’écriait-il. Votre dix-neuvième siècle est veule. Il manque d’excès. Il ignore le riche, il ignore le noble. En toute chose, il est tondu ras. Votre tiers état est insipide, incolore, inodore et informe. Rêves de vos bourgeoises qui s’établissent, comme elles disent: un joli boudoir fraîchement décoré, palissandre et calicot. Place! place! le sieur Grigou épouse la demoiselle Grippesou. Somptuosité et splendeur! on a collé un louis d’or à un cierge. Voilà l’époque. Je demande à m’enfuir au delà des sarmates. Ah! dès 1787, j’ai prédit que tout était perdu, le jour où j’ai vu le duc de Rohan, prince de Léon, duc de Chabot, duc de Montbazon, marquis de Soubise, vicomte de Thouars, pair de France, aller à Longchamp en tapecul! Cela a porté ses fruits. Dans ce siècle on fait des affaires, on joue à la Bourse, on gagne de l’argent, et l’on est pingre. On soigne et on vernit sa surface; on est tiré à quatre épingles, lavé, savonné, ratissé, rasé, peigné, ciré, lissé, frotté, brossé, nettoyé au dehors, irréprochable, poli comme un caillou, discret, propret, et en même temps, vertu de ma mie! on a au fond de la conscience des fumiers et des cloaques à faire reculer une vachère qui se mouche dans ses doigts. J’octroie à ce temps-ci cette devise: Propreté sale. Marius, ne te fâche pas, donne-moi la permission de parler, je ne dis pas de mal du peuple, tu vois, j’en ai plein la bouche de ton peuple, mais trouve bon que je flanque un peu une pile à la bourgeoisie. J’en suis. Qui aime bien cingle bien. Sur ce, je le dis tout net, aujourd’hui on se marie, mais on ne sait plus se marier. Ah! c’est vrai, je regrette la gentillesse des anciennes mœurs. J’en regrette tout. Cette élégance, cette chevalerie, ces façons courtoises et mignonnes, ce luxe réjouissant que chacun avait, la musique faisant partie de la noce, symphonie en haut, tambourinage en bas, les danses, les joyeux visages attablés, les madrigaux alambiqués, les chansons, les fusées d’artifice, les francs rires, le diable et son train, les gros nœuds de rubans. Je regrette la jarretière de la mariée. La jarretière de la mariée est cousine de la ceinture de Vénus. Sur quoi roule la guerre de Troie? Parbleu, sur la jarretière d’Hélène. Pourquoi se bat-on, pourquoi Diomède le divin fracasse-t-il sur la tête de Mérionée ce grand casque d’airain à dix pointes, pourquoi Achille et Hector se pignochent-ils à grands coups de pique? Parce que Hélène a laissé prendre à Pâris sa jarretière. Avec la jarretière de Cosette, Homère ferait l’Iliade. Il mettrait dans son poème un vieux bavard comme moi, et il le nommerait Nestor. Mes amis, autrefois, dans cet aimable autrefois, on se mariait savamment; on faisait un bon contrat, et ensuite une bonne boustifaille. Sitôt Cujas sorti, Gamache entrait. Mais, dame! c’est que l’estomac est une bête agréable qui demande son dû, et qui veut avoir sa noce aussi. On soupait bien, et l’on avait à table une belle voisine sans guimpe qui ne cachait sa gorge que modérément! Oh! les larges bouches riantes, et comme on était gai dans ce temps-là! la jeunesse était un bouquet; tout jeune homme se terminait par une branche de lilas ou par une touffe de roses; fût-on guerrier, on était berger; et si, par hasard, on était capitaine de dragons, on trouvait moyen de s’appeler Florian. On tenait à être joli. On se brodait, on s’empourprait. Un bourgeois avait l’air d’une fleur, un marquis avait l’air d’une pierrerie. On n’avait pas de sous-pieds, on n’avait pas de bottes. On était pimpant, lustré, moiré, mordoré, voltigeant, mignon, coquet, ce qui n’empêchait pas d’avoir l’épée au côté. Le colibri a bec et ongles. C’était le temps des Indes galantes. Un des côtés du siècle était le délicat, l’autre était le magnifique; et, par la vertu-chou! on s’amusait. Aujourd’hui on est sérieux. Le bourgeois est avare, la bourgeoise est prude; votre siècle est infortuné. On chasserait les Grâces comme trop décolletées. Hélas! on cache la beauté comme une laideur. Depuis la révolution, tout a des pantalons, même les danseuses; une baladine doit être grave; vos rigodons sont doctrinaires. Il faut être majestueux. On serait bien fâché de ne pas avoir le menton dans sa cravate. L’idéal d’un galopin de vingt ans qui se marie, c’est de ressembler à monsieur Royer-Collard. Et savez-vous à quoi l’on arrive avec cette majesté là? à être petit. Apprenez ceci: la joie n'est pas seulement joyeuse; elle est grande. Mais soyez donc amoureux gaîment, que diable! mariez-vous donc, quand vous vous mariez, avec la fièvre et l'étourdissement et le vacarme et le tohu-bohu du bonheur! De la gravité à l'église, soit. Mais, sitôt la messe finie, sarpejeu! il faudrait faire tourbillonner un songe autour de l'épousée. Un mariage doit être royal et chimérique; il doit promener sa cérémonie de la cathédrale de Reims à la pagode de Chanteloup. J'ai horreur d'une noce pleutre. Ventregoulette! soyez dans l'olympe, au moins ce jour-là. Soyez des dieux. Ah! l'on pourrait être des sylphes, des Jeux et des Ris, des argyraspides; on est des galoupiats! Mes amis, tout nouveau marié doit être le prince Aldobrandini. Profitez de cette minute unique de la vie pour vous envoler dans l'empyrée avec les cygnes et les aigles, quitte à retomber le lendemain dans la bourgeoisie des grenouilles. N'économisez point sur l'hyménée, ne lui rognez pas ses splendeurs; ne liardez pas le jour où vous rayonnez. La noce n'est pas le ménage. Oh! si je faisais à ma fantaisie, ce serait galant. On entendrait des violons dans les arbres. Voici mon programme: bleu de ciel et argent. Je mêlerais à la fête les divinités agrestes, je convoquerais les dryades et les néréides. Les noces d'Amphitrite, une nuée rose, des nymphes bien coiffées et toutes nues, un académicien offrant des quatrains à la déesse, un char traîné par des monstres marins.

Triton trottait devant, et tirait de sa conque
Des sons si ravissants qu'il ravissait quiconque!

— Voilà un programme de fête, en voilà un, ou je ne m'y connais pas, sac à papier!

Pendant que le grand-père, en pleine effusion lyrique, s'écoutait lui-même, Cosette et Marius s'enivraient de se regarder librement.

La tante Gillenormand considérait tout cela avec sa placidité imperturbable. Elle avait eu depuis cinq ou six mois une certaine quantité d'émotions; Marius revenu, Marius rapporté sanglant, Marius rapporté d'une barricade, Marius mort, puis vivant, Marius réconcilié, Marius fiancé, Marius se mariant avec une pauvresse, Marius se mariant avec une millionnaire. Les six cent mille francs avaient été sa dernière surprise. Puis son indifférence de première communiante lui était revenue. Elle allait régulièrement aux offices, égrenait son rosaire, lisait son eucologe, chuchotait dans un coin de la maison des Ave pendant qu'on chuchotait dans l’autre des I love you, et, vaguement, voyait Marius et Cosette comme deux ombres. L’ombre, c’était elle.

Il y a un certain état d’ascétisme inerte où l’âme, neutralisée par l’engourdissement, étrangère à ce qu’on pourrait appeler l’affaire de vivre, ne perçoit, à l’exception des tremblements de terre et des catastrophes, aucune des impressions humaines, ni les impressions plaisantes, ni les impressions pénibles. — Cette dévotion-là, disait le père Gillenormand à sa fille, correspond au rhume de cerveau. Tu ne sens rien de la vie. Pas de mauvaise odeur, mais pas de bonne.

Du reste, les six cent mille francs avaient fixé les indécisions de la vieille fille. Son père avait pris l’habitude de la compter si peu qu’il ne l’avait pas consultée sur le consentement au mariage de Marius. Il avait agi de fougue, selon sa mode, n’ayant, despote devenu esclave, qu’une pensée, satisfaire Marius. Quant à la tante, que la tante existât, et qu’elle pût avoir un avis, il n’y avait pas même songé, et, toute moutonne qu’elle était, ceci l’avait froissée. Quelque peu révoltée dans son for intérieur, mais extérieurement impassible, elle s’était dit: Mon père résout la question du mariage sans moi; je résoudrai la question de l’héritage sans lui. Elle était riche, en effet, et le père ne l’était pas. Elle avait donc réservé là-dessus sa décision. Il est probable que si le mariage eût été pauvre, elle l’eût laissé pauvre. Tant pis pour monsieur mon neveu! Il épouse une gueuse, qu’il soit gueux. Mais le demi-million de Cosette plut à la tante et changea sa situation intérieure à l’endroit de cette paire d’amoureux. On doit de la considération à six cent mille francs, et il était évident qu’elle ne pouvait faire autrement que de laisser sa fortune à ces jeunes gens, puisqu’ils n’en avaient plus besoin.

Il fut arrangé que le couple habiterait chez le grand-père. M. Gillenormand voulut absolument leur donner sa chambre, la plus belle de la maison. — Cela me rajeunira, déclarait-il. C’est un ancien projet. J’avais toujours eu l’idée de faire la noce dans ma chambre. Il meubla cette chambre d’un tas de vieux bibelots galants. Il la fit plafonner et tendre d’une étoffe extraordinaire qu’il avait en pièce et qu’il croyait d’Utrecht, fond satiné bouton-d’or avec fleurs de velours oreilles-d’ours. — C’est de cette étoffe-là, disait-il, qu’était drapé le lit de la duchesse d’Anville à La Roche-Guyon. — Il mit sur la cheminée une figurine de Saxe portant un manchon sur son ventre nu.

La bibliothèque de M. Gillenormand devint le cabinet d’avocat dont avait besoin Marius; un cabinet, on s’en souvient, étant exigé par le conseil de l’ordre.

Chapitre VII

Les effets de rêve mêlés au bonheur

Les amoureux se voyaient tous les jours. Cosette venait avec M. Fauchelevent. — C’est le renversement des choses, disait mademoiselle Gillenormand, que la future vienne à domicile se faire faire la cour comme ça. — Mais la convalescence de Marius avait fait prendre l’habitude, et les fauteuils de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, meilleurs aux tête-à-tête que les chaises de paille de la rue de l’Homme-Armé, l’avaient enracinée. Marius et M. Fauchelevent se voyaient, mais ne se parlaient pas. Il semblait que cela fût convenu. Toute fille a besoin d’un chaperon. Cosette n’aurait pu venir sans M. Fauchelevent. Pour Marius, M. Fauchelevent était la condition de Cosette. Il l’acceptait. En mettant sur le tapis, vaguement et sans préciser, les matières de la politique, au point de vue de l’amélioration générale du sort de tous, ils parvenaient à se dire un peu plus que oui ou non. Une fois, au sujet de l’enseignement, que Marius voulait gratuit et obligatoire, multiplié sous toutes les formes, prodigué à tous comme l’air et le soleil, en un mot, respirable au peuple tout entier, ils furent à l’unisson et causèrent presque. Marius remarqua à cette occasion que M. Fauchelevent parlait bien, et même avec une certaine élévation de langage. Il lui manquait pourtant on ne sait quoi. M. Fauchelevent avait quelque chose de moins qu’un homme du monde, et quelque chose de plus.

Marius, intérieurement et au fond de sa pensée, entourait de toutes sortes de questions muettes ce M. Fauchelevent qui était pour lui simplement bienveillant et froid. Il lui venait par moments des doutes sur ses propres souvenirs. Il y avait dans sa mémoire un trou, en endroit noir, un abîme creusé par quatre mois d’agonie. Beaucoup de choses s’y étaient perdues. Il en était à se demander s’il était bien réel qu’il eût vu M. Fauchelevent, un tel homme si sérieux et si calme, dans la barricade.

Ce n’était pas d’ailleurs la seule stupeur que les apparitions et les disparitions du passé lui eussent laissée dans l’esprit. Il ne faudrait pas croire qu’il fût délivré de toutes ces obsessions de la mémoire qui nous forcent, même heureux, même satisfaits, à regarder mélancoliquement en arrière. La tête qui ne se retourne pas vers les horizons effacés ne contient ni pensée ni amour. Par moments, Marius prenait son visage dans ses mains et le passé tumultueux et vague traversait le crépuscule qu'il avait dans le cerveau. Il revoyait tomber Mabeuf, il entendait Gavroche chanter sous la mitraille, il sentait sous sa lèvre le froid du front d'Éponine, Enjolras, Courfeyrac, Jean Prouvaire, Combeferre, Bossuet, Grantaire, tous ses amis, se dressaient devant lui, puis se dissipaient. Tous ces êtres chers, douloureux, vaillants, charmants ou tragiques, étaient-ce des songes? avaient-ils en effet existé? L'émeute avait tout roulé dans sa fumée. Ces grandes fièvres ont de grands rêves. Il s'interrogeait; il se tâtait; il avait le vertige de toutes ces réalités évanouies. Où étaient-ils donc tous? était-ce bien vrai que tout fût mort? Une chute dans les ténèbres avait tout emporté, excepté lui. Tout cela lui semblait avoir disparu comme derrière une toile de théâtre. Il y a de ces rideaux qui s'abaissent dans la vie. Dieu passe à l'acte suivant.

Et lui-même, était-il bien le même homme? Lui, le pauvre, il était riche; lui, l'abandonné, il avait une famille; lui, le désespéré, il épousait Cosette. Il lui semblait qu'il avait traversé une tombe, et qu'il y était entré noir, et qu'il en était sorti blanc. Et cette tombe, les autres y étaient restés. À de certains instants, tous ces êtres du passé, revenus et présents, faisaient cercle autour de lui et l'assombrissaient; alors il songeait à Cosette, et redevenait serein; mais il ne fallait rien moins que cette félicité pour effacer cette catastrophe.

M. Fauchelevent avait presque place parmi ces êtres évanouis. Marius hésitait à croire que le Fauchelevent de la barricade fût le même que ce Fauchelevent en chair et en os, si gravement assis près de Cosette. Le premier était probablement un de ces cauchemars apportés et remportés par ses heures de délire. Du reste, leurs deux natures étant escarpées, aucune question n'était possible de Marius à M. Fauchelevent. L'idée ne lui en fût pas même venue. Nous avons indiqué déjà ce détail caractéristique.

Deux hommes qui ont un secret commun, et qui, par une sorte d'accord tacite, n'échangent pas une parole à ce sujet, cela est moins rare qu'on ne pense.

Une fois seulement, Marius tenta un essai. Il fit venir dans la conversation la rue de la Chanvrerie, et, se tournant vers M. Fauchelevent, il lui dit:

— Vous connaissez bien cette rue-là?

— Quelle rue?

— La rue de la Chanvrerie?

— Je n’ai aucune idée du nom de cette rue-là, répondit M. Fauchelevent du ton le plus naturel du monde.

La réponse, qui portait sur le nom de la rue, et point sur la rue elle-même, parut à Marius plus concluante qu’elle ne l’était.

— Décidément, pensa-t-il, j’ai rêvé. J’ai eu une hallucination. C’est quelqu’un qui lui ressemblait. M. Fauchelevent n’y était pas.

Chapitre VIII

Deux hommes impossibles à retrouver

L’enchantement, si grand qu’il fût, n’effaça point dans l’esprit de Marius d’autres préoccupations.

Pendant que le mariage s’apprêtait et en attendant l’époque fixée, il fit faire de difficiles et scrupuleuses recherches rétrospectives.

Il devait de la reconnaissance de plusieurs côtés; il en devait pour son père, il en devait pour lui-même.

Il y avait Thénardier; il y avait l’inconnu qui l’avait rapporté, lui Marius, chez M. Gillenormand.

Marius tenait à retrouver ces deux hommes, n’entendant point se marier, être heureux et les oublier, et craignant que ces dettes du devoir non payées ne fissent ombre sur sa vie, si lumineuse désormais. Il lui était impossible de laisser tout cet arriéré en souffrance derrière lui, et il voulait, avant d’entrer joyeusement dans l’avenir, avoir quittance du passé.

Que Thénardier fût un scélérat, cela n’ôtait rien à ce fait qu’il avait sauvé le colonel Pontmercy. Thénardier était un bandit pour tout le monde, excepté pour Marius.

Et Marius, ignorant la véritable scène du champ de bataille de Waterloo, ne savait pas cette particularité, que son père était vis-à-vis de Thénardier dans cette situation étrange de lui devoir la vie sans lui devoir de reconnaissance.

Aucun des divers agents que Marius employa ne parvint à saisir la piste de Thénardier. L’effacement semblait complet de ce côté-là. La Thénardier était morte en prison pendant l’instruction du procès. Thénardier et sa fille Azelma, les deux seuls qui restassent de ce groupe lamentable, avaient replongé dans l’ombre. Le gouffre de l’inconnu social s’était silencieusement refermé sur ces êtres. On ne voyait même plus à la surface ce frémissement, ce tremblement, ces obscurs cercles concentriques qui annoncent que quelque chose est tombé là, et qu’on peut y jeter la sonde.

La Thénardier étant morte, Boulatruelle étant mis hors de cause, Claquesous ayant disparu, les principaux accusés s’étant échappés de prison, le procès du guet-apens de la masure Gorbeau avait à peu près avorté. L’affaire était restée assez obscure. Le banc des assises avait dû se contenter de deux subalternes, Panchaud, dit Printanier, dit Bigrenaille, et Demi-Liard, dit Deux-Milliards, qui avaient été condamnés contradictoirement à dix ans de galères. Les travaux forcés à perpétuité avaient été prononcés contre leurs complices évadés et contumaces. Thénardier, chef et meneur, avait été, par contumace également, condamné à mort. Cette condamnation était la seule chose qui restât sur Thénardier, jetant sur ce nom enseveli sa lueur sinistre, comme une chandelle à côté d'une bière.

Du reste, en refoulant Thénardier dans les dernières profondeurs par la crainte d'être ressaisi, cette condamnation ajoutait à l'épaississement ténébreux qui couvrait cet homme.

Quant à l'autre, quant à l'homme ignoré qui avait sauvé Marius, les recherches eurent d'abord quelque résultat, puis s'arrêtèrent court. On réussit à retrouver le fiacre qui avait rapporté Marius rue des Filles-du-Calvaire dans la soirée du 6 juin. Le cocher déclara que le 6 juin, d'après l'ordre d'un agent de police, il avait «stationné» depuis trois heures de l'après-midi jusqu'à la nuit, sur le quai des Champs-Élysées, au-dessus de l'issue du Grand Égout; que, vers neuf heures du soir, la grille de l'égout qui donne sur la berge de la rivière s'était ouverte; qu'un homme en était sorti, portant sur ses épaules un autre homme, qui semblait mort; que l'agent, lequel était en observation sur ce point, avait arrêté l'homme vivant et saisi l'homme mort; que, sur l'ordre de l'agent, lui cocher avait reçu «tout ce monde-là» dans son fiacre; qu'on était allé d'abord rue des Filles-du-Calvaire; qu'on y avait déposé l'homme mort; que l'homme mort, c'était monsieur Marius, et que lui cocher le reconnaissait bien, quoiqu'il fût vivant «cette fois-ci»; qu'ensuite on était remonté dans sa voiture, qu'il avait fouetté ses chevaux, que, à quelques pas de la porte des Archives, on lui avait crié de s'arrêter, que là, dans la rue, on l'avait payé et quitté, et que l'agent avait emmené l'autre homme; qu'il ne savait rien de plus; que la nuit était très noire.

Marius, nous l'avons dit, ne se rappelait rien. Il se souvenait seulement d'avoir été saisi en arrière par une main énergique au moment où il tombait à la renverse dans la barricade; puis tout s'effaçait pour lui. Il n'avait repris connaissance que chez M. Gillenormand.

Il se perdait en conjectures.

Il ne pouvait douter de sa propre identité. Comment se faisait-il pourtant que, tombé rue de la Chanvrerie, il eût été ramassé par l'agent de police sur la berge de la Seine, près du pont des Invalides? Quelqu'un l'avait emporté du quartier des halles aux Champs-Élysées. Et comment? Par l'égout. Dévouement inouï!

Quelqu'un? Qui?

C'était cet homme que Marius cherchait.

De cet homme, qui était son sauveur, rien; nulle trace; pas le moindre indice.

Marius, quoique obligé de ce côté-là à une grande réserve, poussa ses recherches jusqu'à la préfecture de police. Là, pas plus qu'ailleurs, les renseignements pris n'aboutirent à aucun éclaircissement. La préfecture en savait moins que le cocher de fiacre. On n'y avait connaissance d'aucune arrestation opérée le 6 juin à la grille du Grand Égout; on n'y avait reçu aucun rapport d'agent sur ce fait qui, à la préfecture, était regardé comme une fable. On y attribuait l'invention de cette fable au cocher. Un cocher qui veut un pourboire est capable de tout, même d'imagination. Le fait, pourtant, était certain, et Marius n'en pouvait douter, à moins de douter de sa propre identité, comme nous venons de le dire.

Tout, dans cette étrange énigme, était inexplicable.

Cet homme, ce mystérieux homme, que le cocher avait vu sortir de la grille du Grand Égout portant sur son dos Marius évanoui, et que l'agent de police aux aguets avait arrêté en flagrant délit de sauvetage d'un insurgé, qu'était-il devenu? qu'était devenu l'agent lui-même? Pourquoi cet agent avait-il gardé le silence? l'homme avait-il réussi à s'évader? avait-il corrompu l'agent? Pourquoi cet homme ne donnait-il aucun signe de vie à Marius qui lui devait tout? Le désintéressement n'était pas moins prodigieux que le dévouement. Pourquoi cet homme ne reparaissait-il pas? Peut-être était-il au-dessus de la récompense, mais personne n'est au-dessus de la reconnaissance. Était-il mort? quel homme était-ce? quelle figure avait-il? Personne ne pouvait le dire. Le cocher répondait: La nuit était très noire. Basque et Nicolette, ahuris, n'avaient regardé que leur jeune maître tout sanglant. Le portier, dont la chandelle avait éclairé la tragique arrivée de Marius, avait seul remarqué l'homme en question, et voici le signalement qu'il en donnait: «Cet homme était épouvantable.»

Dans l'espoir d'en tirer parti pour ses recherches, Marius fit conserver les vêtements ensanglantés qu'il avait sur le corps, lorsqu'on l'avait ramené chez son aïeul. En examinant l'habit, on remarqua qu'un pan était bizarrement déchiré. Un morceau manquait.

Un soir, Marius parlait, devant Cosette et Jean Valjean, de toute cette singulière aventure, des informations sans nombre qu'il avait prises et de l'inutilité de ses efforts. Le visage froid de «monsieur Fauchelevent» l'impatientait. Il s'écria avec une vivacité qui avait presque la vibration de la colère:

— Oui, cet homme-là, quel qu'il soit, a été sublime. Savez-vous ce qu'il a fait, monsieur? Il est intervenu comme l'archange. Il a fallu qu'il se jetât au milieu du combat, qu'il me dérobât, qu'il ouvrît l'égout, qu'il m'y traînât, qu'il m'y portât! Il a fallu qu'il fît plus d'une lieue et demie dans d'affreuses galeries souterraines, courbé, ployé, dans les ténèbres, dans le cloaque, plus d'une lieue et demie, monsieur, avec un cadavre sur le dos! Et dans quel but? Dans l'unique but de sauver ce cadavre. Et ce cadavre, c'était moi. Il s'est dit: Il y a encore là peut-être une lueur de vie; je vais risquer mon existence à moi pour cette misérable étincelle! Et son existence, il ne l'a pas risquée une fois, mais vingt! Et chaque pas était un danger. La preuve, c'est qu'en sortant de l'égout il a été arrêté. Savez-vous, monsieur, que cet homme a fait tout cela? Et aucune récompense à attendre. Qu'étais-je? Un insurgé. Qu'étais-je? Un vaincu. Oh! si les six cent mille francs de Cosette étaient à moi....

— Ils sont à vous, interrompit Jean Valjean.

— Eh bien, reprit Marius, je les donnerais pour retrouver cet homme!

Jean Valjean garda le silence.

Livre sixième — La nuit blanche

Chapitre I

Le 16 février 1833

La nuit du 16 au 17 février 1833 fut une nuit bénie. Elle eut au-dessus de son ombre le ciel ouvert. Ce fut la nuit de noces de Marius et de Cosette.

La journée avait été adorable.

Ce n’avait pas été la fête bleue rêvée par le grand-père, une féerie avec une confusion de chérubins et de cupidons au-dessus de la tête des mariés, un mariage digne de faire un dessus de porte; mais cela avait été doux et riant.

La mode du mariage n’était pas en 1833 ce qu’elle est aujourd’hui. La France n’avait pas encore emprunté à l’Angleterre cette délicatesse suprême d’enlever sa femme, de s’enfuir en sortant de l’église, de se cacher avec honte de son bonheur, et de combiner les allures d’un banqueroutier avec les ravissements du cantique des cantiques. On n’avait pas encore compris tout ce qu’il y a de chaste, d’exquis et de décent à cahoter son paradis en chaise de poste, à entrecouper son mystère de clic-clacs, à prendre pour lit nuptial un lit d’auberge, et à laisser derrière soi, dans l’alcôve banale à tant par nuit, le plus sacré des souvenirs de la vie pêle-mêle avec le tête-à-tête du conducteur de diligence et de la servante d’auberge.

Dans cette seconde moitié du dix-neuvième siècle où nous sommes, le maire et son écharpe, le prêtre et sa chasuble, la loi et Dieu, ne suffisent plus; il faut les compléter par le postillon de Longjumeau; veste bleue aux retroussis rouges et aux boutons grelots, plaque en brassard, culotte de peau verte, jurons aux chevaux normands à la queue nouée, faux galons, chapeau ciré, gros cheveux poudrés, fouet énorme et bottes fortes. La France ne pousse pas encore l’élégance jusqu’à faire, comme la nobility anglaise, pleuvoir sur la calèche de poste des mariés une grêle de pantoufles éculées et de vieilles savates, en souvenir de Churchill, depuis Marlborough, ou Malbrouck, assailli le jour de son mariage par une colère de tante qui lui porta bonheur. Les savates et les pantoufles ne font point encore partie de nos célébrations nuptiales; mais patience, le bon goût continuant à se répandre, on y viendra.

En 1833, il y a cent ans, on ne pratiquait pas le mariage au grand trot.

On s’imaginait encore à cette époque, chose bizarre, qu’un mariage est une fête intime et sociale, qu’un banquet patriarcal ne gâte point une solennité domestique, que la gaîté, fût-elle excessive, pourvu qu’elle soit honnête, ne fait aucun mal au bonheur, et qu’enfin il est vénérable et bon que la fusion de ces deux destinées d’où sortira une famille commence dans la maison, et que le ménage ait désormais pour témoin la chambre nuptiale.

Et l’on avait l’impudeur de se marier chez soi.

Le mariage se fit donc, suivant cette mode maintenant caduque, chez M. Gillenormand.

Si naturelle et si ordinaire que soit cette affaire de se marier, les bans à publier, les actes à dresser, la mairie, l’église, ont toujours quelque complication. On ne put être prêt avant le 16 février.

Or, nous notons ce détail pour la pure satisfaction d’être exact, il se trouva que le 16 était un mardi gras. Hésitations, scrupules, particulièrement de la tante Gillenormand.

— Un mardi gras! s’écria l’aïeul, tant mieux. Il y a un proverbe:

Mariage un mardi gras
N’aura point d’enfants ingrats.

Passons outre. Va pour le 16! Est-ce que tu veux retarder, toi, Marius?

— Non, certes! répondit l’amoureux.

— Marions-nous, fit le grand-père.

Le mariage se fit donc le 16, nonobstant la gaîté publique. Il pleuvait ce jour-là, mais il y a toujours dans le ciel un petit coin d’azur au service du bonheur, que les amants voient, même quand le reste de la création serait sous un parapluie.

La veille, Jean Valjean avait remis à Marius, en présence de M. Gillenormand, les cinq cent quatre-vingt-quatre mille francs.

Le mariage se faisant sous le régime de la communauté, les actes avaient été simples.

Toussaint était désormais inutile à Jean Valjean; Cosette en avait hérité et l’avait promue au grade de femme de chambre.

Quant à Jean Valjean, il y avait dans la maison Gillenormand une belle chambre meublée exprès pour lui, et Cosette lui avait si irrésistiblement dit: «Père, je vous en prie», qu’elle lui avait fait à peu près promettre qu’il viendrait l’habiter.

Quelques jours avant le jour fixé pour le mariage, il était arrivé un accident à Jean Valjean; il s’était un peu écrasé le pouce de la main droite.

Ce n’était point grave; et il n’avait pas permis que personne s’en occupât, ni le pansât, ni même vit son mal, pas même Cosette. Cela pourtant l’avait forcé de s’emmitoufler la main d’un linge, et de porter le bras en écharpe, et l’avait empêché de rien signer. M. Gillenormand, comme subrogé tuteur de Cosette, l’avait suppléé.

Nous ne mènerons le lecteur ni à la mairie ni à l’église. On ne suit guère deux amoureux jusque-là, et l’on a l’habitude de tourner le dos au drame dès qu’il met à sa boutonnière un bouquet de marié. Nous nous bornerons à noter un incident qui, d’ailleurs inaperçu de la noce, marqua le trajet de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire à l’église Saint-Paul.

On repavait à cette époque l’extrémité nord de la rue Saint-Louis. Elle était barrée à partir de la rue du Parc-Royal. Il était impossible aux voitures de la noce d’aller directement à Saint-Paul. Force était de changer l’itinéraire, et le plus simple était de tourner par le boulevard. Un des invités fit observer que c’était le mardi gras, et qu’il y aurait là encombrement de voitures. — Pourquoi? demanda M. Gillenormand. — À cause des masques. — À merveille, dit le grand-père. Allons par là. Ces jeunes gens se marient; ils vont entrer dans le sérieux de la vie. Cela les préparera de voir un peu de mascarade.

On prit par le boulevard. La première des berlines de la noce contenait Cosette et la tante Gillenormand, M. Gillenormand et Jean Valjean. Marius, encore séparé de sa fiancée, selon l’usage, ne venait que dans la seconde. Le cortège nuptial, au sortir de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, s’engagea dans la longue procession de voitures qui faisait la chaîne sans fin de la Madeleine à la Bastille et de la Bastille à la Madeleine.

Les masques abondaient sur le boulevard. Il avait beau pleuvoir par intervalles, Paillasse, Pantalon et Gille s’obstinaient. Dans la bonne humeur de cet hiver de 1833, Paris s’était déguisé en Venise. On ne voit plus de ces mardis gras-là aujourd’hui. Tout ce qui existe étant un carnaval répandu, il n’y a plus de carnaval.

Les contre-allées regorgeaient de passants et les fenêtres de curieux. Les terrasses qui couronnent les péristyles des théâtres étaient bordées de spectateurs. Outre les masques, on regardait ce défilé, propre au mardi gras comme à Longchamps, de véhicules de toutes sortes, citadines, tapissières, carrioles, cabriolets, marchant en ordre, rigoureusement rivés les uns aux autres par les règlements de police et comme emboîtés dans des rails. Quiconque est dans un de ces véhicules-là est tout à la fois spectateur et spectacle. Des sergents de ville maintenaient sur les bas côtés du boulevard ces deux interminables files parallèles se mouvant en mouvement contrarié, et surveillaient, pour que rien n'entravât leur double courant, ces deux ruisseaux de voitures coulant, l'un en aval, l'autre en amont, l'un vers la chaussée d'Antin, l'autre vers le faubourg Saint-Antoine. Les voitures armoriées des pairs de France et des ambassadeurs tenaient le milieu de la chaussée, allant et venant librement. De certains cortèges magnifiques et joyeux, notamment le Bœuf Gras, avaient le même privilège. Dans cette gaîté de Paris, l'Angleterre faisait claquer son fouet; la chaise de poste de lord Seymour, harcelée d'un sobriquet populacier, passait à grand bruit.

Dans la double file, le long de laquelle des gardes municipaux galopaient comme des chiens de berger, d'honnêtes berlingots de famille, encombrés de grand'tantes et d'aïeules, étalaient à leurs portières de frais groupes d'enfants déguisés, pierrots de sept ans, pierrettes de six ans, ravissants petits êtres, sentant qu'ils faisaient officiellement partie de l'allégresse publique, pénétrés de la dignité de leur arlequinade et ayant une gravité de fonctionnaires.

De temps en temps un embarras survenait quelque part dans la procession des véhicules; l'une ou l'autre des deux files latérales s'arrêtait jusqu'à ce que le nœud fût dénoué; une voiture empêchée suffisait pour paralyser toute la ligne. Puis on se remettait en marche.

Les carrosses de la noce étaient dans la file allant vers la Bastille et longeant le côté droit du boulevard. À la hauteur de la rue du Pont-aux-Choux, il y eut un temps d'arrêt. Presque au même instant, sur l'autre bas côté, l'autre file qui allait vers la Madeleine s'arrêta également. Il y avait à ce point-là de cette file une voiture de masques.

Ces voitures, ou, pour mieux dire, ces charretées de masques sont bien connues des Parisiens. Si elles manquaient à un mardi gras ou à une mi-carême, on y entendrait malice, et l'on dirait: Il y a quelque chose là-dessous. Probablement le ministère va changer. Un entassement de Cassandres, d'Arlequins et de Colombines, cahoté au-dessus des passants, tous les grotesques possibles depuis le turc jusqu'au sauvage, des hercules supportant des marquises, des poissardes qui feraient boucher les oreilles à Rabelais de même que les ménades faisaient baisser les yeux à Aristophane, perruques de filasse, maillots roses, chapeaux de faraud, lunettes de grimacier, tricornes de Janot taquinés par un papillon, cris jetés aux piétons, poings sur les hanches, postures hardies, épaules nues, faces masquées, impudeurs démuselées; un chaos d’effronteries promené par un cocher coiffé de fleurs; voilà ce que c’est que cette institution.

La Grèce avait besoin du chariot de Thespis, la France a besoin du fiacre de Vadé.

Tout peut être parodié, même la parodie. La saturnale, cette grimace de la beauté antique, arrive, de grossissement en grossissement, au mardi gras; et la bacchanale, jadis couronnée de pampres, inondée de soleil, montrant des seins de marbre dans une demi-nudité divine, aujourd’hui avachie sous la guenille mouillée du nord, a fini par s’appeler la chie-en-lit.

La tradition des voitures de masques remonte aux plus vieux temps de la monarchie. Les comptes de Louis XI allouent au bailli du palais «vingt sous tournois pour trois coches de mascarades ès carrefours». De nos jours, ces monceaux bruyants de créatures se font habituellement charrier par quelque ancien coucou dont ils encombrent l’impériale, ou accablent de leur tumultueux groupe un landau de régie dont les capotes sont rabattues. Ils sont vingt dans une voiture de six. Il y en a sur le siège, sur le strapontin, sur les joues des capotes, sur le timon. Ils enfourchent jusqu’aux lanternes de la voiture. Ils sont debout, couchés, assis, jarrets recroquevillés, jambes pendantes. Les femmes occupent les genoux des hommes. On voit de loin sur le fourmillement des têtes leur pyramide forcenée. Ces carrossées font des montagnes d’allégresse au milieu de la cohue. Collé, Panard et Piron en découlent, enrichis d’argot. On crache de là-haut sur le peuple le catéchisme poissard. Ce fiacre, devenu démesuré par son chargement, a un air de conquête. Brouhaha est à l’avant, Tohubohu est à l’arrière. On y vocifère, on y vocalise, on y hurle, on y éclate, on s’y tord de bonheur; la gaîté y rugit, le sarcasme y flamboie, la jovialité s’y étale comme une pourpre; deux haridelles y traînent la farce épanouie en apothéose; c’est le char du triomphe du Rire.

Rire trop cynique pour être franc. Et en effet ce rire est suspect. Ce rire a une mission. Il est chargé de prouver aux parisiens le carnaval.

Ces voitures poissardes, où l’on sent on ne sait quelles ténèbres, font songer le philosophe. Il y a du gouvernement là-dedans. On touche là du doigt une affinité mystérieuse entre les hommes publics et les femmes publiques.

Que des turpitudes échafaudées donnent un total de gaîté, qu’en étageant l’ignominie sur l’opprobre on affriande un peuple, que l’espionnage servant de cariatide à la prostitution amuse les cohues en les affrontant, que la foule aime à voir passer sur les quatre roues d'un fiacre ce monstrueux tas vivant, clinquant-haillon, mi-parti ordure et lumière, qui aboie et qui chante, qu'on batte des mains à cette gloire faite de toutes les hontes, qu'il n'y ait pas de fête pour les multitudes si la police ne promène au milieu d'elles ces espèces d'hydres de joie à vingt têtes, certes, cela est triste. Mais qu'y faire? Ces tombereaux de fange enrubannée et fleurie sont insultés et amnistiés par le rire public. Le rire de tous est complice de la dégradation universelle. De certaines fêtes malsaines désagrègent le peuple et le font populace; et aux populaces comme aux tyrans il faut des bouffons. Le roi a Roquelaure, le peuple a Paillasse. Paris est la grande ville folle, toutes les fois qu'il n'est pas la grande cité sublime. Le carnaval y fait partie de la politique. Paris, avouons-le, se laisse volontiers donner la comédie par l'infamie. Il ne demande à ses maîtres, — quand il a des maîtres, — qu'une chose: fardez-moi la boue. Rome était de la même humeur. Elle aimait Néron. Néron était un débardeur titan.

Le hasard fit, comme nous venons de le dire, qu'une de ces difformes grappes de femmes et d'hommes masqués, trimballés dans une vaste calèche, s'arrêta à gauche du boulevard pendant que le cortège de la noce s'arrêtait à droite. D'un bord du boulevard à l'autre, la voiture où étaient les masques aperçut vis-à-vis d'elle la voiture où était la mariée.

— Tiens! dit un masque, une noce.

— Une fausse noce, reprit un autre. C'est nous qui sommes la vraie.

Et, trop loin pour pouvoir interpeller la noce, craignant d'ailleurs le holà des sergents de ville, les deux masques regardèrent ailleurs.

Toute la carrossée masquée eut fort à faire au bout d'un instant, la multitude se mit à la huer, ce qui est la caresse de la foule aux mascarades; et les deux masques qui venaient de parler durent faire front à tout le monde avec leurs camarades, et n'eurent pas trop de tous les projectiles du répertoire des halles pour répondre aux énormes coups de gueule du peuple. Il se fit entre les masques et la foule un effrayant échange de métaphores.

Cependant, deux autres masques de la même voiture, un espagnol au nez démesuré avec un air vieillot et d'énormes moustaches noires, et une poissarde maigre, et toute jeune fille, masquée d'un loup, avaient remarqué la noce, eux aussi, et, pendant que leurs compagnons et les passants s'insultaient, avaient un dialogue à voix basse.

Leur aparté était couvert par le tumulte et s'y perdait. Les bouffées de pluie avaient mouillé la voiture toute grande ouverte; le vent de février n'est pas chaud; tout en répondant à l’Espagnol, la poissarde, décolletée, grelottait, riait, et toussait.

Voici le dialogue:

— Dis donc.

— Quoi, daron?

— Vois-tu ce vieux?

— Quel vieux?

— Là, dans la première roulotte de la noce, de notre côté.

— Qui a le bras accroché dans une cravate noire?

— Oui.

— Eh bien?

— Je suis sûr que je le connais.

— Ah!

— Je veux qu’on me fauche le colabre et n’avoir de ma vioc dit vousaille, tonorgue ni mézig, si je ne colombe pas ce pantinois-là.

— C’est aujourd’hui que Paris est Pantin.

— Peux-tu voir la mariée, en te penchant?

— Non.

— Et le marié?

— Il n’y a pas de marié dans cette roulotte-là.

— Bah!

— À moins que ce ne soit l’autre vieux.

— Tâche donc de voir la mariée en te penchant bien.

— Je ne peux pas.

— C’est égal, ce vieux qui a quelque chose à la patte, j’en suis sûr, je connais ça.

— Et à quoi ça te sert-il de le connaître?

— On ne sait pas. Des fois!

— Je me fiche pas mal des vieux, moi.

— Je le connais.

— Connais-le à ton aise.

— Comment diable est-il à la noce?

— Nous y sommes bien, nous.

— D’où vient-elle, cette noce?

— Est-ce que je sais?

— Écoute.

— Quoi?

— Tu devrais faire une chose.

— Quoi?

— Descendre de notre roulotte et filer cette noce-là.

— Pourquoi faire?

— Pour savoir où elle va, et ce qu’elle est. Dépêche-toi de descendre, cours, ma fée, toi qui es jeune.

— Je ne peux pas quitter la voiture.

— Pourquoi ça?

— Je suis louée.

— Ah fichtre!

— Je dois ma journée de poissarde à la préfecture.

— C’est vrai.

— Si je quitte la voiture, le premier inspecteur qui me voit m’arrête. Tu sais bien.

— Oui, je sais.

— Aujourd’hui, je suis achetée par Pharos.

— C’est égal. Ce vieux m’embête.

— Les vieux t’embêtent. Tu n’es pourtant pas une jeune fille.

— Il est dans la première voiture.

— Eh bien?

— Dans la roulotte de la mariée.

— Après?

— Donc il est le père.

— Qu’est-ce que cela me fait?

— Je te dis qu’il est le père.

— Il n’y a pas que ce père-là.

— Écoute.

— Quoi?

— Moi, je ne peux guère sortir que masqué. Ici, je suis caché, on ne sait pas que j’y suis. Mais demain, il n’y a plus de masques. C’est mercredi des cendres. Je risque de tomber. Il faut que je rentre dans mon trou. Toi, tu es libre.

— Pas trop.

— Plus que moi toujours.

— Eh bien, après?

— Il faut que tu tâches de savoir où est allée cette noce-là?

— Où elle va?

— Oui.

— Je le sais.

— Où va-t-elle donc?

— Au Cadran Bleu.

— D’abord ce n’est pas de ce côté-là.

— Eh bien! à la Râpée.

— Ou ailleurs.

— Elle est libre. Les noces sont libres.

— Ce n’est pas tout ça. Je te dis qu’il faut que tu tâches de me savoir ce que c’est que cette noce-là, dont est ce vieux, et où cette noce-là demeure.

— Plus souvent! voilà qui sera drôle. C’est commode de retrouver, huit jours après, une noce qui a passé dans Paris le mardi gras. Une tiquante dans un grenier à foin! Est-ce que c’est possible?

— N’importe, il faudra tâcher. Entends-tu, Azelma?

Les deux files reprirent des deux côtés du boulevard leur mouvement en sens inverse, et la voiture des masques perdit de vue «la roulotte» de la mariée.

Chapitre II

Jean Valjean a toujours son bras en écharpe

Réaliser son rêve. À qui cela est-il donné? Il doit y avoir des élections pour cela dans le ciel; nous sommes tous candidats à notre insu; les anges votent. Cosette et Marius avaient été élus.

Cosette, à la mairie et dans l'église, était éclatante et touchante. C'était Toussaint, aidée de Nicolette, qui l'avait habillée.

Cosette avait sur une jupe de taffetas blanc sa robe de guipure de Binche, un voile de point d'Angleterre, un collier de perles fines, une couronne de fleurs d'oranger; tout cela était blanc, et, dans cette blancheur, elle rayonnait. C'était une candeur exquise se dilatant et se transfigurant dans la clarté. On eût dit une vierge en train de devenir déesse.

Les beaux cheveux de Marius étaient lustrés et parfumés; on entrevoyait çà et là, sous l'épaisseur des boucles, des lignes pâles qui étaient les cicatrices de la barricade.

Le grand-père, superbe, la tête haute, amalgamant plus que jamais dans sa toilette et dans ses manières toutes les élégances du temps de Barras, conduisait Cosette. Il remplaçait Jean Valjean qui, à cause de son bras en écharpe, ne pouvait donner la main à la mariée.

Jean Valjean, en noir, suivait et souriait.

— Monsieur Fauchelevent, lui disait l'aïeul, voilà un beau jour. Je vote la fin des afflictions et des chagrins! Il ne faut plus qu'il y ait de tristesse nulle part désormais. Pardieu! je décrète la joie! Le mal n'a pas le droit d'être. Qu'il y ait des hommes malheureux, en vérité, cela est honteux pour l'azur du ciel. Le mal ne vient pas de l'homme qui, au fond, est bon. Toutes les misères humaines ont pour chef-lieu et pour gouvernement central l'enfer, autrement dit les Tuileries du diable. Bon, voilà que je dis des mots démagogiques à présent! Quant à moi, je n'ai plus d'opinion politique; que tous les hommes soient riches, c'est-à-dire joyeux, voilà à quoi je me borne.

Quand, à l'issue de toutes les cérémonies, après avoir prononcé devant le maire et devant le prêtre tous les oui possibles, après avoir signé sur les registres à la municipalité et à la sacristie, après avoir échangé leurs anneaux, après avoir été à genoux coude à coude sous le poêle de moire blanche dans la fumée de l'encensoir, ils arrivèrent se tenant par la main, admirés et enviés de tous, Marius en noir, elle en blanc, précédés du suisse à épaulettes de colonel frappant les dalles de sa hallebarde, entre deux haies d’assistants émerveillés, sous le portail de l’église ouvert à deux battants, prêts à remonter en voiture et tout étant fini, Cosette ne pouvait encore y croire. Elle regardait Marius, elle regardait la foule, elle regardait le ciel; il semblait qu’elle eût peur de se réveiller. Son air étonné et inquiet lui ajoutait on ne sait quoi d’enchanteur. Pour s’en retourner, ils montèrent ensemble dans la même voiture, Marius près de Cosette; M. Gillenormand et Jean Valjean leur faisaient vis-à-vis. La tante Gillenormand avait reculé d’un plan, et était dans la seconde voiture. — Mes enfants, disait le grand-père, vous voilà monsieur le baron et madame la baronne avec trente mille livres de rente. Et Cosette, se penchant tout contre Marius, lui caressa l’oreille de ce chuchotement angélique: — C’est donc vrai. Je m’appelle Marius. Je suis madame Toi.

Ces deux êtres resplendissaient. Ils étaient à la minute irrévocable et introuvable, à l’éblouissant point d’intersection de toute la jeunesse et de toute la joie. Ils réalisaient le vers de Jean Prouvaire; à eux deux, ils n’avaient pas quarante ans. C’était le mariage sublimé; ces deux enfants étaient deux lys. Ils ne se voyaient pas, ils se contemplaient. Cosette apercevait Marius dans une gloire; Marius apercevait Cosette sur un autel. Et sur cet autel et dans cette gloire, les deux apothéoses se mêlant, au fond, on ne sait comment, derrière un nuage pour Cosette, dans un flamboiement pour Marius, il y avait la chose idéale, la chose réelle, le rendez-vous du baiser et du songe, l’oreiller nuptial.

Tout le tourment qu’ils avaient eu leur revenait en enivrement. Il leur semblait que les chagrins, les insomnies, les larmes, les angoisses, les épouvantes, les désespoirs, devenus caresses et rayons, rendaient plus charmante encore l’heure charmante qui approchait; et que les tristesses étaient autant de servantes qui faisaient la toilette de la joie. Avoir souffert, comme c’est bon! Leur malheur faisait auréole à leur bonheur. La longue agonie de leur amour aboutissait à une ascension.

C’était dans ces deux âmes le même enchantement, nuancé de volupté dans Marius et de pudeur dans Cosette. Ils se disaient tout bas: Nous irons revoir notre petit jardin de la rue Plumet. Les plis de la robe de Cosette étaient sur Marius.

Un tel jour est un mélange ineffable de rêve et de certitude. On possède et on suppose. On a encore du temps devant soi pour deviner. C’est une indicible émotion ce jour-là d’être à midi et de songer à minuit. Les délices de ces deux cœurs débordaient sur la foule et donnaient de l’allégresse aux passants.

On s’arrêtait rue Saint-Antoine devant Saint-Paul pour voir à travers la vitre de la voiture trembler les fleurs d’oranger sur la tête de Cosette.

Puis ils rentrèrent rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, chez eux. Marius, côte à côte avec Cosette, monta, triomphant et rayonnant, cet escalier où on l’avait traîné mourant. Les pauvres, attroupés devant la porte et se partageant leurs bourses, les bénissaient. Il y avait partout des fleurs. La maison n’était pas moins embaumée que l’église; après l’encens, les roses. Ils croyaient entendre des voix chanter dans l’infini; ils avaient Dieu dans le cœur; la destinée leur apparaissait comme un plafond d’étoiles; ils voyaient au-dessus de leurs têtes une lueur de soleil levant. Tout à coup l’horloge sonna. Marius regarda le charmant bras nu de Cosette et les choses roses qu’on apercevait vaguement à travers les dentelles de son corsage, et Cosette, voyant le regard de Marius, se mit à rougir jusqu’au blanc des yeux.

Bon nombre d’anciens amis de la famille Gillenormand avaient été invités; on s’empressait autour de Cosette. C’était à qui l’appellerait madame la baronne.

L’officier Théodule Gillenormand, maintenant capitaine, était venu de Chartres, où il tenait garnison, pour assister à la noce de son cousin Pontmercy. Cosette ne le reconnut pas.

Lui, de son côté, habitué à être trouvé joli par les femmes, ne se souvint pas plus de Cosette que d’une autre.

— Comme j’ai eu raison de ne pas croire à cette histoire du lancier! disait à part soi le père Gillenormand.

Cosette n’avait jamais été plus tendre avec Jean Valjean. Elle était à l’unisson du père Gillenormand; pendant qu’il érigeait la joie en aphorismes et en maximes, elle exhalait l’amour et la bonté comme un parfum. Le bonheur veut tout le monde heureux.

Elle retrouvait, pour parler à Jean Valjean, des inflexions de voix du temps qu’elle était petite fille. Elle le caressait du sourire.

Un banquet avait été dressé dans la salle à manger.

Un éclairage à giorno est l’assaisonnement nécessaire d’une grande joie. La brume et l’obscurité ne sont point acceptées par les heureux. Ils ne consentent pas à être noirs. La nuit, oui; les ténèbres, non. Si l’on n’a pas de soleil, il faut en faire un.

La salle à manger était une fournaise de choses gaies. Au centre, au-dessus de la table blanche et éclatante, un lustre de Venise à lames plates, avec toutes sortes d'oiseaux de couleur, bleus, violets, rouges, verts, perchés au milieu des bougies; autour du lustre des girandoles, sur le mur des miroirs-appliques à triples et quintuples branches; glaces, cristaux, verreries, vaisselles, porcelaines, faïences, poteries, orfèvreries, argenteries, tout étincelait et se réjouissait. Les vides entre les candélabres étaient comblés par les bouquets, en sorte que, là où il n'y avait pas une lumière, il y avait une fleur.

Dans l'antichambre trois violons et une flûte jouaient en sourdine des quatuors de Haydn.

Jean Valjean s'était assis sur une chaise dans le salon derrière la porte, dont le battant se repliait sur lui de façon à le cacher presque. Quelques instants avant qu'on se mît à table, Cosette vint, comme par coup de tête, lui faire une grande révérence en étalant de ses deux mains sa toilette de mariée, et, avec un regard tendrement espiègle, elle lui demanda:

— Père, êtes-vous content?

— Oui, dit Jean Valjean, je suis content.

— Eh bien, riez alors.

Jean Valjean se mit à rire.

Quelques instants après, Basque annonça que le dîner était servi.

Les convives, précédés de M. Gillenormand donnant le bras à Cosette, entrèrent dans la salle à manger, et se répandirent, selon l'ordre voulu, autour de la table.

Deux grands fauteuils y figuraient, à droite et à gauche de la mariée, le premier pour M. Gillenormand, le second pour Jean Valjean. M. Gillenormand s'assit. L'autre fauteuil resta vide.

On chercha des yeux «monsieur Fauchelevent».

Il n'était plus là.

M. Gillenormand interpella Basque.

— Sais-tu où est monsieur Fauchelevent?

— Monsieur, répondit Basque. Précisément. Monsieur Fauchelevent m'a dit de dire à monsieur qu'il souffrait un peu de sa main malade, et qu'il ne pourrait dîner avec monsieur le baron et madame la baronne. Qu'il priait qu'on l'excusât. Qu'il viendrait demain matin. Il vient de sortir.

Ce fauteuil vide refroidit un moment l'effusion du repas de noces. Mais, M. Fauchelevent absent, M. Gillenormand était là, et le grand-père rayonnait pour deux. Il affirma que M. Fauchelevent faisait bien de se coucher de bonne heure, s'il souffrait, mais que ce n'était qu'un «bobo». Cette déclaration suffit. D'ailleurs, qu'est-ce qu'un coin obscur dans une telle submersion de joie? Cosette et Marius étaient dans un de ces moments égoïstes et bénis où l'on n'a pas d'autre faculté que de percevoir le bonheur. Et puis, M. Gillenormand eut une idée. — Pardieu, ce fauteuil est vide. Viens-y, Marius. Ta tante, quoiqu'elle ait droit à toi, te le permettra. Ce fauteuil est pour toi. C'est légal, et c'est gentil. Fortunatus près de Fortunata. — Applaudissement de toute la table. Marius prit près de Cosette la place de Jean Valjean; et les choses s'arrangèrent de telle sorte que Cosette, d'abord triste de l'absence de Jean Valjean, finit par en être contente. Du moment où Marius était le remplaçant, Cosette n'eût pas regretté Dieu. Elle mit son doux petit pied chaussé de satin blanc sur le pied de Marius.

Le fauteuil occupé, M. Fauchelevent fut effacé; et rien ne manqua. Et, cinq minutes après, la table entière riait d'un bout à l'autre avec toute la verve de l'oubli.

Au dessert, M. Gillenormand debout, un verre de vin de champagne en main, à demi plein pour que le tremblement de ses quatre-vingt-douze ans ne le fît pas déborder, porta la santé des mariés.

— Vous n'échapperez pas à deux sermons, s'écria-t-il. Vous avez eu le matin celui du curé, vous aurez le soir celui du grand-père. Écoutez-moi; je vais vous donner un conseil: adorez-vous. Je ne fais pas un tas de giries, je vais au but, soyez heureux. Il n'y a pas dans la création d'autres sages que les tourtereaux. Les philosophes disent: Modérez vos joies. Moi je dis: Lâchez-leur la bride, à vos joies. Soyez épris comme des diables. Soyez enragés. Les philosophes radotent. Je voudrais leur faire rentrer leur philosophie dans la gargoine. Est-ce qu'il peut y avoir trop de parfums, trop de boutons de rose ouverts, trop de rossignols chantants, trop de feuilles vertes, trop d'aurore dans la vie? est-ce qu'on peut trop s'aimer? est-ce qu'on peut trop se plaire l'un à l'autre? Prends garde, Estelle, tu es trop jolie! Prends garde, Némorin, tu es trop beau! La bonne balourdise! Est-ce qu'on peut trop s'enchanter, trop se cajoler, trop se charmer? est-ce qu'on peut trop être vivant? est-ce qu'on peut trop être heureux? Modérez vos joies. Ah ouiche! À bas les philosophes! La sagesse, c'est la jubilation. Jubilez, jubilons. Sommes-nous heureux parce que nous sommes bons, ou sommes-nous bons parce que nous sommes heureux? Le Sancy s'appelle-t-il le Sancy parce qu'il a appartenu à Harlay de Sancy, ou parce qu'il pèse cent six carats? Je n'en sais rien; la vie est pleine de ces problèmes-là; l'important c'est d'avoir le Sancy, et le bonheur. Soyons heureux sans chicaner. Obéissons aveuglément au soleil. Qu'est-ce que le soleil? C'est l'amour. Qui dit amour, dit femme. Ah! ah! voilà une toute-puissance, c'est la femme. Demandez à ce démagogue de Marius s'il n'est pas l'esclave de cette petite tyranne de Cosette. Et de son plein gré, le lâche! La femme! Il n'y a pas de Robespierre qui tienne, la femme règne. Je ne suis plus royaliste que de cette royauté-là. Qu'est-ce qu'Adam? C'est le royaume d'Ève. Pas de 89 pour Ève. Il y avait le sceptre royal surmonté d'une fleur de lys, il y avait le sceptre impérial surmonté d'un globe, il y avait le sceptre de Charlemagne qui était en fer, il y avait le sceptre de Louis le Grand qui était en or, la révolution les a tordus entre son pouce et son index, comme des fétus de paille de deux liards; c'est fini, c'est cassé, c'est par terre, il n'y a plus de sceptre; mais faites-moi donc des révolutions contre ce petit mouchoir brodé qui sent le patchouli! Je voudrais vous y voir. Essayez. Pourquoi est-ce solide? Parce que c'est un chiffon. Ah! vous êtes le dix-neuvième siècle? Eh bien, après? Nous étions le dix-huitième, nous! Et nous étions aussi bêtes que vous. Ne vous imaginez pas que vous ayez changé grand'chose à l'univers, parce que votre trousse-galant s'appelle le choléra morbus, et parce que votre bourrée s'appelle la cachucha. Au fond, il faudra bien toujours aimer les femmes. Je vous défie de sortir de là. Ces diablesses sont nos anges. Oui, l'amour, la femme, le baiser, c'est un cercle dont je vous défie de sortir; et, quant à moi, je voudrais bien y rentrer. Lequel de vous a vu se lever dans l'infini, apaisant tout au-dessous d'elle, regardant les flots comme une femme, l'étoile Vénus, la grande coquette de l'abîme, la Célimène de l'océan? L'océan, voilà un rude Alceste. Eh bien, il a beau bougonner, Vénus paraît, il faut qu'il sourie. Cette bête brute se soumet. Nous sommes tous ainsi. Colère, tempête, coups de foudre, écume jusqu'au plafond. Une femme entre en scène, une étoile se lève; à plat ventre! Marius se battait il y a six mois; il se marie aujourd'hui. C'est bien fait. Oui, Marius, oui, Cosette, vous avez raison. Existez hardiment l'un pour l'autre, faites-vous des mamours, faites-nous crever de rage de n'en pouvoir faire autant, idolâtrez-vous. Prenez dans vos deux becs tous les petits brins de félicité qu'il y a sur la terre, et arrangez-vous en un nid pour la vie. Pardi, aimer, être aimé, le beau miracle quand on est jeune! Ne vous figurez pas que vous ayez inventé cela. Moi aussi, j'ai rêvé, j'ai songé, j'ai soupiré; moi aussi, j’ai eu une âme clair de lune. L’amour est un enfant de six mille ans. L’amour a droit à une longue barbe blanche. Mathusalem est un gamin près de Cupidon. Depuis soixante siècles, l’homme et la femme se tirent d’affaire en aimant. Le diable, qui est malin, s’est mis à haïr l’homme; l’homme, qui est plus malin, s’est mis à aimer la femme. De cette façon, il s’est fait plus de bien que le diable ne lui a fait de mal. Cette finesse-là a été trouvée dès le paradis terrestre. Mes amis, l’invention est vieille, mais elle est toute neuve. Profitez-en. Soyez Daphnis et Chloé en attendant que vous soyiez Philémon et Baucis. Faites en sorte que, quand vous êtes l’un avec l’autre, rien ne vous manque, et que Cosette soit le soleil pour Marius, et que Marius soit l’univers pour Cosette. Cosette, que le beau temps, ce soit le sourire de votre mari; Marius, que la pluie, ce soit les larmes de ta femme. Et qu’il ne pleuve jamais dans votre ménage. Vous avez chipé à la loterie le bon numéro, l’amour dans le sacrement; vous avez le gros lot, gardez-le bien, mettez-le sous clef, ne le gaspillez pas, adorez-vous, et fichez-vous du reste. Croyez ce que je dis là. C’est du bon sens. Bon sens ne peut mentir. Soyez-vous l’un pour l’autre une religion. Chacun a sa façon d’adorer Dieu. Saperlotte! la meilleure manière d’adorer Dieu, c’est d’aimer sa femme. Je t’aime! voilà mon catéchisme. Quiconque aime est orthodoxe. Le juron de Henri IV met la sainteté entre la ripaille et l’ivresse. Ventre-saint-gris! je ne suis pas de la religion de ce juron-là. La femme y est oubliée. Cela m’étonne de la part du juron de Henri IV. Mes amis, vive la femme! je suis vieux, à ce qu’on dit; c’est étonnant comme je me sens en train d’être jeune. Je voudrais aller écouter des musettes dans les bois. Ces enfants-là qui réussissent à être beaux et contents, cela me grise. Je me marierais bellement si quelqu’un voulait. Il est impossible de s’imaginer que Dieu nous ait faits pour autre chose que ceci: idolâtrer, roucouler, adoniser, être pigeon, être coq, becqueter ses amours du matin au soir, se mirer dans sa petite femme, être fier, être triomphant, faire jabot; voilà le but de la vie. Voilà, ne vous en déplaise, ce que nous pensions, nous autres, dans notre temps dont nous étions les jeunes gens. Ah! vertu-bamboche! qu’il y en avait donc de charmantes femmes, à cette époque-là, et des minois, et des tendrons! J’y exerçais mes ravages. Donc aimez-vous. Si l’on ne s’aimait pas, je ne vois pas vraiment à quoi cela servirait qu’il y eût un printemps; et, quant à moi, je prierais le bon Dieu de serrer toutes les belles choses qu’il nous montre, et de nous les reprendre, et de remettre dans sa boîte les fleurs, les oiseaux et les jolies filles. Mes enfants, recevez la bénédiction du vieux bonhomme.

La soirée fut vive, gaie, aimable. La belle humeur souveraine du grand-père donna l’ut à toute la fête, et chacun se régla sur cette cordialité presque centenaire. On dansa un peu, on rit beaucoup; ce fut une noce bonne enfant. On eût pu y convier le bonhomme Jadis. Du reste il y était dans la personne du père Gillenormand.

Il y eut tumulte, puis silence. Les mariés disparurent.

Un peu après minuit la maison Gillenormand devint un temple.

Ici nous nous arrêtons. Sur le seuil des nuits de noce un ange est debout, souriant, un doigt sur la bouche.

L’âme entre en contemplation devant ce sanctuaire où se fait la célébration de l’amour.

Il doit y avoir des lueurs au-dessus de ces maisons-là. La joie qu’elles contiennent doit s’échapper à travers les pierres des murs en clarté et rayer vaguement les ténèbres. Il est impossible que cette fête sacrée et fatale n’envoie pas un rayonnement céleste à l’infini. L’amour, c’est le creuset sublime où se fait la fusion de l’homme et de la femme; l’être un, l’être triple, l’être final, la trinité humaine en soit. Cette naissance de deux âmes en une doit être une émotion pour l’ombre. L’amant est prêtre; la vierge ravie s’épouvante. Quelque chose de cette joie va à Dieu. Là où il y a vraiment mariage, c’est-à-dire où il y a amour, l’idéal s’en mêle. Un lit nuptial fait dans les ténèbres un coin d’aurore. S’il était donné à la prunelle de chair de percevoir les visions redoutables et charmantes de la vie supérieure, il est probable qu’on verrait les formes de la nuit, les inconnus ailés, les passants bleus de l’invisible, se pencher, foule de têtes sombres, autour de la maison lumineuse, satisfaits, bénissants, se montrant les uns aux autres la vierge épouse, doucement effarés, et ayant le reflet de la félicité humaine sur leurs visages divins. Si, à cette heure suprême, les époux éblouis de volupté, et qui se croient seuls, écoutaient, ils entendraient dans leur chambre un bruissement d’ailes confuses. Le bonheur parfait implique la solidarité des anges. Cette petite alcôve obscure a pour plafond tout le ciel. Quand deux bouches, devenues sacrées par l’amour, se rapprochent pour créer, il est impossible qu’au-dessus de ce baiser ineffable il n’y ait pas un tressaillement dans l’immense mystère des étoiles.

Ces félicités sont les vraies. Pas de joie hors de ces joies-là. L’amour, c’est là l’unique extase. Tout le reste pleure.

Aimer ou avoir aimé, cela suffit. Ne demandez rien ensuite. On n’a pas d’autre perle à trouver dans les plis ténébreux de la vie. Aimer est un accomplissement.

Chapitre III

L’inséparable

Qu’était devenu Jean Valjean?

Immédiatement après avoir ri, sur la gentille injonction de Cosette, personne ne faisant attention à lui, Jean Valjean s’était levé, et, inaperçu, il avait gagné l’antichambre. C’était cette même salle où, huit mois auparavant, il était entré noir de boue, de sang et de poudre, rapportant le petit-fils à l’aïeul. La vieille boiserie était enguirlandée de feuillages et de fleurs; les musiciens étaient assis sur le canapé où l’on avait déposé Marius. Basque en habit noir, en culotte courte, en bas blancs et en gants blancs, disposait des couronnes de roses autour de chacun des plats qu’on allait servir. Jean Valjean lui avait montré son bras en écharpe, l’avait chargé d’expliquer son absence, et était sorti.

Les croisées de la salle à manger donnaient sur la rue. Jean Valjean demeura quelques minutes debout et immobile dans l’obscurité sous ces fenêtres radieuses. Il écoutait. Le bruit confus du banquet venait jusqu’à lui. Il entendait la parole haute et magistrale du grand-père, les violons, le cliquetis des assiettes et des verres, les éclats de rire, et dans toute cette rumeur gaie il distinguait la douce voix joyeuse de Cosette.

Il quitta la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire et s’en revint rue de l’Homme-Armé.

Pour s’en retourner, il prit par la rue Saint-Louis, la rue Culture-Sainte-Catherine et les Blancs-Manteaux; c’était un peu le plus long, mais c’était le chemin par où, depuis trois mois, pour éviter les encombrements et les boues de la rue Vieille-du-Temple, il avait coutume de venir tous les jours de la rue de l’Homme-Armé à la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire, avec Cosette.

Ce chemin où Cosette avait passé excluait pour lui tout autre itinéraire.

Jean Valjean rentra chez lui. Il alluma sa chandelle et monta. L’appartement était vide. Toussaint elle-même n’y était plus. Le pas de Jean Valjean faisait dans les chambres plus de bruit qu’à l’ordinaire. Toutes les armoires étaient ouvertes. Il pénétra dans la chambre de Cosette. Il n’y avait pas de draps au lit. L’oreiller de coutil, sans taie et sans dentelles, était posé sur les couvertures pliées au pied des matelas dont on voyait la toile et où personne ne devait plus coucher. Tous les petits objets féminins auxquels tenait Cosette avaient été emportés; il ne restait que les gros meubles et les quatre murs. Le lit de Toussaint était également dégarni. Un seul lit était fait et semblait attendre quelqu'un; c'était celui de Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean regarda les murailles, ferma quelques portes d'armoires, alla et vint d'une chambre à l'autre.

Puis il se retrouva dans sa chambre, et il posa sa chandelle sur une table.

Il avait dégagé son bras de l'écharpe, et il se servait de la main droite comme s'il n'en souffrait pas.

Il s'approcha de son lit, et ses yeux s'arrêtèrent, fut-ce par hasard? fut-ce avec intention? sur l'inséparable, dont Cosette avait été jalouse, sur la petite malle qui ne le quittait jamais. Le 4 juin, en arrivant rue de l'Homme-Armé, il l'avait déposée sur un guéridon près de son chevet. Il alla à ce guéridon avec une sorte de vivacité, prit dans sa poche une clef, et ouvrit la valise.

Il en tira lentement les vêtements avec lesquels, dix ans auparavant, Cosette avait quitté Montfermeil; d'abord la petite robe noire, puis le fichu noir, puis les bons gros souliers d'enfant que Cosette aurait presque pu mettre encore, tant elle avait le pied petit, puis la brassière de futaine bien épaisse, puis le jupon de tricot, puis le tablier à poches, puis les bas de laine. Ces bas, où était encore gracieusement marquée la forme d'une petite jambe, n'étaient guère plus longs que la main de Jean Valjean. Tout cela était de couleur noire. C'était lui qui avait apporté ces vêtements pour elle à Montfermeil. À mesure qu'il les ôtait de la valise, il les posait sur le lit. Il pensait. Il se rappelait. C'était en hiver, un mois de décembre très froid, elle grelottait à demi nue dans des guenilles, ses pauvres petits pieds tout rouges dans des sabots. Lui Jean Valjean, il lui avait fait quitter ces haillons pour lui faire mettre cet habillement de deuil. La mère avait dû être contente dans sa tombe de voir sa fille porter son deuil, et surtout de voir qu'elle était vêtue et qu'elle avait chaud. Il pensait à cette forêt de Montfermeil; ils l'avaient traversée ensemble, Cosette et lui; il pensait au temps qu'il faisait, aux arbres sans feuilles, au bois sans oiseaux, au ciel sans soleil; c'est égal, c'était charmant. Il rangea les petites nippes sur le lit, le fichu près du jupon, les bas à côté des souliers, la brassière à côté de la robe, et il les regarda l'une après l'autre. Elle n'était pas plus haute que cela, elle avait sa grande poupée dans ses bras, elle avait mis son louis d'or dans la poche de ce tablier, elle riait, ils marchaient tous les deux se tenant par la main, elle n'avait que lui au monde.

Alors sa vénérable tête blanche tomba sur le lit, ce vieux cœur stoïque se brisa, sa face s’abîma pour ainsi dire dans les vêtements de Cosette, et si quelqu’un eût passé dans l’escalier en ce moment, on eût entendu d’effrayants sanglots.

Chapitre IV

Immortale jecur

La vieille lutte formidable, dont nous avons déjà vu plusieurs phases, recommença.

Jacob ne lutta avec l'ange qu'une nuit. Hélas! combien de fois avons-nous vu Jean Valjean saisi corps à corps dans les ténèbres par sa conscience et luttant éperdument contre elle!

Lutte inouïe! À de certains moments, c'est le pied qui glisse; à d'autres instants, c'est le sol qui croule. Combien de fois cette conscience, forcenée au bien, l'avait-elle étreint et accablé! Combien de fois la vérité, inexorable, lui avait-elle mis le genou sur la poitrine! Combien de fois, terrassé par la lumière, lui avait-il crié grâce! Combien de fois cette lumière implacable, allumée en lui et sur lui par l'évêque, l'avait-elle ébloui de force alors qu'il souhaitait être aveuglé! Combien de fois s'était-il redressé dans le combat, retenu au rocher, adossé au sophisme, traîné dans la poussière, tantôt renversant sa conscience sous lui, tantôt renversé par elle! Combien de fois, après une équivoque, après un raisonnement traître et spécieux de l'égoïsme, avait-il entendu sa conscience irritée lui crier à l'oreille: Croc-en-jambe! misérable! Combien de fois sa pensée réfractaire avait-elle râlé convulsivement sous l'évidence du devoir! Résistance à Dieu. Sueurs funèbres. Que de blessures secrètes, que lui seul sentait saigner! Que d'écorchures à sa lamentable existence! Combien de fois s'était-il relevé sanglant, meurtri, brisé, éclairé, le désespoir au cœur, la sérénité dans l'âme? et, vaincu, il se sentait vainqueur. Et, après l'avoir disloqué, tenaillé et rompu, sa conscience, debout au-dessus de lui, redoutable, lumineuse, tranquille, lui disait: Maintenant, va en paix!

Mais, au sortir d'une si sombre lutte, quelle paix lugubre, hélas!

Cette nuit-là pourtant, Jean Valjean sentit qu'il livrait son dernier combat.

Une question se présentait, poignante.

Les prédestinations ne sont pas toutes droites, elles ne se développent pas en avenue rectiligne devant le prédestiné; elles ont des impasses, des cæcums, des tournants obscurs, des carrefours inquiétants offrant plusieurs voies. Jean Valjean faisait halte en ce moment au plus périlleux de ces carrefours.

Il était parvenu au suprême croisement du bien et du mal. Il avait cette ténébreuse intersection sous les yeux. Cette fois encore, comme cela lui était déjà arrivé dans d'autres péripéties douloureuses, deux routes s'ouvraient devant lui; l'une tentante, l'autre effrayante. Laquelle prendre?

Celle qui effrayait était conseillée par le mystérieux doigt indicateur que nous apercevons tous chaque fois que nous fixons nos yeux sur l'ombre.

Jean Valjean avait, encore une fois, le choix entre le port terrible et l'embûche souriante.

Cela est-il donc vrai? l'âme peut guérir; le sort, non. Chose affreuse! une destinée incurable!

La question qui se présentait, la voici:

De quelle façon Jean Valjean allait-il se comporter avec le bonheur de Cosette et de Marius? Ce bonheur, c'était lui qui l'avait voulu, c'était lui qui l'avait fait; il se l'était lui-même enfoncé dans les entrailles, et à cette heure, en le considérant, il pouvait avoir l'espèce de satisfaction qu'aurait un armurier qui reconnaîtrait sa marque de fabrique sur un couteau, en se le retirant tout fumant de la poitrine.

Cosette avait Marius, Marius possédait Cosette. Ils avaient tout, même la richesse. Et c'était son œuvre. Mais ce bonheur, maintenant qu'il existait, maintenant qu'il était là, qu'allait-il en faire, lui Jean Valjean? S'imposerait-il à ce bonheur? Le traiterait-il comme lui appartenant? Sans doute Cosette était à un autre; mais lui Jean Valjean retiendrait-il de Cosette tout ce qu'il en pourrait retenir? Resterait-il l'espèce de père, entrevu, mais respecté, qu'il avait été jusqu'alors? S'introduirait-il tranquillement dans la maison de Cosette? Apporterait-il, sans dire mot, son passé à cet avenir? Se présenterait-il là comme ayant droit, et viendrait-il s'asseoir, voilé, à ce lumineux foyer? Prendrait-il, en leur souriant, les mains de ces innocents dans ses deux mains tragiques? Poserait-il sur les paisibles chenets du salon Gillenormand ses pieds qui traînaient derrière eux l'ombre infamante de la loi? Entrerait-il en participation de chances avec Cosette et Marius? Épaissirait-il l'obscurité sur son front et le nuage dans le leur? Mettrait-il en tiers avec deux félicités sa catastrophe? Continuerait-il de se taire? En un mot serait-il, près de ces deux êtres heureux, le sinistre muet de la destinée?

Il faut être habitué à la fatalité et à ses rencontres pour oser lever les yeux quand de certaines questions nous apparaissent dans leur nudité horrible. Le bien ou le mal sont derrière ce sévère point d'interrogation. Que vas-tu faire? demanda le sphinx.

Cette habitude de l'épreuve, Jean Valjean l'avait. Il regarda le sphinx fixement.

Il examina l'impitoyable problème sous toutes ses faces.

Cosette, cette existence charmante, était le radeau de ce naufragé. Que faire? S'y cramponner, ou lâcher prise?

S'il s'y cramponnait, il sortait du désastre, il remontait au soleil, il laissait ruisseler de ses vêtements et de ses cheveux l'eau amère, il était sauvé, il vivait.

Allait-il lâcher prise?

Alors, l'abîme.

Il tenait ainsi douloureusement conseil avec sa pensée. Ou, pour mieux dire, il combattait; il se ruait, furieux, au dedans de lui-même, tantôt contre sa volonté, tantôt contre sa conviction.

Ce fut un bonheur pour Jean Valjean d'avoir pu pleurer. Cela l'éclaira peut-être. Pourtant le commencement fut farouche. Une tempête, plus furieuse que celle qui autrefois l'avait poussé vers Arras, se déchaîna en lui. Le passé lui revenait en regard du présent; il comparait et il sanglotait. Une fois l'écluse des larmes ouvertes, le désespéré se tordit.

Il se sentait arrêté.

Hélas! dans ce pugilat à outrance entre notre égoïsme et notre devoir, quand nous reculons ainsi pas à pas devant notre idéal incommutable, égarés, acharnés, exaspérés de céder, disputant le terrain, espérant une fuite possible, cherchant une issue, quelle brusque et sinistre résistance derrière nous que le pied du mur!

Sentir l'ombre sacrée qui fait obstacle!

L'invisible inexorable, quelle obsession!

Donc avec la conscience on n'a jamais fini. Prends-en ton parti, Brutus; prends-en ton parti, Caton. Elle est sans fond, étant Dieu. On jette dans ce puits le travail de toute sa vie, on y jette sa fortune, on y jette sa richesse, on y jette son succès, on y jette sa liberté ou sa patrie, on y jette son bien-être, on y jette son repos, on y jette sa joie. Encore! encore! Videz le vase! penchez l'urne! Il faut finir par y jeter son cœur.

Il y a quelque part dans la brume des vieux enfers un tonneau comme cela.

N’est-on pas pardonnable de refuser enfin? Est-ce que l’inépuisable peut avoir un droit? Est-ce que les chaînes sans fin ne sont pas au-dessus de la force humaine? Qui donc blâmerait Sisyphe et Jean Valjean de dire: c’est assez!

L’obéissance de la matière est limitée par le frottement; est-ce qu’il n’y a pas une limite à l’obéissance de l’âme? Si le mouvement perpétuel est impossible, est-ce que le dévouement perpétuel est exigible?

Le premier pas n’est rien; c’est le dernier qui est difficile. Qu’était-ce que l’affaire Champmathieu à côté du mariage de Cosette et de ce qu’il entraînait? Qu’est-ce que ceci: entrer dans le bagne, à côté de ceci: entrer dans le néant?

Ô première marche à descendre, que tu es sombre! Ô seconde marche, que tu es noire!

Comment ne pas détourner la tête cette fois?

Le martyre est une sublimation, sublimation corrosive. C’est une torture qui sacre. On peut y consentir la première heure; on s’assied sur le trône de fer rouge, on met sur son front la couronne de fer rouge, on accepte le globe de fer rouge, on prend le sceptre de fer rouge, mais il reste encore à vêtir le manteau de flamme, et n’y a-t-il pas un moment où la chair misérable se révolte, et où l’on abdique le supplice?

Enfin Jean Valjean entra dans le calme de l’accablement.

Il pesa, il songea, il considéra les alternatives de la mystérieuse balance de lumière et d’ombre.

Imposer son bagne à ces deux enfants éblouissants, ou consommer lui-même son irrémédiable engloutissement. D’un côté le sacrifice de Cosette, de l’autre le sien propre.

À quelle solution s’arrêta-t-il?

Quelle détermination prit-il? Quelle fut, au dedans de lui-même, sa réponse définitive à l’incorruptible interrogatoire de la fatalité? Quelle porte se décida-t-il à ouvrir? Quel côté de sa vie prit-il le parti de fermer et de condamner? Entre tous ces escarpements insondables qui l’entouraient, quel fut son choix? Quelle extrémité accepta-t-il? Auquel de ces gouffres fit-il un signe de tête?

Sa rêverie vertigineuse dura toute la nuit.

Il resta là jusqu’au jour, dans la même attitude, ployé en deux sur ce lit, prosterné sous l’énormité du sort, écrasé peut-être, hélas! les poings crispés, les bras étendus à angle droit comme un crucifié décloué qu’on aurait jeté la face contre terre. Il demeura douze heures, les douze heures d’une longue nuit d’hiver, glacé, sans relever la tête et sans prononcer une parole. Il était immobile comme un cadavre, pendant que sa pensée se roulait à terre et s’envolait, tantôt comme l’hydre, tantôt comme l’aigle. À le voir ainsi sans mouvement on eût dit un mort; tout à coup il tressaillait convulsivement et sa bouche, collée aux vêtements de Cosette, les baisait; alors on voyait qu’il vivait.

Qui? on? puisque Jean Valjean était seul et qu’il n’y avait personne là?

Le On qui est dans les ténèbres.

Livre septième — La dernière gorgée du calice

Chapitre I

Le septième cercle et le huitième ciel

Les lendemains de noce sont solitaires. On respecte le recueillement des heureux. Et aussi un peu leur sommeil attardé. Le brouhaha des visites et des félicitations ne commence que plus tard. Le matin du 17 février, il était un peu plus de midi quand Basque, la serviette et le plumeau sous le bras, occupé «à faire son antichambre», entendit un léger frappement à la porte. On n'avait point sonné, ce qui est discret un pareil jour. Basque ouvrit et vit M. Fauchelevent. Il l'introduisit dans le salon, encore encombré et sens dessus dessous, et qui avait l'air du champ de bataille des joies de la veille.

— Dame, monsieur, observa Basque, nous nous sommes réveillés tard.

— Votre maître est-il levé? demanda Jean Valjean.

— Comment va le bras de monsieur? répondit Basque.

— Mieux. Votre maître est-il levé?

— Lequel? l'ancien ou le nouveau?

— Monsieur Pontmercy.

— Monsieur le baron? fit Basque en se redressant.

On est surtout baron pour ses domestiques. Il leur en revient quelque chose; ils ont ce qu'un philosophe appellerait l'éclaboussure du titre, et cela les flatte. Marius, pour le dire en passant, républicain militant, et il l'avait prouvé, était maintenant baron malgré lui. Une petite révolution s'était faite dans la famille sur ce titre. C'était à présent M. Gillenormand qui y tenait et Marius qui s'en détachait. Mais le colonel Pontmercy avait écrit: Mon fils portera mon titre. Marius obéissait. Et puis Cosette, en qui la femme commençait à poindre, était ravie d'être baronne.

— Monsieur le baron? répéta Basque. Je vais voir. Je vais lui dire que monsieur Fauchelevent est là.

— Non. Ne lui dites pas que c'est moi. Dites-lui que quelqu'un demande à lui parler en particulier, et ne lui dites pas de nom.

— Ah! fit Basque.

— Je veux lui faire une surprise.

— Ah! reprit Basque, se donnant à lui-même son second ah! comme explication du premier.

Et il sortit.

Jean Valjean resta seul.

Le salon, nous venons de le dire, était tout en désordre. Il semblait qu’en prêtant l’oreille on eût pu y entendre encore la vague rumeur de la noce. Il y avait sur le parquet toutes sortes de fleurs tombées des guirlandes et des coiffures. Les bougies brûlées jusqu’au tronçon ajoutaient aux cristaux des lustres des stalactites de cire. Pas un meuble n’était à sa place. Dans des coins, trois ou quatre fauteuils, rapprochés les uns des autres et faisant cercle, avaient l’air de continuer une causerie. L’ensemble était riant. Il y a encore une certaine grâce dans une fête morte. Cela a été heureux. Sur ces chaises en désarroi, parmi ces fleurs qui se fanent, sous ces lumières éteintes, on a pensé de la joie. Le soleil succédait au lustre, et entrait gaîment dans le salon.

Quelques minutes s’écoulèrent. Jean Valjean était immobile à l’endroit où Basque l’avait quitté. Il était très pâle. Ses yeux étaient creux et tellement enfoncés par l’insomnie sous l’orbite qu’ils y disparaissaient presque. Son habit noir avait les plis fatigués d’un vêtement qui a passé la nuit. Les coudes étaient blanchis de ce duvet que laisse au drap le frottement du linge. Jean Valjean regardait à ses pieds la fenêtre dessinée sur le parquet par le soleil.

Un bruit se fit à la porte, il leva les yeux.

Marius entra, la tête haute, la bouche riante, on ne sait quelle lumière sur le visage, le front épanoui, l’œil triomphant. Lui aussi n’avait pas dormi.

— C’est vous, père! s’écria-t-il en apercevant Jean Valjean; cet imbécile de Basque qui avait un air mystérieux! Mais vous venez de trop bonne heure. Il n’est encore que midi et demi. Cosette dort.

Ce mot: Père, dit à M. Fauchelevent par Marius, signifiait: Félicité suprême. Il y avait toujours eu, on le sait, escarpement, froideur et contrainte entre eux; glace à rompre ou à fondre. Marius en était à ce point d’enivrement que l’escarpement s’abaissait, que la glace se dissolvait, et que M. Fauchelevent était pour lui, comme pour Cosette, un père.

Il continua; les paroles débordaient de lui, ce qui est propre à ces divins paroxysmes de la joie:

— Que je suis content de vous voir! Si vous saviez comme vous nous avez manqué hier! Bonjour, père. Comment va votre main? Mieux, n’est-ce pas?

Et, satisfait de la bonne réponse qu’il se faisait à lui-même, il poursuivit:

— Nous avons bien parlé de vous tous les deux. Cosette vous aime tant! Vous n’oubliez pas que vous avez votre chambre ici. Nous ne voulons plus de la rue de l’Homme-Armé. Nous n’en voulons plus du tout. Comment aviez-vous pu aller demeurer dans une rue comme ça, qui est malade, qui est grognon, qui est laide, qui a une barrière à un bout, où l’on a froid, où l’on ne peut pas entrer? Vous viendrez vous installer ici. Et dès aujourd’hui. Ou vous aurez affaire à Cosette. Elle entend nous mener tous par le bout du nez, je vous en préviens. Vous avez vu votre chambre, elle est tout près de la nôtre; elle donne sur des jardins; on a fait arranger ce qu’il y avait à la serrure, le lit est fait, elle est toute prête, vous n’avez qu’à arriver. Cosette a mis près de votre lit une grande vieille bergère en velours d’Utrecht, à qui elle a dit: tends-lui les bras. Tous les printemps, dans le massif d’acacias qui est en face de vos fenêtres, il vient un rossignol. Vous l’aurez dans deux mois. Vous aurez son nid à votre gauche et le nôtre à votre droite. La nuit il chantera, et le jour Cosette parlera. Votre chambre est en plein midi. Cosette vous y rangera vos livres, votre voyage du capitaine Cook, et l’autre, celui de Vancouver, toutes vos affaires. Il y a, je crois, une petite valise à laquelle vous tenez, j’ai disposé un coin d’honneur pour elle. Vous avez conquis mon grand-père, vous lui allez. Nous vivrons ensemble. Savez-vous le whist? vous comblerez mon grand-père si vous savez le whist. C’est vous qui mènerez promener Cosette mes jours de palais, vous lui donnerez le bras, vous savez, comme au Luxembourg autrefois. Nous sommes absolument décidés à être très heureux. Et vous en serez, de notre bonheur, entendez-vous, père? Ah çà, vous déjeunez avec nous aujourd’hui?

— Monsieur, dit Jean Valjean, j’ai une chose à vous dire. Je suis un ancien forçat.

La limite des sons aigus perceptibles peut être tout aussi bien dépassée pour l’esprit que pour l’oreille. Ces mots: Je suis un ancien forçat, sortant de la bouche de M. Fauchelevent et entrant dans l’oreille de Marius, allaient au delà du possible. Marius n’entendit pas. Il lui sembla que quelque chose venait de lui être dit; mais il ne sut quoi. Il resta béant.

Il s’aperçut alors que l’homme qui lui parlait était effrayant. Tout à son éblouissement, il n’avait pas jusqu’à ce moment remarqué cette pâleur terrible.

Jean Valjean dénoua la cravate noire qui lui soutenait le bras droit, défit le linge roulé autour de sa main, mit son pouce à nu et le montra à Marius.

— Je n’ai rien à la main, dit-il.

Marius regarda le pouce.

— Je n'y ai jamais rien eu, reprit Jean Valjean.

Il n'y avait en effet aucune trace de blessure.

Jean Valjean poursuivit:

— Il convenait que je fusse absent de votre mariage. Je me suis fait absent le plus que j'ai pu. J'ai supposé cette blessure pour ne point faire un faux, pour ne pas introduire de nullité dans les actes du mariage, pour être dispensé de signer.

Marius bégaya:

— Qu'est-ce que cela veut dire?

— Cela veut dire, répondit Jean Valjean, que j'ai été aux galères.

— Vous me rendez fou! s'écria Marius épouvanté.

— Monsieur Pontmercy, dit Jean Valjean, j'ai été dix-neuf ans aux galères. Pour vol. Puis j'ai été condamné à perpétuité. Pour vol. Pour récidive. À l'heure qu'il est, je suis en rupture de ban.

Marius avait beau reculer devant la réalité, refuser le fait, résister à l'évidence, il fallait s'y rendre. Il commença à comprendre, et comme cela arrive toujours en pareil cas, il comprit au delà. Il eut le frisson d'un hideux éclair intérieur; une idée, qui le fit frémir, lui traversa l'esprit. Il entrevit dans l'avenir, pour lui-même, une destinée difforme.

— Dites tout, dites tout! cria-t-il. Vous êtes le père de Cosette!

Et il fit deux pas en arrière avec un mouvement d'indicible horreur.

Jean Valjean redressa la tête dans une telle majesté d'attitude qu'il sembla grandir jusqu'au plafond.

— Il est nécessaire que vous me croyiez ici, monsieur; et, quoique notre serment à nous autres ne soit pas reçu en justice....

Ici il fit un silence, puis, avec une sorte d'autorité souveraine et sépulcrale, il ajouta en articulant lentement et en pesant sur les syllabes:

— ...Vous me croirez. Le père de Cosette, moi! devant Dieu, non. Monsieur le baron Pontmercy, je suis un paysan de Faverolles. Je gagnais ma vie à émonder des arbres. Je ne m'appelle pas Fauchelevent, je m'appelle Jean Valjean. Je ne suis rien à Cosette. Rassurez-vous.

Marius balbutia:

— Qui me prouve?....

— Moi. Puisque je le dis.

Marius regarda cet homme. Il était lugubre et tranquille. Aucun mensonge ne pouvait sortir d'un tel calme. Ce qui est glacé est sincère. On sentait le vrai dans cette froideur de tombe.

— Je vous crois, dit Marius.

Jean Valjean inclina la tête comme pour prendre acte, et continua:

— Que suis-je pour Cosette? un passant. Il y a dix ans, je ne savais pas qu'elle existât. Je l'aime, c'est vrai. Une enfant qu'on a vue petite, étant soi-même déjà vieux, on l'aime. Quand on est vieux, on se sent grand-père pour tous les petits enfants. Vous pouvez, ce me semble, supposer que j'ai quelque chose qui ressemble à un cœur. Elle était orpheline. Sans père ni mère. Elle avait besoin de moi. Voilà pourquoi je me suis mis à l'aimer. C'est si faible les enfants, que le premier venu, même un homme comme moi, peut être leur protecteur. J'ai fait ce devoir-là vis-à-vis de Cosette. Je ne crois pas qu'on puisse vraiment appeler si peu de chose une bonne action; mais si c'est une bonne action, eh bien, mettez que je l'ai faite. Enregistrez cette circonstance atténuante. Aujourd'hui Cosette quitte ma vie; nos deux chemins se séparent. Désormais je ne puis plus rien pour elle. Elle est madame Pontmercy. Sa providence a changé. Et Cosette gagne au change. Tout est bien. Quant aux six cent mille francs, vous ne m'en parlez pas, mais je vais au-devant de votre pensée, c'est un dépôt. Comment ce dépôt était-il entre mes mains? Qu'importe? Je rends le dépôt. On n'a rien de plus à me demander. Je complète la restitution en disant mon vrai nom. Ceci encore me regarde. Je tiens, moi, à ce que vous sachiez qui je suis.

Et Jean Valjean regarda Marius en face.

Tout ce qu'éprouvait Marius était tumultueux et incohérent. De certains coups de vent de la destinée font de ces vagues dans notre âme.

Nous avons tous eu de ces moments de trouble dans lesquels tout se disperse en nous; nous disons les premières choses venues, lesquelles ne sont pas toujours précisément celles qu'il faudrait dire. Il y a des révélations subites qu'on ne peut porter et qui enivrent comme un vin funeste. Marius était stupéfié de la situation nouvelle qui lui apparaissait, au point de parler à cet homme presque comme quelqu'un qui lui en aurait voulu de cet aveu.

— Mais enfin, s'écria-t-il, pourquoi me dites-vous tout cela? Qu'est-ce qui vous y force? Vous pouviez vous garder le secret à vous-même. Vous n'êtes ni dénoncé, ni poursuivi, ni traqué? Vous avez une raison pour faire, de gaîté de cœur, une telle révélation. Achevez. Il y a autre chose. À quel propos faites-vous cet aveu? Pour quel motif?

— Pour quel motif? répondit Jean Valjean d'une voix si basse et si sourde qu'on eût dit que c'était à lui-même qu'il parlait plus qu'à Marius.

Pour quel motif, en effet, ce forçat vient-il dire: Je suis un forçat? Eh bien oui! le motif est étrange. C'est par honnêteté. Tenez, ce qu'il y a de malheureux, c'est un fil que j'ai là dans le cœur et qui me tient attaché. C'est surtout quand on est vieux que ces fils-là sont solides. Toute la vie se défait alentour; ils résistent. Si j'avais pu arracher ce fil, le casser, dénouer le nœud ou le couper, m'en aller bien loin, j'étais sauvé, je n'avais qu'à partir; il y a des diligences rue du Bouloy; vous êtes heureux, je m'en vais. J'ai essayé de le rompre, ce fil, j'ai tiré dessus, il a tenu bon, il n'a pas cassé, je m'arrachais le cœur avec. Alors j'ai dit: Je ne puis pas vivre ailleurs que là. Il faut que je reste. Eh bien oui, mais vous avez raison, je suis un imbécile, pourquoi ne pas rester tout simplement? Vous m'offrez une chambre dans la maison, madame Pontmercy m'aime bien, elle dit à ce fauteuil: tends-lui les bras, votre grand-père ne demande pas mieux que de m'avoir, je lui vas, nous habiterons tous ensemble, repas en commun, je donnerai le bras à Cosette... — à madame Pontmercy, pardon, c'est l'habitude, — nous n'aurons qu'un toit, qu'une table, qu'un feu, le même coin de cheminée l'hiver, la même promenade l'été, c'est la joie cela, c'est le bonheur cela, c'est tout, cela. Nous vivrons en famille. En famille!

À ce mot, Jean Valjean devint farouche. Il croisa les bras, considéra le plancher à ses pieds comme s'il voulait y creuser un abîme, et sa voix fut tout à coup éclatante:

— En famille! non. Je ne suis d'aucune famille, moi. Je ne suis pas de la vôtre. Je ne suis pas de celle des hommes. Les maisons où l'on est entre soi, j'y suis de trop. Il y a des familles, mais ce n'est pas pour moi. Je suis le malheureux; je suis dehors. Ai-je eu un père et une mère? j'en doute presque. Le jour où j'ai marié cette enfant, cela a été fini, je l'ai vue heureuse, et qu'elle était avec l'homme qu'elle aime, et qu'il y avait là un bon vieillard, un ménage de deux anges, toutes les joies dans cette maison, et que c'était bien, et je me suis dit: Toi, n'entre pas. Je pouvais mentir, c'est vrai, vous tromper tous, rester monsieur Fauchelevent. Tant que cela a été pour elle, j'ai pu mentir; mais maintenant ce serait pour moi, je ne le dois pas. Il suffisait de me taire, c'est vrai, et tout continuait. Vous me demandez ce qui me force à parler? une drôle de chose, ma conscience. Me taire, c'était pourtant bien facile. J'ai passé la nuit à tâcher de me le persuader; vous me confessez, et ce que je viens vous dire est si extraordinaire que vous en avez le droit; eh bien oui, j'ai passé la nuit à me donner des raisons, je me suis donné de très bonnes raisons, j'ai fait ce que j’ai pu, allez. Mais il y a deux choses où je n’ai pas réussi; ni à casser le fil qui me tient par le cœur fixé, rivé et scellé ici, ni à faire taire quelqu’un qui me parle bas quand je suis seul. C’est pourquoi je suis venu vous avouer tout ce matin. Tout, ou à peu près tout. Il y a de l’inutile à dire qui ne concerne que moi; je le garde pour moi. L’essentiel, vous le savez. Donc j’ai pris mon mystère, et je vous l’ai apporté. Et j’ai éventré mon secret sous vos yeux. Ce n’était pas une résolution aisée à prendre. Toute la nuit je me suis débattu. Ah! vous croyez que je ne me suis pas dit que ce n’était point là l’affaire Champmathieu, qu’en cachant mon nom je ne faisais de mal à personne, que le nom de Fauchelevent m’avait été donné par Fauchelevent lui-même en reconnaissance d’un service rendu, et que je pouvais bien le garder, et que je serais heureux dans cette chambre que vous m’offrez, que je ne gênerais rien, que je serais dans mon petit coin, et que, tandis que vous auriez Cosette, moi j’aurais l’idée d’être dans la même maison qu’elle. Chacun aurait eu son bonheur proportionné. Continuer d’être monsieur Fauchelevent, cela arrangeait tout. Oui, excepté mon âme. Il y avait de la joie partout sur moi, le fond de mon âme restait noir. Ce n’est pas assez d’être heureux, il faut être content. Ainsi je serais resté monsieur Fauchelevent, ainsi mon vrai visage, je l’aurais caché, ainsi, en présence de votre épanouissement, j’aurais eu une énigme, ainsi, au milieu de votre plein jour, j’aurais eu des ténèbres; ainsi, sans crier gare, tout bonnement, j’aurais introduit le bagne à votre foyer, je me serais assis à votre table avec la pensée que, si vous saviez qui je suis, vous m’en chasseriez, je me serais laissé servir par des domestiques qui, s’ils avaient su, auraient dit: Quelle horreur! Je vous aurais touché avec mon coude dont vous avez droit de ne pas vouloir, je vous aurais filouté vos poignées de main! Il y aurait eu dans votre maison un partage de respect entre des cheveux blancs vénérables et des cheveux blancs flétris; à vos heures les plus intimes, quand tous les cœurs se seraient crus ouverts jusqu’au fond les uns pour les autres, quand nous aurions été tous quatre ensemble, votre aïeul, vous deux, et moi, il y aurait eu là un inconnu! J’aurais été côte à côte avec vous dans votre existence, ayant pour unique soin de ne jamais déranger le couvercle de mon puits terrible. Ainsi, moi, un mort, je me serais imposé à vous qui êtes des vivants. Elle, je l’aurais condamnée à moi à perpétuité. Vous, Cosette et moi, nous aurions été trois têtes dans le bonnet vert! Est-ce que vous ne frissonnez pas? Je ne suis que le plus accablé des hommes, j’en aurais été le plus monstrueux. Et ce crime, je l’aurais commis tous les jours! Et ce mensonge, je l'aurais fait tous les jours! Et cette face de nuit, je l'aurais eue sur mon visage tous les jours! Et ma flétrissure, je vous en aurais donné votre part tous les jours! tous les jours! à vous mes bien-aimés, à vous mes enfants, à vous mes innocents! Se taire n'est rien? garder le silence est simple? Non, ce n'est pas simple. Il y a un silence qui ment. Et mon mensonge, et ma fraude, et mon indignité, et ma lâcheté, et ma trahison, et mon crime, je l'aurais bu goutte à goutte, je l'aurais recraché, puis rebu, j'aurais fini à minuit et recommencé à midi, et mon bonjour aurait menti, et mon bonsoir aurait menti, et j'aurais dormi là-dessus, et j'aurais mangé cela avec mon pain, et j'aurais regardé Cosette en face, et j'aurais répondu au sourire de l'ange par le sourire du damné, et j'aurais été un fourbe abominable! Pourquoi faire? pour être heureux. Pour être heureux, moi! Est-ce que j'ai le droit d'être heureux? Je suis hors de la vie, monsieur.

Jean Valjean s'arrêta. Marius écoutait. De tels enchaînements d'idées et d'angoisses ne se peuvent interrompre. Jean Valjean baissa la voix de nouveau, mais ce n'était plus la voix sourde, c'était la voix sinistre.

— Vous demandez pourquoi je parle? je ne suis ni dénoncé, ni poursuivi, ni traqué, dites-vous. Si! je suis dénoncé! si! je suis poursuivi! si! je suis traqué! Par qui? par moi. C'est moi qui me barre à moi-même le passage, et je me traîne, et je me pousse, et je m'arrête, et je m'exécute, et quand on se tient soi-même, on est bien tenu.

Et, saisissant son propre habit à poigne-main et le tirant vers Marius:

— Voyez donc ce poing-ci, continua-t-il. Est-ce que vous ne trouvez pas qu'il tient ce collet-là de façon à ne pas le lâcher? Eh bien! c'est bien un autre poignet, la conscience! Il faut, si l'on veut être heureux, monsieur, ne jamais comprendre le devoir; car, dès qu'on l'a compris, il est implacable. On dirait qu'il vous punit de le comprendre; mais non; il vous en récompense; car il vous met dans un enfer où l'on sent à côté de soi Dieu. On ne s'est pas sitôt déchiré les entrailles qu'on est en paix avec soi-même.

Et, avec une accentuation poignante, il ajouta:

— Monsieur Pontmercy, cela n'a pas le sens commun, je suis un honnête homme. C'est en me dégradant à vos yeux que je m'élève aux miens. Ceci m'est déjà arrivé une fois, mais c'était moins douloureux; ce n'était rien. Oui, un honnête homme. Je ne le serais pas si vous aviez, par ma faute, continué de m'estimer; maintenant que vous me méprisez, je le suis. J'ai cette fatalité sur moi que, ne pouvant jamais avoir que de la considération volée, cette considération m'humilie et m'accable intérieurement, et que, pour que je me respecte, il faut qu'on me méprise. Alors je me redresse. Je suis un galérien qui obéit à sa conscience. Je sais bien que cela n'est pas ressemblant. Mais que voulez-vous que j'y fasse? cela est. J'ai pris des engagements envers moi-même; je les tiens. Il y a des rencontres qui nous lient, il y a des hasards qui nous entraînent dans des devoirs. Voyez-vous, monsieur Pontmercy, il m'est arrivé des choses dans ma vie.

Jean Valjean fit encore une pause, avalant sa salive avec effort comme si ses paroles avaient un arrière-goût amer, et il reprit:

— Quand on a une telle horreur sur soi, on n'a pas le droit de la faire partager aux autres à leur insu, on n'a pas le droit de leur communiquer sa peste, on n'a pas le droit de les faire glisser dans son précipice sans qu'ils s'en aperçoivent, on n'a pas le droit de laisser traîner sa casaque rouge sur eux, on n'a pas le droit d'encombrer sournoisement de sa misère le bonheur d'autrui. S'approcher de ceux qui sont sains et les toucher dans l'ombre avec son ulcère invisible, c'est hideux. Fauchelevent a eu beau me prêter son nom, je n'ai pas le droit de m'en servir; il a pu me le donner, je n'ai pas pu le prendre. Un nom, c'est un moi. Voyez-vous, monsieur, j'ai un peu pensé, j'ai un peu lu, quoique je sois un paysan; et je me rends compte des choses. Vous voyez que je m'exprime convenablement. Je me suis fait une éducation à moi. Eh bien oui, soustraire un nom et se mettre dessous, c'est déshonnête. Des lettres de l'alphabet, cela s'escroque comme une bourse ou comme une montre. Être une fausse signature en chair et en os, être une fausse clef vivante, entrer chez d'honnêtes gens en trichant leur serrure, ne plus jamais regarder, loucher toujours, être infâme au dedans de moi, non! non! non! non! Il vaut mieux souffrir, saigner, pleurer, s'arracher la peau de la chair avec les ongles, passer les nuits à se tordre dans les angoisses, se ronger le ventre et l'âme. Voilà pourquoi je viens vous raconter tout cela. De gaîté de cœur, comme vous dites.

Il respira péniblement, et jeta ce dernier mot:

— Pour vivre, autrefois, j'ai volé un pain; aujourd'hui, pour vivre, je ne veux pas voler un nom.

— Pour vivre! interrompit Marius. Vous n'avez pas besoin de ce nom pour vivre?

— Ah! je m'entends, répondit Jean Valjean, en levant et en abaissant la tête lentement plusieurs fois de suite.

Il y eut un silence. Tous deux se taisaient, chacun abîmé dans un gouffre de pensées. Marius s'était assis près d'une table et appuyait le coin de sa bouche sur un de ses doigts replié. Jean Valjean allait et venait. Il s'arrêta devant une glace et demeura sans mouvement. Puis, comme s'il répondait à un raisonnement intérieur, il dit en regardant cette glace où il ne se voyait pas:

— Tandis qu'à présent je suis soulagé!

Il se remit à marcher et alla à l'autre bout du salon. À l'instant où il se retourna, il s'aperçut que Marius le regardait marcher. Alors il lui dit avec un accent inexprimable:

— Je traîne un peu la jambe. Vous comprenez maintenant pourquoi.

Puis il acheva de se tourner vers Marius:

— Et maintenant, monsieur, figurez-vous ceci: Je n'ai rien dit, je suis resté monsieur Fauchelevent, j'ai pris ma place chez vous, je suis des vôtres, je suis dans ma chambre, je viens déjeuner le matin, en pantoufles, les soirs nous allons au spectacle tous les trois, j'accompagne madame Pontmercy aux Tuileries et à la place Royale, nous sommes ensemble, vous me croyez votre semblable; un beau jour, je suis là, vous êtes là, nous causons, nous rions, tout à coup vous entendez une voix crier ce nom: Jean Valjean! et voilà que cette main épouvantable, la police, sort de l'ombre et m'arrache mon masque brusquement!

Il se tut encore; Marius s'était levé avec un frémissement. Jean Valjean reprit:

— Qu'en dites-vous?

Le silence de Marius répondait.

Jean Valjean continua:

— Vous voyez bien que j'ai raison de ne pas me taire. Tenez, soyez heureux, soyez dans le ciel, soyez l'ange d'un ange, soyez dans le soleil, et contentez-vous-en, et ne vous inquiétez pas de la manière dont un pauvre damné s'y prend pour s'ouvrir la poitrine et faire son devoir; vous avez un misérable homme devant vous, monsieur.

Marius traversa lentement le salon, et quand il fut près de Jean Valjean, lui tendit la main.

Mais Marius dut aller prendre cette main qui ne se présentait point, Jean Valjean se laissa faire, et il sembla à Marius qu'il étreignait une main de marbre.

— Mon grand-père a des amis, dit Marius; je vous aurai votre grâce.

— C’est inutile, répondit Jean Valjean. On me croit mort, cela suffit. Les morts ne sont pas soumis à la surveillance. Ils sont censés pourrir tranquillement. La mort, c’est la même chose que la grâce.

Et, dégageant sa main que Marius tenait, il ajouta avec une sorte de dignité inexorable:

— D’ailleurs, faire mon devoir, voilà l’ami auquel j’ai recours; et je n’ai besoin que d’une grâce, celle de ma conscience.

En ce moment, à l’autre extrémité du salon, la porte s’entrouvrit doucement et dans l’entre-bâillement la tête de Cosette apparut. On n’apercevait que son doux visage, elle était admirablement décoiffée, elle avait les paupières encore gonflées de sommeil. Elle fit le mouvement d’un oiseau qui passe sa tête hors du nid, regarda d’abord son mari, puis Jean Valjean, et leur cria en riant, on croyait voir un sourire au fond d’une rose:

— Parions que vous parlez politique! Comme c’est bête, au lieu d’être avec moi!

Jean Valjean tressaillit.

— Cosette!... balbutia Marius. — Et il s’arrêta. On eût dit deux coupables.

Cosette, radieuse, continuait de les regarder tour à tour tous les deux. Il y avait dans ses yeux comme des échappées de paradis.

— Je vous prends en flagrant délit, dit Cosette. Je viens d’entendre à travers la porte mon père Fauchelevent qui disait: — La conscience.... — Faire son devoir.... — C’est de la politique, ça. Je ne veux pas. On ne doit pas parler politique dès le lendemain. Ce n’est pas juste.

— Tu te trompes, Cosette, répondit Marius. Nous parlons affaires. Nous parlons du meilleur placement à trouver pour tes six cent mille francs....

— Ce n’est pas tout ça, interrompit Cosette. Je viens. Veut-on de moi ici?

Et, passant résolûment la porte, elle entra dans le salon. Elle était vêtue d’un large peignoir blanc à mille plis et à grandes manches qui, partant du cou, lui tombait jusqu’aux pieds. Il y a, dans les ciels d’or des vieux tableaux gothiques, de ces charmants sacs à mettre un ange.

Elle se contempla de la tête aux pieds dans une grande glace, puis s’écria avec une explosion d’extase ineffable:

— Il y avait une fois un roi et une reine. Oh! comme je suis contente!

Cela dit, elle fit la révérence à Marius et à Jean Valjean.

— Voilà, dit-elle, je vais m’installer près de vous sur un fauteuil, on déjeune dans une demi-heure, vous direz tout ce que vous voudrez, je sais bien qu’il faut que les hommes parlent, je serai bien sage.

Marius lui prit le bras, et lui dit amoureusement:

— Nous parlons affaires.

— À propos, répondit Cosette, j’ai ouvert ma fenêtre, il vient d’arriver un tas de pierrots dans le jardin. Des oiseaux, pas des masques. C’est aujourd’hui mercredi des cendres; mais pas pour les oiseaux.

— Je te dis que nous parlons affaires, va, ma petite Cosette, laisse-nous un moment. Nous parlons chiffres. Cela t’ennuierait.

— Tu as mis ce matin une charmante cravate, Marius. Vous êtes fort coquet, monseigneur. Non, cela ne m’ennuiera pas.

— Je t’assure que cela t’ennuiera.

— Non. Puisque c’est vous. Je ne vous comprendrai pas, mais je vous écouterai. Quand on entend les voix qu’on aime, on n’a pas besoin de comprendre les mots qu’elles disent. Être là ensemble, c’est tout ce que je veux. Je reste avec vous, bah!

— Tu es ma Cosette bien-aimée! Impossible.

— Impossible!

— Oui.

— C’est bon, reprit Cosette. Je vous aurais dit des nouvelles. Je vous aurais dit que mon grand-père dort encore, que votre tante est à la messe, que la cheminée de la chambre de mon père Fauchelevent fume, que Nicolette a fait venir le ramoneur, que Toussaint et Nicolette se sont déjà disputées, que Nicolette se moque du bégayement de Toussaint. Eh bien, vous ne saurez rien! Ah! c’est impossible? Moi aussi, à mon tour, vous verrez, monsieur, je dirai: c’est impossible. Qui est-ce qui sera attrapé? Je t’en prie, mon petit Marius, laisse-moi ici avec vous deux.

— Je te jure qu’il faut que nous soyons seuls.

— Eh bien, est-ce que je suis quelqu’un?

Jean Valjean ne prononçait pas une parole. Cosette se tourna vers lui:

— D’abord, père, vous, je veux que vous veniez m’embrasser. Qu’est-ce que vous faites là à ne rien dire au lieu de prendre mon parti? qui est-ce qui m’a donné un père comme ça? Vous voyez bien que je suis très malheureuse en ménage. Mon mari me bat. Allons, embrassez-moi tout de suite.

Jean Valjean s’approcha.

Cosette se retourna vers Marius.

— Vous, je vous fais la grimace.

Puis elle tendit son front à Jean Valjean.

Jean Valjean fit un pas vers elle.

Cosette recula.

— Père, vous êtes pâle. Est-ce que votre bras vous fait mal?

— Il est guéri, dit Jean Valjean.

— Est-ce que vous avez mal dormi?

— Non.

— Est-ce que vous êtes triste?

— Non.

— Embrassez-moi. Si vous vous portez bien, si vous dormez bien, si vous êtes content, je ne vous gronderai pas.

Et de nouveau elle lui tendit son front.

Jean Valjean déposa un baiser sur ce front où il y avait un reflet céleste.

— Souriez.

Jean Valjean obéit. Ce fut le sourire d'un spectre.

— Maintenant, défendez-moi contre mon mari.

— Cosette!... fit Marius.

— Fâchez-vous, père. Dites-lui qu'il faut que je reste. On peut bien parler devant moi. Vous me trouvez donc bien sotte. C'est donc bien étonnant ce que vous dites! des affaires, placer de l'argent à une banque, voilà grand'chose. Les hommes font les mystérieux pour rien. Je veux rester. Je suis très jolie ce matin; regarde-moi, Marius.

Et avec un haussement d'épaules adorable et on ne sait quelle bouderie exquise, elle regarda Marius. Il y eut comme un éclair entre ces deux êtres. Que quelqu'un fût là, peu importait.

— Je t'aime! dit Marius.

— Je t'adore! dit Cosette.

Et ils tombèrent irrésistiblement dans les bras l'un de l'autre.

— À présent, reprit Cosette en rajustant un pli de son peignoir avec une petite moue triomphante, je reste.

— Cela, non, répondit Marius d'un ton suppliant. Nous avons quelque chose à terminer.

— Encore non?

Marius prit une inflexion de voix grave:

— Je t'assure, Cosette, que c'est impossible.

— Ah! vous faites votre voix d’homme, monsieur. C’est bon, on s’en va. Vous, père, vous ne m’avez pas soutenue. Monsieur mon mari, monsieur mon papa, vous êtes des tyrans. Je vais le dire à grand-père. Si vous croyez que je vais revenir et vous faire des platitudes, vous vous trompez. Je suis fière. Je vous attends à présent. Vous allez voir que c’est vous qui allez vous ennuyer sans moi. Je m’en vais, c’est bien fait.

Et elle sortit.

Deux secondes après, la porte se rouvrit, sa fraîche tête vermeille passa encore une fois entre les deux battants, et elle leur cria:

— Je suis très en colère.

La porte se referma et les ténèbres se refirent.

Ce fut comme un rayon de soleil fourvoyé qui, sans s’en douter, aurait traversé brusquement de la nuit.

Marius s’assura que la porte était bien refermée.

— Pauvre Cosette! murmura-t-il, quand elle va savoir....

À ce mot, Jean Valjean trembla de tous ses membres. Il fixa sur Marius un œil égaré.

— Cosette! oh oui, c’est vrai, vous allez dire cela à Cosette. C’est juste. Tiens, je n’y avais pas pensé. On a de la force pour une chose, on n’en a pas pour une autre. Monsieur, je vous en conjure, je vous en supplie, monsieur, donnez-moi votre parole la plus sacrée, ne le lui dites pas. Est-ce qu’il ne suffit pas que vous le sachiez, vous? J’ai pu le dire de moi-même sans y être forcé, je l’aurais dit à l’univers, à tout le monde, ça m’était égal. Mais elle, elle ne sait pas ce que c’est, cela l’épouvanterait. Un forçat, quoi! on serait forcé de lui expliquer, de lui dire: C’est un homme qui a été aux galères. Elle a vu un jour passer la chaîne. Oh mon Dieu!

Il s’affaissa sur un fauteuil et cacha son visage dans ses deux mains. On ne l’entendait pas, mais aux secousses de ses épaules, on voyait qu’il pleurait. Pleurs silencieux, pleurs terribles.

Il y a de l’étouffement dans le sanglot. Une sorte de convulsion le prit, il se renversa en arrière sur le dossier du fauteuil comme pour respirer, laissant pendre ses bras et laissant voir à Marius sa face inondée de larmes, et Marius l’entendit murmurer si bas que sa voix semblait être dans une profondeur sans fond: — Oh, je voudrais mourir!

— Soyez tranquille, dit Marius, je garderai votre secret pour moi seul.

Et, moins attendri peut-être qu’il n’aurait dû l’être, mais obligé depuis une heure de se familiariser avec un inattendu effroyable, voyant par degrés un forçat se superposer sous ses yeux à M. Fauchelevent, gagné peu à peu par cette réalité lugubre, et amené par la pente naturelle de la situation à constater l’intervalle qui venait de se faire entre cet homme et lui, Marius ajouta:

— Il est impossible que je ne vous dise pas un mot du dépôt que vous avez si fidèlement et si honnêtement remis. C’est là un acte de probité. Il est juste qu’une récompense vous soit donnée. Fixez la somme vous-même, elle vous sera comptée. Ne craignez pas de la fixer très haut.

— Je vous en remercie, monsieur, répondit Jean Valjean avec douceur.

Il resta pensif un moment, passant machinalement le bout de son index sur l’ongle de son pouce, puis il éleva la voix:

— Tout est à peu près fini. Il me reste une dernière chose....

— Laquelle?

Jean Valjean eut comme une suprême hésitation, et, sans voix, presque sans souffle, il balbutia plus qu’il ne dit:

— À présent que vous savez, croyez-vous, monsieur, vous qui êtes le maître, que je ne dois plus voir Cosette?

— Je crois que ce serait mieux, répondit froidement Marius.

— Je ne la verrai plus, murmura Jean Valjean.

Et il se dirigea vers la porte.

Il mit la main sur le bec-de-cane, le pêne céda, la porte s’entre-bâilla, Jean Valjean l’ouvrit assez pour pouvoir passer, demeura une seconde immobile, puis referma la porte et se retourna vers Marius.

Il n’était plus pâle, il était livide, il n’y avait plus de larmes dans ses yeux, mais une sorte de flamme tragique. Sa voix était redevenue étrangement calme.

— Tenez, monsieur, dit-il, si vous voulez, je viendrai la voir. Je vous assure que je le désire beaucoup. Si je n’avais pas tenu à voir Cosette, je ne vous aurais pas fait l’aveu que je vous ai fait, je serais parti; mais voulant rester dans l’endroit où est Cosette et continuer de la voir, j’ai dû honnêtement tout vous dire. Vous suivez mon raisonnement, n’est-ce pas? c’est là une chose qui se comprend. Voyez-vous, il y a neuf ans passés que je l’ai près de moi. Nous avons demeuré d’abord dans cette masure du boulevard, ensuite dans le couvent, ensuite près du Luxembourg. C’est là que vous l’avez vue pour la première fois. Vous vous rappelez son chapeau de peluche bleue. Nous avons été ensuite dans le quartier des Invalides où il y avait une grille et un jardin. Rue Plumet. J’habitais une petite arrière-cour d’où j’entendais son piano. Voilà ma vie. Nous ne nous quittions jamais. Cela a duré neuf ans et des mois. J’étais comme son père, et elle était mon enfant. Je ne sais pas si vous me comprenez, monsieur Pontmercy, mais s’en aller à présent, ne plus la voir, ne plus lui parler, n’avoir plus rien, ce serait difficile. Si vous ne le trouvez pas mauvais, je viendrai de temps en temps voir Cosette. Je ne viendrais pas souvent. Je ne resterais pas longtemps. Vous diriez qu’on me reçoive dans la petite salle basse. Au rez-de-chaussée. J’entrerais bien par la porte de derrière, qui est pour les domestiques, mais cela étonnerait peut-être. Il vaut mieux, je crois, que j’entre par la porte de tout le monde. Monsieur, vraiment. Je voudrais bien voir encore un peu Cosette. Aussi rarement qu’il vous plaira. Mettez-vous à ma place, je n’ai plus que cela. Et puis, il faut prendre garde. Si je ne venais plus du tout, il y aurait un mauvais effet, on trouverait cela singulier. Par exemple, ce que je puis faire, c’est de venir le soir, quand il commence à être nuit.

— Vous viendrez tous les soirs, dit Marius, et Cosette vous attendra.

— Vous êtes bon, monsieur, dit Jean Valjean.

Marius salua Jean Valjean, le bonheur reconduisit jusqu’à la porte le désespoir, et ces deux hommes se quittèrent.

Chapitre II

Les obscurités que peut contenir une révélation

Marius était bouleversé.

L'espèce d'éloignement qu'il avait toujours eu pour l'homme près duquel il voyait Cosette, lui était désormais expliqué. Il y avait dans ce personnage un on ne sait quoi énigmatique dont son instinct l'avertissait. Cette énigme, c'était la plus hideuse des hontes, le bagne. Ce M. Fauchelevent était le forçat Jean Valjean.

Trouver brusquement un tel secret au milieu de son bonheur, cela ressemble à la découverte d'un scorpion dans un nid de tourterelles.

Le bonheur de Marius et de Cosette était-il condamné désormais à ce voisinage? Était-ce là un fait accompli? L'acceptation de cet homme faisait-elle partie du mariage consommé? N'y avait-il plus rien à faire?

Marius avait-il épousé aussi le forçat?

On a beau être couronné de lumière et de joie, on a beau savourer la grande heure de pourpre de la vie, l'amour heureux, de telles secousses forceraient même l'archange dans son extase, même le demi-dieu dans sa gloire, au frémissement.

Comme il arrive toujours dans les changements à vue de cette espèce, Marius se demandait s'il n'avait pas de reproche à se faire à lui-même? Avait-il manqué de divination? Avait-il manqué de prudence? S'était-il étourdi involontairement? Un peu, peut-être. S'était-il engagé, sans assez de précaution pour éclairer les alentours, dans cette aventure d'amour qui avait abouti à son mariage avec Cosette? Il constatait, — c'est ainsi, par une série de constatations successives de nous-mêmes sur nous-mêmes, que la vie nous amende peu à peu, — il constatait le côté chimérique et visionnaire de sa nature, sorte de nuage intérieur propre à beaucoup d'organisations, et qui, dans les paroxysmes de la passion et de la douleur, se dilate, la température de l'âme changeant, et envahit l'homme tout entier, au point de n'en plus faire qu'une conscience baignée d'un brouillard. Nous avons plus d'une fois indiqué cet élément caractéristique de l'individualité de Marius. Il se rappelait que, dans l'enivrement de son amour, rue Plumet, pendant ces six ou sept semaines extatiques, il n'avait pas même parlé à Cosette de ce drame énigmatique du bouge Gorbeau où la victime avait eu un si étrange parti pris de silence pendant la lutte et d’évasion après. Comment se faisait-il qu’il n’en eût point parlé à Cosette? Cela pourtant était si proche et si effroyable! Comment se faisait-il qu’il ne lui eût pas même nommé les Thénardier, et, particulièrement, le jour où il avait rencontré Éponine? Il avait presque peine à s’expliquer maintenant son silence d’alors. Il s’en rendait compte cependant. Il se rappelait son étourdissement, son ivresse de Cosette, l’amour absorbant tout, cet enlèvement de l’un par l’autre dans l’idéal, et peut-être aussi, comme la quantité imperceptible de raison mêlée à cet état violent et charmant de l’âme, un vague et sourd instinct de cacher et d’abolir dans sa mémoire cette aventure redoutable dont il craignait le contact, où il ne voulait jouer aucun rôle, à laquelle il se dérobait, et où il ne pouvait être ni narrateur ni témoin sans être accusateur. D’ailleurs, ces quelques semaines avaient été un éclair; on n’avait eu le temps de rien, que de s’aimer. Enfin, tout pesé, tout retourné, tout examiné, quand il eût raconté le guet-apens Gorbeau à Cosette, quand il lui eût nommé les Thénardier, quelles qu’eussent été les conséquences, quand même il eût découvert que Jean Valjean était un forçat, cela l’eût-il changé, lui Marius? cela l’eût-il changée, elle Cosette? Eût-il reculé? L’eût-il moins adorée? L’eût-il moins épousée? Non. Cela eût-il changé quelque chose à ce qui s’était fait? Non. Rien donc à regretter, rien à se reprocher. Tout était bien. Il y a un dieu pour ces ivrognes qu’on appelle les amoureux. Aveugle, Marius avait suivi la route qu’il eût choisie clairvoyant. L’amour lui avait bandé les yeux, pour le mener où? Au paradis.

Mais ce paradis était compliqué désormais d’un côtoiement infernal.

L’ancien éloignement de Marius pour cet homme, pour ce Fauchelevent devenu Jean Valjean, était à présent mêlé d’horreur.

Dans cette horreur, disons-le, il y avait quelque pitié, et même une certaine surprise.

Ce voleur, ce voleur récidiviste, avait restitué un dépôt. Et quel dépôt? Six cent mille francs. Il était seul dans le secret du dépôt. Il pouvait tout garder, il avait tout rendu.

En outre, il avait révélé de lui-même sa situation. Rien ne l’y obligeait. Si l’on savait qui il était, c’était par lui. Il y avait dans cet aveu plus que l’acceptation de l’humiliation, il y avait l’acceptation du péril. Pour un condamné, un masque n’est pas un masque, c’est un abri. Il avait renoncé à cet abri. Un faux nom, c’est de la sécurité; il avait rejeté ce faux nom. Il pouvait, lui galérien, se cacher à jamais dans une famille honnête; il avait résisté à cette tentation. Et pour quel motif? par scrupule de conscience. Il l’avait expliqué lui-même avec l’irrésistible accent de la réalité. En somme, quel que fût ce Jean Valjean, c’était incontestablement une conscience qui se réveillait. Il y avait là on ne sait quelle mystérieuse réhabilitation commencée; et, selon toute apparence, depuis longtemps déjà le scrupule était maître de cet homme. De tels accès du juste et du bien ne sont pas propres aux natures vulgaires. Réveil de conscience, c’est grandeur d’âme.

Jean Valjean était sincère. Cette sincérité, visible, palpable, irréfragable, évidente même par la douleur qu’elle lui faisait, rendait les informations inutiles et donnait autorité à tout ce que disait cet homme. Ici, pour Marius, interversion étrange des situations. Que sortait-il de M. Fauchelevent? la défiance. Que se dégageait-il de Jean Valjean? la confiance.

Dans le mystérieux bilan de ce Jean Valjean que Marius pensif dressait, il constatait l’actif, il constatait le passif, et il tâchait d’arriver à une balance. Mais tout cela était comme dans un orage. Marius, s’efforçant de se faire une idée nette de cet homme, et poursuivant, pour ainsi dire, Jean Valjean au fond de sa pensée, le perdait et le retrouvait dans une brume fatale.

Le dépôt honnêtement rendu, la probité de l’aveu, c’était bien. Cela faisait comme une éclaircie dans la nuée, puis la nuée redevenait noire.

Si troubles que fussent les souvenirs de Marius, il lui en revenait quelque ombre.

Qu’était-ce décidément que cette aventure du galetas Jondrette? Pourquoi, à l’arrivée de la police, cet homme, au lieu de se plaindre, s’était-il évadé? ici Marius trouvait la réponse. Parce que cet homme était un repris de justice en rupture de ban.

Autre question: Pourquoi cet homme était-il venu dans la barricade? Car à présent Marius revoyait distinctement ce souvenir, reparu dans ces émotions comme l’encre sympathique au feu. Cet homme était dans la barricade. Il n’y combattait pas. Qu’était-il venu y faire? Devant cette question un spectre se dressait, et faisait la réponse. Javert. Marius se rappelait parfaitement à cette heure la funèbre vision de Jean Valjean entraînant hors de la barricade Javert garrotté, et il entendait encore derrière l’angle de la petite rue Mondétour l’affreux coup de pistolet. Il y avait, vraisemblablement, haine entre cet espion et ce galérien. L’un gênait l’autre. Jean Valjean était allé à la barricade pour se venger. Il y était arrivé tard. Il savait probablement que Javert y était prisonnier. La vendette corse a pénétré dans de certains bas-fonds et y fait loi; elle est si simple qu'elle n'étonne pas les âmes même à demi retournées vers le bien; et ces cœurs-là sont ainsi faits qu'un criminel, en voie de repentir, peut être scrupuleux sur le vol et ne l'être pas sur la vengeance. Jean Valjean avait tué Javert. Du moins, cela semblait évident.

Dernière question enfin; mais à celle-ci pas de réponse. Cette question, Marius la sentait comme une tenaille. Comment se faisait-il que l'existence de Jean Valjean eût coudoyé si longtemps celle de Cosette? Qu'était-ce que ce sombre jeu de la providence qui avait mis cet enfant en contact avec cet homme? Y a-t-il donc aussi des chaînes à deux forgées là-haut, et Dieu se plaît-il à accoupler l'ange avec le démon? Un crime et une innocence peuvent donc être camarades de chambrée dans le mystérieux bagne des misères? Dans ce défilé de condamnés qu'on appelle la destinée humaine, deux fronts peuvent passer l'un près de l'autre, l'un naïf, l'autre formidable, l'un tout baigné des divines blancheurs de l'aube, l'autre à jamais blêmi par la lueur d'un éternel éclair? Qui avait pu déterminer cet appareillement inexplicable? De quelle façon, par suite de quel prodige, la communauté de vie avait-elle pu s'établir entre cette céleste petite et ce vieux damné? Qui avait pu lier l'agneau au loup, et, chose plus incompréhensible encore, attacher le loup à l'agneau? Car le loup aimait l'agneau, car l'être farouche adorait l'être faible, car, pendant neuf années, l'ange avait eu pour point d'appui le monstre. L'enfance et l'adolescence de Cosette, sa venue au jour, sa virginale croissance vers la vie et la lumière, avaient été abritées par ce dévouement difforme. Ici, les questions s'exfoliaient, pour ainsi parler, en énigmes innombrables, les abîmes s'ouvraient au fond des abîmes, et Marius ne pouvait plus se pencher sur Jean Valjean sans vertige. Qu'était-ce donc que cet homme précipice?

Les vieux symboles génésiaques sont éternels; dans la société humaine, telle qu'elle existe, jusqu'au jour où une clarté plus grande la changera, il y a à jamais deux hommes, l'un supérieur, l'autre souterrain; celui qui est selon le bien, c'est Abel; celui qui est selon le mal, c'est Caïn. Qu'était-ce que ce Caïn tendre? Qu'était-ce que ce bandit religieusement absorbé dans l'adoration d'une vierge, veillant sur elle, l'élevant, la gardant, la dignifiant, et l'enveloppant, lui impur, de pureté? Qu'était-ce que ce cloaque qui avait vénéré cette innocence au point de ne pas lui laisser une tache? Qu'était-ce que ce Jean Valjean faisant l'éducation de Cosette? Qu'était-ce que cette figure de ténèbres ayant pour unique soin de préserver de toute ombre et de tout nuage le lever d'un astre?

Là était le secret de Jean Valjean; là aussi était le secret de Dieu.

Devant ce double secret, Marius reculait. L'un en quelque sorte le rassurait sur l'autre. Dieu était dans cette aventure aussi visible que Jean Valjean. Dieu a ses instruments. Il se sert de l'outil qu'il veut. Il n'est pas responsable devant l'homme. Savons-nous comment Dieu s'y prend? Jean Valjean avait travaillé à Cosette. Il avait un peu fait cette âme. C'était incontestable. Eh bien, après? L'ouvrier était horrible; mais l'œuvre était admirable. Dieu produit ses miracles comme bon lui semble. Il avait construit cette charmante Cosette, et il avait employé Jean Valjean. Il lui avait plu de se choisir cet étrange collaborateur. Quel compte avons-nous à lui demander? Est-ce la première fois que le fumier aide le printemps à faire la rose?

Marius se faisait ces réponses-là et se déclarait à lui-même qu'elles étaient bonnes. Sur tous les points que nous venons d'indiquer, il n'avait pas osé presser Jean Valjean sans s'avouer à lui-même qu'il ne l'osait pas. Il adorait Cosette, il possédait Cosette, Cosette était splendidement pure. Cela lui suffisait. De quel éclaircissement avait-il besoin? Cosette était une lumière. La lumière a-t-elle besoin d'être éclaircie? Il avait tout; que pouvait-il désirer? Tout, est-ce que ce n'est pas assez? Les affaires personnelles de Jean Valjean ne le regardaient pas. En se penchant sur l'ombre fatale de cet homme, il se cramponnait à cette déclaration solennelle du misérable: Je ne suis rien à Cosette. Il y a dix ans, je ne savais pas qu'elle existât.

Jean Valjean était un passant. Il l'avait dit lui-même. Eh bien, il passait. Quel qu'il fût, son rôle était fini. Il y avait désormais Marius pour faire les fonctions de la providence près de Cosette. Cosette était venue retrouver dans l'azur son pareil, son amant, son époux, son mâle céleste. En s'envolant, Cosette, ailée et transfigurée, laissait derrière elle à terre, vide et hideuse, sa chrysalide, Jean Valjean.

Dans quelque cercle d'idées que tournât Marius, il en revenait toujours à une certaine horreur de Jean Valjean. Horreur sacrée peut-être, car, nous venons de l'indiquer, il sentait un quid divinum dans cet homme. Mais, quoi qu'on fit, et quelque atténuation qu'on y cherchât, il fallait bien toujours retomber sur ceci: c'était un forçat; c'est-à-dire l'être qui, dans l'échelle sociale, n'a même pas de place, étant au-dessous du dernier échelon. Après le dernier des hommes vient le forçat. Le forçat n’est plus, pour ainsi dire, le semblable des vivants. La loi l’a destitué de toute la quantité d’humanité qu’elle peut ôter à un homme. Marius, sur les questions pénales, en était encore, quoique démocrate, au système inexorable, et il avait, sur ceux que la loi frappe, toutes les idées de la loi. Il n’avait pas encore accompli, disons-le, tous les progrès. Il n’en était pas encore à distinguer entre ce qui est écrit par l’homme et ce qui est écrit par Dieu, entre la loi et le droit. Il n’avait point examiné et pesé le droit que prend l’homme de disposer de l’irrévocable et de l’irréparable. Il n’était pas révolté du mot vindicte. Il trouvait simple que de certaines effractions de la loi écrite fussent suivies de peines éternelles, et il acceptait, comme procédé de civilisation, la damnation sociale. Il en était encore là, sauf à avancer infailliblement plus tard, sa nature étant bonne, et au fond toute faite de progrès latent.

Dans ce milieu d’idées, Jean Valjean lui apparaissait difforme et repoussant. C’était le réprouvé. C’était le forçat. Ce mot était pour lui comme un son de trompette du jugement; et, après avoir considéré longtemps Jean Valjean, son dernier geste était de détourner la tête. Vade retro.

Marius, il faut le reconnaître et même y insister, tout en interrogeant Jean Valjean au point que Jean Valjean lui avait dit: vous me confessez, ne lui avait pourtant pas fait deux ou trois questions décisives. Ce n’était pas qu’elles ne se fussent présentées à son esprit, mais il en avait eu peur. Le galetas Jondrette? La barricade? Javert? Qui sait où se fussent arrêtées les révélations? Jean Valjean ne semblait pas homme à reculer, et qui sait si Marius, après l’avoir poussé, n’aurait pas souhaité le retenir? Dans de certaines conjonctures suprêmes, ne nous est-il pas arrivé à tous, après avoir fait une question, de nous boucher les oreilles pour ne pas entendre la réponse? C’est surtout quand on aime qu’on a de ces lâchetés-là. Il n’est pas sage de questionner à outrance les situations sinistres, surtout quand le côté indissoluble de notre propre vie y est fatalement mêlé. Des explications désespérées de Jean Valjean, quelque épouvantable lumière pouvait sortir, et qui sait si cette clarté hideuse n’aurait pas rejailli jusqu’à Cosette? Qui sait s’il n’en fût pas resté une sorte de lueur infernale sur le front de cet ange? L’éclaboussure d’un éclair, c’est encore de la foudre. La fatalité a de ces solidarités-là, où l’innocence elle-même s’empreint de crime par la sombre loi des reflets colorants. Les plus pures figures peuvent garder à jamais la réverbération d’un voisinage horrible. À tort ou à raison, Marius avait eu peur. Il en savait déjà trop. Il cherchait plutôt à s'étourdir qu'à s'éclairer. Éperdu, il emportait Cosette dans ses bras en fermant les yeux sur Jean Valjean.

Cet homme était de la nuit, de la nuit vivante et terrible. Comment oser en chercher le fond? C'est une épouvante de questionner l'ombre. Qui sait ce qu'elle va répondre? L'aube pourrait en être noircie pour jamais.

Dans cette situation d'esprit, c'était pour Marius une perplexité poignante de penser que cet homme aurait désormais un contact quelconque avec Cosette. Ces questions redoutables, devant lesquelles il avait reculé, et d'où aurait pu sortir une décision implacable et définitive, il se reprochait presque à présent de ne pas les avoir faites. Il se trouvait trop bon, trop doux, disons le mot, trop faible. Cette faiblesse l'avait entraîné à une concession imprudente. Il s'était laissé toucher. Il avait eu tort. Il aurait dû purement et simplement rejeter Jean Valjean. Jean Valjean était la part du feu, il aurait dû la faire, et débarrasser sa maison de cet homme. Il s'en voulait, il en voulait à la brusquerie de ce tourbillon d'émotions qui l'avait assourdi, aveuglé, et entraîné. Il était mécontent de lui-même.

Que faire maintenant? Les visites de Jean Valjean lui répugnaient profondément. À quoi bon cet homme chez lui? que faire? Ici il s'étourdissait, il ne voulait pas creuser, il ne voulait pas approfondir; il ne voulait pas se sonder lui-même. Il avait promis, il s'était laissé entraîner à promettre; Jean Valjean avait sa promesse; même à un forçat, surtout à un forçat, on doit tenir sa parole. Toutefois, son premier devoir était envers Cosette. En somme, une répulsion, qui dominait tout, le soulevait.

Marius roulait confusément tout cet ensemble d'idées dans son esprit, passant de l'une à l'autre, et remué par toutes. De là un trouble profond. Il ne lui fut pas aisé de cacher ce trouble à Cosette, mais l'amour est un talent, et Marius y parvint.

Du reste, il fit, sans but apparent, des questions à Cosette, candide comme une colombe est blanche, et ne se doutant de rien; il lui parla de son enfance et de sa jeunesse, et il se convainquit de plus en plus que tout ce qu'un homme peut être de bon, de paternel et de respectable, ce forçat l'avait été pour Cosette. Tout ce que Marius avait entrevu et supposé était réel. Cette ortie sinistre avait aimé et protégé ce lys.

Livre huitième — La décroissance crépusculaire

Chapitre I

La chambre d’en bas

Le lendemain, à la nuit tombante, Jean Valjean frappait à la porte cochère de la maison Gillenormand. Ce fut Basque qui le reçut. Basque se trouvait dans la cour à point nommé, et comme s’il avait eu des ordres. Il arrive quelquefois qu’on dit à un domestique: Vous guetterez monsieur un tel, quand il arrivera.

Basque, sans attendre que Jean Valjean vînt à lui, lui adressa la parole:

— Monsieur le baron m’a chargé de demander à monsieur s’il désire monter ou rester en bas?

— Rester en bas, répondit Jean Valjean.

Basque, d’ailleurs absolument respectueux, ouvrit la porte de la salle basse et dit: Je vais prévenir madame.

La pièce où Jean Valjean entra était un rez-de-chaussée voûté et humide, servant de cellier dans l’occasion, donnant sur la rue, carrelé de carreaux rouges, et mal éclairé d’une fenêtre à barreaux de fer.

Cette chambre n’était pas de celles que harcèlent le houssoir, la tête de loup et le balai. La poussière y était tranquille. La persécution des araignées n’y était pas organisée. Une telle toile, largement étalée, bien noire, ornée de mouches mortes, faisait la roue sur une des vitres de la fenêtre. La salle, petite et basse, était meublée d’un tas de bouteilles vides amoncelées dans un coin. La muraille, badigeonnée d’un badigeon d’ocre jaune, s’écaillait par larges plaques. Au fond, il y avait une cheminée de bois peinte en noir à tablette étroite. Un feu y était allumé; ce qui indiquait qu’on avait compté sur la réponse de Jean Valjean: Rester en bas.

Deux fauteuils étaient placés aux deux coins de la cheminée. Entre les fauteuils était étendue, en guise de tapis, une vieille descente de lit montrant plus de corde que de laine.

La chambre avait pour éclairage le feu de la cheminée et le crépuscule de la fenêtre.

Jean Valjean était fatigué. Depuis plusieurs jours il ne mangeait ni ne dormait. Il se laissa tomber sur un des fauteuils.

Basque revint, posa sur la cheminée une bougie allumée et se retira. Jean Valjean, la tête ployée et le menton sur la poitrine, n’aperçut ni Basque, ni la bougie.

Tout à coup, il se dressa comme en sursaut. Cosette était derrière lui.

Il ne l’avait pas vue entrer, mais il avait senti qu’elle entrait. Il se retourna. Il la contempla. Elle était adorablement belle. Mais ce qu’il regardait de ce profond regard, ce n’était pas la beauté, c’était l’âme.

— Ah bien, s’écria Cosette, voilà une idée! père, je savais que vous étiez singulier, mais jamais je ne me serais attendue à celle-là. Marius me dit que c’est vous qui voulez que je vous reçoive ici.

— Oui, c’est moi.

— Je m’attendais à la réponse. Tenez-vous bien. Je vous préviens que je vais vous faire une scène. Commençons par le commencement. Père, embrassez-moi.

Et elle tendit sa joue.

Jean Valjean demeura immobile.

— Vous ne bougez pas. Je le constate. Attitude de coupable. Mais c’est égal, je vous pardonne. Jésus-Christ a dit: Tendez l’autre joue. La voici.

Et elle tendit l’autre joue.

Jean Valjean ne remua pas. Il semblait qu’il eût les pieds cloués dans le pavé.

— Ceci devient sérieux, dit Cosette. Qu’est-ce que je vous ai fait? Je me déclare brouillée. Vous me devez mon raccommodement. Vous dînez avec nous.

— J’ai dîné.

— Ce n’est pas vrai. Je vous ferai gronder par monsieur Gillenormand. Les grands-pères sont faits pour tancer les pères. Allons. Montez avec moi dans le salon. Tout de suite.

— Impossible.

Cosette ici perdit un peu de terrain. Elle cessa d’ordonner et passa aux questions.

— Mais pourquoi? Et vous choisissez pour me voir la chambre la plus laide de la maison. C’est horrible ici.

— Tu sais....

Jean Valjean se reprit.

— Vous savez, madame, je suis particulier, j’ai mes lubies.

Cosette frappa ses petites mains l’une contre l’autre.

— Madame!... vous savez!... encore du nouveau! Qu’est-ce que cela veut dire?

Jean Valjean attacha sur elle ce sourire navrant auquel il avait parfois recours.

— Vous avez voulu être madame. Vous l’êtes.

— Pas pour vous, père.

— Ne m’appelez plus père.

— Comment?

— Appelez-moi monsieur Jean. Jean, si vous voulez.

— Vous n’êtes plus père? je ne suis plus Cosette? monsieur Jean? Qu’est-ce que cela signifie? mais c’est des révolutions, ça! que s’est-il donc passé? Regardez-moi donc un peu en face. Et vous ne voulez pas demeurer avec nous! Et vous ne voulez pas de ma chambre! Qu’est-ce que je vous ai fait? Qu’est-ce que je vous ai fait? Il y a donc eu quelque chose?

— Rien.

— Eh bien alors?

— Tout est comme à l’ordinaire.

— Pourquoi changez-vous de nom?

— Vous en avez bien changé, vous.

Il sourit encore de ce même sourire et ajouta:

— Puisque vous êtes madame Pontmercy, je puis bien être monsieur Jean.

— Je n’y comprends rien. Tout cela est idiot. Je demanderai à mon mari la permission que vous soyez monsieur Jean. J’espère qu’il n’y consentira pas. Vous me faites beaucoup de peine. On a des lubies, mais on ne fait pas du chagrin à sa petite Cosette. C’est mal. Vous n’avez pas le droit d’être méchant, vous qui êtes bon.

Il ne répondit pas.

Elle lui prit vivement les deux mains, et, d’un mouvement irrésistible, les élevant vers son visage, elle les pressa contre son cou sous son menton, ce qui est un profond geste de tendresse.

— Oh! lui dit-elle, soyez bon!

Et elle poursuivit:

— Voici ce que j’appelle être bon: être gentil, venir demeurer ici, reprendre nos bonnes petites promenades, il y a des oiseaux ici comme rue Plumet, vivre avec nous, quitter ce trou de la rue de l’Homme-Armé, ne pas nous donner des charades à deviner, être comme tout le monde, dîner avec nous, déjeuner avec nous, être mon père.

Il dégagea ses mains.

— Vous n’avez plus besoin de père, vous avez un mari.

Cosette s’emporta.

— Je n’ai plus besoin de père! Des choses comme çà qui n’ont pas le sens commun, on ne sait que dire vraiment!

— Si Toussaint était là, reprit Jean Valjean comme quelqu’un qui en est à chercher des autorités et qui se rattache à toutes les branches, elle serait la première à convenir que c’est vrai que j’ai toujours eu mes manières à moi. Il n’y a rien de nouveau. J’ai toujours aimé mon coin noir.

— Mais il fait froid ici. On n’y voit pas clair. C’est abominable, ça, de vouloir être monsieur Jean. Je ne veux pas que vous me disiez vous.

— Tout à l’heure, en venant, répondit Jean Valjean, j’ai vu rue Saint-Louis un meuble. Chez un ébéniste. Si j’étais une jolie femme, je me donnerais ce meuble-là. Une toilette très bien; genre d’à présent. Ce que vous appelez du bois de rose, je crois. C’est incrusté. Une glace assez grande. Il y a des tiroirs. C’est joli.

— Hou! le vilain ours! répliqua Cosette.

Et avec une gentillesse suprême, serrant les dents et écartant les lèvres, elle souffla contre Jean Valjean. C’était une Grâce copiant une chatte.

— Je suis furieuse, reprit-elle. Depuis hier vous me faites tous rager. Je bisque beaucoup. Je ne comprends pas. Vous ne me défendez pas contre Marius. Marius ne me soutient pas contre vous. Je suis toute seule. J’arrange une chambre gentiment. Si j’avais pu y mettre le bon Dieu, je l’y aurais mis. On me laisse ma chambre sur les bras. Mon locataire me fait banqueroute. Je commande à Nicolette un bon petit dîner. On n’en veut pas de votre dîner, madame. Et mon père Fauchelevent veut que je l’appelle monsieur Jean, et que je le reçoive dans une affreuse vieille laide cave moisie où les murs ont de la barbe, et où il y a, en fait de cristaux, des bouteilles vides, et en fait de rideaux, des toiles d’araignées! Vous êtes singulier, j’y consens, c’est votre genre, mais on accorde une trêve à des gens qui se marient. Vous n’auriez pas dû vous remettre à être singulier tout de suite. Vous allez donc être bien content dans votre abominable rue de l’Homme-Armé. J’y ai été bien désespérée, moi! Qu’est-ce que vous avez contre moi? Vous me faites beaucoup de peine. Fi!

Et, sérieuse subitement, elle regarda fixement Jean Valjean, et ajouta:

— Vous m’en voulez donc de ce que je suis heureuse?

La naïveté, à son insu, pénètre quelquefois très avant. Cette question, simple pour Cosette, était profonde pour Jean Valjean. Cosette voulait égratigner; elle déchirait.

Jean Valjean pâlit. Il resta un moment sans répondre, puis, d’un accent inexprimable et se parlant à lui-même, il murmura:

— Son bonheur, c’était le but de ma vie. À présent Dieu peut me signer ma sortie. Cosette, tu es heureuse; mon temps est fait.

— Ah! vous m’avez dit tu! s’écria Cosette.

Et elle lui sauta au cou.

Jean Valjean, éperdu, l’étreignit contre sa poitrine avec égarement. Il lui sembla presque qu’il la reprenait.

— Merci, père! lui dit Cosette.

L’entraînement allait devenir poignant pour Jean Valjean. Il se retira doucement des bras de Cosette, et prit son chapeau.

— Eh bien? dit Cosette.

Jean Valjean répondit:

— Je vous quitte, madame, on vous attend.

Et, du seuil de la porte, il ajouta:

— Je vous ai dit tu. Dites à votre mari que cela ne m’arrivera plus. Pardonnez-moi.

Jean Valjean sortit, laissant Cosette stupéfaite de cet adieu énigmatique.

Chapitre II

Autre pas en arrière

Le jour suivant, à la même heure, Jean Valjean revint.

Cosette ne lui fit pas de questions, ne s’étonna plus, ne s’écria plus qu’elle avait froid, ne parla plus du salon; elle évita de dire ni père ni monsieur Jean. Elle se laissa dire vous. Elle se laissa appeler madame. Seulement elle avait une certaine diminution de joie. Elle eût été triste, si la tristesse lui eût été possible.

Il est probable qu’elle avait eu avec Marius une de ces conversations dans lesquelles l’homme aimé dit ce qu’il veut, n’explique rien, et satisfait la femme aimée. La curiosité des amoureux ne va pas très loin au delà de leur amour.

La salle basse avait fait un peu de toilette. Basque avait supprimé les bouteilles, et Nicolette les araignées.

Tous les lendemains qui suivirent ramenèrent à la même heure Jean Valjean. Il vint tous les jours, n’ayant pas la force de prendre les paroles de Marius autrement qu’à la lettre. Marius s’arrangea de manière à être absent aux heures où Jean Valjean venait. La maison s’accoutuma à la nouvelle manière d’être de M. Fauchelevent. Toussaint y aida. Monsieur a toujours été comme ça, répétait-elle. Le grand-père rendit ce décret: — C’est un original. Et tout fut dit. D’ailleurs, à quatre-vingt-dix ans il n’y a plus de liaison possible; tout est juxtaposition; un nouveau venu est une gêne. Il n’y a plus de place, toutes les habitudes sont prises. M. Fauchelevent, M. Tranchelevent, le père Gillenormand ne demanda pas mieux que d’être dispensé de «ce monsieur». Il ajouta: — Rien n’est plus commun que ces originaux-là. Ils font toutes sortes de bizarreries. De motif, point. Le marquis de Canaples était pire. Il acheta un palais pour loger dans le grenier. Ce sont des apparences fantasques qu’ont les gens.

Personne n’entrevit le dessous sinistre. Qui eût d’ailleurs pu deviner une telle chose? Il y a de ces marais dans l’Inde; l’eau semble extraordinaire, inexplicable, frissonnante sans qu’il y ait de vent, agitée là où elle devrait être calme. On regarde à la superficie ces bouillonnements sans cause; on n’aperçoit pas l’hydre qui se traîne au fond.

Beaucoup d’hommes ont ainsi un monstre secret, un mal qu’ils nourrissent, un dragon qui les ronge, un désespoir qui habite leur nuit. Tel homme ressemble aux autres, va, vient. On ne sait pas qu’il a en lui une effroyable douleur parasite aux mille dents, laquelle vit dans ce misérable, qui en meurt. On ne sait pas que cet homme est un gouffre. Il est stagnant, mais profond. De temps en temps un trouble auquel on ne comprend rien se fait à sa surface. Une ride mystérieuse se plisse, puis s’évanouit, puis reparaît; une bulle d’air monte et crève. C’est peu de chose, c’est terrible. C’est la respiration de la bête inconnue.

De certaines habitudes étranges, arriver à l’heure où les autres partent, s’effacer pendant que les autres s’étalent, garder dans toutes les occasions ce qu’on pourrait appeler le manteau couleur de muraille, chercher l’allée solitaire, préférer la rue déserte, ne point se mêler aux conversations, éviter les foules et les fêtes, sembler à son aise et vivre pauvrement, avoir, tout riche qu’on est, sa clef dans sa poche et sa chandelle chez le portier, entrer par la petite porte, monter par l’escalier dérobé, toutes ces singularités insignifiantes, rides, bulles d’air, plis fugitifs à la surface, viennent souvent d’un fond formidable.

Plusieurs semaines se passèrent ainsi. Une vie nouvelle s’empara peu à peu de Cosette; les relations que crée le mariage, les visites, le soin de la maison, les plaisirs, ces grandes affaires. Les plaisirs de Cosette n’étaient pas coûteux; ils consistaient en un seul: être avec Marius. Sortir avec lui, rester avec lui, c’était là la grande occupation de sa vie. C’était pour eux une joie toujours toute neuve de sortir bras dessus bras dessous, à la face du soleil, en pleine rue, sans se cacher, devant tout le monde, tous les deux tout seuls. Cosette eut une contrariété. Toussaint ne put s’accorder avec Nicolette, le soudage de deux vieilles filles étant impossible, et s’en alla. Le grand-père se portait bien; Marius plaidait çà et là quelques causes; la tante Gillenormand menait paisiblement près du nouveau ménage cette vie latérale qui lui suffisait. Jean Valjean venait tous les jours.

Le tutoiement disparu, le vous, le madame, le monsieur Jean, tout cela le faisait autre pour Cosette. Le soin qu’il avait pris lui-même à la détacher de lui, lui réussissait. Elle était de plus en plus gaie et de moins en moins tendre. Pourtant elle l’aimait toujours bien, et il le sentait. Un jour elle lui dit tout à coup: vous étiez mon Père, vous n’êtes plus mon père, vous étiez mon oncle, vous n’êtes plus mon oncle, vous étiez monsieur Fauchelevent, vous êtes Jean. Qui êtes-vous donc? Je n’aime pas tout ça. Si je ne vous savais pas si bon, j’aurais peur de vous.

Il demeurait toujours rue de l’Homme-Armé, ne pouvant se résoudre à s’éloigner du quartier qu’habitait Cosette.

Dans les premiers temps il ne restait près de Cosette que quelques minutes, puis s’en allait.

Peu à peu il prit l’habitude de faire ses visites moins courtes. On eût dit qu’il profitait de l’autorisation des jours qui s’allongeaient; il arriva plus tôt et partit plus tard.

Un jour il échappa à Cosette de lui dire: Père. Un éclair de joie illumina le vieux visage sombre de Jean Valjean. Il la reprit: Dites Jean, — Ah! c’est vrai, répondit-elle avec un éclat de rire, monsieur Jean. — C’est bien, dit-il. Et il se détourna pour qu’elle ne le vît pas essuyer ses yeux.

Chapitre III

Ils se souviennent du jardin de la rue Plumet

Ce fut la dernière fois. À partir de cette dernière lueur, l’extinction complète se fit. Plus de familiarité, plus de bonjour avec un baiser, plus jamais ce mot si profondément doux: mon père! il était, sur sa demande et par sa propre complicité, successivement chassé de tous ses bonheurs; et il avait cette misère qu’après avoir perdu Cosette tout entière en un jour, il lui avait fallu ensuite la reperdre en détail.

L’œil finit par s’habituer aux jours de cave. En somme, avoir tous les jours une apparition de Cosette, cela lui suffisait. Toute sa vie se concentrait dans cette heure-là. Il s’asseyait près d’elle, il la regardait en silence, ou bien il lui parlait des années d’autrefois, de son enfance, du couvent, de ses petites amies d’alors.

Une après-midi, — c’était une des premières journées d’avril, déjà chaude, encore fraîche, le moment de la grande gaîté du soleil, les jardins qui environnaient les fenêtres de Marius et de Cosette avaient l’émotion du réveil, l’aubépine allait poindre, une bijouterie de giroflées s’étalait sur les vieux murs, les gueules-de-loup roses bâillaient dans les fentes des pierres, il y avait dans l’herbe un charmant commencement de pâquerettes et de boutons-d’or, les papillons blancs de l’année débutaient, le vent, ce ménétrier de la noce éternelle, essayait dans les arbres les premières notes de cette grande symphonie aurorale que les vieux poètes appelaient le renouveau, — Marius dit à Cosette: — Nous avons dit que nous irions revoir notre jardin de la rue Plumet. Allons-y. Il ne faut pas être ingrats. — Et ils s’envolèrent comme deux hirondelles vers le printemps. Ce jardin de la rue Plumet leur faisait l’effet de l’aube. Ils avaient déjà derrière eux quelque chose qui était comme le printemps de leur amour. La maison de la rue Plumet, étant prise à bail, appartenait encore à Cosette. Ils allèrent à ce jardin et à cette maison. Ils s’y retrouvèrent, ils s’y oublièrent. Le soir, à l’heure ordinaire, Jean Valjean vint rue des Filles-du-Calvaire. — Madame est sortie avec monsieur, et n’est pas rentrée encore, lui dit Basque. Il s’assit en silence et attendit une heure. Cosette ne rentra point. Il baissa la tête et s’en alla.

Cosette était si enivrée de sa promenade à «leur jardin» et si joyeuse d’avoir «vécu tout un jour dans son passé» qu’elle ne parla pas d’autre chose le lendemain.

Elle ne s’aperçut pas qu’elle n’avait point vu Jean Valjean.

— De quelle façon êtes-vous allés là? lui demanda Jean Valjean.

— À pied.

— Et comment êtes-vous revenus?

— En fiacre.

Depuis quelque temps Jean Valjean remarquait la vie étroite que menait le jeune couple. Il en était importuné. L’économie de Marius était sévère, et le mot pour Jean Valjean avait son sens absolu. Il hasarda une question:

— Pourquoi n’avez-vous pas une voiture à vous? Un joli coupé ne vous coûterait que cinq cents francs par mois. Vous êtes riches.

— Je ne sais pas, répondit Cosette.

— C’est comme Toussaint, reprit Jean Valjean. Elle est partie. Vous ne l’avez pas remplacée. Pourquoi?

— Nicolette suffit.

— Mais il vous faudrait une femme de chambre.

— Est-ce que je n’ai pas Marius?

— Vous devriez avoir une maison à vous, des domestiques à vous, une voiture, loge au spectacle. Il n’y a rien de trop beau pour vous. Pourquoi ne pas profiter de ce que vous êtes riches? La richesse, cela s’ajoute au bonheur.

Cosette ne répondit rien.

Les visites de Jean Valjean ne s’abrégeaient point. Loin de là. Quand c’est le cœur qui glisse, on ne s’arrête pas sur la pente.

Lorsque Jean Valjean voulait prolonger sa visite et faire oublier l’heure, il faisait l’éloge de Marius; il le trouvait beau, noble, courageux, spirituel, éloquent, bon. Cosette enchérissait. Jean Valjean recommençait. On ne tarissait pas. Marius, ce mot était inépuisable; il y avait des volumes dans ces six lettres. De cette façon Jean Valjean parvenait à rester longtemps. Voir Cosette, oublier près d’elle, cela lui était si doux! C’était le pansement de sa plaie. Il arriva plusieurs fois que Basque vint dire à deux reprises: Monsieur Gillenormand m’envoie rappeler à Madame la baronne que le dîner est servi.

Ces jours-là, Jean Valjean rentrait chez lui très pensif.

Y avait-il donc du vrai dans cette comparaison de la chrysalide qui s’était présentée à l’esprit de Marius? Jean Valjean était-il en effet une chrysalide qui s’obstinerait, et qui viendrait faire des visites à son papillon?

Un jour il resta plus longtemps encore qu’à l’ordinaire. Le lendemain, il remarqua qu’il n’y avait point de feu dans la cheminée. — Tiens! pensa-t-il. Pas de feu. — Et il se donna à lui-même cette explication: — C’est tout simple. Nous sommes en avril. Les froids ont cessé.

— Dieu! qu’il fait froid ici! s’écria Cosette en entrant.

— Mais non, dit Jean Valjean.

— C’est donc vous qui avez dit à Basque de ne pas faire de feu?

— Oui. Nous sommes en mai tout à l’heure.

— Mais on fait du feu jusqu’au mois de juin. Dans cette cave-ci, il en faut toute l’année.

— J’ai pensé que le feu était inutile.

— C’est bien là une de vos idées! reprit Cosette.

Le jour d’après, il y avait du feu. Mais les deux fauteuils étaient rangés à l’autre bout de la salle près de la porte. — Qu’est-ce que cela veut dire? pensa Jean Valjean.

Il alla chercher les fauteuils, et les remit à leur place ordinaire près de la cheminée.

Ce feu rallumé l’encouragea pourtant. Il fit durer la causerie plus longtemps encore que d’habitude. Comme il se levait pour s’en aller, Cosette lui dit:

— Mon mari m’a dit une drôle de chose hier.

— Quelle chose donc?

— Il m’a dit: Cosette, nous avons trente mille livres de rente. Vingt-sept que tu as, trois que me fait mon grand-père. J’ai répondu: Cela fait trente. Il a repris: Aurais-tu le courage de vivre avec les trois mille? J’ai répondu: Oui, avec rien. Pourvu que ce soit avec toi. Et puis j’ai demandé: Pourquoi me dis-tu ça? Il m’a répondu: Pour savoir.

Jean Valjean ne trouva pas une parole. Cosette attendait probablement de lui quelque explication; il l’écouta dans un morne silence. Il s’en retourna rue de l’Homme-Armé; il était si profondément absorbé qu’il se trompa de porte, et qu’au lieu de rentrer chez lui, il entra dans la maison voisine. Ce ne fut qu’après avoir monté presque deux étages qu’il s’aperçut de son erreur et qu’il redescendit.

Son esprit était bourrelé de conjectures. Il était évident que Marius avait des doutes sur l’origine de ces six cent mille francs, qu’il craignait quelque source non pure, qui sait? qu’il avait même peut-être découvert que cet argent venait de lui Jean Valjean, qu’il hésitait devant cette fortune suspecte, et répugnait à la prendre comme sienne, aimant mieux rester pauvres, lui et Cosette, que d’être riches d’une richesse trouble.

En outre, vaguement, Jean Valjean commençait à se sentir éconduit.

Le jour suivant, il eut, en pénétrant dans la salle basse, comme une secousse. Les fauteuils avaient disparu. Il n’y avait pas même une chaise.

— Ah çà, s’écria Cosette en entrant, pas de fauteuils! Où sont donc les fauteuils?

— Ils n’y sont plus, répondit Jean Valjean.

— Voilà qui est fort!

Jean Valjean bégaya:

— C’est moi qui ai dit à Basque de les enlever.

— Et la raison?

— Je ne reste que quelques minutes aujourd’hui.

— Rester peu, ce n’est pas une raison pour rester debout.

— Je crois que Basque avait besoin des fauteuils pour le salon.

— Pourquoi?

— Vous avez sans doute du monde ce soir.

— Nous n’avons personne.

Jean Valjean ne put dire un mot de plus.

Cosette haussa les épaules.

— Faire enlever les fauteuils! L’autre jour vous faites éteindre le feu. Comme vous êtes singulier!

— Adieu, murmura Jean Valjean.

Il ne dit pas: Adieu, Cosette. Mais il n’eut pas la force de dire: Adieu, madame.

Il sortit accablé.

Cette fois il avait compris.

Le lendemain il ne vint pas. Cosette ne le remarqua que le soir.

— Tiens, dit-elle, monsieur Jean n’est pas venu aujourd’hui.

Elle eut comme un léger serrement de cœur, mais elle s’en aperçut à peine, tout de suite distraite par un baiser de Marius.

Le jour d’après, il ne vint pas.

Cosette n’y prit pas garde, passa sa soirée et dormit sa nuit, comme à l’ordinaire, et n’y pensa qu’en se réveillant. Elle était si heureuse! Elle envoya bien vite Nicolette chez monsieur Jean savoir s’il était malade, et pourquoi il n’était pas venu la veille. Nicolette rapporta la réponse de monsieur Jean. Il n’était point malade. Il était occupé. Il viendrait bientôt. Le plus tôt qu’il pourrait. Du reste, il allait faire un petit voyage. Que madame devait se souvenir que c’était son habitude de faire des voyages de temps en temps. Qu’on n’eût pas d’inquiétude. Qu’on ne songeât point à lui.

Nicolette, en entrant chez monsieur Jean, lui avait répété les propres paroles de sa maîtresse. Que madame envoyait savoir «pourquoi monsieur Jean n’était pas venu la veille». Il y a deux jours que je ne suis venu, dit Jean Valjean avec douceur.

Mais l’observation glissa sur Nicolette qui n’en rapporta rien à Cosette.

Chapitre IV

L’attraction et l’extinction

Pendant les derniers mois du printemps et les premiers mois de l’été de 1833, les passants clairsemés du Marais, les marchands des boutiques, les oisifs sur le pas des portes, remarquaient un vieillard proprement vêtu de noir, qui, tous les jours, vers la même heure, à la nuit tombante, sortait de la rue de l’Homme-Armé, du côté de la rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie, passait devant les Blancs-Manteaux, gagnait la rue Culture-Sainte-Catherine, et, arrivé à la rue de l’Écharpe, tournait à gauche, et entrait dans la rue Saint-Louis.

Là il marchait à pas lents, la tête tendue en avant, ne voyant rien, n’entendant rien, l’œil immuablement fixé sur un point toujours le même, qui semblait pour lui étoilé, et qui n’était autre que l’angle de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire. Plus il approchait de ce coin de rue, plus son œil s’éclairait; une sorte de joie illuminait ses prunelles comme une aurore intérieure il avait l’air fasciné et attendri, ses lèvres faisaient des mouvements obscurs, comme s’il parlait à quelqu’un qu’il ne voyait pas, il souriait vaguement, et il avançait le plus lentement qu’il pouvait. On eût dit que, tout en souhaitant d’arriver, il avait peur du moment où il serait tout près. Lorsqu’il n’y avait plus que quelques maisons entre lui et cette rue qui paraissait l’attirer, son pas se ralentissait au point que par instants on pouvait croire qu’il ne marchait plus. La vacillation de sa tête et la fixité de sa prunelle faisaient songer à l’aiguille qui cherche le pôle. Quelque temps qu’il mît à faire durer l’arrivée, il fallait bien arriver; il atteignait la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire; alors il s’arrêtait, il tremblait, il passait sa tête avec une sorte de timidité sombre au delà du coin de la dernière maison, et il regardait dans cette rue, et il y avait dans ce tragique regard quelque chose qui ressemblait à l’éblouissement de l’impossible et à la réverbération d’un paradis fermé. Puis une larme, qui s’était peu à peu amassée dans l’angle des paupières, devenue assez grosse pour tomber, glissait sur sa joue, et quelquefois s’arrêtait à sa bouche. Le vieillard en sentait la saveur amère. Il restait ainsi quelques minutes comme s’il eût été de pierre; puis il s’en retournait par le même chemin et du même pas, et, à mesure qu’il s’éloignait son regard s’éteignait.

Peu à peu, ce vieillard cessa d'aller jusqu'à l'angle de la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire; il s'arrêtait à mi-chemin dans la rue Saint-Louis; tantôt un peu plus loin, tantôt un peu plus près. Un jour, il resta au coin de la rue Culture-Sainte-Catherine et regarda la rue des Filles-du-Calvaire de loin. Puis il hocha silencieusement la tête de droite à gauche, comme s'il se refusait quelque chose, et rebroussa chemin.

Bientôt, il ne vint même plus jusqu'à la rue Saint-Louis. Il arrivait jusqu'à la rue Pavée, secouait le front, et s'en retournait; puis il n'alla plus au delà de la rue des Trois-Pavillons; puis il ne dépassa plus les Blancs-Manteaux. On eût dit un pendule qu'on ne remonte plus et dont les oscillations s'abrègent en attendant qu'elles s'arrêtent.

Tous les jours il sortait de chez lui à la même heure, il entreprenait le même trajet, mais il ne l'achevait plus, et, peut-être sans qu'il en eût conscience, il le raccourcissait sans cesse. Tout son visage exprimait cette unique idée: À quoi bon? La prunelle était éteinte; plus de rayonnement. La larme aussi était tarie; elle ne s'amassait plus dans l'angle des paupières; cet œil pensif était sec. La tête du vieillard était toujours tendue en avant; le menton par moments remuait; les plis de son cou maigre faisaient de la peine. Quelquefois, quand le temps était mauvais, il avait sous le bras un parapluie, qu'il n'ouvrait point. Les bonnes femmes du quartier disaient: C'est un innocent. Les enfants le suivaient en riant.

Chapitre I

Pitié pour les malheureux, mais indulgence pour les heureux

C’est une terrible chose d’être heureux! Comme on s’en contente! Comme on trouve que cela suffit! Comme, étant en possession du faux but de la vie, le bonheur, on oublie le vrai but, le devoir!

Disons-le pourtant, on aurait tort d’accuser Marius.

Marius, nous l’avons expliqué, avant son mariage, n’avait pas fait de questions à M. Fauchelevent, et, depuis, il avait craint d’en faire à Jean Valjean. Il avait regretté la promesse à laquelle il s’était laissé entraîner. Il s’était beaucoup dit qu’il avait eu tort de faire cette concession au désespoir. Il s’était borné à éloigner peu à peu Jean Valjean de sa maison et à l’effacer le plus possible dans l’esprit de Cosette. Il s’était en quelque sorte toujours placé entre Cosette et Jean Valjean, sûr que de cette façon elle ne l’apercevrait pas et n’y songerait point. C’était plus que l’effacement, c’était l’éclipse.

Marius faisait ce qu’il jugeait nécessaire et juste. Il croyait avoir, pour écarter Jean Valjean, sans dureté, mais sans faiblesse, des raisons sérieuses qu’on a vues déjà et d’autres encore qu’on verra plus tard. Le hasard lui ayant fait rencontrer, dans un procès qu’il avait plaidé, un ancien commis de la maison Laffitte, il avait eu, sans les chercher, de mystérieux renseignements qu’il n’avait pu, à la vérité, approfondir, par respect même pour ce secret qu’il avait promis de garder, et par ménagement pour la situation périlleuse de Jean Valjean. Il croyait, en ce moment-là même, avoir un grave devoir à accomplir, la restitution des six cent mille francs à quelqu’un qu’il cherchait le plus discrètement possible. En attendant, il s’abstenait de toucher à cet argent.

Quant à Cosette, elle n’était dans aucun de ces secrets-là; mais il serait dur de la condamner, elle aussi.

Il y avait de Marius à elle un magnétisme tout-puissant, qui lui faisait faire, d’instinct et presque machinalement, ce que Marius souhaitait. Elle sentait, du côté de «monsieur Jean», une volonté de Marius; elle s’y conformait. Son mari n’avait eu rien à lui dire; elle subissait la pression vague, mais claire, de ses intentions tacites, et obéissait aveuglément. Son obéissance ici consistait à ne pas se souvenir de ce que Marius oubliait. Elle n’avait aucun effort à faire pour cela. Sans qu’elle sût elle-même pourquoi, et sans qu’il y ait à l’en accuser, son âme était tellement devenue celle de son mari, que ce qui se couvrait d’ombre dans la pensée de Marius s’obscurcissait dans la sienne.

N’allons pas trop loin cependant; en ce qui concerne Jean Valjean, cet oubli et cet effacement n’étaient que superficiels. Elle était plutôt étourdie qu’oublieuse. Au fond, elle aimait bien celui qu’elle avait si longtemps nommé son père. Mais elle aimait plus encore son mari. C’est ce qui avait un peu faussé la balance de ce cœur, penchée d’un seul côté.

Il arrivait parfois que Cosette parlait de Jean Valjean et s’étonnait. Alors Marius la calmait: — Il est absent, je crois. N’a-t-il pas dit qu’il partait pour un voyage? C’est vrai, pensait Cosette. Il avait l’habitude de disparaître ainsi. Mais pas si longtemps. — Deux ou trois fois elle envoya Nicolette rue de l’Homme-Armé s’informer si monsieur Jean était revenu de son voyage. Jean Valjean fit répondre que non.

Cosette n’en demanda pas davantage, n’ayant sur la terre qu’un besoin, Marius.

Disons encore que, de leur côté, Marius et Cosette avaient été absents. Ils étaient allés à Vernon. Marius avait mené Cosette au tombeau de son père.

Marius avait peu à peu soustrait Cosette à Jean Valjean. Cosette s’était laissé faire.

Du reste, ce qu’on appelle beaucoup trop durement, dans de certains cas, l’ingratitude des enfants, n’est pas toujours une chose aussi reprochable qu’on le croit. C’est l’ingratitude de la nature. La nature, nous l’avons dit ailleurs, «regarde devant elle». La nature divise les êtres vivants en arrivants et en partants. Les partants sont tournés vers l’ombre, les arrivants vers la lumière. De là un écart qui, du côté des vieux, est fatal, et, du côté des jeunes, involontaire. Cet écart, d’abord insensible, s’accroît lentement comme toute séparation de branches. Les rameaux, sans se détacher du tronc, s’en éloignent. Ce n’est pas leur faute. La jeunesse va où est la joie, aux fêtes, aux vives clartés, aux amours. La vieillesse va à la fin. On ne se perd pas de vue, mais il n’y a plus d’étreinte. Les jeunes gens sentent le refroidissement de la vie; les vieillards celui de la tombe. N’accusons pas ces pauvres enfants.

Chapitre II

Dernières palpitations de la lampe sans huile

Jean Valjean un jour descendit son escalier, fit trois pas dans la rue, s’assit sur une borne, sur cette même borne où Gavroche, dans la nuit du 5 au 6 juin, l’avait trouvé songeant; il resta là quelques minutes, puis remonta. Ce fut la dernière oscillation du pendule. Le lendemain, il ne sortit pas de chez lui. Le surlendemain, il ne sortit pas de son lit.

Sa portière, qui lui apprêtait son maigre repas, quelques choux ou quelques pommes de terre avec un peu de lard, regarda dans l’assiette de terre brune et s’exclama:

— Mais vous n’avez pas mangé hier, pauvre cher homme!

— Si fait, répondit Jean Valjean.

— L’assiette est toute pleine.

— Regardez le pot à l’eau. Il est vide.

— Cela prouve que vous avez bu; cela ne prouve pas que vous avez mangé.

— Eh bien, fît Jean Valjean, si je n’ai eu faim que d’eau?

— Cela s’appelle la soif, et, quand on ne mange pas en même temps, cela s’appelle la fièvre.

— Je mangerai demain.

— Ou à la Trinité. Pourquoi pas aujourd’hui? Est-ce qu’on dit: Je mangerai demain! Me laisser tout mon plat sans y toucher! Mes viquelottes qui étaient si bonnes!

Jean Valjean prit la main de la vieille femme:

— Je vous promets de les manger, lui dit-il de sa voix bienveillante.

— Je ne suis pas contente de vous, répondit la portière.

Jean Valjean ne voyait guère d’autre créature humaine que cette bonne femme. Il y a dans Paris des rues où personne ne passe et des maisons où personne ne vient. Il était dans une de ces rues-là et dans une de ces maisons-là.

Du temps qu’il sortait encore, il avait acheté à un chaudronnier pour quelques sous un petit crucifix de cuivre qu’il avait accroché à un clou en face de son lit. Ce gibet-là est toujours bon à voir.

Une semaine s’écoula sans que Jean Valjean fît un pas dans sa chambre. Il demeurait toujours couché. La portière disait à son mari: — Le bonhomme de là-haut ne se lève plus, il ne mange plus, il n’ira pas loin. Ça a des chagrins, ça. On ne m’ôtera pas de la tête que sa fille est mal mariée.

Le portier répliqua avec l’accent de la souveraineté maritale:

— S’il est riche, qu’il ait un médecin. S’il n’est pas riche, qu’il n’en ait pas. S’il n’a pas de médecin, il mourra.

— Et s’il en a un?

— Il mourra, dit le portier.

La portière se mit à gratter avec un vieux couteau de l’herbe qui poussait dans ce qu’elle appelait son pavé, et tout en arrachant l’herbe, elle grommelait:

— C’est dommage. Un vieillard qui est si propre! Il est blanc comme un poulet.

Elle aperçut au bout de la rue un médecin du quartier qui passait; elle prit sur elle de le prier de monter.

— C’est au deuxième, lui dit-elle. Vous n’aurez qu’à entrer. Comme le bonhomme ne bouge plus de son lit, la clef est toujours à la porte.

Le médecin vit Jean Valjean et lui parla.

Quand il redescendit, la portière l’interpella:

— Eh bien, docteur?

— Votre malade est bien malade.

— Qu’est-ce qu’il a?

— Tout et rien. C’est un homme qui, selon toute apparence, a perdu une personne chère. On meurt de cela.

— Qu’est-ce qu’il vous a dit?

— Il m’a dit qu’il se portait bien.

— Reviendrez-vous, docteur?

— Oui, répondit le médecin. Mais il faudrait qu’un autre que moi revînt.

Chapitre III

Une plume pèse à qui soulevait la charrette Fauchelevent

Un soir Jean Valjean eut de la peine à se soulever sur le coude; il se prit la main et ne trouva pas son pouls; sa respiration était courte et s’arrêtait par instants; il reconnut qu’il était plus faible qu’il ne l’avait encore été. Alors, sans doute sous la pression de quelque préoccupation suprême, il fit un effort, se dressa sur son séant, et s’habilla. Il mit son vieux vêtement d’ouvrier. Ne sortant plus, il y était revenu, et il le préférait. Il dut s’interrompre plusieurs fois en s’habillant; rien que pour passer les manches de la veste, la sueur lui coulait du front.

Depuis qu’il était seul, il avait mis son lit dans l’antichambre, afin d’habiter le moins possible cet appartement désert.

Il ouvrit la valise et en tira le trousseau de Cosette.

Il l’étala sur son lit.

Les chandeliers de l’évêque étaient à leur place sur la cheminée. Il prit dans un tiroir deux bougies de cire et les mit dans les chandeliers. Puis, quoiqu’il fît encore grand jour, c’était en été, il les alluma. On voit ainsi quelquefois des flambeaux allumés en plein jour dans les chambres où il y a des morts.

Chaque pas qu’il faisait en allant d’un meuble à l’autre l’exténuait, et il était obligé de s’asseoir. Ce n’était point de la fatigue ordinaire qui dépense la force pour la renouveler; c’était le reste des mouvements possibles; C’était la vie épuisée qui s’égoutte dans des efforts accablants qu’on ne recommencera pas.

Une des chaises où il se laissa tomber était placée devant le miroir, si fatal pour lui, si providentiel pour Marius, où il avait lu sur le buvard l’écriture renversée de Cosette. Il se vit dans ce miroir, et ne se reconnut pas. Il avait quatre-vingts ans; avant le mariage de Marius, on lui eût à peine donné cinquante ans; cette année avait compté trente. Ce qu’il avait sur le front, ce n’était plus la ride de l’âge, c’était la marque mystérieuse de la mort. On sentait là le creusement de l’ongle impitoyable. Ses joues pendaient; la peau de son visage avait cette couleur qui ferait croire qu’il y a déjà de la terre dessus; les deux coins de sa bouche s’abaissaient comme dans ce masque que les anciens sculptaient sur les tombeaux; il regardait le vide avec un air de reproche; on eût dit un de ces grands êtres tragiques qui ont à se plaindre de quelqu'un.

Il était dans cette situation, la dernière phase de l'accablement, où la douleur ne coule plus; elle est, pour ainsi dire, coagulée; il y a sur l'âme comme un caillot de désespoir.

La nuit était venue. Il traîna laborieusement une table et le vieux fauteuil près de la cheminée, et posa sur la table une plume, de l'encre et du papier.

Cela fait, il eut un évanouissement. Quand il reprit connaissance, il avait soif. Ne pouvant soulever le pot à l'eau, il le pencha péniblement vers sa bouche, et but une gorgée.

Puis il se tourna vers le lit, et, toujours assis, car il ne pouvait rester debout, il regarda la petite robe noire et tous ces chers objets.

Ces contemplations-là durent des heures qui semblent des minutes. Tout à coup il eut un frisson, il sentit que le froid lui venait; il s'accouda à la table que les flambeaux de l'évêque éclairaient, et prit la plume.

Comme la plume ni l'encre n'avaient servi depuis longtemps, le bec de la plume était recourbé, l'encre était desséchée, il fallut qu'il se levât et qu'il mît quelques gouttes d'eau dans l'encre, ce qu'il ne put faire sans s'arrêter et s'asseoir deux ou trois fois, et il fut forcé d'écrire avec le dos de la plume. Il s'essuyait le front de temps en temps.

Sa main tremblait. Il écrivit lentement quelques lignes que voici:

«Cosette, je te bénis. Je vais t'expliquer. Ton mari a eu raison de me faire comprendre que je devais m'en aller; cependant il y a un peu d'erreur dans ce qu'il a cru, mais il a eu raison. Il est excellent. Aime-le toujours bien quand je serai mort. Monsieur Pontmercy, aimez toujours mon enfant bien-aimé. Cosette, on trouvera ce papier-ci, voici ce que je veux te dire, tu vas voir les chiffres, si j'ai la force de me les rappeler, écoute bien, cet argent est bien à toi. Voici toute la chose: Le jais blanc vient de Norvège, le jais noir vient d'Angleterre, la verroterie noire vient d'Allemagne. Le jais est plus léger, plus précieux, plus cher. On peut faire en France des imitations comme en Allemagne. Il faut une petite enclume de deux pouces carrés et une lampe à esprit de vin pour amollir la cire. La cire autrefois se faisait avec de la résine et du noir de fumée et coûtait quatre francs la livre. J'ai imaginé de la faire avec de la gomme laque et de la térébenthine. Elle ne coûte plus que trente sous, et elle est bien meilleure. Les boucles se font avec un verre violet qu'on colle au moyen de cette cire sur une petite membrure en fer noir. Le verre doit être violet pour les bijoux de fer et noir pour les bijoux d'or. L'Espagne en achète beaucoup. C'est le pays du jais...»

Ici il s'interrompit, la plume tomba de ses doigts, il lui vint un de ces sanglots désespérés qui montaient par moments des profondeurs de son être, le pauvre homme prit sa tête dans ses deux mains, et songea.

— Oh! s'écria-t-il au dedans de lui-même (cris lamentables, entendus de Dieu seul), c'est fini. Je ne la verrai plus. C'est un sourire qui a passé sur moi. Je vais entrer dans la nuit sans même la revoir. Oh! une minute, un instant, entendre sa voix, toucher sa robe, la regarder, elle, l'ange! et puis mourir! Ce n'est rien de mourir, ce qui est affreux, c'est de mourir sans la voir. Elle me sourirait, elle me dirait un mot. Est-ce que cela ferait du mal à quelqu'un? Non, c'est fini, jamais. Me voilà tout seul. Mon Dieu! mon Dieu! je ne la verrai plus.

En ce moment on frappa à sa porte.

Chapitre IV

Bouteille d’encre qui ne réussit qu’à blanchir

Ce même jour, ou, pour mieux dire, ce même soir, comme Marius sortait de table et venait de se retirer dans son cabinet, ayant un dossier à étudier, Basque lui avait remis une lettre en disant: La personne qui a écrit la lettre est dans l’antichambre.

Cosette avait pris le bras du grand-père et faisait un tour dans le jardin.

Une lettre peut, comme un homme, avoir mauvaise tournure. Gros papier, pli grossier, rien qu’à les voir, de certaines missives déplaisent. La lettre qu’avait apportée Basque était de cette espèce.

Marius la prit. Elle sentait le tabac. Rien n’éveille un souvenir comme une odeur. Marius reconnut ce tabac. Il regarda la suscription: À monsieur, monsieur le baron Pommerci. En son hôtel. Le tabac reconnu lui fit reconnaître l’écriture. On pourrait dire que l’étonnement a des éclairs. Marius fut comme illuminé d’un de ces éclairs-là.

L’odorat, ce mystérieux aide-mémoire, venait de faire revivre en lui tout un monde. C’était bien là le papier, la façon de plier, la teinte blafarde de l’encre, c’était bien là l’écriture connue; surtout c’était là le tabac. Le galetas Jondrette lui apparaissait.

Ainsi, étrange coup de tête du hasard! une des deux pistes qu’il avait tant cherchées, celle pour laquelle dernièrement encore il avait fait tant d’efforts et qu’il croyait à jamais perdue, venait d’elle-même s’offrir à lui.

Il décacheta avidement la lettre, et il lut:

«Monsieur le baron,

«Si l’Être Suprême m’en avait donné les talents, j’aurais pu être le baron Thénard, membre de l’institut (académie des sciences), mais je ne le suis pas. Je porte seulement le même nom que lui, heureux si ce souvenir me recommande à l’excellence de vos bontés. Le bienfait dont vous m’honorerez sera réciproque. Je suis en possession d’un secret consernant un individu. Cet individu vous conserne. Je tiens le secret à votre disposition désirant avoir l’honneur de vous être hutile. Je vous donnerai le moyen simple de chaser de votre honorable famille cet individu qui n’y a pas droit, madame la baronne étant de haute naissance. Le sanctuaire de la vertu ne pourrait coabiter plus longtemps avec le crime sans abdiquer.

«J’atends dans l’antichambre les ordres de monsieur le baron.

La lettre était signée «Thénard».

Cette signature n’était pas fausse. Elle était seulement un peu abrégée.

Du reste l’amphigouri et l’orthographe achevaient la révélation. Le certificat d’origine était complet. Aucun doute n’était possible.

L’émotion de Marius fut profonde. Après le mouvement de surprise, il eut un mouvement de bonheur. Qu’il trouvât maintenant l’autre homme qu’il cherchait, celui qui l’avait sauvé lui Marius, et il n’aurait plus rien à souhaiter.

Il ouvrit un tiroir de son secrétaire, y prit quelques billets de banque, les mit dans sa poche, referma le secrétaire et sonna. Basque entre-bâilla la porte.

— Faites entrer, dit Marius.

Basque annonça:

— Monsieur Thénard.

Un homme entra.

Nouvelle surprise pour Marius. L’homme qui entra lui était parfaitement inconnu.

Cet homme, vieux du reste, avait le nez gros, le menton dans la cravate, des lunettes vertes à double abat-jour de taffetas vert sur les yeux, les cheveux lissés et aplatis sur le front au ras des sourcils comme la perruque des cochers anglais de high life. Ses cheveux étaient gris. Il était vêtu de noir de la tête aux pieds, d’un noir très râpé, mais propre; un trousseau de breloques, sortant de son gousset, y faisait supposer une montre. Il tenait à la main un vieux chapeau. Il marchait voûté, et la courbure de son dos s’augmentait de la profondeur de son salut.

Ce qui frappait au premier abord, c’est que l’habit de ce personnage, trop ample, quoique soigneusement boutonné, ne semblait pas fait pour lui. Ici une courte digression est nécessaire.

Il y avait à Paris, à cette époque, dans un vieux logis borgne, rue Beautreillis, près de l’Arsenal, un juif ingénieux qui avait pour profession de changer un gredin en honnête homme. Pas pour trop longtemps, ce qui eût pu être gênant pour le gredin. Le changement se faisait à vue, pour un jour ou deux, à raison de trente sous par jour, au moyen d’un costume ressemblant le plus possible à l’honnêteté de tout le monde. Ce loueur de costumes s’appelait le Changeur; les filous parisiens lui avaient donné ce nom, et ne lui en connaissaient pas d'autre. Il avait un vestiaire assez complet. Les loques dont il affublait les gens étaient à peu près possibles. Il avait des spécialités et des catégories; à chaque clou de son magasin pendait, usée et fripée, une condition sociale; ici l'habit de magistrat, là l'habit de curé, là l'habit de banquier, dans un coin l'habit de militaire en retraite, ailleurs l'habit d'homme de lettres, plus loin l'habit d'homme d'État. Cet être était le costumier du drame immense que la friponnerie joue à Paris. Son bouge était la coulisse d'où le vol sortait et où l'escroquerie rentrait. Un coquin déguenillé arrivait à ce vestiaire, déposait trente sous, et choisissait, selon le rôle qu'il voulait jouer ce jour-là, l'habit qui lui convenait, et, en redescendant l'escalier, le coquin était quelqu'un. Le lendemain les nippes étaient fidèlement rapportées, et le Changeur, qui confiait tout aux voleurs, n'était jamais volé. Ces vêtements avaient un inconvénient, ils «n'allaient pas»; n'étant point faits pour ceux qui les portaient, ils étaient collants pour celui-ci, flottants pour celui-là, et ne s'ajustaient à personne. Tout filou qui dépassait la moyenne humaine en petitesse ou en grandeur, était mal à l'aise dans les costumes du Changeur. Il ne fallait être ni trop gras ni trop maigre. Le Changeur n'avait prévu que les hommes ordinaires. Il avait pris mesure à l'espèce dans la personne du premier gueux venu, lequel n'est ni gros, ni mince, ni grand, ni petit. De là des adaptations quelquefois difficiles dont les pratiques du Changeur se tiraient comme elles pouvaient. Tant pis pour les exceptions! L'habit d'homme d'État, par exemple, noir du haut en bas, et par conséquent convenable, eût été trop large pour Pitt et trop étroit pour Castelcicala. Le vêtement d'homme d'état était désigné comme il suit dans le catalogue du Changeur; nous copions: «Un habit de drap noir, un pantalon de laine noire, un gilet de soie, des bottes et du linge.» Il y avait en marge: Ancien ambassadeur, et une note que nous transcrivons également: «Dans une boîte séparée, une perruque proprement frisée, des lunettes vertes, des breloques, et deux petits tuyaux de plume d'un pouce de long enveloppés de coton.» Tout cela revenait à l'homme d'État, ancien ambassadeur. Tout ce costume était, si l'on peut parler ainsi, exténué; les coutures blanchissaient, une vague boutonnière s'entrouvrait à l'un des coudes; en outre, un bouton manquait à l'habit sur la poitrine; mais ce n'est qu'un détail; la main de l'homme d'État, devant toujours être dans l'habit et sur le cœur, avait pour fonction de cacher le bouton absent.

Si Marius avait été familier avec les institutions occultes de Paris, il eût tout de suite reconnu, sur le dos du visiteur que Basque venait d'introduire, l'habit d'homme d'État emprunté au Décroche-moi-ça du Changeur.

Le désappointement de Marius, en voyant entrer un homme autre que celui qu'il attendait, tourna en disgrâce pour le nouveau venu. Il l'examina des pieds à la tête, pendant que le personnage s'inclinait démesurément, et lui demanda d'un ton bref:

— Que voulez-vous?

L'homme répondit avec un rictus aimable dont le sourire caressant d'un crocodile donnerait quelque idée:

— Il me semble impossible que je n'aie pas déjà eu l'honneur de voir monsieur le baron dans le monde. Je crois bien l'avoir particulièrement rencontré, il y a quelques années, chez madame la princesse Bagration et dans les salons de sa seigneurie le vicomte Dambray, pair de France.

C'est toujours une bonne tactique en coquinerie que d'avoir l'air de reconnaître quelqu'un qu'on ne connaît point.

Marius était attentif au parler de cet homme. Il épiait l'accent et le geste, mais son désappointement croissait; c'était une prononciation nasillarde, absolument différente du son de voix aigre et sec auquel il s'attendait. Il était tout à fait dérouté.

— Je ne connais, dit-il, ni madame Bagration, ni M. Dambray. Je n'ai de ma vie mis le pied ni chez l'un ni chez l'autre.

La réponse était bourrue. Le personnage, gracieux quand même, insista.

— Alors, ce sera chez Chateaubriand que j'aurai vu monsieur! Je connais beaucoup Chateaubriand. Il est très affable. Il me dit quelquefois: Thénard, mon ami... est-ce que vous ne buvez pas un verre avec moi?

Le front de Marius devint de plus en plus sévère:

— Je n'ai jamais eu l'honneur d'être reçu chez monsieur de Chateaubriand. Abrégeons. Qu'est-ce que vous voulez?

L'homme, devant la voix plus dure, salua plus bas.

— Monsieur le baron, daignez m'écouter. Il y a en Amérique, dans un pays qui est du côté de Panama, un village appelé la Joya. Ce village se compose d'une seule maison. Une grande maison carrée de trois étages en briques cuites au soleil, chaque côté du carré long de cinq cents pieds, chaque étage en retraite de douze pieds sur l'étage inférieur de façon à laisser devant soi une terrasse qui fait le tour de l'édifice, au centre une cour intérieure où sont les provisions et les munitions, pas de fenêtres, des meurtrières, pas de porte, des échelles, des échelles pour monter du sol à la première terrasse, et de la première à la seconde, et de la seconde à la troisième, des échelles pour descendre dans la cour intérieure, pas de portes aux chambres, des trappes, pas d'escaliers aux chambres, des échelles; le soir on ferme les trappes, on retire les échelles, on braque des tromblons et des carabines aux meurtrières; nul moyen d'entrer; une maison le jour, une citadelle la nuit, huit cents habitants, voilà ce village. Pourquoi tant de précautions? c'est que ce pays est dangereux; il est plein d'anthropophages. Alors pourquoi y va-t-on? c'est que ce pays est merveilleux; on y trouve de l'or.

— Où voulez-vous en venir? interrompit Marius qui du désappointement passait à l'impatience.

— À ceci, monsieur le baron. Je suis un ancien diplomate fatigué. La vieille civilisation m'a mis sur les dents. Je veux essayer des sauvages.

— Après?

— Monsieur le baron, l'égoïsme est la loi du monde. La paysanne prolétaire qui travaille à la journée se retourne quand la diligence passe, la paysanne propriétaire qui travaille à son champ ne se retourne pas. Le chien du pauvre aboie après le riche, le chien du riche aboie après le pauvre. Chacun pour soi. L'intérêt, voilà le but des hommes. L'or, voilà l'aimant.

— Après? Concluez.

— Je voudrais aller m'établir à la Joya. Nous sommes trois. J'ai mon épouse et ma demoiselle; une fille qui est fort belle. Le voyage est long et cher. Il me faut un peu d'argent.

— En quoi cela me regarde-t-il? demanda Marius.

L'inconnu tendit le cou hors de sa cravate, geste propre au vautour, et répliqua avec un redoublement de sourire:

— Est-ce que monsieur le baron n'a pas lu ma lettre?

Cela était à peu près vrai. Le fait est que le contenu de l'épître avait glissé sur Marius. Il avait vu l'écriture plus qu'il n'avait lu la lettre. Il s'en souvenait à peine. Depuis un moment un nouvel éveil venait de lui être donné. Il avait remarqué ce détail: mon épouse et ma demoiselle. Il attachait sur l'inconnu un œil pénétrant. Un juge d'instruction n'eût pas mieux regardé. Il le guettait presque. Il se borna à lui répondre:

— Précisez.

L'inconnu inséra ses deux mains dans ses deux goussets, releva sa tête sans redresser son épine dorsale, mais en scrutant de son côté Marius avec le regard vert de ses lunettes.

— Soit, monsieur le baron. Je précise. J’ai un secret à vous vendre.

— Un secret?

— Un secret.

— Qui me concerne?

— Un peu.

— Quel est ce secret?

Marius examinait de plus en plus l’homme, tout en l’écoutant.

— Je commence gratis, dit l’inconnu. Vous allez voir que je suis intéressant.

— Parlez.

— Monsieur le baron, vous avez chez vous un voleur et un assassin.

Marius tressaillit.

— Chez moi? non, dit-il.

L’inconnu, imperturbable, brossa son chapeau du coude, et poursuivit:

— Assassin et voleur. Remarquez, monsieur le baron, que je ne parle pas ici de faits anciens, arriérés, caducs, qui peuvent être effacés par la prescription devant la loi et par le repentir devant Dieu. Je parle de faits récents, de faits actuels, de faits encore ignorés de la justice à cette heure. Je continue. Cet homme s’est glissé dans votre confiance, et presque dans votre famille, sous un faux nom. Je vais vous dire son nom vrai. Et vous le dire pour rien.

— J’écoute.

— Il s’appelle Jean Valjean.

— Je le sais.

— Je vais vous dire, également pour rien, qui il est.

— Dites.

— C’est un ancien forçat.

— Je le sais.

— Vous le savez depuis que j’ai eu l’honneur de vous le dire.

— Non. Je le savais auparavant.

Le ton froid de Marius, cette double réplique je le sais, son laconisme réfractaire au dialogue, remuèrent dans l’inconnu quelque colère sourde. Il décocha à la dérobée à Marius un regard furieux, tout de suite éteint. Si rapide qu’il fût, ce regard était de ceux qu’on reconnaît quand on les a vus une fois; il n’échappa point à Marius. De certains flamboiements ne peuvent venir que de certaines âmes; la prunelle, ce soupirail de la pensée, s’en embrase; les lunettes ne cachent rien; mettez donc une vitre à l’enfer.

L’inconnu reprit, en souriant:

— Je ne me permets pas de démentir monsieur le baron. Dans tous les cas, vous devez voir que je suis renseigné. Maintenant ce que j’ai à vous apprendre n’est connu que de moi seul. Cela intéresse la fortune de madame la baronne. C’est un secret extraordinaire. Il est à vendre. C’est à vous que je l’offre d’abord. Bon marché. Vingt mille francs.

— Je sais ce secret-là comme je sais les autres, dit Marius.

Le personnage sentit le besoin de baisser un peu son prix:

— Monsieur le baron, mettez dix mille francs, et je parle.

— Je vous répète que vous n’avez rien à m’apprendre. Je sais ce que vous voulez me dire.

Il y eut dans l’œil de l’homme un nouvel éclair. Il s’écria:

— Il faut pourtant que je dîne aujourd’hui. C’est un secret extraordinaire, vous dis-je. Monsieur le baron, je vais parler. Je parle. Donnez-moi vingt francs.

Marius le regarda fixement:

— Je sais votre secret extraordinaire; de même que je savais le nom de Jean Valjean, de même que je sais votre nom.

— Mon nom?

— Oui.

— Ce n’est pas difficile, monsieur le baron. J’ai eu l’honneur de vous l’écrire et de vous le dire. Thénard.

— Dier.

— Hein?

— Thénardier.

— Qui ça?

Dans le danger, le porc-épic se hérisse, le scarabée fait le mort, la vieille garde se forme en carré; cet homme se mit à rire.

Puis il épousseta d’une chiquenaude un grain de poussière sur la manche de son habit.

Marius continua:

— Vous êtes aussi l’ouvrier Jondrette, le comédien Fabantou, le poète Genflot, l’espagnol don Alvarès, et la femme Balizard.

— La femme quoi?

— Et vous avez tenu une gargote à Montfermeil.

— Une gargote! Jamais.

— Et je vous dis que vous êtes Thénardier.

— Je le nie.

— Et que vous êtes un gueux. Tenez.

Et Marius, tirant de sa poche un billet de banque, le lui jeta à la face.

— Merci! pardon! cinq cents francs! monsieur le baron!

Et l’homme, bouleversé, saluant, saisissant le billet, l’examina.

— Cinq cents francs! reprit-il, ébahi. Et il bégaya à demi-voix: Un fafiot sérieux!

Puis brusquement:

— Eh bien soit, s’écria-t-il. Mettons-nous à notre aise.

Et, avec une prestesse de singe, rejetant ses cheveux en arrière, arrachant ses lunettes, retirant de son nez et escamotant les deux tuyaux de plume dont il a été question tout à l’heure, et qu’on a d’ailleurs déjà vus à une autre page de ce livre, il ôta son visage comme on ôte son chapeau.

L’œil s’alluma; le front inégal, raviné, bossu par endroits, hideusement ridé en haut, se dégagea, le nez redevint aigu comme un bec; le profil féroce et sagace de l’homme de proie reparut.

— Monsieur le baron est infaillible, dit-il d’une voix nette et d’où avait disparu tout nasillement, je suis Thénardier.

Et il redressa son dos voûté.

Thénardier, car c’était bien lui, était étrangement surpris; il eût été troublé s’il avait pu l’être. Il était venu apporter de l’étonnement, et c’était lui qui en recevait. Cette humiliation lui était payée cinq cents francs, et, à tout prendre, il l’acceptait; mais il n’en était pas moins abasourdi.

Il voyait pour la première fois ce baron Pontmercy, et, malgré son déguisement, ce baron Pontmercy le reconnaissait, et le reconnaissait à fond. Et non seulement ce baron était au fait de Thénardier, mais il semblait au fait de Jean Valjean. Qu’était-ce que ce jeune homme presque imberbe, si glacial et si généreux, qui savait les noms des gens, qui savait tous leurs noms, et qui leur ouvrait sa bourse, qui malmenait les fripons comme un juge et qui les payait comme une dupe?

Thénardier, on se le rappelle, quoique ayant été voisin de Marius, ne l’avait jamais vu, ce qui est fréquent à Paris; il avait autrefois entendu vaguement ses filles parler d’un jeune homme très pauvre appelé Marius qui demeurait dans la maison. Il lui avait écrit, sans le connaître, la lettre qu’on sait. Aucun rapprochement n’était possible dans son esprit entre ce Marius-là et M. le baron Pontmercy.

Quant au nom de Pontmercy, on se rappelle que, sur le champ de bataille de Waterloo, il n’en avait entendu que les deux dernières syllabes, pour lesquelles il avait toujours eu le légitime dédain qu’on doit à ce qui n’est qu’un remercîment.

Du reste, par sa fille Azelma, qu’il avait mise à la piste des mariés du 16 février, et par ses fouilles personnelles, il était parvenu à savoir beaucoup de choses, et, du fond de ses ténèbres, il avait réussi à saisir plus d’un fil mystérieux. Il avait, à force d’industrie, découvert, ou, tout au moins, à force d’inductions, deviné, quel était l’homme qu’il avait rencontré un certain jour dans le Grand Égout. De l’homme, il était facilement arrivé au nom. Il savait que madame la baronne Pontmercy, c’était Cosette. Mais de ce côté-là, il comptait être discret. Qui était Cosette? Il ne le savait pas au juste lui-même. Il entrevoyait bien quelque bâtardise, l’histoire de Fantine lui avait toujours semblé louche, mais à quoi bon en parler? Pour se faire payer son silence? Il avait, ou croyait avoir, à vendre mieux que cela. Et, selon toute apparence, venir faire, sans preuve, cette révélation au baron Pontmercy: Votre femme est bâtarde, cela n’eût réussi qu’à attirer la botte du mari vers les reins du révélateur.

Dans la pensée de Thénardier, la conversation avec Marius n’avait pas encore commencé. Il avait dû reculer, modifier sa stratégie, quitter une position, changer de front; mais rien d’essentiel n’était encore compromis, et il avait cinq cents francs dans sa poche. En outre, il avait quelque chose de décisif à dire, et même contre ce baron Pontmercy si bien renseigné et si bien armé, il se sentait fort. Pour les hommes de la nature de Thénardier, tout dialogue est un combat. Dans celui qui allait s’engager, quelle était sa situation? Il ne savait pas à qui il parlait, mais il savait de quoi il parlait. Il fit rapidement cette revue intérieure de ses forces, et après avoir dit: Je suis Thénardier, il attendit.

Marius était resté pensif. Il tenait donc enfin Thénardier. Cet homme, qu’il avait tant désiré retrouver, était là. Il allait donc pouvoir faire honneur à la recommandation du colonel Pontmercy. Il était humilié que ce héros dût quelque chose à ce bandit, et que la lettre de change tirée du fond du tombeau par son père sur lui Marius fût jusqu’à ce jour protestée. Il lui paraissait aussi, dans la situation complexe où était son esprit vis-à-vis de Thénardier, qu’il y avait lieu de venger le colonel du malheur d’avoir été sauvé par un tel gredin. Quoi qu'il en fût, il était content. Il allait donc enfin délivrer de ce créancier indigne l'ombre du colonel, et il lui semblait qu'il allait retirer de la prison pour dettes la mémoire de son père.

À côté de ce devoir, il en avait un autre, éclaircir, s'il se pouvait, la source de la fortune de Cosette. L'occasion semblait se présenter. Thénardier savait peut-être quelque chose. Il pouvait être utile de voir le fond de cet homme. Il commença par là.

Thénardier avait fait disparaître le «fafiot sérieux» dans son gousset, et regardait Marius avec une douceur presque tendre.

Marius rompit le silence.

— Thénardier, je vous ai dit votre nom. À présent, votre secret, ce que vous veniez m'apprendre, voulez-vous que je vous le dise? J'ai mes informations aussi, moi. Vous allez voir que j'en sais plus long que vous. Jean Valjean, comme vous l'avez dit, est un assassin et un voleur. Un voleur, parce qu'il a volé un riche manufacturier dont il a causé la ruine, M. Madeleine. Un assassin, parce qu'il a assassiné l'agent de police Javert.

— Je ne comprends pas, monsieur le baron, fît Thénardier.

— Je vais me faire comprendre. Écoutez. Il y avait, dans un arrondissement du Pas-de-Calais, vers 1822, un homme qui avait eu quelque ancien démêlé avec la justice, et qui, sous le nom de M. Madeleine, s'était relevé et réhabilité. Cet homme était devenu, dans toute la force du terme, un juste. Avec une industrie, la fabrique des verroteries noires, il avait fait la fortune de toute une ville. Quant à sa fortune personnelle, il l'avait faite aussi, mais secondairement et, en quelque sorte, par occasion. Il était le père nourricier des pauvres. Il fondait des hôpitaux, ouvrait des écoles, visitait les malades, dotait les filles, soutenait les veuves, adoptait les orphelins; il était comme le tuteur du pays. Il avait refusé la croix, on l'avait nommé maire. Un forçat libéré savait le secret d'une peine encourue autrefois par cet homme; il le dénonça et le fit arrêter, et profita de l'arrestation pour venir à Paris et se faire remettre par le banquier Laffitte, — Je tiens le fait du caissier lui-même, — au moyen d'une fausse signature, une somme de plus d'un demi-million qui appartenait à M. Madeleine. Ce forçat, qui a volé M. Madeleine, c'est Jean Valjean. Quant à l'autre fait, vous n'avez rien non plus à m'apprendre. Jean Valjean a tué l'agent Javert; il l'a tué d'un coup de pistolet. Moi qui vous parle, j'étais présent.

Thénardier jeta à Marius le coup d'œil souverain d'un homme battu qui remet la main sur la victoire et qui vient de regagner en une minute tout le terrain qu'il avait perdu. Mais le sourire revint tout de suite; l'inférieur vis-à-vis du supérieur doit avoir le triomphe câlin, et Thénardier se borna à dire à Marius:

— Monsieur le baron, nous faisons fausse route.

Et il souligna cette phrase en faisant faire à son trousseau de breloques un moulinet expressif.

— Quoi! repartit Marius, contestez-vous cela? Ce sont des faits.

— Ce sont des chimères. La confiance dont monsieur le baron m'honore me fait un devoir de le lui dire. Avant tout la vérité et la justice. Je n'aime pas voir accuser les gens injustement. Monsieur le baron, Jean Valjean n'a point volé M. Madeleine, et Jean Valjean n'a point tué Javert.

— Voilà qui est fort! comment cela?

— Pour deux raisons.

— Lesquelles? parlez.

— Voici la première: il n'a pas volé M. Madeleine, attendu que c'est lui-même Jean Valjean qui est M. Madeleine.

— Que me contez-vous là?

— Et voici la seconde: il n'a pas assassiné Javert, attendu que celui qui a tué Javert, c'est Javert.

— Que voulez-vous dire?

— Que Javert s'est suicidé.

— Prouvez! prouvez! cria Marius hors de lui.

Thénardier reprit en scandant sa phrase à la façon d'un alexandrin antique:

— L'agent-de-police-Ja-vert-a-été-trouvé-noyé-sous-un-bateau-du-Pont-au-Change.

— Mais prouvez donc!

Thénardier tira de sa poche de côté une large enveloppe de papier gris qui semblait contenir des feuilles pliées de diverses grandeurs.

— J'ai mon dossier, dit-il avec calme.

Et il ajouta:

— Monsieur le baron, dans votre intérêt, j'ai voulu connaître à fond mon Jean Valjean. Je dis que Jean Valjean et Madeleine, c'est le même homme, et je dis que Javert n'a eu d'autre assassin que Javert, et quand je parle, c'est que j'ai des preuves. Non des preuves manuscrites, l'écriture est suspecte, l'écriture est complaisante, mais des preuves imprimées.

Tout en parlant, Thénardier extrayait de l’enveloppe deux numéros de journaux jaunis, fanés, et fortement saturés de tabac. L’un de ces deux journaux, cassé à tous les plis et tombant en lambeaux carrés, semblait beaucoup plus ancien que l’autre.

— Deux faits, deux preuves, fit Thénardier. Et il tendit à Marius les deux journaux déployés.

Ces deux journaux, le lecteur les connaît. L’un, le plus ancien, un numéro du Drapeau blanc du 25 juillet 1823, dont on a pu voir le texte à la page 148 du tome troisième de ce livre, établissait l’identité de M. Madeleine et de Jean Valjean. L’autre, un Moniteur du 15 juin 1832, constatait le suicide de Javert, ajoutant qu’il résultait d’un rapport verbal de Javert au préfet que, fait prisonnier dans la barricade de la rue de la Chanvrerie, il avait dû la vie à la magnanimité d’un insurgé qui, le tenant sous son pistolet, au lieu de lui brûler la cervelle, avait tiré en l’air.

Marius lut. Il y avait évidence, date certaine, preuve irréfragable, ces deux journaux n’avaient pas été imprimés exprès pour appuyer les dires de Thénardier; la note publiée dans le Moniteur était communiquée administrativement par la préfecture de police. Marius ne pouvait douter. Les renseignements du commis-caissier étaient faux et lui-même s’était trompé. Jean Valjean, grandi brusquement, sortait du nuage. Marius ne put retenir un cri de joie:

— Eh bien alors, ce malheureux est un admirable homme! toute cette fortune était vraiment à lui! c’est Madeleine, la providence de tout un pays! c’est Jean Valjean, le sauveur de Javert! c’est un héros! c’est un saint!

— Ce n’est pas un saint, et ce n’est pas un héros, dit Thénardier. C’est un assassin et un voleur.

Et il ajouta du ton d’un homme qui commence à se sentir quelque autorité: — Calmons-nous.

Voleur, assassin, ces mots que Marius croyait disparus, et qui revenaient, tombèrent sur lui comme une douche de glace.

— Encore! dit-il.

— Toujours, fit Thénardier. Jean Valjean n’a pas volé Madeleine, mais c’est un voleur. Il n’a pas tué Javert, mais c’est un meurtrier.

— Voulez-vous parler, reprit Marius, de ce misérable vol d’il y a quarante ans, expié, cela résulte de vos journaux mêmes, par toute une vie de repentir, d’abnégation et de vertu?

— Je dis assassinat et vol, monsieur le baron. Et je répète que je parle de faits actuels. Ce que j'ai à vous révéler est absolument inconnu. C'est de l'inédit. Et peut-être y trouverez-vous la source de la fortune habilement offerte par Jean Valjean à madame la baronne. Je dis habilement, car, par une donation de ce genre, se glisser dans une honorable maison dont on partagera l'aisance, et, du même coup, cacher son crime, jouir de son vol, enfouir son nom, et se créer une famille, ce ne serait pas très maladroit.

— Je pourrais vous interrompre ici, observa Marius, mais continuez.

— Monsieur le baron, je vais vous dire tout, laissant la récompense à votre générosité. Ce secret vaut de l'or massif. Vous me direz: Pourquoi ne t'es-tu pas adressé à Jean Valjean? Par une raison toute simple; je sais qu'il s'est dessaisi, et dessaisi en votre faveur, et je trouve la combinaison ingénieuse; mais il n'a plus le sou, il me montrerait ses mains vides, et, puisque j'ai besoin de quelque argent pour mon voyage à la Joya, je vous préfère, vous qui avez tout, à lui qui n'a rien. Je suis un peu fatigué, permettez-moi de prendre une chaise.

Marius s'assit et lui fit signe de s'asseoir.

Thénardier s'installa sur une chaise capitonnée, reprit les deux journaux, les replongea dans l'enveloppe, et murmura en becquetant avec son ongle le Drapeau blanc: Celui-ci m'a donné du mal pour l'avoir. Cela fait, il croisa les jambes et s'étala sur le dos, attitude propre aux gens sûrs de ce qu'ils disent, puis entra en matière, gravement et en appuyant sur les mots:

— Monsieur le baron, le 6 juin 1832, il y a un an environ, le jour de l'émeute, un homme était dans le Grand Égout de Paris, du côté où l'égout vient rejoindre la Seine, entre le pont des Invalides et le pont d'Iéna.

Marius rapprocha brusquement sa chaise de celle de Thénardier. Thénardier remarqua ce mouvement et continua avec la lenteur d'un orateur qui tient son interlocuteur et qui sent la palpitation de son adversaire sous ses paroles:

— Cet homme, forcé de se cacher, pour des raisons du reste étrangères à la politique, avait pris l'égout pour domicile et en avait une clef. C'était, je le répète, le 6 juin; il pouvait être huit heures du soir. L'homme entendit du bruit dans l'égout. Très surpris, il se blottit, et guetta. C'était un bruit de pas, on marchait dans l'ombre, on venait de son côté. Chose étrange, il y avait dans l'égout un autre homme que lui. La grille de sortie de l'égout n'était pas loin. Un peu de lumière qui en venait lui permit de reconnaître le nouveau venu et de voir que cet homme portait quelque chose sur son dos.

Il marchait courbé. L'homme qui marchait courbé était un ancien forçat, et ce qu'il traînait sur ses épaules était un cadavre. Flagrant délit d'assassinat, s'il en fut. Quant au vol, il va de soi; on ne tue pas un homme gratis. Ce forçat allait jeter ce cadavre à la rivière. Un fait à noter, c'est qu'avant d'arriver à la grille de sortie, ce forçat, qui venait de loin dans l'égout, avait nécessairement rencontré une fondrière épouvantable où il semble qu'il eût pu laisser le cadavre; mais, dès le lendemain, les égoutiers, en travaillant à la fondrière, y auraient retrouvé l'homme assassiné, et ce n'était pas le compte de l'assassin. Il avait mieux aimé traverser la fondrière, avec son fardeau, et ses efforts ont dû être effrayants, il est impossible de risquer plus complètement sa vie; je ne comprends pas qu'il soit sorti de là vivant.

La chaise de Marius se rapprocha encore. Thénardier en profita pour respirer longuement. Il poursuivit:

— Monsieur le baron, un égout n'est pas le Champ de Mars. On y manque de tout, et même de place. Quand deux hommes sont là, il faut qu'ils se rencontrent. C'est ce qui arriva. Le domicilié et le passant furent forcés de se dire bonjour, à regret l'un et l'autre. Le passant dit au domicilié: — Tu vois ce que j'ai sur le dos, il faut que je sorte, tu as la clef, donne-la-moi. Ce forçat était un homme d'une force terrible. Il n'y avait pas à refuser. Pourtant celui qui avait la clef parlementa, uniquement pour gagner du temps. Il examina ce mort, mais il ne put rien voir, sinon qu'il était jeune, bien mis, l'air d'un riche, et tout défiguré par le sang. Tout en causant, il trouva moyen de déchirer et d'arracher par derrière, sans que l'assassin s'en aperçût, un morceau de l'habit de l'homme assassiné. Pièce à conviction, vous comprenez; moyen de ressaisir la trace des choses et de prouver le crime au criminel. Il mit la pièce à conviction dans sa poche. Après quoi il ouvrit la grille, fit sortir l'homme avec son embarras sur le dos, referma la grille et se sauva, se souciant peu d'être mêlé au surplus de l'aventure et surtout ne voulant pas être là quand l'assassin jetterait l'assassiné à la rivière. Vous comprenez à présent. Celui qui portait le cadavre, c'est Jean Valjean; celui qui avait la clef vous parle en ce moment; et le morceau de l'habit....

Thénardier acheva la phrase en tirant de sa poche et en tenant, à la hauteur de ses yeux, pincé entre ses deux pouces et ses deux index, un lambeau de drap noir déchiqueté, tout couvert de taches sombres.

Marius s'était levé, pâle, respirant à peine, l'œil fixé sur le morceau de drap noir, et, sans prononcer une parole, sans quitter ce haillon du regard, il reculait vers le mur et, de sa main droite étendue derrière lui, cherchait en tâtonnant sur la muraille une clef qui était à la serrure d'un placard près de la cheminée. Il trouva cette clef, ouvrit le placard, et y enfonça son bras sans y regarder, et sans que sa prunelle effarée se détachât du chiffon que Thénardier tenait déployé.

Cependant Thénardier continuait:

— Monsieur le baron, j'ai les plus fortes raisons de croire que le jeune homme assassiné était un opulent étranger attiré par Jean Valjean dans un piège et porteur d'une somme énorme.

— Le jeune homme c'était moi, et voici l'habit! cria Marius, et il jeta sur le parquet un vieil habit noir tout sanglant.

Puis, arrachant le morceau des mains de Thénardier, il s'accroupit sur l'habit, et rapprocha du pan déchiqueté le morceau déchiré. La déchirure s'adaptait exactement, et le lambeau complétait l'habit.

Thénardier était pétrifié. Il pensa ceci: Je suis épaté.

Marius se redressa frémissant, désespéré, rayonnant.

Il fouilla dans sa poche, et marcha, furieux, vers Thénardier, lui présentant et lui appuyant presque sur le visage son poing rempli de billets de cinq cents francs et de mille francs.

— Vous êtes un infâme! vous êtes un menteur, un calomniateur, un scélérat. Vous veniez accuser cet homme, vous l'avez justifié; vous vouliez le perdre, vous n'avez réussi qu'à le glorifier. Et c'est vous qui êtes un voleur! Et c'est vous qui êtes un assassin! Je vous ai vu, Thénardier Jondrette, dans ce bouge du boulevard de l'Hôpital. J'en sais assez sur vous pour vous envoyer au bagne, et plus loin même, si je voulais. Tenez, voilà mille francs, sacripant que vous êtes!

Et il jeta un billet de mille francs à Thénardier.

— Ah! Jondrette Thénardier, vil coquin! que ceci vous serve de leçon, brocanteur de secrets, marchand de mystères, fouilleur de ténèbres, misérable! Prenez ces cinq cents francs, et sortez d'ici! Waterloo vous protège.

— Waterloo! grommela Thénardier, en empochant les cinq cents francs avec les mille francs.

— Oui, assassin! vous y avez sauvé la vie à un colonel....

— À un général, dit Thénardier, en relevant la tête.

— À un colonel! reprit Marius avec emportement. Je ne donnerais pas un liard pour un général. Et vous veniez ici faire des infamies! Je vous dis que vous avez commis tous les crimes. Partez! disparaissez! Soyez heureux seulement, c’est tout ce que je désire. Ah! monstre! Voilà encore trois mille francs. Prenez-les. Vous partirez dès demain, pour l’Amérique, avec votre fille; car votre femme est morte, abominable menteur! Je veillerai à votre départ, bandit, et je vous compterai à ce moment-là vingt mille francs. Allez vous faire pendre ailleurs!

— Monsieur le baron, répondit Thénardier en saluant jusqu’à terre, reconnaissance éternelle.

Et Thénardier sortit, n’y concevant rien, stupéfait et ravi de ce doux écrasement sous des sacs d’or et de cette foudre éclatant sur sa tête en billets de banque.

Foudroyé, il l’était, mais content aussi; et il eût été très fâché d’avoir un paratonnerre contre cette foudre-là.

Finissons-en tout de suite avec cet homme. Deux jours après les événements que nous racontons en ce moment, il partit, par les soins de Marius, pour l’Amérique, sous un faux nom, avec sa fille Azelma, muni d’une traite de vingt mille francs sur New York. La misère morale de Thénardier, ce bourgeois manqué, était irrémédiable; il fut en Amérique ce qu’il était en Europe. Le contact d’un méchant homme suffit quelquefois pour pourrir une bonne action et pour en faire sortir une chose mauvaise. Avec l’argent de Marius, Thénardier se fit négrier.

Dès que Thénardier fut dehors, Marius courut au jardin où Cosette se promenait encore.

— Cosette! Cosette! cria-t-il. Viens! viens vite. Partons. Basque, un fiacre! Cosette, viens. Ah! mon Dieu! C’est lui qui m’avait sauvé la vie! Ne perdons pas une minute! Mets ton châle.

Cosette le crut fou, et obéit.

Il ne respirait pas, il mettait la main sur son cœur pour en comprimer les battements. Il allait et venait à grands pas, il embrassait Cosette: — Ah! Cosette! je suis un malheureux! disait-il.

Marius était éperdu. Il commençait à entrevoir dans ce Jean Valjean on ne sait quelle haute et sombre figure. Une vertu inouïe lui apparaissait, suprême et douce, humble dans son immensité. Le forçat se transfigurait en Christ. Marius avait l’éblouissement de ce prodige. Il ne savait pas au juste ce qu’il voyait, mais c’était grand.

En un instant, un fiacre fut devant la porte. Marius y fit monter Cosette et s’y élança.

— Cocher, dit-il, rue de l’Homme-Armé, numéro 7. Le fiacre partit.

— Ah! quel bonheur! fit Cosette, rue de l’Homme-Armé. Je n’osais plus t’en parler. Nous allons voir monsieur Jean.

— Ton père, Cosette! ton père plus que jamais. Cosette, je devine. Tu m’as dit que tu n’avais jamais reçu la lettre que je t’avais envoyée par Gavroche. Elle sera tombée dans ses mains. Cosette, il est allé à la barricade, pour me sauver. Comme c’est son besoin d’être un ange, en passant, il en a sauvé d’autres; il a sauvé Javert. Il m’a tiré de ce gouffre pour me donner à toi. Il m’a porté sur son dos dans cet effroyable égout. Ah! je suis un monstrueux ingrat. Cosette, après avoir été ta providence, il a été la mienne. Figure-toi qu’il y avait une fondrière épouvantable, à s’y noyer cent fois, à se noyer dans la boue, Cosette! il me l’a fait traverser. J’étais évanoui je ne voyais rien, je n’entendais rien, je ne pouvais rien savoir de ma propre aventure. Nous allons le ramener, le prendre avec nous, qu’il le veuille ou non, il ne nous quittera plus. Pourvu qu’il soit chez lui! Pourvu que nous le trouvions! Je passerai le reste de ma vie à le vénérer. Oui, ce doit être cela, vois-tu, Cosette? C’est à lui que Gavroche aura remis ma lettre. Tout s’explique. Tu comprends.

Cosette ne comprenait pas un mot.

— Tu as raison, lui dit-elle.

Cependant le fiacre roulait.

Chapitre V

Nuit derrière laquelle il y a le jour

Au coup qu'il entendit frapper à sa porte, Jean Valjean se retourna.

— Entrez, dit-il faiblement.

La porte s'ouvrit. Cosette et Marius parurent.

Cosette se précipita dans la chambre.

Marius resta sur le seuil, debout, appuyé contre le montant de la porte.

— Cosette! dit Jean Valjean, et il se dressa sur sa chaise, les bras ouverts et tremblants, hagard, livide, sinistre, une joie immense dans les yeux.

Cosette, suffoquée d'émotion, tomba sur la poitrine de Jean Valjean.

— Père! dit-elle.

Jean Valjean, bouleversé, bégayait:

— Cosette! elle! vous, madame! c'est toi! Ah mon Dieu!

Et, serré dans les bras de Cosette, il s'écria:

— C'est toi! tu es là! Tu me pardonnes donc!

Marius, baissant les paupières pour empêcher ses larmes de couler, fit un pas et murmura entre ses lèvres contractées convulsivement pour arrêter les sanglots:

— Mon père!

— Et vous aussi, vous me pardonnez! dit Jean Valjean.

Marius ne put trouver une parole, et Jean Valjean ajouta: — Merci.

Cosette arracha son châle et jeta son chapeau sur le lit.

— Cela me gêne, dit-elle.

Et, s'asseyant sur les genoux du vieillard, elle écarta ses cheveux blancs d'un mouvement adorable, et lui baisa le front.

Jean Valjean se laissait faire, égaré.

Cosette, qui ne comprenait que très confusément, redoublait ses caresses, comme si elle voulait payer la dette de Marius.

Jean Valjean balbutiait:

— Comme on est bête! Je croyais que je ne la verrais plus. Figurez-vous, monsieur Pontmercy, qu'au moment où vous êtes entré, je me disais: C'est fini. Voilà sa petite robe, je suis un misérable homme, je ne verrai plus Cosette, je disais cela au moment même où vous montiez l'escalier. Étais-je idiot! Voilà comme on est idiot! Mais on compte sans le bon Dieu. Le bon Dieu dit: Tu t’imagines qu’on va t’abandonner, bêta! Non, non, ça ne se passera pas comme ça. Allons, il y a là un pauvre bonhomme qui a besoin d’un ange. Et l’ange vient; et l’on revoit sa Cosette, et l’on revoit sa petite Cosette! Ah! j’étais bien malheureux!

Il fut un moment sans pouvoir parler, puis il poursuivit:

— J’avais vraiment besoin de voir Cosette une petite fois de temps en temps. Un cœur, cela veut un os à ronger. Cependant je sentais bien que j’étais de trop. Je me donnais des raisons: Ils n’ont pas besoin de toi, reste dans ton coin, on n’a pas le droit de s’éterniser. Ah! Dieu béni, je la revois! Sais-tu, Cosette, que ton mari est très beau? Ah! tu as un joli col brodé, à la bonne heure. J’aime ce dessin-là. C’est ton mari qui l’a choisi, n’est-ce pas? Et puis, il te faudra des cachemires. Monsieur Pontmercy, laissez-moi la tutoyer. Ce n’est pas pour longtemps.

Et Cosette reprenait:

— Quelle méchanceté de nous avoir laissés comme cela! Où êtes-vous donc allé? pourquoi avez-vous été si longtemps? Autrefois vos voyages ne duraient pas plus de trois ou quatre jours. J’ai envoyé Nicolette, on répondait toujours: Il est absent. Depuis quand êtes-vous revenu? Pourquoi ne pas nous l’avoir fait savoir? Savez-vous que vous êtes très changé? Ah! le vilain père! il a été malade, et nous ne l’avons pas su! Tiens, Marius, tâte sa main comme elle est froide!

— Ainsi vous voilà! Monsieur Pontmercy, vous me pardonnez! répéta Jean Valjean.

À ce mot, que Jean Valjean venait de redire, tout ce qui se gonflait dans le cœur de Marius trouva une issue, il éclata:

— Cosette, entends-tu? il en est là! il me demande pardon. Et sais-tu ce qu’il m’a fait, Cosette? Il m’a sauvé la vie. Il a fait plus. Il t’a donnée à moi. Et après m’avoir sauvé et après t’avoir donnée à moi, Cosette, qu’a-t-il fait de lui-même? il s’est sacrifié. Voilà l’homme. Et, à moi l’ingrat, à moi l’oublieux, à moi l’impitoyable, à moi le coupable, il me dit: Merci! Cosette, toute ma vie passée aux pieds de cet homme, ce sera trop peu. Cette barricade, cet égout, cette fournaise, ce cloaque, il a tout traversé pour moi, pour toi, Cosette! Il m’a emporté à travers toutes les morts qu’il écartait de moi et qu’il acceptait pour lui. Tous les courages, toutes les vertus, tous les héroïsmes, toutes les saintetés, il les a! Cosette, cet homme-là, c’est l’ange!

— Chut! chut! dit tout bas Jean Valjean. Pourquoi dire tout cela?

— Mais vous! s’écria Marius avec une colère où il y avait de la vénération, pourquoi ne l’avez-vous pas dit? C’est votre faute aussi. Vous sauvez la vie aux gens, et vous le leur cachez! Vous faites plus, sous prétexte de vous démasquer, vous vous calomniez. C’est affreux.

— J’ai dit la vérité, répondit Jean Valjean.

— Non, reprit Marius, la vérité, c’est toute la vérité; et vous ne l’avez pas dite. Vous étiez monsieur Madeleine, pourquoi ne pas l’avoir dit? Vous aviez sauvé Javert, pourquoi ne pas l’avoir dit? Je vous devais la vie, pourquoi ne pas l’avoir dit?

— Parce que je pensais comme vous. Je trouvais que vous aviez raison. Il fallait que je m’en allasse. Si vous aviez su cette affaire de l’égout, vous m’auriez fait rester près de vous. Je devais donc me taire. Si j’avais parlé, cela aurait tout gêné.

— Gêné quoi! gêné qui! repartit Marius. Est-ce que vous croyez que vous allez rester ici? Nous vous emmenons. Ah! mon Dieu! quand je pense que c’est par hasard que j’ai appris tout cela! Nous vous emmenons. Vous faites partie de nous-mêmes. Vous êtes son père et le mien. Vous ne passerez pas dans cette affreuse maison un jour de plus. Ne vous figurez pas que vous serez demain ici.

— Demain, dit Jean Valjean, je ne serai pas ici, mais je ne serai pas chez vous.

— Que voulez-vous dire? répliqua Marius. Ah çà, nous ne permettons plus de voyage. Vous ne nous quitterez plus. Vous nous appartenez. Nous ne vous lâchons pas.

— Cette fois-ci, c’est pour de bon, ajouta Cosette. Nous avons une voiture en bas. Je vous enlève. S’il le faut, j’emploierai la force.

Et, riant, elle fit le geste de soulever le vieillard dans ses bras.

— Il y a toujours votre chambre dans notre maison, poursuivit-elle. Si vous saviez comme le jardin est joli dans ce moment-ci! Les azalées y viennent très bien. Les allées sont sablées avec du sable de rivière; il y a de petits coquillages violets. Vous mangerez de mes fraises. C’est moi qui les arrose. Et plus de madame, et plus de monsieur Jean, nous sommes en république, tout le monde se dit tu, n’est-ce pas, Marius? Le programme est changé. Si vous saviez, père, j’ai eu un chagrin, il y avait un rouge-gorge qui avait fait son nid dans un trou du mur, un horrible chat me l’a mangé. Mon pauvre joli petit rouge-gorge qui mettait sa tête à sa fenêtre et qui me regardait! J’en ai pleuré. J’aurais tué le chat! Mais maintenant personne ne pleure plus. Tout le monde rit, tout le monde est heureux. Vous allez venir avec nous. Comme le grand-père va être content! Vous aurez votre carré dans le jardin, vous le cultiverez, et nous verrons si vos fraises sont aussi belles que les miennes. Et puis, je ferai tout ce que vous voudrez, et puis, vous m'obéirez bien.

Jean Valjean l'écoutait sans l'entendre. Il entendait la musique de sa voix plutôt que le sens de ses paroles; une de ces grosses larmes, qui sont les sombres perles de l'âme, germait lentement dans son œil. Il murmura:

— La preuve que Dieu est bon, c'est que la voilà.

— Mon père! dit Cosette.

Jean Valjean continua:

— C'est bien vrai que ce serait charmant de vivre ensemble. Ils ont des oiseaux plein leurs arbres. Je me promènerais avec Cosette. Être des gens qui vivent, qui se disent bonjour, qui s'appellent dans le jardin, c'est doux. On se voit dès le matin. Nous cultiverions chacun un petit coin. Elle me ferait manger ses fraises, je lui ferais cueillir mes roses. Ce serait charmant. Seulement....

Il s'interrompit, et dit doucement:

— C'est dommage.

La larme ne tomba pas, elle rentra, et Jean Valjean la remplaça par un sourire.

Cosette prit les deux mains du vieillard dans les siennes.

— Mon Dieu! dit-elle, vos mains sont encore plus froides. Est-ce que vous êtes malade? Est-ce que vous souffrez?

— Moi? non, répondit Jean Valjean, je suis très bien. Seulement....

Il s'arrêta.

— Seulement quoi?

— Je vais mourir tout à l'heure.

Cosette et Marius frissonnèrent.

— Mourir! s'écria Marius.

— Oui, mais ce n'est rien, dit Jean Valjean.

Il respira, sourit, et reprit:

— Cosette, tu me parlais, continue, parle encore, ton petit rouge-gorge est donc mort, parle, que j'entende ta voix!

Marius pétrifié regardait le vieillard.

Cosette poussa un cri déchirant.

— Père! mon père! vous vivrez. Vous allez vivre. Je veux que vous viviez, entendez-vous!

Jean Valjean leva la tête vers elle avec adoration.

— Oh oui, défends-moi de mourir. Qui sait? j'obéirai peut-être. J'étais en train de mourir quand vous êtes arrivés. Cela m'a arrêté, il m'a semblé que je renaissais.

— Vous êtes plein de force et de vie, s'écria Marius. Est-ce que vous vous imaginez qu'on meurt comme cela? Vous avez eu du chagrin, vous n'en aurez plus. C'est moi qui vous demande pardon, et à genoux encore! Vous allez vivre, et vivre avec nous, et vivre longtemps. Nous vous reprenons. Nous sommes deux ici qui n'aurons désormais qu'une pensée, votre bonheur!

— Vous voyez bien, reprit Cosette tout en larmes, que Marius dit que vous ne mourrez pas.

Jean Valjean continuait de sourire.

— Quand vous me reprendriez, monsieur Pontmercy, cela ferait-il que je ne sois pas ce que je suis? Non, Dieu a pensé comme vous et moi, et il ne change pas d'avis; il est utile que je m'en aille. La mort est un bon arrangement. Dieu sait mieux que nous ce qu'il nous faut. Que vous soyez heureux, que monsieur Pontmercy ait Cosette, que la jeunesse épouse le matin, qu'il y ait autour de vous, mes enfants, des lilas et des rossignols, que votre vie soit une belle pelouse avec du soleil, que tous les enchantements du ciel vous remplissent l'âme, et maintenant, moi qui ne suis bon à rien, que je meure, il est sûr que tout cela est bien. Voyez-vous, soyons raisonnables, il n'y a plus rien de possible maintenant, je sens tout à fait que c'est fini. Il y a une heure, j'ai eu un évanouissement. Et puis, cette nuit, j'ai bu tout ce pot d'eau qui est là. Comme ton mari est bon, Cosette! tu es bien mieux qu'avec moi.

Un bruit se fit à la porte. C'était le médecin qui entrait.

— Bonjour et adieu, docteur, dit Jean Valjean. Voici mes pauvres enfants.

Marius s'approcha du médecin. Il lui adressa ce seul mot: Monsieur?... mais dans la manière de le prononcer, il y avait une question complète.

Le médecin répondit à la question par un coup d'œil expressif.

— Parce que les choses déplaisent, dit Jean Valjean, ce n'est pas une raison pour être injuste envers Dieu.

Il y eut un silence. Toutes les poitrines étaient oppressées.

Jean Valjean se tourna vers Cosette. Il se mit à la contempler comme s’il voulait en prendre pour l’éternité. À la profondeur d’ombre où il était déjà descendu, l’extase lui était encore possible en regardant Cosette. La réverbération de ce doux visage illuminait sa face pâle. Le sépulcre peut avoir son éblouissement.

Le médecin lui tâta le pouls.

— Ah! c’est vous qu’il lui fallait! murmura-t-il en regardant Cosette et Marius.

Et, se penchant à l’oreille de Marius, il ajouta très bas:

— Trop tard.

Jean Valjean, presque sans cesser de regarder Cosette, considéra Marius et le médecin avec sérénité. On entendit sortir de sa bouche cette parole à peine articulée:

— Ce n’est rien de mourir; c’est affreux de ne pas vivre.

Tout à coup il se leva. Ces retours de force sont quelquefois un signe même de l’agonie. Il marcha d’un pas ferme à la muraille, écarta Marius et le médecin qui voulaient l’aider, détacha du mur le petit crucifix de cuivre qui y était suspendu, revint s’asseoir avec toute la liberté de mouvement de la pleine santé, et dit d’une voix haute en posant le crucifix sur la table:

— Voilà le grand martyr.

Puis sa poitrine s’affaissa, sa tête eut une vacillation, comme si l’ivresse de la tombe le prenait, et ses deux mains, posées sur ses genoux, se mirent à creuser de l’ongle l’étoffe de son pantalon.

Cosette lui soutenait les épaules, et sanglotait, et tâchait de lui parler sans pouvoir y parvenir. On distinguait, parmi les mots mêlés à cette salive lugubre qui accompagne les larmes, des paroles comme celles-ci: — Père! ne nous quittez pas. Est-il possible que nous ne vous retrouvions que pour vous perdre?

On pourrait dire que l’agonie serpente. Elle va, vient, s’avance vers le sépulcre, et se retourne vers la vie. Il y a du tâtonnement dans l’action de mourir.

Jean Valjean, après cette demi-syncope, se raffermit, secoua son front comme pour en faire tomber les ténèbres, et redevint presque pleinement lucide. Il prit un pan de la manche de Cosette et le baisa.

— Il revient! docteur, il revient! cria Marius.

— Vous êtes bons tous les deux, dit Jean Valjean. Je vais vous dire ce qui m’a fait de la peine. Ce qui m’a fait de la peine, monsieur Pontmercy, c’est que vous n’ayez pas voulu toucher à l’argent. Cet argent-là est bien à votre femme. Je vais vous expliquer, mes enfants, c’est même pour cela que je suis content de vous voir. Le jais noir vient d’Angleterre, le jais blanc vient de Norvège. Tout ceci est dans le papier que voilà, que vous lirez. Pour les bracelets, j’ai inventé de remplacer les coulants en tôle soudée par des coulants en tôle rapprochée. C’est plus joli, meilleur, et moins cher. Vous comprenez tout l’argent qu’on peut gagner. La fortune de Cosette est donc bien à elle. Je vous donne ces détails-là pour que vous ayez l’esprit en repos.

La portière était montée et regardait par la porte entre-bâillée. Le médecin la congédia, mais il ne put empêcher qu’avant de disparaître cette bonne femme zélée ne criât au mourant:

— Voulez-vous un prêtre?

— J’en ai un, répondit Jean Valjean.

Et, du doigt, il sembla désigner un point au-dessus de sa tête où l’on eût dit qu’il voyait quelqu’un.

Il est probable que l’évêque en effet assistait à cette agonie.

Cosette, doucement, lui glissa un oreiller sous les reins.

Jean Valjean reprit:

— Monsieur Pontmercy, n’ayez pas de crainte, je vous en conjure. Les six cent mille francs sont bien à Cosette. J’aurais donc perdu ma vie si vous n’en jouissiez pas! Nous étions parvenus à faire très bien cette verroterie-là. Nous rivalisions avec ce qu’on appelle les bijoux de Berlin. Par exemple, on ne peut pas égaler le verre noir d’Allemagne. Une grosse, qui contient douze cents grains très bien taillés, ne coûte que trois francs.

Quand un être qui nous est cher va mourir, on le regarde avec un regard qui se cramponne à lui et qui voudrait le retenir. Tous deux, muets d’angoisse, ne sachant que dire à la mort, désespérés et tremblants, étaient debout devant lui, Cosette donnant la main à Marius.

D’instant en instant, Jean Valjean déclinait. Il baissait; il se rapprochait de l’horizon sombre. Son souffle était devenu intermittent; un peu de râle l’entrecoupait. Il avait de la peine à déplacer son avant-bras, ses pieds avaient perdu tout mouvement, et en même temps que la misère des membres et l’accablement du corps croissait, toute la majesté de l’âme montait et se déployait sur son front. La lumière du monde inconnu était déjà visible dans sa prunelle.

Sa figure blêmissait et en même temps souriait. La vie n’était plus là, il y avait autre chose. Son haleine tombait, son regard grandissait. C’était un cadavre auquel on sentait des ailes.

Il fit signe à Cosette d’approcher, puis à Marius; c’était évidemment la dernière minute de la dernière heure, et il se mit à leur parler d’une voix si faible quelle semblait venir de loin, et qu’on eût dit qu’il y avait dès à présent une muraille entre eux et lui.

— Approche, approchez tous deux. Je vous aime bien. Oh! c’est bon de mourir comme cela! Toi aussi, tu m’aimes, ma Cosette. Je savais bien que tu avais toujours de l’amitié pour ton vieux bonhomme. Comme tu es gentille de m’avoir mis ce coussin sous les reins! Tu me pleureras un peu, n’est-ce pas? Pas trop. Je ne veux pas que tu aies de vrais chagrins. Il faudra vous amuser beaucoup, mes enfants. J’ai oublié de vous dire que sur les boucles sans ardillons on gagnait encore plus que sur tout le reste. La grosse, les douze douzaines, revenait à dix francs, et se vendait soixante. C’était vraiment un bon commerce. Il ne faut donc pas s’étonner des six cent mille francs, monsieur Pontmercy. C’est de l’argent honnête. Vous pouvez être riches tranquillement. Il faudra avoir une voiture, de temps en temps une loge aux théâtres, de belles toilettes de bal, ma Cosette, et puis donner de bons dîners à vos amis, être très heureux. J’écrivais tout à l’heure à Cosette. Elle trouvera ma lettre. C’est à elle que je lègue les deux chandeliers qui sont sur la cheminée. Ils sont en argent; mais pour moi ils sont en or, ils sont en diamant; ils changent les chandelles qu’on y met, en cierges. Je ne sais pas si celui qui me les a donnés est content de moi là-haut. J’ai fait ce que j’ai pu. Mes enfants, vous n’oublierez pas que je suis un pauvre, vous me ferez enterrer dans le premier coin de terre venu sous une pierre pour marquer l’endroit. C’est là ma volonté. Pas de nom sur la pierre. Si Cosette veut venir un peu quelquefois, cela me fera plaisir. Vous aussi, monsieur Pontmercy. Il faut que je vous avoue que je ne vous ai pas toujours aimé; je vous en demande pardon. Maintenant, elle et vous, vous n’êtes qu’un pour moi. Je vous suis très reconnaissant. Je sens que vous rendez Cosette heureuse. Si vous saviez, monsieur Pontmercy, ses belles joues roses, c’était ma joie; quand je la voyais un peu pâle, j’étais triste. Il y a dans la commode un billet de cinq cents francs. Je n’y ai pas touché. C’est pour les pauvres. Cosette, vois-tu ta petite robe, là, sur le lit? la reconnais-tu? Il n’y a pourtant que dix ans de cela. Comme le temps passe! Nous avons été bien heureux. C’est fini. Mes enfants, ne pleurez pas, je ne vais pas très loin. Je vous verrai de là. Vous n'aurez qu'à regarder quand il fera nuit, vous me verrez sourire. Cosette, te rappelles-tu Montfermeil? Tu étais dans le bois, tu avais bien peur; te rappelles-tu quand j'ai pris l'anse du seau d'eau? C'est la première fois que j'ai touché ta pauvre petite main. Elle était si froide! Ah! vous aviez les mains rouges dans ce temps-là, mademoiselle, vous les avez bien blanches maintenant. Et la grande poupée! te rappelles-tu? Tu la nommais Catherine. Tu regrettais de ne pas l'avoir emmenée au couvent! Comme tu m'as fait rire des fois, mon doux ange! Quand il avait plu, tu embarquais sur les ruisseaux des brins de paille, et tu les regardais aller. Un jour, je t'ai donné une raquette en osier, et un volant avec des plumes jaunes, bleues, vertes. Tu l'as oublié, toi. Tu étais si espiègle toute petite! Tu jouais. Tu te mettais des cerises aux oreilles. Ce sont là des choses du passé. Les forêts où l'on a passé avec son enfant, les arbres où l'on s'est promené, les couvents où l'on s'est caché, les jeux, les bons rires de l'enfance, c'est de l'ombre. Je m'étais imaginé que tout cela m'appartenait. Voilà où était ma bêtise. Ces Thénardier ont été méchants. Il faut leur pardonner. Cosette, voici le moment venu de te dire le nom de ta mère. Elle s'appelait Fantine. Retiens ce nom-là: — Fantine. Mets-toi à genoux toutes les fois que tu le prononceras. Elle a bien souffert. Elle t'a bien aimée. Elle a eu en malheur tout ce que tu as en bonheur. Ce sont les partages de Dieu. Il est là-haut, il nous voit tous, et il sait ce qu'il fait au milieu de ses grandes étoiles. Je vais donc m'en aller, mes enfants. Aimez-vous bien toujours. Il n'y a guère autre chose que cela dans le monde: s'aimer. Vous penserez quelquefois au pauvre vieux qui est mort ici. Ô ma Cosette! ce n'est pas ma faute, va, si je ne t'ai pas vue tous ces temps-ci, cela me fendait le cœur; j'allais jusqu'au coin de ta rue, je devais faire un drôle d'effet aux gens qui me voyaient passer, j'étais comme fou, une fois je suis sorti sans chapeau. Mes enfants, voici que je ne vois plus très clair, j'avais encore des choses à dire, mais c'est égal. Pensez un peu à moi. Vous êtes des êtres bénis. Je ne sais pas ce que j'ai, je vois de la lumière. Approchez encore. Je meurs heureux. Donnez-moi vos chères têtes bien-aimées, que je mette mes mains dessus.

Cosette et Marius tombèrent à genoux, éperdus, étouffés de larmes, chacun sur une des mains de Jean Valjean. Ces mains augustes ne remuaient plus.

Il était renversé en arrière, la lueur des deux chandeliers l'éclairait; sa face blanche regardait le ciel, il laissait Cosette et Marius couvrir ses mains de baisers; il était mort.

La nuit était sans étoiles et profondément obscure. Sans doute, dans l’ombre, quelque ange immense était debout, les ailes déployées, attendant l’âme.

Chapitre VI

L’herbe cache et la pluie efface

Il y a, au cimetière du Père-Lachaise, aux environs de la fosse commune, loin du quartier élégant de cette ville des sépulcres, loin de tous ces tombeaux de fantaisie qui étalent en présence de l’éternité les hideuses modes de la mort, dans un angle désert, le long d’un vieux mur, sous un grand if auquel grimpent les liserons, parmi les chiendents et les mousses, une pierre. Cette pierre n’est pas plus exempte que les autres des lèpres du temps, de la moisissure, du lichen, et des fientes d’oiseaux. L’eau la verdit, l’air la noircit. Elle n’est voisine d’aucun sentier, et l’on n’aime pas aller de ce côté-là, parce que l’herbe est haute et qu’on a tout de suite les pieds mouillés. Quand il y a un peu de soleil, les lézards y viennent. Il y a, tout autour, un frémissement de folles avoines. Au printemps, les fauvettes chantent dans l’arbre.

Cette pierre est toute nue. On n’a songé en la taillant qu’au nécessaire de la tombe, et l’on n’a pris d’autre soin que de faire cette pierre assez longue et assez étroite pour couvrir un homme.

On n’y lit aucun nom.

Seulement, voilà de cela bien des années déjà, une main y a écrit au crayon ces quatre vers qui sont devenus peu à peu illisibles sous la pluie et la poussière, et qui probablement sont aujourd’hui effacés:

Il dort. Quoique le sort fût pour lui bien étrange,
Il vivait. Il mourut quand il n’eut plus son ange,
La chose simplement d’elle-même arriva,
Comme la nuit se fait lorsque le jour s’en va.

TOILERS OF THE SEA

Translated by W. Moy Thomas

This novel was first published in Brussels in 1866, as Hugo was in exile from France at the time. An English translation quickly appeared in New York later that year, under the title The Toilers of the Sea, which is the translation featured in this collection. W. Moy Thomas was a renowned translator, as well as an acquaintance of Charles Dickens and a contributor to Household Words.

The novel is dedicated to the island of Guernsey, where Hugo spent 15 years in exile, and concerns a local man named Gilliatt, a social outcast who falls in love with Deruchette, the niece of a local shipowner. When Lethierry's ship is wrecked on the Roches Douvres, a perilous reef, Deruchette promises to marry whomever can salvage the ship's steam engine.

INTRODUCTION

Victor Hugo was thinking much of Æschylus and his Prometheus at the time he conceived the figure of Gilliatt, heroic warrer with the elements. But it is to a creature of the Gothic mind like Byron’s Manfred, and not to any earlier, or classic, type of the eternal rebellion against fate or time or circumstance, that Hugo’s readers will be tempted to turn for the fellow to his Guernsey hero:

“My joy was in the wilderness — to breathe
The difficult air of the iced mountain’s top,
Where the birds dare not build — nor insects wing
Flit o’er the herbless granite; or to plunge
Into the torrent, and to roll along
On the swift whirl of the new-breaking wave
Of river-stream, or ocean, in their flow.”

The island of Guernsey was Gilliatt’s Alp and sea-solitude, where he, too, had his avalanches waiting to fall “like foam from the round ocean of old Hell.” And as Byron figured his own revolt against the bonds in Manfred, so Hugo, being in exile, put himself with lyrical and rhetorical impetuosity into the island marcou and child of destiny that he concocted with “a little sand and a little blood and a deal of fantasy” in the years 1864 and 1865. There is a familiar glimpse of the Hugo household to be had in the first winter of its transference to the Channel Islands, years before Les Travailleurs was written, which betrays the mood from which finally sprang this concrete fable of the man-at-odds. It was the end of November 1852, and a father and his younger son sat in a room of a house of Marine Terrace, Jersey — a plain, unpicturesque house; square, hard in outline, and newly whitewashed, — Methodism, said Hugo, in stones and mortar. Outside its windows the rain fell and the wind blew: the house was like a thing benumbed by the angry noise. The two inmates sat plunged in thought, possibly thinking of the sad significance of these beginnings of winter and of exile which had arrived together. At length the son (François Hugo) asked the father what he meant to do during their exile, which he had already predicted would be long? The father said, “I shall look at the sea.”

Then came a silence, broken by a question as to what the son would do? To which he replied that he would translate Shakespeare.

Victor Hugo’s own study or eulogy of Shakespeare was written as a preamble to his son’s translation of the plays. It is not too much to connect the new and ample creative work that followed, including his great novel of Revolution, Les Misérables, and his poems in La Légende des Siècles (first series) with the double artistic stimulus gained from this conditioned solitude and his closer acquaintance with the dramatic mind of that “giant of the great art of the ages,” as he termed our English poet in the book already quoted from.

The Shakespeare book is dated from Hauteville House, 1864. Les Travailleurs from the same quarters, March 1866. The Hugos had perforce suddenly left Jersey for Guernsey in 1855, owing to the gibes and flouts of an unlucky revolutionary Jersey journal, L’Homme, at the two governments: Victor Hugo being already a marked man for his pains. The Guernsey house he inhabited for so many years had a spacious study in its upper story, with a large window, free to the sun and to the sea. Here he wrote, tirelessly, tremendously, as his custom was: beginning betimes in the early morning, and writing on till the time for his déjeuner: standing at a tall desk to write in his sea-tower. You must turn to certain of his poems and to the pages of Les Misérables and Les Travailleurs for the mental colours and phantasmagoria of those days and years.

It would be easy to point out, resuming an immense amount of criticism of his romances and of this story in particular, the defects on the side of dramatic and true life-likeness to be found in Hugo’s prose-narrative. But it is more helpful in turning to a story-book to know what has been said unreservedly in its favour. Hugo’s greatest appreciator was superlative in his praise, and it need hardly be explained that it was Swinburne who brought his tribute to the romance of Gilliatt also, after positing the parallel claims of Hugo’s five chief romances. Of the five, they were not, he said, to be comparatively classified in order of merit. “But I may perhaps be permitted to say without fear of deserved rebuke that none is to me personally a treasure of greater price than Les Travailleurs de la Mer. The splendid energy of the book makes the superhuman energy of the hero seem not only possible but natural, and his triumph over all physical impossibilities not only natural but inevitable.” Swinburne’s love for the Channel Islands, and his poems inspired by them, were mainly due as we know to Hugo’s life and his books lived and written there.

PREFACE

Religion, Society, and Nature! these are the three struggles of man. They constitute at the same time his three needs. He has need of a faith; hence the temple. He must create; hence the city. He must live; hence the plough and the ship. But these three solutions comprise three perpetual conflicts. The mysterious difficulty of life results from all three. Man strives with obstacles under the form of superstition, under the form of prejudice, and under the form of the elements. A triple ἀναγκη weighs upon us. There is the fatality of dogmas, the oppression of human laws, the inexorability of nature. In Notre Dame de Paris the author denounced the first; in the Misérables he exemplified the second; in this book he indicates the third. With these three fatalities mingles that inward fatality — the supreme ἀναγκη, the human heart.

THE HISTORY OF A BAD REPUTATION

I

A WORD WRITTEN ON A WHITE PAGE

Christmas Day in the year 182- was somewhat remarkable in the island of Guernsey. Snow fell on that day. In the Channel Islands a frosty winter is uncommon, and a fall of snow is an event.

On that Christmas morning, the road which skirts the seashore from St. Peter’s Port to the Vale was clothed in white. From midnight till the break of day the snow had been falling. Towards nine o’clock, a little after the rising of the wintry sun, as it was too early yet for the Church of England folks to go to St. Sampson’s, or for the Wesleyans to repair to Eldad Chapel, the road was almost deserted. Throughout that portion of the highway which separates the first from the second tower, only three foot-passengers could be seen. These were a child, a man, and a woman. Walking at a distance from each other, these wayfarers had no visible connection. The child, a boy of about eight years old, had stopped, and was looking curiously at the wintry scene. The man walked behind the woman, at a distance of about a hundred paces. Like her he was coming from the direction of the church of St. Sampson. The appearance of the man, who was still young, was something between that of a workman and a sailor. He wore his working-day clothes — a kind of Guernsey shirt of coarse brown stuff, and trousers partly concealed by tarpaulin leggings — a costume which seemed to indicate that, notwithstanding the holy day, he was going to no place of worship. His heavy shoes of rough leather, with their soles covered with large nails, left upon the snow, as he walked, a print more like that of a prison lock than the foot of a man. The woman, on the contrary, was evidently dressed for church. She wore a large mantle of black silk, wadded, under which she had coquettishly adjusted a dress of Irish poplin, trimmed alternately with white and pink; but for her red stockings, she might have been taken for a Parisian. She walked on with a light and free step, so little suggestive of the burden of life that it might easily be seen that she was young. Her movements possessed that subtle grace which indicates the most delicate of all transitions — that soft intermingling, as it were, of two twilights — the passage from the condition of a child to that of womanhood. The man seemed to take no heed of her.

Suddenly, near a group of oaks at the corner of a field, and at the spot called the Basses Maisons, she turned, and the movement seemed to attract the attention of the man. She stopped, seemed to reflect a moment, then stooped, and the man fancied that he could discern that she was tracing with her finger some letters in the snow. Then she rose again, went on her way at a quicker pace, turned once more, this time smiling, and disappeared to the left of the roadway, by the footpath under the hedges which leads to the Ivy Castle. When she had turned for the second time, the man had recognised her as Déruchette, a charming girl of that neighbourhood.

The man felt no need of quickening his pace; and some minutes later he found himself near the group of oaks. Already he had ceased to think of the vanished Déruchette; and if, at that moment, a porpoise had appeared above the water, or a robin had caught his eye in the hedges, it is probable that he would have passed on his way. But it happened that his eyes were fixed upon the ground; his gaze fell mechanically upon the spot where the girl had stopped. Two little footprints were there plainly visible; and beside them he read this word, evidently written by her in the snow —

“GILLIATT.”

It was his own name.

He lingered for awhile motionless, looking at the letters, the little footprints, and the snow; and then walked on, evidently in a thoughtful mood.

II

THE BÛ DE LA RUE

Gilliatt lived in the parish of St. Sampson. He was not liked by his neighbours; and there were reasons for that fact.

To begin with, he lived in a queer kind of “haunted” dwelling. In the islands of Jersey and Guernsey, sometimes in the country, but often in streets with many inhabitants, you will come upon a house the entrance to which is completely barricaded. Holly bushes obstruct the doorway, hideous boards, with nails, conceal the windows below; while the casements of the upper stories are neither closed nor open: for all the window-frames are barred, but the glass is broken. If there is a little yard, grass grows between its stones; and the parapet of its wall is crumbling away. If there is a garden, it is choked with nettles, brambles, and hemlock, and strange insects abound in it. The chimneys are cracked, the roof is falling in; so much as can be seen from without of the rooms presents a dismantled appearance. The woodwork is rotten; the stone mildewed. The paper of the walls has dropped away and hangs loose, until it presents a history of the bygone fashions of paper-hangings — the scrawling patterns of the time of the Empire, the crescent-shaped draperies of the Directory, the balustrades and pillars of the days of Louis XVI. The thick draperies of cobwebs, filled with flies, indicate the quiet reign long enjoyed by innumerable spiders. Sometimes a broken jug may be noticed on a shelf. Such houses are considered to be haunted. Satan is popularly believed to visit them by night. Houses are like the human beings who inhabit them. They become to their former selves what the corpse is to the living body. A superstitious belief among the people is sufficient to reduce them to this state of death. Then their aspect is terrible. These ghostly houses are common in the Channel Islands.

The rural and maritime populations are easily moved with notions of the active agency of the powers of evil. Among the Channel Isles, and on the neighbouring coast of France, the ideas of the people on this subject are deeply rooted. In their view, Beelzebub has his ministers in all parts of the earth. It is certain that Belphegor is the ambassador from the infernal regions in France, Hutgin in Italy, Belial in Turkey, Thamuz in Spain, Martinet in Switzerland, and Mammon in England. Satan is an Emperor just like any other: a sort of Satan Cæsar. His establishment is well organised. Dagon is grand almoner, Succor Benoth chief of the Eunuchs; Asmodeus, banker at the gaming-table; Kobal, manager of the theatre, and Verdelet, grand-master of the ceremonies. Nybbas is the court-fool; Wierus, a savant, a good strygologue, and a man of much learning in demonology, calls Nybbas the great parodist.

The Norman fishermen, who frequent the Channel, have many precautions to take at sea, by reason of the illusions with which Satan environs them. It has long been an article of popular faith, that Saint Maclou inhabited the great square rock called Ortach, in the sea between Aurigny and the Casquets; and many old sailors used to declare that they had often seen him there, seated and reading in a book. Accordingly the sailors, as they passed, were in the habit of kneeling many times before the Ortach rock, until the day when the fable was destroyed, and the truth took its place. For it has been discovered, and is now well established, that the lonely inhabitant of the rock is not a saint, but a devil. This evil spirit, whose name is Jochmus, had the impudence to pass himself off, for many centuries, as Saint Maclou. Even the Church herself is not proof against snares of this kind. The demons Raguhel, Oribel, and Tobiel, were regarded as saints until the year 745; when Pope Zachary, having at length exposed them, turned them out of saintly company. This sort of weeding of the saintly calendar is certainly very useful; but it can only be practised by very accomplished judges of devils and their ways.

The old inhabitants of these parts relate — though all this refers to bygone times — that the Catholic population of the Norman Archipelago was once, though quite involuntarily, even in more intimate correspondence with the powers of darkness than the Huguenots themselves. How this happened, however, we do not pretend to say; but it is certain that the people suffered considerable annoyance from this cause. It appears that Satan had taken a fancy to the Catholics, and sought their company a good deal; a circumstance which has given rise to the belief that the devil is more Catholic than Protestant. One of his most insufferable familiarities consisted in paying nocturnal visits to married Catholics in bed, just at the moment when the husband had fallen fast asleep, and the wife had begun to doze; a fruitful source of domestic trouble. Patouillet was of opinion that a faithful biography of Voltaire ought not to be without some allusion to this practice of the evil one. The truth of all this is perfectly well known, and described in the forms of excommunication in the rubric de erroribus nocturnis et de semine diabolorum. The practice was raging particularly at St. Helier's towards the end of the last century, probably as a punishment for the Revolution; for the evil consequences of revolutionary excesses are incalculable. However this may have been, it is certain that this possibility of a visit from the demon at night, when it is impossible to see distinctly, or even in slumber, caused much embarrassment among orthodox dames. The idea of giving to the world a Voltaire was by no means a pleasant one. One of these, in some anxiety, consulted her confessor on this extremely difficult subject, and the best mode for timely discovery of the cheat. The confessor replied, "In order to be sure that it is your husband by your side, and not a demon, place your hand upon his head. If you find horns, you may be sure there is something wrong." But this test was far from satisfactory to the worthy dame.

Gilliatt's house had been haunted, but it was no longer in that condition; it was for that reason, however, only regarded with more suspicion. No one learned in demonology can be unaware of the fact that, when a sorcerer has installed himself in a haunted dwelling, the devil considers the house sufficiently occupied, and is polite enough to abstain from visiting there, unless called in, like the doctor, on some special occasion.

This house was known by the name of the Bû de la Rue. It was situated at the extremity of a little promontory, rather of rock than of land, forming a small harbourage apart in the creek of Houmet Paradis. The water at this spot is deep. The house stood quite alone upon the point, almost separated from the island, and with just sufficient ground about it for a small garden, which was sometimes inundated by the high tides. Between the port of St. Sampson and the creek of Houmet Paradis, rises a steep hill, surmounted by the block of towers covered with ivy, and known as Vale Castle, or the Château de l'Archange; so that, at St. Sampson, the Bû de la Rue was shut out from sight.

Nothing is commoner than sorcerers in Guernsey. They exercise their profession in certain parishes, in profound indifference to the enlightenment of the nineteenth century. Some of their practices are downright criminal. They set gold boiling, they gather herbs at midnight, they cast sinister looks upon the people's cattle. When the people consult them they send for bottles containing "water of the sick," and they are heard to mutter mysteriously, “the water has a sad look.” In March, 1857, one of them discovered, in water of this kind, seven demons. They are universally feared. Another only lately bewitched a baker “as well as his oven.” Another had the diabolical wickedness to wafer and seal up envelopes “containing nothing inside.” Another went so far as to have on a shelf three bottles labelled “B.” These monstrous facts are well authenticated. Some of these sorcerers are obliging, and for two or three guineas will take on themselves the complaint from which you are suffering. Then they are seen to roll upon their beds, and to groan with pain; and while they are in these agonies the believer exclaims, “There! I am well again.” Others cure all kinds of diseases, by merely tying a handkerchief round the patient’s loins, a remedy so simple that it is astonishing that no one had yet thought of it. In the last century, the Cour Royale of Guernsey bound such folks upon a heap of fagots and burnt them alive. In these days it condemns them to eight weeks’ imprisonment; four weeks on bread and water, and the remainder of the term in solitary confinement. Amant alterna catenæ.

The last instance of burning sorcerers in Guernsey took place in 1747. The city authorities devoted one of its squares, the Carrefour du Bordage, to that ceremony. Between 1565 and 1700, eleven sorcerers thus suffered at this spot. As a rule the criminals made confession of their guilt. Torture was used to assist their confession. The Carrefour du Bordage has indeed rendered many other services to society and religion. It was here that heretics were brought to the stake. Under Queen Mary, among other Huguenots burnt here, were a mother and two daughters. The name of this mother was Perrotine Massy. One of the daughters was enceinte, and was delivered of a child even in the midst of the flames. As the old chronicle expresses it, “Son ventre éclata.” The new-born infant rolled out of the fiery furnace. A man named House took it in his arms; but Helier Gosselin the bailli, like a good Catholic as he was, sternly commanded the child to be cast again into the fire.

III

FOR YOUR WIFE: WHEN YOU MARRY

We must return to Gilliatt.

The country people told how, towards the close of the great Revolution, a woman, bringing with her a little child, came to live in Guernsey. She was English, or perhaps French. She had a name which the Guernsey pronunciation and the country folks' bad spelling had finally converted into "Gilliatt." She lived alone with the child, which, according to some, was a nephew; according to others, a son or grandson; according to others, again, a strange child whom she was protecting. She had some means; enough to struggle on in a poor way. She had purchased a small plot of ground at La Sergentée, and another at La Roque Crespel, near Rocquaine. The house of the Bû de la Rue was haunted at this period. For more than thirty years no one had inhabited it. It was falling into ruins. The garden, so often invaded by the sea, could produce nothing. Besides noises and lights seen there at night-time, the house had this mysterious peculiarity: any one who should leave there in the evening, upon the mantelpiece, a ball of worsted, a few needles, and a plate filled with soup, would assuredly find, in the morning, the soup consumed, the plate empty, and a pair of mittens ready knitted. The house, demon included, was offered for sale for a few pounds sterling. The stranger woman became the purchaser, evidently tempted by the devil, or by the advantageous bargain.

She did more than purchase the house; she took up her abode there with the child; and from that moment peace reigned within its walls. The Bû de la Rue has found a fit tenant, said the country people. The haunting ceased. There was no longer any light seen there, save that of the tallow candle of the new comer. "Witch's candle is as good as devil's torch." The proverb satisfied the gossips of the neighbourhood.

The woman cultivated some acres of land which belonged to her. She had a good cow, of the sort which produces yellow butter. She gathered her white beans, cauliflowers, and "Golden drop" potatoes. She sold, like other people, her parsnips by the tonneau, her onions by the hundred, and her beans by the denerel. She did not go herself to market, but disposed of her crops through the agency of Guilbert Falliot, at the sign of the Abreveurs of St. Sampson. The register of Falliot bears evidence that Falliot sold for her, on one occasion, as much as twelve bushels of rare early potatoes.

The house had been meanly repaired; but sufficiently to make it habitable. It was only in very bad weather that the rain-drops found their way through the ceilings of the rooms. The interior consisted of a ground-floor suite of rooms, and a granary overhead. The ground-floor was divided into three rooms; two for sleeping, and one for meals. A ladder connected it with the granary above. The woman attended to the kitchen and taught the child to read. She did not go to church or chapel, which, all things considered, led to the conclusion that she must be French not to go to a place of worship. The circumstance was grave. In short, the new comers were a puzzle to the neighbourhood.

That the woman was French seemed probable. Volcanoes cast forth stones, and revolutions men, so families are removed to distant places; human beings come to pass their lives far from their native homes; groups of relatives and friends disperse and decay; strange people fall, as it were, from the clouds — some in Germany, some in England, some in America. The people of the country view them with surprise and curiosity. Whence come these strange faces? Yonder mountain, smoking with revolutionary fires, casts them out. These barren aërolites, these famished and ruined people, these footballs of destiny, are known as refugees, émigrés, adventurers. If they sojourn among strangers, they are tolerated; if they depart, there is a feeling of relief. Sometimes these wanderers are harmless, inoffensive people, strangers — at least, as regards the women — to the events which have led to their exile, objects of persecution, helpless and astonished at their fate. They take root again somewhere as they can. They have done no harm to any one, and scarcely comprehend the destiny that has befallen them. So thus I have seen a poor tuft of grass uprooted and carried away by the explosion of a mine. No great explosion was ever followed by more of such strays than the first French Revolution.

The strange woman whom the Guernsey folks called “Gilliatt” was, possibly, one of these human strays.

The woman grew older; the child became a youth. They lived alone and avoided by all; but they were sufficient for each other. Louve et louveteau se pourlèchent. This was another of the generous proverbs which the neighbourhood applied to them. Meanwhile, the youth grew to manhood; and then, as the old and withered bark falls from the tree, the mother died.

She left to her son the little field of Sergentée, the small property called La Roque Crespel, and the house known as the Bû de la Rue; with the addition, as the official inventory said, of “one hundred guineas in gold in the pid d’une cauche,” that is to say, in the foot of a stocking. The house was already sufficiently furnished with two oaken chests, two beds, six chairs and a table, besides necessary household utensils. Upon a shelf were some books, and in the corner a trunk, by no means of a mysterious character, which had to be opened for the inventory. This trunk was of drab leather, ornamented with brass nails and little stars of white metal, and it contained a bride’s outfit, new and complete, of beautiful Dunkirk linen — chemises and petticoats, and some silk dresses — with a paper on which was written, in the handwriting of the deceased, —

“For your wife: when you marry.”

The loss of his mother was a terrible blow for the young man. His disposition had always been unsociable; he became now moody and sullen. The solitude around him was complete. Hitherto it had been mere isolation; now his life was a blank. While we have only one companion, life is endurable; left alone, it seems as if it is impossible to struggle on, and we fall back in the race, which is the first sign of despair. As time rolls on, however, we discover that duty is a series of compromises; we contemplate life, regard its end, and submit; but it is a submission which makes the heart bleed.

Gilliatt was young; and his wound healed with time. At that age sorrows cannot be lasting. His sadness, disappearing by slow degrees, seemed to mingle itself with the scenes around him, to draw him more and more towards the face of nature, and further and further from the need of social converse; and, finally, to assimilate his spirit more completely to the solitude in which he lived.

IV

AN UNPOPULAR MAN

Gilliatt, as we have said, was not popular in the parish. Nothing could be more natural than that antipathy among his neighbours. The reasons for it were abundant. To begin with, as we have already explained, there was the strange house he lived in; then there was his mysterious origin. Who could that woman have been? and what was the meaning of this child? Country people do not like mysteries, when they relate to strange sojourners among them. Then his clothes were the clothes of a workman, while he had, although certainly not rich, sufficient to live without labour. Then there was his garden, which he succeeded in cultivating, and from which he produced crops of potatoes, in spite of the stormy equinoxes; and then there were the big books which he kept upon a shelf, and read from time to time.

More reasons: why did he live that solitary life? The Bû de la Rue was a kind of lazaretto, in which Gilliatt was kept in a sort of moral quarantine. This, in the popular judgment, made it quite simple that people should be astonished at his isolation, and should hold him responsible for the solitude which society had made around his home.

He never went to chapel. He often went out at night-time. He held converse with sorcerers. He had been seen, on one occasion, sitting on the grass with an expression of astonishment on his features. He haunted the druidical stones of the Ancresse, and the fairy caverns which are scattered about in that part. It was generally believed that he had been seen politely saluting the Roque qui Chante, or Crowing Rock. He bought all birds which people brought to him, and having bought them, set them at liberty. He was civil to the worthy folks in the streets of St. Sampson, but willingly turned out of his way to avoid them if he could. He often went out on fishing expeditions, and always returned with fish. He trimmed his garden on Sundays. He had a bagpipe which he had bought from one of the Highland soldiers who are sometimes in Guernsey, and on which he played occasionally at twilight, on the rocks by the seashore. He had been seen to make strange gestures, like those of one sowing seeds. What kind of treatment could be expected for a man like that?

As regards the books left by the deceased woman, which he was in the habit of reading, the neighbours were particularly suspicious. The Reverend Jaquemin Hérode, rector of St. Sampson, when he visited the house at the time of the woman's funeral, had read on the backs of these books the titles Rosier's Dictionary, Candide, by Voltaire, Advice to the People on Health, by Tissot. A French noble, an émigré, who had retired to St. Sampson, remarked that this Tissot, "must have been the Tissot who carried the head of the Princess de Lamballe upon a pike."

The Reverend gentleman had also remarked upon one of these books, the highly fantastic and terribly significant title, De Rhubarbaro.

In justice to Gilliatt, however, it must be added that this volume being in Latin — a language which it is doubtful if he understood — the young man had possibly never read it.

But it is just those books which a man possesses, but does not read, which constitute the most suspicious evidence against him. The Spanish Inquisition have deliberated on that point, and have come to a conclusion which places the matter beyond further doubt.

The book in question, however, was no other than the treatise of Doctor Tilingius upon the rhubarb plant, published in Germany in 1679.

It was by no means certain that Gilliatt did not prepare philters and unholy decoctions. He was undoubtedly in possession of certain phials.

Why did he walk abroad at evening, and sometimes even at midnight, on the cliffs? Evidently to hold converse with the evil spirits who, by night, frequent the seashores, enveloped in smoke.

On one occasion he had aided a witch at Torteval to clean her chaise: this was an old woman named Moutonne Gahy.

When a census was taken in the island, in answer to a question about his calling, he replied, "Fisherman; when there are fish to catch." Imagine yourself in the place of Gilliatt's neighbours, and admit that there is something unpleasant in answers like this.

Poverty and wealth are comparative terms. Gilliatt had some fields and a house, his own property; compared with those who had nothing, he was not poor. One day, to test this, and perhaps, also as a step towards a correspondence — for there are base women who would marry a demon for the sake of riches — a young girl of the neighbourhood said to Gilliatt, "When are you going to take a wife, neighbour?" He answered, "I will take a wife when the Roque qui Chante takes a husband."

This Roque qui Chante is a great stone, standing in a field near Mons. Lemézurier de Fry's. It is a stone of a highly suspicious character. No one knows what deeds are done around it. At times you may hear there a cock crowing, when no cock is near — an extremely disagreeable circumstance. Then it is commonly asserted that this stone was originally placed in the field by the elfin people known as Sarregousets, who are the same as the Sins.

At night, when it thunders, if you should happen to see men flying in the lurid light of the clouds, or on the rolling waves of the air, these are no other than the Sarregousets. A woman who lives at the Grand Mielles knows them well. One evening, when some Sarregousets happened to be assembled at a crossroad, this woman cried out to a man with a cart, who did not know which route to take, "Ask them your way. They are civil folks, and always ready to direct a stranger." There can be little doubt that this woman was a sorceress.

The learned and judicious King James I. had women of this kind boiled, and then tasting the water of the cauldron, was able to say from its flavour, "That was a sorceress;" or "That was not one."

It is to be regretted that the kings of these latter days no longer possess a talent which placed in so strong a light the utility of monarchical institutions.

It was not without substantial grounds that Gilliatt lived in this odour of sorcery. One midnight, during a storm, Gilliatt being at sea alone in a bark, on the coast by La Sommeilleuse, he was heard to ask —

"Is there a passage sufficient for me?"

And a voice cried from the heights above:

"Passage enough: steer boldly."

To whom could he have been speaking, if not to those who replied to him? This seems something like evidence.

Another time, one stormy evening, when it was so dark that nothing could be distinguished, Gilliatt was near the Catiau Roque — a double row of rocks where witches, goats, and other diabolical creatures assemble and dance on Fridays — and here, it is firmly believed, that the voice of Gilliatt was heard mingling in the following terrible conversation: —

"How is Vesin Brovard?" (This was a mason who had fallen from the roof of a house.)

"He is getting better."

“Ver dia! he fell from a greater height than that of yonder peak. It is delightful to think that he was not dashed to pieces.”

“Our folks had a fine time for the seaweed gathering last week.”

“Ay, finer than to-day.”

“I believe you. There will be little fish at the market to-day.”

“It blows too hard.”

“They can’t lower their nets.”

“How is Catherine?”

“She is charming.”

Catherine was evidently the name of a Sarregouset.

According to all appearance, Gilliatt had business on hand at night: at least none doubted it.

Sometimes he was seen with a pitcher in his hand, pouring water on the ground. Now water, cast upon the ground, is known to make a shape like that of devils.

On the road to St. Sampson, opposite the Martello tower, number 1, stand three stones, arranged in the form of steps. Upon the platform of those stones, now empty, stood anciently a cross, or perhaps a gallows. These stones are full of evil influences.

Staid and worthy people, and perfectly credible witnesses, testified to having seen Gilliatt at this spot conversing with a toad. Now there are no toads at Guernsey. The share of Guernsey in the reptiles of the Channel Isles consisting exclusively of the snakes. It is Jersey that has all the toads. This toad, then, must have swum from the neighbouring island, in order to hold converse with Gilliatt. The converse was of a friendly kind.

These facts were clearly established; and the proof is that the three stones are there to this day. Those who doubt it may go and see them; and at a little distance, there is also a house on which the passer-by may read this inscription: —

“Dealer in cattle, alive and dead, old cordage, iron, bones, and tobacco for chewing, prompt payment for goods, and every attention given to orders.”

A man must be sceptical indeed to contest the existence of those stones, and of the house in question. Now both these circumstances were injurious to the reputation of Gilliatt.

Only the most ignorant are unaware of the fact that the greatest danger of the coasts of the Channel Islands is the King of the Auxcriniers. No inhabitant of the seas is more redoubtable. Whoever has seen him is certain to be wrecked between one St. Michel and the other. He is little, being in fact a dwarf; and is deaf, in his quality of king. He knows the names of all those who have been drowned in the seas, and the spots where they lie. He has a profound knowledge of that great graveyard which stretches far and wide beneath the waters of the ocean. A head, massive in the lower part and narrow in the forehead; a squat and corpulent figure; a skull, covered with warty excrescences; long legs, long arms, fins for feet, claws for hands, and a sea-green countenance; such are the chief characteristics of this king of the waves. His claws have palms like hands; his fins human nails. Imagine a spectral fish with the face of a human being. No power could check his career unless he could be exorcised, or mayhap, fished up from the sea. Meanwhile he continues his sinister operations. Nothing is more unpleasant than an interview with this monster: amid the rolling waves and breakers, or in the thick of the mist, the sailor perceives, sometimes, a strange creature with a beetle brow, wide nostrils, flattened ears, an enormous mouth, gap-toothed jaws, peaked eyebrows, and great grinning eyes. When the lightning is livid, he appears red; when it is purple, he looks wan. He has a stiff spreading beard, running with water, and overlapping a sort of pelerine, ornamented with fourteen shells, seven before and seven behind. These shells are curious to those who are learned in conchology. The King of the Auxcriniers is only seen in stormy seas. He is the terrible harbinger of the tempest. His hideous form traces itself in the fog, in the squall, in the tempest of rain. His breast is hideous. A coat of scales covers his sides like a vest. He rises above the waves which fly before the wind, twisting and curling like thin shavings of wood beneath the carpenter’s plane. Then his entire form issues out of the foam, and if there should happen to be in the horizon any vessels in distress, pale in the twilight, or his face lighted up with a sinister smile, he dances terrible and uncouth to behold. It is an evil omen indeed to meet him on a voyage.

At the period when the people of St. Sampson were particularly excited on the subject of Gilliatt, the last persons who had seen the King of the Auxcriniers declared that his pelerine was now ornamented with only thirteen shells. Thirteen! He was only the more dangerous. But what had become of the fourteenth? Had he given it to some one? No one would say positively; and folks confined themselves to conjecture. But it was an undoubted fact that a certain Mons. Lupin Mabier, of Godaines, a man of property, paying a good sum to the land tax, was ready to depose on oath, that he had once seen in the hands of Gilliatt a very remarkable kind of shell.

It was not uncommon to hear dialogues like the following among the country people: —

“I have a fine bull here, neighbour, what do you say?”

“Very fine, neighbour?”

“It is a fact, tho’ ’tis I who say it; he is better though for tallow than for meat.”

“Ver dia!”

“Are you sure that Gilliatt hasn’t cast his eye upon it?”

Gilliatt would stop sometimes beside a field where some labourers were assembled, or near gardens in which gardeners were engaged, and would perhaps hear these mysterious words:

“When the mors du diable flourishes, reap the winter rye.”

(The mors du diable is the scabwort plant.)

“The ash tree is coming out in leaf. There will be no more frost.”

“Summer solstice, thistle in flower.”

“If it rain not in June, the wheat will turn white. Look out for mildew.”

“When the wild cherry appears, beware of the full moon.”

“If the weather on the sixth day of the new moon is like that of the fourth, or like that of the fifth day, it will be the same nine times out of twelve, in the first case, and eleven times out of twelve in the second, during the whole month.”

“Keep your eye on neighbours who go to law with you. Beware of malicious influences. A pig which has had warm milk given to it will die. A cow which has had its teeth rubbed with leeks will eat no more.”

“Spawning time with the smelts; beware of fevers.”

“When frogs begin to appear, sow your melons.”

“When the liverwort flowers, sow your barley.”

“When the limes are in bloom, mow the meadows.”

“When the elm-tree flowers, open the hot-bed frames.”

“When tobacco fields are in blossom, close your greenhouses.”

And, fearful to relate, these occult precepts were not without truth. Those who put faith in them could vouch for the fact.

One night, in the month of June, when Gilliatt was playing upon his bagpipe, upon the sand-hills on the shore of the Demie de Fontenelle, it had happened that the mackerel fishing had failed.

One evening, at low water, it came to pass that a cart filled with seaweed for manure overturned on the beach, in front of Gilliatt's house. It is most probable that he was afraid of being brought before the magistrates, for he took considerable trouble in helping to raise the cart, and he filled it again himself.

A little neglected child of the neighbourhood being troubled with vermin, he had gone himself to St. Peter's Port, and had returned with an ointment, with which he rubbed the child's head. Thus Gilliatt had removed the pest from the poor child, which was an evidence that Gilliatt himself had originally given it; for everybody knows that there is a certain charm for giving vermin to people.

Gilliatt was suspected of looking into wells — a dangerous practice with those who have an evil eye; and, in fact, at Arculons, near St. Peter's Port, the water of a well became unwholesome. The good woman to whom this well belonged said to Gilliatt:

"Look here, at this water;" and she showed him a glassful. Gilliatt acknowledged it.

"The water is thick," he said; "that is true."

The good woman, who dreaded him in her heart, said, "Make it sweet again for me."

Gilliatt asked her some questions: whether she had a stable? whether the stable had a drain? whether the gutter of the drain did not pass near the well? The good woman replied "Yes." Gilliatt went into the stable; worked at the drain; turned the gutter in another direction; and the water became pure again. People in the country round might think what they pleased. A well does not become foul one moment and sweet the next without good cause; the bottom of the affair was involved in obscurity; and, in short, it was difficult to escape the conclusion that Gilliatt himself had bewitched the water.

On one occasion, when he went to Jersey, it was remarked that he had taken a lodging in the street called the Rue des Alleurs. Now the word alleurs signifies spirits from the other world.

In villages it is the custom to gather together all these little hints and indications of a man's career; and when they are gathered together, the total constitutes his reputation among the inhabitants.

It happened that Gilliatt was once caught with blood issuing from his nose. The circumstances appeared grave. The master of a barque who had sailed almost entirely round the world, affirmed that among the Tongusians all sorcerers were subject to bleeding at the nose. In fact, when you see a man in those parts bleeding at the nose, you know at once what is in the wind. Moderate reasoners, however, remarked that the characteristics of sorcerers among the Tongusians may possibly not apply in the same degree to the sorcerers of Guernsey.

In the environs of one of the St. Michels, he had been seen to stop in a close belonging to the Huriaux, skirting the highway from the Videclins. He whistled in the field, and a moment afterwards a crow alighted there; a moment later, a magpie. The fact was attested by a worthy man who has since been appointed to the office of Douzenier of the Douzaine, as those are called who are authorised to make a new survey and register of the fief of the king.

At Hamel, in the Vingtaine of L'Epine, there lived some old women who were positive of having heard one morning a number of swallows distinctly calling "Gilliatt."

Add to all this that he was of a malicious temper.

One day, a poor man was beating an ass. The ass was obstinate. The poor man gave him a few kicks in the belly with his wooden shoe, and the ass fell. Gilliatt ran to raise the unlucky beast, but he was dead. Upon this Gilliatt administered to the poor man a sound thrashing.

Another day, Gilliatt seeing a boy come down from a tree with a brood of little birds, newly hatched and unfledged, he took the brood away from the boy, and carried his malevolence so far as even to take them back and replace them in the tree.

Some passers-by took up the boy's complaint; but Gilliatt made no reply, except to point to the old birds, who were hovering and crying plaintively over the tree, as they looked for their nest. He had a weakness for birds — another sign by which the people recognise a magician.

Children take a pleasure in robbing the nests of birds along the cliff. They bring home quantities of yellow, blue, and green eggs, with which they make rosaries for mantelpiece ornaments. As the cliffs are peaked, they sometimes slip and are killed. Nothing is prettier than shutters decorated with sea-birds' eggs. Gilliatt's mischievous ingenuity had no end. He would climb, at the peril of his own life, into the steep places of the sea rocks, and hang up bundles of hay, old hats, and all kinds of scarecrows, to deter the birds from building there, and, as a consequence, to prevent the children from visiting those spots.

These are some of the reasons why Gilliatt was disliked throughout the country. Perhaps nothing less could have been expected.

V

MORE SUSPICIOUS FACTS ABOUT GILLIATT

Public opinion was not yet quite settled with regard to Gilliatt.

In general he was regarded as a Marcou: some went so far as to believe him to be a Cambion. A cambion is the child of a woman begotten by a devil.

When a woman bears to her husband seven male children consecutively, the seventh is a marcou. But the series must not be broken by the birth of any female child.

The marcou has a natural fleur-de-lys imprinted upon some part of his body; for which reason he has the power of curing scrofula, exactly the same as the King of France. Marcous are found in all parts of France, but particularly in the Orléanais. Every village of Gâtinais has its marcou. It is sufficient for the cure of the sick that the marcou should breathe upon their wounds, or let them touch his fleur-de-lys. The night of Good Friday is particularly favourable to these ceremonies. Ten years ago there lived, at Ormes in Gâtinais, one of these creatures who was nicknamed the Beau Marcou, and consulted by all the country of Beauce. He was a cooper, named Foulon, who kept a horse and vehicle. To put a stop to his miracles, it was found necessary to call in the assistance of the gendarmes. His fleur-de-lys was on the left breast; other marcous have it in different parts.

There are marcous at Jersey, Auvigny, and at Guernsey. This fact is doubtless in some way connected with the rights possessed by France over Normandy: or why the fleur-de-lys?

There are also, in the Channel Islands, people afflicted with scrofula; which of course necessitates a due supply of these marcous.

Some people, who happened to be present one day when Gilliatt was bathing in the sea, had fancied that they could perceive upon him a fleur-de-lys. Interrogated on that subject he made no reply, but merely burst into laughter. For he laughed sometimes like other men. From that time, however, no one ever saw him bathe: he bathed thenceforth only in perilous and solitary places; probably by moonlight: a thing in itself somewhat suspicious.

Those who obstinately regarded him as a cambion, or son of the devil, were evidently in error. They ought to have known that cambions scarcely exist out of Germany. But The Vale and St. Sampson were, fifty years ago, places remarkable for the ignorance of their inhabitants.

To fancy that a resident of the island of Guernsey could be the son of a devil was evidently absurd.

Gilliatt, for the very reason that he caused disquietude among the people, was sought for and consulted. The peasants came in fear, to talk to him of their diseases. That fear itself had in it something of faith in his powers; for in the country, the more the doctor is suspected of magic, the more certain is the cure. Gilliatt had certain remedies of his own, which he had inherited from the deceased woman. He communicated them to all who had need of them, and would never receive money for them. He cured whitlows with applications of herbs. A liquor in one of his phials allayed fever. The chemist of St. Sampson, or pharmacien, as they would call him in France, thought that this was probably a decoction of Jesuits' bark. The more generous among his censors admitted that Gilliatt was not so bad a demon in his dealings with the sick, so far as regarded his ordinary remedies. But in his character of a marcou, he would do nothing. If persons afflicted with scrofula came to him to ask to touch the fleur-de-lys on his skin, he made no other answer than that of shutting the door in their faces. He persistently refused to perform any miracles — a ridiculous position for a sorcerer. No one is bound to be a sorcerer; but when a man is one, he ought not to shirk the duties of his position.

One or two exceptions might be found to this almost universal antipathy. Sieur Landoys, of the Clos-Landés, was clerk and registrar of St. Peter's Port, custodian of the documents, and keeper of the register of births, marriages, and deaths. This Landoys was vain of his descent from Peter Landoys, treasurer of the province of Brittany, who was hanged in 1485. One day, when Sieur Landoys was bathing in the sea, he ventured to swim out too far, and was on the point of drowning: Gilliatt plunged into the water, narrowly escaping drowning himself, and succeeded in saving him. From that day Landoys never spoke an evil word of Gilliatt. To those who expressed surprise at this change, he replied, "Why should I detest a man who never did me any harm, and who has rendered me a service?" The parish clerk and registrar even came at last to feel a sort of friendship for Gilliatt. This public functionary was a man without prejudices. He had no faith in sorcerers. He laughed at people who went in fear of ghostly visitors. As for him, he had a boat in which he amused himself by making fishing excursions in his leisure hours; but he had never seen anything extraordinary, unless it was on one occasion — a woman clothed in white, who rose about the waters in the light of the moon — and even of this circumstance he was not quite sure. Moutonne Gahy, the old witch of Torteval, had given him a little bag to be worn under the cravat, as a protection against evil spirits: he ridiculed the bag, and knew not what it contained, though, to be sure, he carried it about him, feeling more security with this charm hanging on his neck.

Some courageous persons, emboldened by the example of Landoys, ventured to cite, in Gilliatt's favour, certain extenuating circumstances; a few signs of good qualities, as his sobriety, his abstinence from spirits and tobacco; and sometimes they went so far as to pass this elegant eulogium upon him: "He neither smokes, drinks, chews tobacco, or takes snuff."

Sobriety, however, can only count as a virtue when there are other virtues to support it.

The ban of public opinion lay heavily upon Gilliatt.

In any case, as a marcou, Gilliatt had it in his power to render great services. On a certain Good Friday, at midnight, a day and an hour propitious to this kind of cure, all the scrofulous people of the island, either by sudden inspiration, or by concerted action, presented themselves in a crowd at the Bû de la Rue, and with pitiable sores and imploring gestures, called on Gilliatt to make them clean. But he refused; and herein the people found another proof of his malevolence.

VI

THE DUTCH SLOOP

Such was the character of Gilliatt.

The young women considered him ugly.

Ugly he was not. He might, perhaps, have been called handsome. There was something in his profile of rude but antique grace. In repose it had some resemblance to that of a sculptured Dacian on the Trajan column. His ears were small, delicate, without lobes, and of an admirable form for hearing. Between his eyes he had that proud vertical line which indicates in a man boldness and perseverance. The corners of his mouth were depressed, giving a slight expression of bitterness. His forehead had a calm and noble roundness. The clear pupils of his eyes possessed a steadfast look, although troubled a little with that involuntary movement of the eyelids which fishermen contract from the glitter of the waves. His laugh was boyish and pleasing. No ivory could be of a finer white than his teeth; but exposure to the sun had made him swarthy as a moor. The ocean, the tempest, and the darkness cannot be braved with impunity. At thirty he looked already like a man of forty-five. He wore the sombre mask of the wind and the sea.

The people had nicknamed him “Malicious Gilliatt.”

There is an Indian fable to the effect that one day the god Brahma inquired of the Spirit of Power, “Who is stronger than thee?” and the spirit replied “Cunning.” A Chinese proverb says, “What could not the lion do, if he was the monkey also?” Gilliatt was neither the lion nor the monkey; but his actions gave some evidence of the truth of the Chinese proverb, and of the Hindoo fable. Although only of ordinary height and strength, he was enabled, so inventive and powerful was his dexterity, to lift burdens that might have taxed a giant, and to accomplish feats which would have done credit to an athlete.

He had in him something of the power of the gymnast. He used, with equal address, his left hand and his right.

He never carried a gun; but was often seen with his net. He spared the birds, but not the fish. Ill-luck to these dumb creatures! He was an excellent swimmer.

Solitude either develops the mental powers, or renders men dull and vicious. Gilliatt sometimes presented himself under both these aspects. At times, when his features wore that air of strange surprise already mentioned, he might have been taken for a man of mental powers scarcely superior to the savage. At other moments an indescribable air of penetration lighted up his face. Ancient Chaldea possessed some men of this stamp. At certain times the dullness of the shepherd mind became transparent, and revealed the inspired sage.

After all, he was but a poor man; uninstructed, save to the extent of reading and writing. It is probable that the condition of his mind was at that limit which separates the dreamer from the thinker. The thinker wills, the dreamer is a passive instrument. Solitude sinks deeply into pure natures, and modifies them in a certain degree. They become, unconsciously, penetrated with a kind of sacred awe. The shadow in which the mind of Gilliatt constantly dwelt was composed in almost equal degrees of two elements, both obscure, but very different. Within himself all was ignorance and weakness; without, infinity and mysterious power.

By dint of frequent climbing on the rocks, of escalading the rugged cliffs, of going to and fro among the islands in all weathers, of navigating any sort of craft which came to hand, of venturing night and day in difficult channels, he had become, without taking count of his other advantages, and merely in following his fancy and pleasure, a seaman of extraordinary skill.

He was a born pilot. The true pilot is the man who navigates the bed of the ocean even more than its surface. The waves of the sea are an external problem, continually modified by the submarine conditions of the waters in which the vessel is making her way. To see Gilliatt guiding his craft among the reefs and shallows of the Norman Archipelago, one might have fancied that he carried in his head a plan of the bottom of the sea. He was familiar with it all, and feared nothing.

He was better acquainted with the buoys in the channels than the cormorants who make them their resting-places. The almost imperceptible differences which distinguish the four upright buoys of the Creux, Alligande, the Trémies, and the Sardrette, were perfectly visible and clear to him, even in misty weather. He hesitated neither at the oval, apple-headed buoy of Anfré, nor at the triple iron point of the Rousse, nor at the white ball of the Corbette, nor at the black ball of Longue Pierre; and there was no fear of his confounding the cross of Goubeau with the sword planted in earth at La Platte, nor the hammer-shaped buoy of the Barbées with the curled-tail buoy of the Moulinet.

His rare skill in seamanship showed itself in a striking manner one day at Guernsey, on the occasion of one of those sea tournaments which are called regattas. The feat to be performed was to navigate alone a boat with four sails from St. Sampson to the Isle of Herm, at one league distance, and to bring the boat back from Herm to St. Sampson. To manage, without assistance, a boat with four sails, is a feat which every fisherman is equal to, and the difficulty seemed little; but there was a condition which rendered it far from simple. The boat, to begin with, was one of those large and heavy sloops of bygone times which the sailors of the last century knew by the name of “Dutch Belly Boats.” This ancient style of flat, pot-bellied craft, carrying on the larboard and starboard sides, in compensation for the want of a keel, two wings, which lowered themselves, sometimes the one, sometimes the other, according to the wind, may occasionally be met with still at sea. In the second place, there was the return from Herm, a journey which was rendered more difficult by a heavy ballasting of stones. The conditions were to go empty, but to return loaded. The sloop was the prize of the contest. It was dedicated beforehand to the winner. This “Dutch Belly Boat” had been employed as a pilot-boat. The pilot who had rigged and worked it for twenty years was the most robust of all the sailors of the channel. When he died no one had been found capable of managing the sloop; and it was, in consequence, determined to make it the prize of the regatta. The sloop, though not decked, had some sea qualities, and was a tempting prize for a skilful sailor. Her mast was somewhat forward, which increased the motive-power of her sails; besides having the advantage of not being in the way of her pilot. It was a strong-built vessel, heavy, but roomy, and taking the open sea well; in fact, a good, serviceable craft. There was eager anxiety for the prize; the task was a rough one, but the reward of success was worth having. Seven or eight fishermen, among the most vigorous of the island, presented themselves. One by one they essayed; but not one could succeed in reaching Herm. The last one who tried his skill was known for having crossed, in a rowing-boat, the terrible narrow sea between Sark and Brecq-Hou. Sweating with his exertions, he brought back the sloop, and said, “It is impossible.” Gilliatt then entered the bark, seized first of all the oar, then the mainsail, and pushed out to sea. Then, without either making fast the boom, which would have been imprudent, or letting it go, which kept the sail under his direction, and leaving the boom to move with the wind without drifting, he held the tiller with his left hand. In three quarters of an hour he was at Herm. Three hours later, although a strong breeze had sprung up and was blowing across the roads, the sloop, guided by Gilliatt, returned to St. Sampson with its load of stones. He had, with an extravagant display of his resources, even added to the cargo the little bronze cannon at Herm, which the people were in the habit of firing off on the 5th of November, by way of rejoicing over the death of Guy Fawkes.

Guy Fawkes, by the way, has been dead two hundred and sixty years; a remarkably long period of rejoicing.

Gilliatt, thus burdened and encumbered, although he had the Guy Fawkes'-day cannon in the boat and the south wind in his sails, steered, or rather brought back, the heavy craft to St. Sampson.

Seeing which, Mess Lethierry exclaimed, “There's a bold sailor for you!”

And he held out his hand to Gilliatt.

We shall have occasion to speak again of Mess Lethierry.

The sloop was awarded to Gilliatt.

This adventure detracted nothing from his evil reputation.

Several persons declared that the feat was not at all astonishing, for that Gilliatt had concealed in the boat a branch of wild medlar. But this could not be proved.

From that day forward, Gilliatt navigated no boat except the old sloop. In this heavy craft he went on his fishing avocation. He kept it at anchor in the excellent little shelter which he had all to himself, under the very wall of his house of the Bû de la Rue. At nightfall, he cast his nets over his shoulder, traversed his little garden, climbed over the parapet of dry stones, stepped lightly from rock to rock, and jumping into the sloop, pushed out to sea.

He brought home heavy takes of fish; but people said that his medlar branch was always hanging up in the boat. No one had ever seen this branch, but every one believed in its existence.

When he had more fish than he wanted, he did not sell it, but gave it away.

The poor people took his gift, but were little grateful, for they knew the secret of his medlar branch. Such devices cannot be permitted. It is unlawful to trick the sea out of its treasures.

He was a fisherman; but he was something more. He had, by instinct, or for amusement, acquired a knowledge of three or four trades. He was a carpenter, worker in iron, wheelwright, boat-caulker, and, to some extent, an engineer. No one could mend a broken wheel better than he could. He manufactured, in a fashion of his own, all the things which fishermen use. In a corner of the Bû de la Rue he had a small forge and an anvil; and the sloop having but one anchor, he had succeeded, without help, in making another. The anchor was excellent. The ring had the necessary strength; and Gilliatt, though entirely uninstructed in this branch of the smith's art, had found the exact dimensions of the stock for preventing the over-balancing of the fluke ends.

He had patiently replaced all the nails in the planks by rivets; which rendered rust in the holes impossible.

In this way he had much improved the sea-going qualities of the sloop. He employed it sometimes when he took a fancy to spend a month or two in some solitary islet, like Chousey or the Casquets. People said, "Ay! ay! Gilliatt is away;" but this was a circumstance which nobody regretted.

VII

A FIT TENANT FOR A HAUNTED HOUSE

Gilliatt was a man of dreams, hence his daring, hence also his timidity. He had ideas on many things which were peculiarly his own.

There was in his character, perhaps, something of the visionary and the transcendentalist. Hallucinations may haunt the poor peasant like Martin, no less than the king like Henry IV. There are times when the unknown reveals itself in a mysterious way to the spirit of man. A sudden rent in the veil of darkness will make manifest things hitherto unseen, and then close again upon the mysteries within. Such visions have occasionally the power to effect a transfiguration in those whom they visit. They convert a poor camel-driver into a Mahomet; a peasant girl tending her goats into a Joan of Arc. Solitude generates a certain amount of sublime exaltation. It is like the smoke arising from the burning bush. A mysterious lucidity of mind results, which converts the student into a seer, and the poet into a prophet: herein we find a key to the mysteries of Horeb, Kedron, Ombos; to the intoxication of Castilian laurels, the revelations of the month Busion. Hence, too, we have Peleia at Dodona, Phemonoe at Delphos, Trophonius in Lebadea, Ezekiel on the Chebar, and Jerome in the Thetais.

More frequently this visionary state overwhelms and stupefies its victim. There is such a thing as a divine besottedness. The Hindoo fakir bears about with him the burden of his vision, as the Cretin his goître. Luther holding converse with devils in his garret at Wittenburg; Pascal shutting out the view of the infernal regions with the screen of his cabinet; the African Obi conversing with the white-faced god Bossum; are each and all the same phenomenon, diversely interpreted by the minds in which they manifest themselves, according to their capacity and power. Luther and Pascal were grand, and are grand still; the Obi is simply a poor half-witted creature.

Gilliatt was neither so exalted nor so low. He was a dreamer: nothing more.

Nature presented itself to him under a somewhat strange aspect.

Just as he had often found in the perfectly limpid water of the sea strange creatures of considerable size and of various shapes, of the Medusa genus, which out of the water bore a resemblance to soft crystal, and which, cast again into the sea, became lost to sight in that medium by reason of their identity in transparency and colour, so he imagined that other transparencies, similar to these almost invisible denizens of the ocean, might probably inhabit the air around us. The birds are scarcely inhabitants of the air, but rather amphibious creatures passing much of their lives upon the earth. Gilliatt could not believe the air a mere desert. He used to say, “Since the water is filled with life, why not the atmosphere?” Creatures colourless and transparent like the air would escape from our observation. What proof have we that there are no such creatures? Analogy indicates that the liquid fields of air must have their swimming habitants, even as the waters of the deep. These aerial fish would, of course, be diaphanous; a provision of their wise Creator for our sakes as well as their own. Allowing the light to pass through their forms, casting no shadow, having no defined outline, they would necessarily remain unknown to us, and beyond the grasp of human sense. Gilliatt indulged the wild fancy that if it were possible to exhaust the earth of its atmosphere, or if we could fish the air as we fish the depths of the sea, we should discover the existence of a multitude of strange animals. And then, he would add in his reverie, many things would be made clear.

Reverie, which is thought in its nebulous state, borders closely upon the land of sleep, by which it is bounded as by a natural frontier. The discovery of a new world, in the form of an atmosphere filled with transparent creatures, would be the beginning of a knowledge of the vast unknown. But beyond opens up the illimitable domain of the possible, teeming with yet other beings, and characterised by other phenomena. All this would be nothing supernatural, but merely the occult continuation of the infinite variety of creation. In the midst of that laborious idleness, which was the chief feature in his existence, Gilliatt was singularly observant. He even carried his observations into the domain of sleep. Sleep has a close relation with the possible, which we call also the invraisemblable. The world of sleep has an existence of its own. Night-time, regarded as a separate sphere of creation, is a universe in itself. The material nature of man, upon which philosophers tell us that a column of air forty-five miles in height continually presses, is wearied out at night, sinks into lassitude, lies down, and finds repose. The eyes of the flesh are closed; but in that drooping head, less inactive than is supposed, other eyes are opened. The unknown reveals itself. The shadowy existences of the invisible world become more akin to man; whether it be that there is a real communication, or whether things far off in the unfathomable abyss are mysteriously brought nearer, it seems as if the impalpable creatures inhabiting space come then to contemplate our natures, curious to comprehend the denizens of the earth. Some phantom creation ascends or descends to walk beside us in the dim twilight: some existence altogether different from our own, composed partly of human consciousness, partly of something else, quits his fellows and returns again, after presenting himself for a moment to our inward sight; and the sleeper, not wholly slumbering, nor yet entirely conscious, beholds around him strange manifestations of life — pale spectres, terrible or smiling, dismal phantoms, uncouth masks, unknown faces, hydra-headed monsters, undefined shapes, reflections of moonlight where there is no moon, vague fragments of monstrous forms. All these things which come and go in the troubled atmosphere of sleep, and to which men give the name of dreams, are, in truth, only realities invisible to those who walk about the daylight world. The dream-world is the Aquarium of Night.

So, at least, thought Gilliatt.

VIII

THE GILD-HOLM-’UR SEAT

The curious visitor, in these days, would seek in vain in the little bay of Houmet for the house in which Gilliatt lived, or for his garden, or the creek in which he sheltered the Dutch sloop. The Bû de la Rue no longer exists. Even the little peninsula on which his house stood has vanished, levelled by the pickaxe of the quarryman, and carried away, cart-load by cart-load, by dealers in rock and granite. It must be sought now in the churches, the palaces, and the quays of a great city. All that ridge of rocks has been long ago conveyed to London.

These long lines of broken cliffs in the sea, with their frequent gaps and crevices, are like miniature chains of mountains. They strike the eye with the impression which a giant may be supposed to have in contemplating the Cordilleras. In the language of the country they are called “Banques.” These banques vary considerably in form. Some resemble a long spine, of which each rock forms one of the vertebræ; others are like the backbone of a fish; while some bear an odd resemblance to a crocodile in the act of drinking.

At the extremity of the ridge on which the Bû de la Rue was situate, was a large rock, which the fishing people of Houmet called the “Beast’s Horn.” This rock, a sort of pyramid, resembled, though less in height, the “Pinnacle” of Jersey. At high water the sea divided it from the ridge, and the Horn stood alone; at low water it was approached by an isthmus of rocks. The remarkable feature of this “Beast’s Horn” was a sort of natural seat on the side next the sea, hollowed out by the water, and polished by the rains. The seat, however, was a treacherous one. The stranger was insensibly attracted to it by “the beauty of the prospect,” as the Guernsey folks said. Something detained him there in spite of himself, for there is a charm in a wide view. The seat seemed to offer itself for his convenience; it formed a sort of niche in the peaked façade of the rock. To climb up to it was easy, for the sea, which had fashioned it out of its rocky base, had also cast beneath it, at convenient distances, a kind of natural stairs composed of flat stones. The perilous abyss is full of these snares; beware, therefore, of its proffered aids. The spot was tempting: the stranger mounted and sat down. There he found himself at his ease; for his seat he had the granite rounded and hollowed out by the foam; for supports, two rocky elbows which seemed made expressly for him; against his back, the high vertical wall of rock which he looked up to and admired, without thinking of the impossibility of scaling it. Nothing could be more simple than to fall into reverie in that convenient resting-place. All around spread the wide sea; far off the ships were seen passing to and fro. It was possible to follow a sail with the eye, till it sank in the horizon beyond the Casquets. The stranger was entranced: he looked around, enjoying the beauty of the scene, and the light touch of wind and wave. There is a sort of bat found at Cayenne, which has the power of fanning people to sleep in the shade with a gentle beating of its dusky wings. Like this strange creature the wind wanders about, alternately ravaging or lulling into security. So the stranger would continue contemplating the sea, listening for a movement in the air, and yielding himself up to dreamy indolence. When the eyes are satiated with light and beauty, it is a luxury to close them for awhile. Suddenly the loiterer would arouse; but it was too late. The sea had crept up step by step; the waters surrounded the rock; the stranger had been lured on to his death.

A terrible rock was this in a rising sea.

The tide gathers at first insensibly, then with violence; when it touches the rocks a sudden wrath seems to possess it, and it foams. Swimming is difficult in the breakers: excellent swimmers have been lost at the Horn of the Bû de la Rue.

In certain places, and at certain periods, the aspect of the sea is dangerous — fatal; as at times is the glance of a woman.

Very old inhabitants of Guernsey used to call this niche, fashioned in the rock by the waves, “Gild-Holm-’Ur” seat, or Kidormur; a Celtic word, say some authorities, which those who understand Celtic cannot interpret, and which all who understand French can— “Qui-dort-meurt:” such is the country folks’ translation.

The reader may choose between the translation, Qui-dort-meurt, and that given in 1819, I believe in The Armorican, by M. Athenas. According to this learned Celtic scholar, Gild-Holm-’Ur signifies “The resting-place of birds.”

There is, at Aurigny, another seat of this kind, called the Monk’s Chair, so well sculptured by the waves, and with steps of rock so conveniently placed, that it might be said that the sea politely sets a footstool for those who rest there.

In the open sea, at high water, the Gild-Holm-’Ur was no longer visible; the water covered it entirely.

The Gild-Holm-’Ur was a neighbour of the Bû de la Rue. Gilliatt knew it well, and often seated himself there. Was it his meditating place? No. We have already said he did not meditate, but dream. The sea, however, never entrapped him there.

MESS LETHIERRY

I

A TROUBLED LIFE, BUT A QUIET CONSCIENCE

Mess Lethierry, a conspicuous man in St. Sampson, was a redoubtable sailor. He had voyaged a great deal. He had been a cabin-boy, seaman, topmast-man, second mate, mate, pilot, and captain. He was at this period a ship-owner. There was not a man to compare with him for general knowledge of the sea. He was brave in putting off to ships in distress. In foul weather he would take his way along the beach, scanning the horizon. “What have we yonder?” he would say; “some craft in trouble?” Whether it were an interloping Weymouth fisherman, a cutter from Aurigny, a bisquine from Courseulle, the yacht of some nobleman, an English craft or a French one — poor or rich, mattered little. He jumped into a boat, called together two or three strong fellows, or did without them, as the case might be, pushed out to sea, rose and sank, and rose again on rolling waves, plunged into the storm, and encountered the danger face to face. Then afar off, amid the rain and lightning, and drenched with water, he was sometimes seen upright in his boat like a lion with a foaming mane. Often he would pass whole days in danger amidst the waves, the hail, and the wind, making his way to the sides of foundering vessels during the tempest, and rescuing men and merchandise. At night, after feats like these, he would return home, and pass his time in knitting stockings.

For fifty years he led this kind of life — from ten years of age to sixty — so long did he feel himself still young. At sixty, he began to discover that he could no longer lift with one hand the great anvil at the forge of Varclin. This anvil weighed three hundredweight. At length rheumatic pains compelled him to be a prisoner; he was forced to give up his old struggle with the sea, to pass from the heroic into the patriarchal stage, to sink into the condition of a harmless, worthy old fellow.

Happily his rheumatism attacks happened at the period when he had secured a comfortable competency. These two consequences of labour are natural companions. At the moment when men become rich, how often comes paralysis — the sorrowful crowning of a laborious life!

Old and weary men say among themselves, “Let us rest and enjoy life.”

The population of islands like Guernsey is composed of men who have passed their lives in going about their little fields or in sailing round the world. These are the two classes of the labouring people; the labourers on the land, and the toilers of the sea. Mess Lethierry was of the latter class; he had had a life of hard work. He had been upon the continent; was for some time a ship carpenter at Rochefort, and afterwards at Cette. We have just spoken of sailing round the world; he had made the circuit of all France, getting work as a journeyman carpenter; and had been employed at the great salt works of Franche-Comte. Though a humble man, he had led a life of adventure. In France he had learned to read, to think, to have a will of his own. He had had a hand in many things, and in all he had done had kept a character for probity. At bottom, however, he was simply a sailor. The water was his element; he used to say that he lived with the fish when really at home. In short, his whole existence, except two or three years, had been devoted to the ocean. Flung into the water, as he said, he had navigated the great oceans both of the Atlantic and the Pacific, but he preferred the Channel. He used to exclaim enthusiastically, “That is the sea for a rough time of it!” He was born at sea, and at sea would have preferred to end his days. After sailing several times round the world, and seeing most countries, he had returned to Guernsey, and never permanently left the island again. Henceforth his great voyages were to Granville and St. Malo.

Mess Lethierry was a Guernsey man — that peculiar amalgamation of Frenchman and Norman, or rather English. He had within himself this quadruple extraction, merged and almost lost in that far wider country, the ocean. Throughout his life and wheresoever he went, he had preserved the habits of a Norman fisherman.

All this, however, did not prevent his looking now and then into some old book; of taking pleasure in reading, in knowing the names of philosophers and poets, and in talking a little now and then in all languages.

II

A CERTAIN PREDILECTION

Gilliatt was a child of Nature. Mess Lethierry was the same.

Lethierry's uncultivated nature, however, was not without certain refinements.

He was fastidious upon the subject of women's hands. In his early years, while still a lad, passing from the stage of cabin-boy to that of sailor, he had heard the Admiral de Suffren say, "There goes a pretty girl; but what horrible great red hands." An observation from an admiral on any subject is a command, a law, an authority far above that of an oracle. The exclamation of Admiral de Suffren had rendered Lethierry fastidious and exacting in the matter of small and white hands. His own hand, a large club fist of the colour of mahogany, was like a mallet or a pair of pincers for a friendly grasp, and, tightly closed, would almost break a paving-stone.

He had never married; he had either no inclination for matrimony, or had never found a suitable match. That, perhaps, was due to his being a stickler for hands like those of a duchess. Such hands are, indeed, somewhat rare among the fishermen's daughters at Portbail.

It was whispered, however, that at Rochefort, on the Charente, he had, once upon a time, made the acquaintance of a certain grisette, realising his ideal. She was a pretty girl with graceful hands; but she was a vixen, and had also a habit of scratching. Woe betide any one who attacked her! yet her nails, though capable at a pinch of being turned into claws, were of a cleanliness which left nothing to be desired. It was these peculiarly bewitching nails which had first enchanted and then disturbed the peace of Lethierry, who, fearing that he might one day become no longer master of his mistress, had decided not to conduct that young lady to the nuptial altar.

Another time he met at Aurigny a country girl who pleased him. He thought of marriage, when one of the inhabitants of the place said to him, "I congratulate you; you will have for your wife a good fuel maker." Lethierry asked the meaning of this. It appeared that the country people at Aurigny have a certain custom of collecting manure from their cow-houses, which they throw against a wall, where it is left to dry and fall to the ground. Cakes of dried manure of this kind are used for fuel, and are called coipiaux. A country girl of Aurigny has no chance of getting a husband if she is not a good fuel maker; but the young lady’s especial talent only inspired disgust in Lethierry.

Besides, he had in his love matters a kind of rough country folks’ philosophy, a sailor-like sort of habit of mind. Always smitten but never enslaved, he boasted of having been in his youth easily conquered by a petticoat, or rather a cotillon; for what is now-a-days called a crinoline, was in his time called a cotillon; a term which, in his use of it, signifies both something more and something less than a wife.

These rude seafaring men of the Norman Archipelago, have a certain amount of shrewdness. Almost all can read and write. On Sundays, little cabin-boys may be seen in those parts, seated upon a coil of ropes, reading, with book in hand. From all time these Norman sailors have had a peculiar satirical vein, and have been famous for clever sayings. It was one of these men, the bold pilot Quéripel, who said to Montgomery, when he sought refuge in Jersey after the unfortunate accident in killing Henry II. at a tournament, with a blow of his lance, “Tête folle a cassé tête vide.” Another one, Touzeau, a sea-captain at St. Brélade, was the author of that philosophical pun, erroneously attributed to Camus, “Après la mort, les papes deviennent papillons, et les sires deviennent cirons.”

THE OLD SEA LANGUAGE

The mariners of the Channel are the true ancient Gauls. The islands, which in these days become rapidly more and more English — preserved for many ages their old French character. The peasant in Sark speaks the language of Louis XIV. Forty years ago, the old classical nautical language was to be found in the mouths of the sailors of Jersey and Aurigny. When amongst them, it was possible to imagine oneself carried back to the sea life of the seventeenth century. From that speaking trumpet which terrified Admiral Hidde, a philologist might have learnt the ancient technicalities of manœuvring and giving orders at sea, in the very words which were roared out to his sailors by Jean Bart. The old French maritime vocabulary is now almost entirely changed, but was still in use in Jersey in 1820. A ship that was a good plyer was bon boulinier; one that carried a weather-helm in spite of her foresails and rudder was un vaisseau ardent; to get under way was prendre aire; to lie to in a storm, capeyer; to make fast running rigging was faire dormant; to get to windward, faire chapelle; to keep the cable tight, faire teste; to be out of trim, être en pantenne; to keep the sails full, porter plain. These expressions have fallen out of use. To-day we say louvoyer for to beat to windward, they said leauvoyer; for naviguer, sail, they said naviger; for virer vent devant, to tack, donner vent devant; for aller de l'avant, to make headway, tailler de l'avant; for tirez d'accord, haul together, halez d'accord; for dérapez, to weigh anchor, deplantez; for embraquez, to haul tight, abraquez; for taquets, cleats, bittons; for burins, toggles, tappes; for balancine, fore-lift, main-lift, etc., valancine; for tribord, starboard, stribord; for les hommes de quart à bâbord, men of the larboard watch, les basbourdis. Tourville wrote to Hocquincourt: nous avons singlét (sailed), for cinglé. Instead of la rafale, squall, le raffal; instead of bossoir, cat-head, boussoir; instead of drosse, truss, drousse; instead of loffer, to luff, faire une olofée; instead of elonger, to lay alongside, alonger; instead of forte brise, stiff breeze, survent; instead of jouail, stock of an anchor, jas; instead of soute, store-room, fosse.

Such, at the beginning of this century, was the maritime dialect of the Channel Islands. Ango would have been startled had he heard the speech of a Jersey pilot. Whilst everywhere else the sails faseyaient (shivered), in these islands they barbeyaient. A saute de vent, sudden shift of wind, was a folle-vente. The old methods of mooring known as la valture and la portugaise were alone used, and such commands as jour-et-chaque! and bosse et vilte! might still be heard. While a sailor of Granville was already employing the word clan for sheave-hold, one of St. Aubin or of St. Sampson still stuck to his canal de pouliot. What was called bout d'alonge (upper fultock) at St. Malo, was oreille d'âne at St. Helier. Mess Lethierry, as did the Duke de Vibonne, called the sheer of the decks la tonture, and the caulker's chisel la patarasse.

It was with this uncouth sea dialect in his mouth that Duquesne beat De Ruyter, that Duguay Trouin defeated Wasnaer, and that Tourville, in 1681, poured a broadside into the first galley which bombarded Algiers. It is now a dead language. The idiom of the sea is altogether different. Duperré would not be able to understand Suffren.

The language of French naval signals is not less transformed; there is a long distance between the four pennants, red, white, yellow, and blue, of Labourdonnaye, and the eighteen flags of these days, which, hoisted two and two, three and three, or four and four, furnish, for distant communication, sixty-six thousand combinations, are never deficient, and, so to speak, foresee the unforeseen.

IV

ONE IS VULNERABLE WHERE ONE LOVES

Mess Lethierry’s heart and hand were always ready — a large heart and a large hand. His failing was that admirable one, self-confidence. He had a certain fashion of his own of undertaking to do a thing. It was a solemn fashion. He said, “I give my word of honour to do it, with God’s help.” That said, he went through with his duty. He put his faith in God — nothing more. His rare churchgoing was merely formal. At sea he was superstitious.

Nevertheless, the storm had never yet arisen which could daunt him. One reason of this was his impatience of opposition. He could tolerate it neither from the ocean nor anything else. He meant to have his way; so much the worse for the sea if it thwarted him. It might try, if it would, but Mess Lethierry would not give in. A refractory wave could no more stop him than an angry neighbour. What he had said was said; what he planned out was done. He bent neither before an objection nor before the tempest. The word “no” had no existence for him, whether it was in the mouth of a man or in the angry muttering of a thunder-cloud. In the teeth of all he went on in his way. He would take no refusals. Hence his obstinacy in life, and his intrepidity on the ocean.

He seasoned his simple meal of fish soup for himself, knowing the quantities of pepper, salt, and herbs which it required, and was as well pleased with the cooking as with the meal. To complete the sketch of Lethierry’s peculiarities, the reader must conjure a being to whom the putting on of a surtout would amount to a transfiguration; whom a landsman’s greatcoat would convert into a strange animal; one who, standing with his locks blown about by the wind, might have represented old Jean Bart, but who, in the landsman’s round hat, would have looked an idiot; awkward in cities, wild and redoubtable at sea; a man with broad shoulders, fit for a porter; one who indulged in no oaths, was rarely in anger, whose voice had a soft accent, which became like thunder in a speaking-trumpet; a peasant who had read something of the philosophy of Diderot and D’Alembert; a Guernsey man who had seen the great Revolution; a learned ignoramus, free from bigotry, but indulging in visions, with more faith in the White Lady than in the Holy Virgin; possessing the strength of Polyphemus, the perseverance of Columbus, with a little of the bull in his nature, and a little of the child. Add to these physical and mental peculiarities a somewhat flat nose, large cheeks, a set of teeth still perfect, a face filled with wrinkles, and which seemed to have been buffeted by the waves and subjected to the beating of the winds of forty years, a brow in which the storm and tempest were plainly written — an incarnation of a rock in the open sea. Add to this, too, a good-tempered smile always ready to light up his weather-beaten countenance, and you have before you Mess Lethierry.

Mess Lethierry had two special objects of affection only. Their names were Durande and Déruchette.

BOOK III

DURANDE AND DÉRUCHETTE

I

PRATTLE AND SMOKE

The human body might well be regarded as a mere simulacrum; but it envelopes our reality, it darkens our light, and broadens the shadow in which we live. The soul is the reality of our existence. Strictly speaking, the human visage is a mask. The true man is that which exists under what is called man. If that being, which thus exists sheltered and secreted behind that illusion which we call the flesh, could be approached, more than one strange revelation would be made. The vulgar error is to mistake the outward husk for the living spirit. Yonder maiden, for example, if we could see her as she really is, might she not figure as some bird of the air?

A bird transmuted into a young maiden, what could be more exquisite? Picture it in your own home, and call it Déruchette. Delicious creature! One might be almost tempted to say, “Good-morning, Mademoiselle Goldfinch.” The wings are invisible, but the chirping may still be heard. Sometimes, too, she pipes a clear, loud song. In her childlike prattle, the creature is, perhaps, inferior; but in her song, how superior to humanity! When womanhood dawns, this angel flies away; but sometimes returns, bringing back a little one to a mother. Meanwhile, she who is one day to be a mother is for a long while a child; the girl becomes a maiden, fresh and joyous as the lark. Noting her movements, we feel as if it was good of her not to fly away. The dear familiar companion moves at her own sweet will about the house; flits from branch to branch, or rather from room to room; goes to and fro; approaches and retires; plumes her wings, or rather combs her hair, and makes all kinds of gentle noises — murmurings of unspeakable delight to certain ears. She asks a question, and is answered; is asked something in return, and chirps a reply. It is delightful to chat with her when tired of serious talk; for this creature carries with her something of her skyey element. She is, as it were, a thread of gold interwoven with your sombre thoughts; you feel almost grateful to her for her kindness in not making herself invisible, when it would be so easy for her to be even impalpable; for the beautiful is a necessary of life. There is, in this world, no function more important than that of being charming. The forest-glade would be incomplete without the humming-bird. To shed joy around, to radiate happiness, to cast light upon dark days, to be the golden thread of our destiny, and the very spirit of grace and harmony, is not this to render a service? Does not beauty confer a benefit upon us, even by the simple fact of being beautiful? Here and there we meet with one who possesses that fairy-like power of enchanting all about her; sometimes she is ignorant herself of this magical influence, which is, however, for that reason, only the more perfect. Her presence lights up the home; her approach is like a cheerful warmth; she passes by; and we are content; she stays awhile, and we are happy. To behold her is to live: she is the Aurora with a human face. She has no need to do more than simply to be: she makes an Eden of the house; Paradise breathes from her; and she communicates this delight to all, without taking any greater trouble than that of existing beside them. Is it not a thing divine to have a smile which, none know how, has the power to lighten the weight of that enormous chain which all the living, in common, drag behind them? Déruchette possessed this smile: we may even say that this smile was Déruchette herself. There is one thing which has more resemblance to ourselves than even our face, and that is our expression: but there is yet another thing which more resembles us than this, and that is our smile. Déruchette smiling was simply Déruchette.

There is something peculiarly attractive in the Jersey and Guernsey race. The women, particularly the young, are remarkable for a pure and exquisite beauty. Their complexion is a combination of the Saxon fairness, with the proverbial ruddiness of the Norman people — rosy cheeks and blue eyes; but the eyes want brilliancy. The English training dulls them. Their liquid glances will be irresistible whenever the secret is found of giving them that depth which is the glory of the Parisienne. Happily Englishwomen are not yet quite transformed into the Parisian type. Déruchette was not a Parisian; yet she was certainly not a Guernesiaise. Lethierry had brought her up to be neat and delicate and pretty; and so she was.

Déruchette had, at times, an air of bewitching langour, and a certain mischief in the eye, which were altogether involuntary. She scarcely knew, perhaps, the meaning of the word love, and yet not unwillingly ensnared those about her in the toils. But all this in her was innocent. She never thought of marrying.

Déruchette had the prettiest little hands in the world, and little feet to match them. Sweetness and goodness reigned throughout her person; her family and fortune were her uncle Mess Lethierry; her occupation was only to live her daily life; her accomplishments were the knowledge of a few songs; her intellectual gifts were summed up in her simple innocence; she had the graceful repose of the West Indian woman, mingled at times with giddiness and vivacity, with the teasing playfulness of a child, yet with a dash of melancholy. Her dress was somewhat rustic, and like that peculiar to her country — elegant, though not in accordance with the fashions of great cities; for she wore flowers in her bonnet all the year round. Add to all this an open brow, a neck supple and graceful, chestnut hair, a fair skin slightly freckled with exposure to the sun, a mouth somewhat large, but well-defined, and visited from time to time by a dangerous smile. This was Déruchette.

Sometimes in the evening, a little after sunset, at the moment when the dusk of the sky mingles with the dusk of the sea, and twilight invests the waves with a mysterious awe, the people beheld, entering the harbour of St. Sampson, upon the dark rolling waters, a strange, undefined thing, a monstrous form which puffed and blew; a horrid machine which roared like a wild beast, and smoked like a volcano; a species of Hydra foaming among the breakers, and leaving behind it a dense cloud, as it rushed on towards the town with a frightful beating of its fins, and a throat belching forth flame. This was Durande.

THE OLD STORY OF UTOPIA

A steamboat was a prodigious novelty in the waters of the Channel in 182-. The whole coast of Normandy was long strangely excited by it. Now-a-days, ten or a dozen steam vessels, crossing and recrossing within the bounds of the horizon, scarcely attract a glance from loiterers on the shore. At the most, some persons, whose interest or business it is to note such things, will observe the indications in their smoke of whether they burn Welsh or Newcastle coal. They pass, and that is all. “Welcome,” if coming home; “a pleasant passage,” if outward bound.

Folks were less calm on the subject of these wonderful inventions in the first quarter of the present century; and the new and strange machines, and their long lines of smoke regarded with no good-will by the Channel Islanders. In that Puritanical Archipelago, where the Queen of England has been censured for violating the Scriptures by using chloroform during her accouchments, the first steam-vessel which made its appearance received the name of the “Devil Boat.” In the eyes of these worthy fishermen, once Catholics, now Calvinists, but always bigots, it seemed to be a portion of the infernal regions which had been somehow set afloat. A local preacher selected for his discourse the question of “Whether man has the right to make fire and water work together when God had divided them. This beast, composed of iron and fire, did it not resemble Leviathan? Was it not an attempt to bring chaos again into the universe? This is not the only occasion on which the progress of civilisation has been stigmatised as a return to chaos.

“A mad notion — a gross delusion — an absurdity!” Such was the verdict of the Academy of Sciences when consulted by Napoleon on the subject of steamboats, early in the present century. The poor fishermen of St. Sampson may be excused for not being, in scientific matters, any wiser than the mathematicians of Paris; and in religious matters, a little island like Guernsey is not bound to be more enlightened than a great continent like America. In the year 1807, when the first steamboat of Fulton, commanded by Livingston, furnished with one of Watt’s engines, sent from England, and manœuvred, besides her ordinary crew, by two Frenchmen only, André

Michaux and another, made her first voyage from New York to Albany, it happened that she set sail on the 17th of August. The Methodists took up this important fact, and in numberless chapels, preachers were heard calling down a malediction on the machine, and declaring that this number 17 was no other than the total of the ten horns and seven heads of the beast of the Apocalypse. In America, they invoked against the steamboats the beast from the book of Revelation; in Europe, the reptile of the book of Genesis. This was the simple difference.

The savants had rejected steamboats as impossible; the priests had anathematised them as impious. Science had condemned, and religion consigned them to perdition. Fulton was a new incarnation of Lucifer. The simple people on the coasts and in the villages were confirmed in their prejudice by the uneasiness which they felt at the outlandish sight. The religious view of steamboats may be summed up as follows: Water and fire were divorced at the creation. This divorce was enjoined by God himself. Man has no right to join what his Maker has put asunder; to reunite what he has disunited. The peasants' view was simply, "I don't like the look of this thing."

No one but Mess Lethierry, perhaps, could have been found at that early period daring enough to dream of such an enterprise as the establishment of a steam-vessel between Guernsey and St. Malo. He, alone, as an independent thinker, was capable of conceiving such an idea, or, as a hardy mariner, of carrying it out. The French part of his nature, probably, conceived the idea; the English part supplied the energy to put it in execution.

How and when this was, we are about to inform the reader.

III

RANTAINE

About forty years before the period of the commencement of our narrative, there stood in the suburbs of Paris, near the city wall, between the Fosse-aux-Loups and the Tombe-Issoire, a house of doubtful reputation. It was a lonely, ruinous building, evidently a place for dark deeds on an occasion. Here lived, with his wife and child, a species of town bandit; a man who had been clerk to an attorney practising at the Châtelet — he figured somewhat later at the Assize Court; the name of this family was Rantaine. On a mahogany chest of drawers in the old house were two china cups, ornamented with flowers, on one of which appeared, in gilt letters, the words, “A souvenir of friendship;” on the other, “A token of esteem.” The child lived in an atmosphere of vice in this miserable home. The father and mother having belonged to the lower middle class, the boy had learnt to read, and they brought it up in a fashion. The mother, pale and almost in rags, gave “instruction,” as she called it, mechanically, to the little one, heard it spell a few words to her, and interrupted the lesson to accompany her husband on some criminal expedition, or to earn the wages of prostitution. Meanwhile, the book remained open on the table as she had left it, and the boy sat beside it, meditating in his way.

The father and mother, detected one day in one of their criminal enterprises, suddenly vanished into that obscurity in which the penal laws envelop convicted malefactors. The child, too, disappeared.

Lethierry, in his wanderings about the world, stumbled, one day, on an adventurer like himself; helped him out of some scrape; rendered him a kindly service, and was apparently repaid with gratitude. He took a fancy to the stranger, picked him up, and brought him to Guernsey, where, finding him intelligent in learning the duties of a sailor aboard a coasting vessel, he made him a companion. This stranger was the little Rantaine, now grown up to manhood.

Rantaine, like Lethierry, had a bull neck, a large and powerful breadth of shoulders for carrying burdens, and loins like those of the Farnese Hercules. Lethierry and he had a remarkable similarity of appearance: Rantaine was the taller. People who saw their forms behind as they were walking side by side along the port, exclaimed, “There are two brothers.” On looking them in the face the effect was different: all that was open in the countenance of Lethierry was reserved and cautious in that of Rantaine. Rantaine was an expert swordsman, played on the harmonica, could snuff a candle at twenty paces with a pistol-ball, could strike a tremendous blow with the fist, recite verses from Voltaire’s Henriade, and interpret dreams; he knew by heart Les Tombeaux de Saint Denis, by Treneuil. He talked sometimes of having had relations with the Sultan of Calicut, “whom the Portuguese call the Zamorin.” If any one had seen the little memorandum-book which he carried about with him, he would have found notes and jottings of this kind: “At Lyons in a fissure of the wall of one of the cells in the prison of St. Joseph, a file.” He spoke always with a grave deliberation; he called himself the son of a Chevalier de Saint Louis. His linen was of a miscellaneous kind, and marked with different initials. Nobody was ever more tender than he was on the point of honour; he fought and killed his man. The mother of a pretty actress could not have an eye more watchful for an insult.

He might have stood for the personification of subtlety under an outer garb of enormous strength.

It was the power of his fist, applied one day at a fair, upon a cabeza de moro, which had originally taken the fancy of Lethierry. No one in Guernsey knew anything of his adventures. They were of a chequered kind. If the great theatre of destiny had a special wardrobe, Rantaine ought to have taken the dress of harlequin. He had lived, and had seen the world. He had run through the gamut of possible trades and qualities; had been a cook at Madagascar, trainer of birds at Honolulu, a religious journalist at the Galapagos Islands, a poet at Oomrawuttee, a freeman at Haiti. In this latter character he had delivered at Grand Goave a funeral oration, of which the local journals have preserved this fragment: “Farewell, then, noble spirit. In the azure vault of the heavens, where thou wingest now thy flight, thou wilt, no doubt, rejoin the good Abbé Leander Crameau, of Little Goave. Tell him that, thanks to ten years of glorious efforts, thou hast completed the church of the Ansa-à-Veau. Adieu! transcendent genius, model mason!” His freemason’s mask did not prevent him, as we see, wearing a little of the Roman Catholic. The former won to his side the men of progress, and the latter the men of order. He declared himself a white of pure caste, and hated the negroes; though, for all that, he would certainly have been an admirer of the Emperor Soulouque. In 1815, at Bordeaux, the glow of his royalist enthusiasm broke forth in the shape of a huge white feather in his cap. His life had been a series of eclipses — of appearances, disappearances, and reappearances. He was a sort of revolving light upon the coasts of scampdom. He knew a little Turkish: instead of “guillotined,” would say “néboïssé.” He had been a slave in Tripoli, in the house of a Thaleb, and had learnt Turkish by dint of blows with a stick. His employment had been to stand at evenings at the doors of the mosque, there to read aloud to the faithful the Koran inscribed upon slips of wood, or pieces of camel leather. It is not improbable that he was a renegade.

He was capable of everything, and something worse.

He had a trick of laughing loud and knitting his brows at the same time. He used to say, “In politics, I esteem only men inaccessible to influences;” or, “I am for decency and good morals;” or, “The pyramid must be replaced upon its base.” His manner was rather cheerful and cordial than otherwise. The expression of his mouth contradicted the sense of his words. His nostrils had an odd way of distending themselves. In the corners of his eyes he had a little network of wrinkles, in which all sorts of dark thoughts seemed to meet together. It was here alone that the secret of his physiognomy could be thoroughly studied. His flat foot was a vulture’s claw. His skull was low at the top and large about the temples. His ill-shapen ear, bristled with hair, seemed to say, “Beware of speaking to the animal in this cave.”

One fine day, in Guernsey, Rantaine was suddenly missing.

Lethierry’s partner had absconded, leaving the treasury of their partnership empty.

In this treasury there was some money of Rantaine’s, no doubt, but there were also fifty thousand francs belonging to Lethierry.

By forty years of industry and probity as a coaster and ship carpenter, Lethierry had saved one hundred thousand francs. Rantaine robbed him of half the sum.

Half ruined, Lethierry did not lose heart, but began at once to think how to repair his misfortune. A stout heart may be ruined in fortune, but not in spirit. It was just about that time that people began to talk of the new kind of boat to be moved by steam-engines. Lethierry conceived the idea of trying Fulton’s invention, so much disputed about; and by one of these fire-boats to connect the Channel Islands with the French coast. He staked his all upon this idea; he devoted to it the wreck of his savings. Accordingly, six months after Rantaine’s flight, the astonished people of St. Sampson beheld, issuing from the port, a vessel discharging huge volumes of smoke, and looking like a ship a-fire at sea. This was the first steam-vessel to navigate the Channel.

This vessel, to which the people in their dislike and contempt for novelty immediately gave the nickname of “Lethierry’s Galley,” was announced as intended to maintain a constant communication between Guernsey and St. Malo.

IV

CONTINUATION OF THE STORY OF UTOPIA

It may be well imagined that the new enterprise did not prosper much at first. The owners of cutters passing between the Island of Guernsey and the French coast were loud in their outcries. They denounced this attack upon the Holy Scriptures and their monopoly. The chapels began to fulminate against it. One reverend gentleman, named Elihu, stigmatised the new steam-vessel as an “atheistical construction,” and the sailing-boat was declared the only orthodox craft. The people saw the horns of the devil among the beasts which the fireship carried to and fro. This storm of protest continued a considerable time. At last, however, it began to be perceived that these animals arrived less tired and sold better, their meat being superior; that the sea risk was less also for passengers; that this mode of travelling was less expensive, shorter, and more sure; that they started at a fixed time, and arrived at a fixed time; that consignments of fish travelling faster arrived fresher, and that it was now possible to find a sale in the French markets for the surplus of great takes of fish so common in Guernsey. The butter, too, from the far-famed Guernsey cows, made the passage quicker in the “Devil Boat” than in the old sailing vessels, and lost nothing of its good quality, insomuch that Dinan, in Brittany, began to become a customer for it, as well as St. Brieuc and Rennes. In short, thanks to what they called “Lethierry’s Galley,” the people enjoyed safe travelling, regular communication, prompt and easy passages to and fro, an increase of circulation, an extension of markets and of commerce, and, finally, it was felt that it was necessary to patronise this “Devil Boat,” which flew in the face of the Holy Scriptures, and brought wealth to the island. Some daring spirits even went so far as to express a positive satisfaction at it. Sieur Landoys, the registrar, bestowed his approval upon the vessel — an undoubted piece of impartiality on his part, as he did not like Lethierry. For, first of all, Lethierry was entitled to the dignity of “Mess,” while Landoys was merely “Sieur Landoys.” Then, although registrar of St. Peter’s Port, Landoys was a parishioner of St. Sampson. Now, there was not in the entire parish another man besides them devoid of prejudices. It seemed little enough, therefore, to indulge themselves with a detestation of each other. Two of a trade, says the proverb, rarely agree.

Sieur Landoys, however, had the honesty to support the steamboat. Others followed Landoys. By little and little, these facts multiplied. The growth of opinion is like the rising tide. Time and the continued and increasing success of the venture, with the evidence of real service rendered and the improvement in the general welfare, gradually converted the people; and the day at length arrived when, with the exception of a few wiseacres, every one admired “Lethierry’s Galley.”

It would probably win less admiration now-a-days. This steamboat of forty years since would doubtless provoke a smile among our modern boat-builders; for this marvel was ill-shaped; this prodigy was clumsy and infirm.

The distance between our grand Atlantic steam-vessels of the present day and the boats with wheel-paddles which Denis Papin floated on the Fulda in 1707, is not greater than that between a three-decker, like the Montebello, 200 feet long, having a mainyard of 115 feet, carrying a weight of 3000 tons, 1100 men, 120 guns, 10,000 cannon-balls, and 160 packages of canister, belching forth at every broadside, when in action, 3300 pounds of iron, and spreading to the wind, when it moves, 5600 square mètres of canvas, and the old Danish galley of the second century, discovered, full of stone hatchets, and bows and clubs, in the mud of the seashore, at Wester-Satrup, and preserved at the Hotel de Ville at Flensburg.

Exactly one hundred years — from 1707 to 1807 — separate the first paddle-boat of Papin from the first steamboat of Fulton. “Lethierry’s Galley” was assuredly a great improvement upon those two rough sketches; but it was itself only a sketch. For all that, it was a masterpiece in its way. Every scientific discovery in embryo presents that double aspect — a monster in the fœtus, a marvel in the germ.

V

THE DEVIL BOAT

“Lethierry’s Galley” was not masted with a view to sailing well; a fact which was not a defect; it is, indeed, one of the laws of naval construction. Besides, her motive power being steam, her sails were only accessory. A paddle steamboat, moreover, is almost insensible to sails. The new steam-vessel was too short, round, and thick-set. She had too much bow, and too great a breadth of quarter. The daring of inventors had not yet reached the point of making a steam-vessel light; Lethierry’s boat had some of the defects of Gilliatt’s Dutch sloop. She pitched very little, but she rolled a good deal. Her paddle-boxes were too high. She had too much beam for her length. The massive machinery encumbered her, and to make her capable of carrying a heavy cargo, her constructors had raised her bulwarks to an unusual height, giving to the vessel the defects of old seventy-fours, a bastard model which would have to be cut down to render them really seaworthy, or fit to go into action. Being short, she ought to have been able to veer quickly — the time employed in a manœuvre of that kind being in proportion to the length of the vessel — but her weight deprived her of the advantage of her shortness. Her midship-frame was too broad, a fact which retarded her; the resistance of the sea being proportioned to the largest section below the water-line, and to the square of the speed. Her prow was vertical, which would not be regarded as a fault at the present day, but at that period this portion of the construction was invariably sloped at an angle of forty-five degrees. All the curving lines of the hull agreed well together, but it was not long enough for oblique sailing, or for lying parallel with the water displaced, which should always be thrown off laterally. In rough weather she drew too much water, sometimes fore, sometimes aft, which showed that her centre of gravity was not rightly adjusted. Owing to the weight of the engine, the cargo shifted, so that the centre of gravity was often aft of the mainmast, and then steam power had to be resorted to, for at such times the mainsail had to be furled as it only made the vessel fall off. If close to the wind, very careful manœuvring was required. The rudder was the old-fashioned bar-rudder, not the wheeled one of the present time. Two skiffs, a species of you-yous, were suspended to the davits. The vessel had four anchors; the sheet-anchor, the second or working anchor, and two bower-anchors. These four anchors, slung by chains, were moved, according to the occasion, by the great capstan of the poop, or by the small capstan at the prow. At that period the pump windlass had not superseded the intermitting efforts of the old handspike. Having only two bower-anchors, one on the starboard and the other on the larboard side, the vessel could not move conveniently in certain winds, though she could aid herself at such times with the second anchor. Her buoys were normal, and so constructed that they carried the weight of the buoy-ropes without dipping. The launch was of a useful size, of service in all cases of need, and able to raise the main anchor. A novelty about her was that she was rigged with chains, which in no way detracted, however, from the mobility of the running rigging, or from the firmness of the standing rigging. The masts, yards, etc., although not of first-rate quality, were not in any way amiss, and the rigging at the mast-head was not very noticeable. The ribs were solid, but coarse, less delicacy of wood being required for steam than for sail. Her speed was six knots an hour. When lying-to she rode well. Take her as she was, “Lethierry’s Galley” was a good sea boat; but people felt, that in moments of danger from reefs or waterspouts, she would be hardly manageable. Unhappily her build made her roll about on the waves, with a perpetual creaking like that of a new shoe.

She was, above all, a merchandise boat, and, like all ships built more for commerce than for fighting, was constructed exclusively with a view to stowage. She carried few passengers. The transport of cattle rendered stowage difficult and very peculiar. Vessels carried bullocks at that time in the hold, which was a complication of the difficulty. At the present day they are stowed on the fore-deck. The paddle-boxes of Lethierry’s “Devil Boat” were painted white, the hull, down to the water-line, red, and all the rest of the vessel black, according to the somewhat ugly fashion of this century. When empty she drew seven feet of water, and when laden fourteen.

With regard to the engine, it was of considerable power. To speak exactly, its power was equal to that of one horse to every three tons burden, which is almost equal to that of a tugboat. The paddles were well placed, a little in advance of the centre of gravity of the vessel. The maximum pressure of the engine was equal to two atmospheres. It consumed a great deal of coal, although it was constructed on the condensation and expansion principles. It had no fly-wheel on account of the instability of the point of support, but this was then, as now, compensated for by two cranks at the extremities of the revolving shaft, so arranged that one was always at right angles when the other was at dead-point. The whole rested on a single sheet of cast-iron, so that even in case of any serious damage, no shock of the waves could upset its equilibrium, and even if the hull were injured the engine would remain intact. To render it stronger still, the connecting-rod had been placed near the steam-cylinders, so that the centre of oscillation of the working-beam was transferred from the middle to the end. Since then oscillating cylinders have been invented which do away with the necessity of connecting-rods, but in those days the placing of the connecting-rod near the cylinder was thought a triumph of engineering. The boiler was in sections and provided with a salt-water pump. The wheels were very large, which lessened the loss of power; the smoke-stack was lofty, which increased the draught. On the other hand, the size of the wheels exposed them to the force of the waves, and the height of the smoke-stack to the violence of the wind. Wooden paddle-floats, iron clamps, bosses of cast-iron — such were the wheels, which, well constructed, could, strange though it may seem, be taken to pieces. Three floats were always under water. The speed of the centre of the floats only exceeded by a sixth the speed of the vessel itself; this was the chief defect of the wheels. Moreover, the cranks were too long, and the slide-valve caused too much friction in the admission of steam into the cylinder. For that period the engine seemed, and indeed was, admirable. It had been constructed in France, at the works at Bercy. Mess Lethierry had roughly sketched it: the engineer who had constructed it in accordance with his diagram was dead, so that the engine was unique, and probably could not have been replaced. The designer still lived, but the constructor was no more.

The engine had cost forty thousand francs.

Lethierry had himself constructed the “Devil Boat” upon the great covered stocks by the side of the first tower between St. Peter’s Port and St. Sampson. He had been to Brême to buy the wood. All his skill as a shipwright was exhausted in its construction; his ingenuity might be seen in the planks, the seams of which were straight and even, and covered with sarangousti, an Indian mastic, better than resin. The sheathing was well beaten. To remedy the roundness of the hull, Lethierry had fitted out a boom at the bowsprit, which allowed him to add a false spritsail to the regular one. On the day of the launch, he cried aloud, “At last I am afloat!” The vessel was successful, in fact, as the reader has already learnt.

Either by chance or design she had been launched on the 14th of July, the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille. On that day, mounted upon the bridge between the two paddle-boxes, looked Lethierry upon the sea, and exclaimed, “It is your turn now! The Parisians took the Bastille, now science takes the sea.”

Lethierry’s boat made the voyage from Guernsey to St. Malo once a week. She started on the Tuesday morning, and returned on the Friday evening, in time for the Saturday market. She was a stronger craft than any of the largest coasting sloops in all the Archipelago, and her capacity being in proportion to her dimensions, one of her voyages was equal to four voyages of an ordinary boat in the same trade; hence they were very profitable. The reputation of a vessel depends on its stowage, and Lethierry was an admirable stower of cargo. When he was no longer able to work himself, he trained up a sailor to undertake this duty. At the end of two years, the steamboat brought in a clear seven hundred and fifty pounds sterling a year, or eighteen thousand francs. The pound sterling of Guernsey is worth twenty-four francs only, that of England twenty-five, and that of Jersey twenty-six. These differences are less unimportant than they seem: the banks, at all events, know how to turn them to advantage.

VI

LETHIERRY’S EXALTATION

The “Devil Boat” prospered. Mess Lethierry began to look forward to the time when he should be called “Monsieur.” At Guernsey, people do not become “Monsieurs” at one bound. Between the plain man and the gentleman, there is quite a scale to climb. To begin with, we have the simple name, plain “Peter,” let us suppose; the second step is “Neighbour Peter;” the third, “Father Peter;” the fourth, “Sieur Peter;” the fifth, “Mess Peter;” and then we reach the summit in “Monsieur Peter.”

This scale ascending thus from the ground is carried to still greater heights. All the upper classes of England join on and continue it. Here are the various steps, becoming more and more glorious. Above the Monsieur, or “Mr.,” there is the “Esquire;” above the squire, the knight; above the knight, still rising, we have the baronet, the Scotch laird, the baron, the viscount, the earl (called count in France, and jarl in Norway); the marquis, the duke, the prince of the blood royal, and the king: so, by degrees, we ascend from the people to the middle class, from the middle class to the baronetage, from the baronetage to the peerage, from the peerage to royalty.

Thanks to his successful ingenuity, thanks to steam, and his engines, and the “Devil Boat,” Mess Lethierry was fast becoming an important personage. When building his vessel he had been compelled to borrow money. He had become indebted at Brême, he had become indebted at St. Malo; but every year he diminished his obligations.

He had, moreover, purchased on credit, at the very entrance to the port of St. Sampson, a pretty stone-built house, entirely new, situate between the sea and a garden. On the corner of this house was inscribed the name of the “Bravées.” Its front formed a part of the wall of the port itself, and it was remarkable for a double row of windows: on the north, alongside a little enclosure filled with flowers, and on the south commanding a view of the ocean. It had thus two façades, one open to the tempest and the sea, the other looking into a garden filled with roses.

These two frontages seemed made for the two inmates of the house — Mess Lethierry and Déruchette.

The “Bravées” was popular at St. Sampson, for Mess Lethierry had at length become a popular man. This popularity was due partly to his good nature, his devotedness, and his courage; partly to the number of lives he had saved; and a great deal to his success, and to the fact that he had awarded to St. Sampson the honour of being the port of the departure and arrival of the new steamboat. Having made the discovery that the “Devil Boat” was decidedly a success, St. Peter’s, the capital, desired to obtain it for that port, but Lethierry held fast to St. Sampson. It was his native town. “It was there that I was first pitched into the water,” he used to say; hence his great local popularity. His position as a small landed proprietor paying land-tax, made him, what they call in Guernsey, an unhabitant. He was chosen douzenier. The poor sailor had mounted five out of six steps of the Guernsey social scale; he had attained the dignity of “Mess”; he was rapidly approaching the Monsieur; and who could predict whether he might not even rise higher than that? who could say that they might not one day find in the almanack of Guernsey, under the heading of “Nobility and Gentry,” the astonishing and superb inscription, — Lethierry, Esq.?

But Mess Lethierry had nothing of vanity in his nature, or he had no sense of it; or if he had, disdained it: to know that he was useful was his greatest pleasure; to be popular touched him less than being necessary; he had, as we have already said, only two objects of delight, and consequently only two ambitions: the Durande and Déruchette.

However this may have been, he had embarked in the lottery of the sea, and had gained the chief prize.

This chief prize was the Durande steaming away in all her pride.

THE SAME GODFATHER AND THE SAME PATRON SAINT

Having created his steamboat, Lethierry had christened it: he had called it Durande— “La Durande.” We will speak of her henceforth by no other name; we will claim the liberty, also, in spite of typographical usage, of not italicising this name Durande; conforming in this to the notion of Mess Lethierry, in whose eyes La Durande was almost a living person.

Durande and Déruchette are the same name. Déruchette is the diminutive.

This diminutive is very common in France.

In the country the names of saints are endowed with all these diminutives as well as all their augmentatives. One might suppose there were several persons when there is, in fact, only one. This system of patrons and patronesses under different names is by no means rare. Lise, Lisette, Lisa, Elisa, Isabelle, Lisbeth, Betsy, all these are simply Elizabeth. It is probable that Mahout, Maclou, Malo, and Magloire are the same saint: this, however, we do not vouch for.

Saint Durande is a saint of l’Angoumois, and of the Charente; whether she is an orthodox member of the calendar is a question for the Bollandists: orthodox or not, she has been made the patron saint of numerous chapels.

It was while Lethierry was a young sailor at Rochefort that he had made the acquaintance of this saint, probably in the person of some pretty Charantaise, perhaps in that of the grisette with the white nails. The saint had remained sufficiently in his memory for him to give the name to the two things which he loved most — Durande to the steamboat, Déruchette to the girl.

Of one he was the father, of the other the uncle.

Déruchette was the daughter of a brother who had died: she was an orphan child: he had adopted her, and had taken the place both of father and mother.

Déruchette was not only his niece, she was his godchild; he had held her in his arms at the baptismal font; it was he who had chosen her patron saint, Durande, and her Christian name, Déruchette.

Déruchette, as we have said, was born at St. Peter's Port. Her name was inscribed at its date on the register of the parish.

As long as the niece was a child, and the uncle poor, nobody took heed of her appellation of Déruchette; but when the little girl became a miss, and the sailor a gentleman, the name of Déruchette shocked the feelings of Guernsey society. The uncouthness of the sound astonished every one. Folks asked Mess Lethierry "why Déruchette?" He answered, "It is a very good name in its way." Several attempts were made to get him to obtain a change in the baptismal name, but he would be no party to them. One day, a fine lady of the upper circle of society in St. Sampson, the wife of a rich retired ironfounder, said to Mess Lethierry, "In future, I shall call your daughter Nancy."

"If names of country towns are in fashion," said he, "why not Lons le Saulnier?" The fine lady did not yield her point, and on the morrow said, "We are determined not to have it Déruchette; I have found for your daughter a pretty name — Marianne." "A very pretty name, indeed," replied Mess Lethierry, "composed of two words which signify — a husband and an ass." He held fast to Déruchette.

It would be a mistake to infer from Lethierry's pun that he had no wish to see his niece married. He desired to see her married, certainly; but in his own way: he intended her to have a husband after his own heart, one who would work hard, and whose wife would have little to do. He liked rough hands in a man, and delicate ones in a woman. To prevent Déruchette spoiling her pretty hands he had always brought her up like a young lady; he had provided her with a music-master, a piano, a little library, and a few needles and threads in a pretty work-basket. She was, indeed, more often reading than stitching; more often playing than reading. This was as Mess Lethierry wished it. To be charming was all that he expected of her. He had reared the young girl like a flower. Whoever has studied the character of sailors will understand this: rude and hard in their nature, they have an odd partiality for grace and delicacy. To realise the idea of the uncle, the niece ought to have been rich; so indeed felt Mess Lethierry. His steamboat voyaged for this end. The mission of Durande was to provide a marriage portion for Déruchette.

VIII

“BONNIE DUNDEE”

Déruchette occupied the prettiest room at the Bravées. It had two windows, was furnished with various articles made of fine-grained mahogany, had a bed with four curtains, green and white, and looked out upon the garden, and beyond it towards the high hill, on which stands the Vale Castle. Gilliatt’s house, the Bû de la Rue, was on the other side of this hill.

Déruchette had her music and piano in this chamber; she accompanied herself on the instrument when singing the melody which she preferred — the melancholy Scottish air of “Bonnie Dundee.” The very spirit of night breathes in this melody; but her voice was full of the freshness of dawn. The contrast was quaint and pleasing; people said, “Miss Déruchette is at her piano.”

The passers-by at the foot of the hill stopped sometimes before the wall of the garden of the Bravées to listen to that sweet voice and plaintive song.

Déruchette was the very embodiment of joy as she went to and fro in the house. She brought with her a perpetual spring. She was beautiful, but more pretty than beautiful; and still more graceful than pretty. She reminded the good old pilots, friends of Mess Lethierry, of that princess in the song which the soldiers and sailors sing, who was so beautiful:

“Qu’elle passait pour telle dans le regiment.”

Mess Lethierry used to say, “She has a head of hair like a ship’s cable.”

From her infancy she had been remarkable for beauty. The learned in such matters had grave doubts about her nose, but the little one having probably determined to be pretty, had finally satisfied their requirements. She grew to girlhood without any serious loss of beauty; her nose became neither too long nor too short; and when grown up, her critics admitted her to be charming.

She never addressed her uncle otherwise than as father.

Lethierry allowed her to soil her fingers a little in gardening, and even in some kind of household duties: she watered her beds of pink hollyhocks, purple foxgloves, perennial phloxes, and scarlet herb bennets. She took good advantage of the climate of Guernsey, so favourable to flowers. She had, like many other persons there, aloes in the open ground, and, what is more difficult, she succeeded in cultivating the Nepaulese cinquefoil. Her little kitchen-garden was scientifically arranged; she was able to produce from it several kinds of rare vegetables. She sowed Dutch cauliflower and Brussels cabbages, which she thinned out in July, turnips for August, endive for September, short parsnip for the autumn, and rampions for winter. Mess Lethierry did not interfere with her in this, so long as she did not handle the spade and rake too much, or meddle with the coarser kinds of garden labour. He had provided her with two servants, one named Grace, and the other Douce, which are favourite names in Guernsey. Grace and Douce did the hard work of the house and garden, and they had the right to have red hands.

With regard to Mess Lethierry, his room was a little retreat with a view over the harbour, and communicating with the great lower room of the ground floor, on which was situated the door of the house, near which the various staircases met.

His room was furnished with his hammock, his chronometer, and his pipe: there were also a table and a chair. The ceiling had been whitewashed, as well as the four walls. A fine marine map, bearing the inscription W. Faden, 5 Charing Cross, Geographer to His Majesty, and representing the Channel Islands, was nailed up at the side of the door, and on the left, stretched out and fastened with other nails, appeared one of those large cotton handkerchiefs on which are printed, in colours, the signals of all countries in the world, having at the four corners the standards of France, Russia, Spain, and the United States, and in the centre the union-jack of England.

Douce and Grace were two faithful creatures within certain limits. Douce was good-natured enough, and Grace was probably good-looking. Douce was unmarried, and had secretly “a gallant.” In the Channel Islands the word is common, as indeed is the fact itself. The two girl’s regarded as servants had something of the Creole in their character, a sort of slowness in their movements, not out of keeping with the Norman spirit pervading the relations of servant and master in the Channel Islands. Grace, coquettish and good-looking, was always scanning the future with a nervous anxiety. This arose from the fact of her not only having, like Douce, “a gallant,” but also, as the scandal-loving averred, a sailor husband, whose return one day was a thing she dreaded. This, however, does not concern us. In a household less austere and less innocent, Douce would have continued to be the servant, but Grace would have become the soubrette. The dangerous talents of Grace were lost upon a young mistress so pure and good as Déruchette. For the rest, the intrigues of Douce and Grace were cautiously concealed. Mess Lethierry knew nothing of such matters, and no token of them had ever reached Déruchette.

The lower room of the ground floor, a hall with a large fireplace and surrounded with benches and tables, had served in the last century as a meeting-place for a conventicle of French Protestant refugees. The sole ornament of the bare stone wall was a sheet of parchment, set in a frame of black wood, on which were represented some of the charitable deeds of the great Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux. Some poor diocesans of this famous orator, surnamed the “Eagle,” persecuted by him at the time of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and driven to take shelter at Guernsey, had hung this picture on the wall to preserve the remembrance of those facts. The spectator who had the patience to decipher a rude handwriting in faded ink might have learnt the following facts, which are but little known: —”29th October, 1685, Monsieur the Bishop of Meaux, appeals to the king to destroy the temples of Morcef and Nanteuil”—”2nd April, 1686, Arrest of Cochard, father and son, for their religious opinions, at the request of Monsieur the Bishop of Meaux. Released: the Cochards having recanted.”—”28th October, 1699, Monsieur the Bishop of Meaux sent to Mde. Pontchartrain a petition of remonstrance, pointing out that it will be necessary to place the young ladies named Chalandes and de Neuville, who are of the reformed religion, in the House of the ‘New Catholics’ at Paris.”—”7th July, 1703, the king’s order executed as requested by Monsieur the Bishop of Meaux, for shutting up in an asylum Baudouin and his wife, two bad Catholics of Fublaines.”

At the end of the hall, near the door of Mess Lethierry’s room, was a little corner with a wooden partition, which had been the Huguenot’s sanctum, and had become, thanks to its row of rails and a small hole to pass paper or money through, the steamboat office; that is to say, the office of the Durande, kept by Mess Lethierry in person. Upon the old oaken reading-desk, where once rested the Holy Bible, lay a great ledger with its alternate pages headed Dr. and Cr.

IX

THE MAN WHO DISCOVERED RANTAINE'S CHARACTER

As long as Mess Lethierry had been able to do duty, he had commanded the Durande, and had had no other pilot or captain but himself; but a time had come, as we have said, when he had been compelled to find a successor. He had chosen for that purpose Sieur Clubin, of Torteval, a taciturn man. Sieur Clubin had a character upon the coast for strict probity. He became the alter ego, the double, of Mess Lethierry.

Sieur Clubin, although he had rather the look of a notary than of a sailor, was a mariner of rare skill. He had all the talents which are required to meet dangers of every kind. He was a skilful stower, a safe man aloft, an able and careful boatswain, a powerful steersman, an experienced pilot, and a bold captain. He was prudent, and he carried his prudence sometimes to the point of daring, which is a great quality at sea. His natural apprehensiveness of danger was tempered by a strong instinct of what was possible in an emergency. He was one of those mariners who will face risks to a point perfectly well known to themselves, and who generally manage to come successfully out of every peril. Every certainty which a man can command, dealing with so fickle an element as the sea, he possessed. Sieur Clubin, moreover, was a renowned swimmer; he was one of that race of men broken into the buffeting of the waves, who can remain as long as they please in the water — who can start from the Havre-des-Pas at Jersey, double the Colettes, swim round the Hermitage and Castle Elizabeth, and return in two hours to the point from which they started. He came from Torteval, where he had the reputation of often having swum across the passage so much dreaded, from the Hanway rocks to the point of Pleinmont.

One circumstance which had recommended Sieur Clubin to Mess Lethierry more than any other, was his having judged correctly the character of Rantaine. He had pointed out to Lethierry the dishonesty of the man, and had said "Rantaine will rob you." His prediction was verified. More than once — in matters, it is true, not very important — Mess Lethierry had put his ever-scrupulous honesty to the proof; and he freely communicated with him on the subject of his affairs. Mess Lethierry used to say, "A good conscience expects to be treated with perfect confidence."

X

LONG YARNS

Mess Lethierry, for the sake of his own ease, always wore his seafaring clothes, and preferred his tarpaulin overcoat to his pilot jacket. Déruchette felt vexed, occasionally, about this peculiarity. Nothing is prettier than a pouting beauty. She laughed and scolded. “My dear father,” she would say, “what a smell of pitch!” and she would give him a gentle tap upon his broad shoulders.

This good old seaman had gathered from his voyages many wonderful stories. He had seen at Madagascar birds’ feathers, three of which sufficed to make a roof of a house. He had seen in India, field sorrel, the stalks of which were nine inches high. In New Holland he had seen troops of turkeys and geese led about and guarded by a bird, like a flock by a shepherd’s dog; this bird was called the Agami. He had visited elephants’ cemeteries. In Africa, he had encountered gorillas, a terrible species of man-monkey. He knew the ways of all the ape tribe, from the wild dog-faced monkey, which he called the Macaco-bravo, to the howling monkey or Macaco-barbado. In Chili, he had seen a pouched monkey move the compassion of the huntsman by showing its little one. He had seen in California a hollow trunk of a tree fall to the ground, so vast that a man on horseback could ride one hundred paces inside. In Morocco, he had seen the Mozabites and the Bisskris fighting with matraks and bars of iron — the Bisskris, because they had been called kelbs, which means dogs; and the Mozabites, because they had been treated as khamsi, which means people of the fifth sect. He had seen in China the pirate Chanh-thong-quan-larh-Quoi cut to pieces for having assassinated the Ap of a village. At Thu-dan-mot, he had seen a lion carry off an old woman in the open market-place. He was present at the arrival of the Great Serpent brought from Canton to Saigon to celebrate in the pagoda of Cho-len the fête of Quan-nam, the goddess of navigators. He had beheld the great Quan-Sû among the Moi. At Rio de Janeiro, he had seen the Brazilian ladies in the evening put little balls of gauze into their hair, each containing a beautiful kind of firefly; and the whole forming a head-dress of little twinkling lights. He had combated in Paraguay with swarms of enormous ants and spiders, big and downy as an infant’s head, and compassing with their long legs a third of a yard, and attacking men by pricking them with their bristles, which enter the skin as sharp as arrows, and raise painful blisters. On the river Arinos, a tributary of the Tocantins, in the virgin forests to the north of Diamantina, he had determined the existence of the famous bat-shaped people, the Murcilagos, or men who are born with white hair and red eyes, who live in the shady solitudes of the woods, sleep by day, awake by night, and fish and hunt in the dark, seeing better then than by the light of the moon. He told how, near Beyrout, once in an encampment of an expedition of which he formed part, a rain gauge belonging to one of the party happened to be stolen from a tent. A wizard, wearing two or three strips of leather only, and looking like a man having nothing on but his braces, thereupon rang a bell at the end of a horn so violently, that a hyena finally answered the summons by bringing back the missing instrument. The hyena was, in fact, the thief. These veritable histories bore a strong resemblance to fictions; but they amused Déruchette.

The poupée or "doll" of the Durande, as the people of the Channel Islands call the figure-head of a ship, was the connecting link between the vessel and Lethierry's niece. In the Norman Islands the figure-head of a ship, a roughly-carved wooden statue, is called the Poupée. Hence the local saying, meaning to sail, "être entre poupe et poupée."

The poupée of the Durande was particularly dear to Mess Lethierry. He had instructed the carver to make it resemble Déruchette. It looked like a rude attempt to cut out a face with a hatchet; or like a clumsy log trying hard to look like a girl.

This unshapely block produced a great effect upon Mess Lethierry's imagination. He looked upon it with an almost superstitious admiration. His faith in it was complete. He was able to trace in it an excellent resemblance to Déruchette. Thus the dogma resembles the truth, and the idol the deity.

Mess Lethierry had two grand fête days in every week; one was Tuesday, the other Friday. His first delight consisted in seeing the Durande weigh anchor; his second in seeing her enter the port again. He leaned upon his elbows at the window contemplating his work, and was happy.

On Fridays, the presence of Mess Lethierry at his window was a signal. When people passing the Bravées saw him lighting his pipe, they said, "Ay! the steamboat is in sight." One kind of smoke was the herald of the other.

The Durande, when she entered the port, made her cable fast to a huge iron ring under Mess Lethierry's window, and fixed in the basement of the house. On those nights Lethierry slept soundly in his hammock, with a soothing consciousness of the presence of Déruchette asleep in her room near him, and of the Durande moored opposite.

The moorings of the Durande were close to the great bell of the port. A little strip of quay passed thence before the door of the Bravées.

The quay, the Bravées and its house, the garden, the alleys bordered with edges, and the greater part even of the surrounding houses, no longer exist. The demand for Guernsey granite has invaded these too. The whole of this part of the town is now occupied by stone-cutters’ yards.

XI

MATRIMONIAL PROSPECTS

Déruchette was approaching womanhood, and was still unmarried.

Mess Lethierry in bringing her up to have white hands had also rendered her somewhat fastidious. A training of that kind has its disadvantages; but Lethierry was himself still more fastidious. He would have liked to have provided at the same time for both his idols; to have found in the guide and companion of the one a commander for the other. What is a husband but the pilot on the voyage of matrimony? Why not then the same conductor for the vessel and for the girl? The affairs of a household have their tides, their ebbs and flows, and he who knows how to steer a bark, ought to know how to guide a woman's destiny, subject as both are to the influences of the moon and the wind. Sieur Clubin being only fifteen years younger than Lethierry, would necessarily be only a provisional master for the Durande. It would be necessary to find a young captain, a permanent master, a true successor of the founder, inventor, and creator of the first channel steamboat. A captain for the Durande who should come up to his ideal, would have been, already, almost a son-in-law in Lethierry's eyes. Why not make him son-in-law in a double sense? The idea pleased him. The husband in posse of Déruchette haunted his dreams. His ideal was a powerful seaman, tanned and browned by weather, a sea athlete. This, however, was not exactly the ideal of Déruchette. Her dreams, if dreams they could even be called, were of a more ethereal character.

The uncle and the niece were at all events agreed in not being in haste to seek a solution of these problems. When Déruchette began to be regarded as a probable heiress, a crowd of suitors had presented themselves. Attentions under these circumstances are not generally worth much. Mess Lethierry felt this. He would grumble out the old French proverb, "A maiden of gold, a suitor of brass." He politely showed the fortune-seekers to the door. He was content to wait, and so was Déruchette.

It was, perhaps, a singular fact, that he had little inclination for the local aristocracy. In that respect Mess Lethierry showed himself not entirely English. It will hardly be believed that he even refused for Déruchette a Ganduel of Jersey, and a Bugnet Nicolin of Sark. People were bold enough to affirm, although we doubt if this were possible, that he had even declined the proposals of a member of the family of Edou, which is evidently descended from “Edou-ard” (Anglicè Edward) the Confessor.

XII

AN ANOMALY IN THE CHARACTER OF LETHIERRY

Mess Lethierry had a failing, and a serious one. He detested a priest; though not as an individual, but as an institution. Reading one day — for he used to read — in a work of Voltaire — for he would even read Voltaire — the remark, that priests “have something cat-like in their nature,” he laid down the book and was heard to mutter, “Then, I suppose, I have something dog-like in mine.”

It must be remembered that the priests — Lutheran and Calvinist, as well as Catholic — had vigorously combated the new “Devil Boat,” and had persecuted its inventor. To be a sort of revolutionist in the art of navigation, to introduce a spirit of progress in the Norman Archipelago, to disturb the peace of the poor little island of Guernsey with a new invention, was in their eyes, as we have not concealed from the reader, an abominable and most condemnable rashness. Nor had they omitted to condemn it pretty loudly. It must not be forgotten that we are now speaking of the Guernsey clergy of a bygone generation, very different from that of the present time, who in almost all the local places of worship display a laudable sympathy with progress. They had embarrassed Lethierry in a hundred ways; every sort of resisting force which can be found in sermons and discourses had been employed against him. Detested by the churchmen, he naturally came to detest them in his turn. Their hatred was the extenuating circumstance to be taken into account in judging of his.

But it must be confessed that his dislike for priests was, in some degree, in his very nature. It was hardly necessary for them to hate him in order to inspire him with aversion. As he said, he moved among them like the dog among cats. He had an antipathy to them, not only in idea, but in what is more difficult to analyse, his instincts. He felt their secret claws, and showed his teeth; sometimes, it must be confessed, a little at random and out of season. It is a mistake to make no distinctions: a dislike in the mass is a prejudice. The good Savoyard curé would have found no favour in his eyes. It is not certain that a worthy priest was even a possible thing in Lethierry’s mind. His philosophy was carried so far that his good sense sometimes abandoned him. There is such a thing as the intolerance of tolerants, as well as the violence of moderates. But Lethierry was at bottom too good-natured to be a thorough hater. He did not attack so much as avoid. He kept the church people at a distance. He suffered evil at their hands; but he confined himself to not wishing them any good. The shade of difference, in fact, between his aversion and theirs, lay in the fact that they bore animosity, while he had only a strong antipathy. Small as is the island of Guernsey, it has, unfortunately, plenty of room for differences of religion; there, to take the broad distinction, is the Catholic faith and the Protestant faith; every form of worship has its temple or chapel. In Germany, at Heidelberg, for example, people are not so particular; they divide a church in two, one half for St. Peter, the other half for Calvin, and between the two is a partition to prevent religious variances terminating in fisticuffs. The shares are equal; the Catholics have three altars, the Huguenots three altars. As the services are at the same hours, one bell summonses both denominations to prayers; it rings, in fact, both for God and for Satan, according as each pleases to regard it. Nothing can be more simple.

The phlegmatic character of the Germans favours, I suppose, this peculiar arrangement, but in Guernsey every religion has its own domicile; there is the orthodox parish and the heretic parish; the individual may choose. “Neither one nor the other” was the choice of Mess Lethierry.

This sailor, workman, philosopher, and parvenu trader, though a simple man in appearance, was by no means simple at bottom. He had his opinions and his prejudices. On the subject of the priests he was immovable; he would have entered the lists with Montlosier.

Occasionally he indulged in rather disrespectful jokes upon this subject. He had certain odd expressions thereupon peculiar to himself, but significant enough. Going to confession he called “combing one’s conscience.” The little learning that he had — a certain amount of reading picked up here and there between the squalls at sea — did not prevent his making blunders in spelling. He made also mistakes in pronunciation, some of which, however, gave a double sense to his words, which might have been suspected of a sly intention. After peace had been brought about by Waterloo between the France of Louis XVIII. and the England of Wellington, Mess Lethierry was heard to say, “Bour mont a été le traître d’union entre les deux camps.” On one occasion he wrote pape ôté for papauté. We do not think these puns were intentional.

Though he was a strong anti-papist, that circumstance was far from conciliating the Anglicans. He was no more liked by the Protestant rectors than by the Catholic curés. The enunciation of the greatest dogmas did not prevent his anti-theological temper bursting forth. Accident, for example, having once brought him to hear a sermon on eternal punishment, by the Reverend Jaquemin Hérode — a magnificent discourse, filled from one end to the other with sacred texts, proving the everlasting pains, the tortures, the torments, the perditions, the inexorable chastisements, the burnings without end, the inextinguishable maledictions, the wrath of the Almighty, the celestial fury, the divine vengeance, and other incontestable realities — he was heard to say as he was going out in the midst of the faithful flock, "You see, I have an odd notion of my own on this matter; I imagine God as a merciful being."

This leaven of atheism was doubtless due to his sojourn in France.

Although a Guernsey man of pure extraction, he was called in the island "the Frenchman;" but chiefly on account of his "improper" manner of speaking. He did not indeed conceal the truth from himself. He was impregnated with ideas subversive of established institutions. His obstinacy in constructing the "Devil Boat" had proved that. He used to say, "I was suckled by the '89" — a bad sort of nurse. These were not his only indiscretions. In France "to preserve appearances," in England "to be respectable," is the chief condition of a quiet life. To be respectable implies a multitude of little observances, from the strict keeping of Sunday down to the careful tying of a cravat. "To act so that nobody may point at you;" this is the terrible social law. To be pointed at with the finger is almost the same thing as an anathematisation. Little towns, always hotbeds of gossip, are remarkable for that isolating malignancy, which is like the tremendous malediction of the Church seen through the wrong end of the telescope. The bravest are afraid of this ordeal. They are ready to confront the storm, the fire of cannon, but they shrink at the glance of "Mrs. Grundy." Mess Lethierry was more obstinate than logical; but under pressure even his obstinacy would bend. He put — to use another of his phrases, eminently suggestive of latent compromises, not always pleasant to avow— "a little water in his wine." He kept aloof from the clergy, but he did not absolutely close his door against them. On official occasions, and at the customary epochs of pastoral visits, he received with sufficiently good grace both the Lutheran rector and the Papist chaplain. He had even, though at distant intervals, accompanied Déruchette to the Anglican parish church, to which Déruchette herself, as we have said, only went on the four great festivals of the year.

On the whole, these little concessions, which always cost him a pang, irritated him; and far from inclining him towards the Church people, only increased his inward disinclination to them. He compensated himself by more raillery. His nature, in general so devoid of bitterness, had no uncharitable side except this. To alter him, however, was impossible.

In fact, this was in his very temperament, and was beyond his own power to control.

Every sort of priest or clergyman was distasteful to him. He had a little of the old revolutionary want of reverence. He did not distinguish between one form of worship and another. He did not do justice to that great step in the progress of ideas, the denial of the real presence. His shortsightedness in these matters even prevented his perceiving any essential difference between a minister and an abbé. A reverend doctor and a reverend father were pretty nearly the same to him. He used to say, "Wesley is not more to my taste than Loyola." When he saw a reverend pastor walking with his wife, he would turn to look at them, and mutter, "a married priest," in a tone which brought out all the absurdity which those words had in the ears of Frenchmen at that time. He used to relate how, on his last voyage to England, he had seen the "Bishop*ess*" of London. His dislike for marriages of that sort amounted almost to disgust. "Gown and gown do not mate well," he would say. The sacerdotal function was to him in the nature of a distinct sex. It would have been natural to him to have said, "Neither a man nor a woman, only a priest;" and he had the bad taste to apply to the Anglican and the Roman Catholic clergy the same disdainful epithets. He confounded the two cassocks in the same phraseology. He did not take the trouble to vary in favour of Catholics or Lutherans, or whatever they might be, the figures of speech common among military men of that period. He would say to Déruchette, "Marry whom you please, provided you do not marry a parson."

XIII

THOUGHTLESSNESS ADDS A GRACE TO BEAUTY

A word once said, Mess Lethierry remembered it: a word once said, Déruchette soon forgot it. Here was another difference between the uncle and the niece.

Brought up in the peculiar way already described, Déruchette was little accustomed to responsibility. There is a latent danger in an education not sufficiently serious, which cannot be too much insisted on. It is perhaps unwise to endeavour to make a child happy too soon.

So long as she was happy, Déruchette thought all was well. She knew, too, that it was always a pleasure to her uncle to see her pleased. The religious sentiment in her nature was satisfied with going to the parish church four times in the year. We have seen her in her Christmas-day toilet. Of life, she was entirely ignorant. She had a disposition which one day might lead her to love passionately. Meanwhile she was contented.

She sang by fits and starts, chatted by fits and starts, enjoyed the hour as it passed, fulfilled some little duty, and was gone again, and was delightful in all. Add to all this the English sort of liberty which she enjoyed. In England the very infants go alone, girls are their own mistresses, and adolescence is almost wholly unrestrained. Such are the differences of manners. Later, how many of these free maidens become female slaves? I use the word in its least odious sense; I mean that they are free in the development of their nature, but slaves to duty.

Déruchette awoke every morning with little thought of her actions of the day before. It would have troubled her a good deal to have had to give an account of how she had spent her time the previous week. All this, however, did not prevent her having certain hours of strange disquietude; times when some dark cloud seemed to pass over the brightness of her joy. Those azure depths are subject to such shadows! But clouds like these soon passed away. She quickly shook off such moods with a cheerful laugh, knowing neither why she had been sad, nor why she had regained her serenity. She was always at play. As a child, she would take delight in teasing the passers-by. She played practical jokes upon the boys. If the fiend himself had passed that way, she would hardly have spared him some ingenious trick. She was pretty and innocent; and she could abuse the immunity accorded to such qualities. She was ready with a smile, as a cat with a stroke of her claws. So much the worse for the victim of her scratches. She thought no more of them. Yesterday had no existence for her. She lived in the fullness of to-day. Such it is to have too much happiness fall to one’s lot! With Déruchette impressions vanished like the melted snow.

STREAKS OF FIRE ON THE HORIZON

Gilliatt had never spoken to Déruchette; he knew her from having seen her at a distance, as men know the morning star.

At the period when Déruchette had met Gilliatt on the road leading from St. Peter’s Port to Vale, and had surprised him by tracing his name in the snow, she was just sixteen years of age. Only the evening before Mess Lethierry had said to her, “Come, no more childish tricks; you are a great girl.”

That word “Gilliatt,” written by the young maiden, had sunk into an unfathomed depth.

What were women to Gilliatt? He could not have answered that question himself. When he met one he generally inspired her with something of the timidity which he felt himself. He never spoke to a woman except from urgent necessity. He had never played the part of a “gallant” to any one of the country girls. When he found himself alone on the road, and perceived a woman coming towards him, he would climb over a fence, or bury himself in some copse: he even avoided old women. Once in his life he had seen a Parisian lady. A Parisienne on the wing was a strange event in Guernsey at that distant epoch; and Gilliatt had heard this gentle lady relate her little troubles in these words: “I am very much annoyed; I have got some spots of rain upon my bonnet. Pale buff is a shocking colour for rain.” Having found, some time afterwards, between the leaves of a book, an old engraving, representing “a lady of the Chaussée d’Antin” in full dress, he had stuck it against the wall at home as a souvenir of this remarkable apparition.

On that Christmas morning when he had met Déruchette, and when she had written his name and disappeared laughing, he returned home, scarcely conscious of why he had gone out. That night he slept little; he was dreaming of a thousand things: that it would be well to cultivate black radishes in the garden; that he had not seen the boat from Sark pass by; had anything happened to it? Then he remembered that he had seen the white stonecrop in flower, a rare thing at that season. He had never known exactly who was the woman who had reared him, and he made up his mind that she must have been his mother, and thought of her with redoubled tenderness. He called to mind the lady's clothing in the old leathern trunk. He thought that the Reverend Jaquemin Hérode would probably one day or other be appointed dean of St. Peter's Port and surrogate of the bishop, and that the rectory of St. Sampson would become vacant. Next, he remembered that the morrow of Christmas would be the twenty-seventh day of the moon, and that consequently high water would be at twenty-one minutes past three, the half-ebb at a quarter past seven, low water at thirty-three minutes past nine, and half flood at thirty-nine minutes past twelve. He recalled, in the most trifling details, the costume of the Highlander who had sold him the bagpipe; his bonnet with a thistle ornament, his claymore, his close-fitting short jacket, his philabeg ornamented with a pocket, and his snuff-horn, his pin set with a Scottish stone, his two girdles, his sash and belts, his sword, cutlass, dirk, and skene-dhu — his black-sheathed knife, with its black handle ornamented with two cairngorms — and the bare knees of the soldier; his socks, gaiters, and buckled shoes. This highly-equipped figure became a spectre in his imagination, which pursued him with a sense of feverishness as he sunk into oblivion. When he awoke it was full daylight, and his first thought was of Déruchette.

The next night he slept more soundly, but he was dreaming again of the Scottish soldier. In the midst of his sleep he remembered that the after-Christmas sittings of the Chief Law Court would commence on the 21st of January. He dreamed also about the Reverend Jaquemin Hérode. He thought of Déruchette, and seemed to be in violent anger with her. He wished he had been a child again to throw stones at her windows. Then he thought that if he were a child again he should have his mother by his side, and he began to sob.

Gilliatt had a project at this time of going to pass three months at Chousey, or at the Miriquiers; but he did not go.

He walked no more along the road to St. Peter's Port.

He had an odd fancy that his name of "Gilliatt" had remained there traced upon the ground, and that the passers-by stopped to read it.

II

THE UNKNOWN UNFOLDS ITSELF BY DEGREES

On the other hand, Gilliatt had the satisfaction of seeing the Bravées every day. By some accident he was continually passing that way. His business seemed always to lead him by the path which passed under the wall of Déruchette’s garden.

One morning, as he was walking along this path, he heard a market-woman who was returning from the Bravées, say to another: “Mess Lethierry is fond of sea-kale.”

He dug in his garden of the Bû de la Rue a trench for sea-kale. The sea-kale is a vegetable which has a flavour like asparagus.

The wall of the garden of the Bravées was very low; it would have been easy to scale it. The idea of scaling it would have appeared, to him, terrible. But there was nothing to hinder his hearing, as any one else might, the voices of persons talking as he passed, in the rooms or in the garden. He did not listen, but he heard them. Once he could distinguish the voices of the two servants, Grace and Douce, disputing. It was a sound which belonged to the house, and their quarrel remained in his ears like a remembrance of music.

On another occasion, he distinguished a voice which was different, and which seemed to him to be the voice of Déruchette. He quickened his pace, and was soon out of hearing.

The words uttered by that voice, however, remained fixed in his memory. He repeated them at every instant. They were, “Will you please give me the little broom?”

By degrees he became bolder. He had the daring to stay awhile. One day it happened that Déruchette was singing at her piano, altogether invisible from without, although her window was open. The air was that of “Bonnie Dundee.” He grew pale, but he screwed his courage to the point of listening.

Springtide came. One day Gilliatt enjoyed a beatific vision. The heavens were opened, and there, before his eyes, appeared Déruchette, watering lettuces in her little garden.

Soon afterwards he look to doing more than merely listening there. He watched her habits, observed her hours, and waited to catch a glimpse of her.

In all this he was very careful not to be seen.

The year advanced; the time came when the trellises were heavy with roses, and haunted by the butterflies. By little and little, he had come to conceal himself for hours behind her wall, motionless and silent, seen by no one, and holding his breath as Déruchette passed in and out of her garden. Men grow accustomed to poison by degrees.

From his hiding-place he could often hear the sound of Déruchette conversing with Mess Lethierry under a thick arch of leaves, in a spot where there was a garden-seat. The words came distinctly to his ears.

What a change had come over him! He had even descended to watch and listen. Alas! there is something of the character of a spy in every human heart.

There was another garden-seat, visible to him, and nearer Déruchette would sit there sometimes.

From the flowers that he had observed her gathering he had guessed her taste in the matter of perfumes. The scent of the bindweed was her favourite, then the pink, then the honeysuckle, then the jasmine. The rose stood only fifth in the scale. She looked at the lilies, but did not smell them.

Gilliatt figured her in his imagination from this choice of odours. With each perfume he associated some perfection.

The very idea of speaking to Déruchette would have made his hair stand on end. A poor old rag-picker, whose wandering brought her, from time to time, into the little road leading under the inclosure of the Bravées, had occasionally remarked Gilliatt's assiduity beside the wall, and his devotion for this retired spot. Did she connect the presence of a man before this wall with the possibility of a woman behind it? Did she perceive that vague, invisible thread? Was she, in her decrepit mendicancy, still youthful enough to remember something of the old happier days? And could she, in this dark night and winter of her wretched life, still recognise the dawn? We know not: but it appears that, on one occasion, passing near Gilliatt at his post, she brought to bear upon him something as like a smile as she was still capable of, and muttered between her teeth, “It is getting warmer.”

Gilliatt heard the words, and was struck by them. “It warms one,” he muttered, with an inward note of interrogation. “It is getting warmer.” What did the old woman mean?

He repeated the phrase mechanically all day, but he could not guess its meaning.

THE AIR “BONNIE DUNDEE” FINDS AN ECHO ON THE HILL

It was in a spot behind the enclosure of the garden of the Bravées, at an angle of the wall, half concealed with holly and ivy, and covered with nettles, wild mallow, and large white mullen growing between the blocks of stone, that he passed the greater part of that summer. He watched there, lost in deep thought. The lizards grew accustomed to his presence, and basked in the sun among the same stones. The summer was bright and full of dreamy indolence: overhead the light clouds came and went. Gilliatt sat upon the grass. The air was full of the songs of birds. He held his two hands up to his forehead, sometimes trying to recollect himself: “Why should she write my name in the snow?” From a distance the sea breeze came up in gentle breaths, at intervals the horn of the quarrymen sounded abruptly, warning the passers-by to take shelter, as they shattered some mass with gunpowder. The Port of St. Sampson was not visible from this place, but he could see the tips of masts above the trees. The sea-gulls flew wide and afar. Gilliatt had heard his mother say that women could love men; that such things happened sometimes. He remembered it; and said within himself, “Who knows, may not Déruchette love me?” Then a feeling of sadness would come upon him; he would say, “She, too, thinks of me in her turn. It is well.” He remembered that Déruchette was rich, and that he was poor: and then the new boat appeared to him an execrable invention. He could never remember what day of the month it was. He would stare listlessly at the great bees, with their yellow bodies and their short wings, as they entered with a buzzing noise into the holes in the wall.

One evening Déruchette went in-doors to retire to bed. She approached her window to close it. The night was dark. Suddenly, something caught her ear, and she listened. Somewhere in the darkness there was a sound of music. It was some one, perhaps, on the hill-side, or at the foot of the towers of Vale Castle, or, perhaps, further still, playing an air upon some instrument. Déruchette recognised her favourite melody, “Bonnie Dundee,” played upon the bagpipe. She thought little of it.

From that night the music might be heard again from time to time at the same hours, particularly when the nights were very dark.

Déruchette was not much pleased with all this.

“A serenade by night may please a lady fair,
the troubadour beware.”
Unpublished Comedy

Four years passed away.

Déruchette was approaching her twenty-first year, and was still unmarried. Some writer has said that a fixed idea is a sort of gimlet; every year gives it another turn. To pull out the first year is like plucking out the hair by the roots; in the second year, like tearing the skin; in the third, like breaking the bones; and in the fourth, like removing the very brain itself.

Gilliatt had arrived at this fourth stage.

He had never yet spoken a word to Déruchette. He lived and dreamed near that delightful vision. This was all.

It happened one day that, finding himself by chance at St. Sampson, he had seen Déruchette talking with Mess Lethierry at the door of the Bravées, which opens upon the roadway of the port. Gilliatt ventured to approach very near. He fancied that at the very moment of his passing she had smiled. There was nothing impossible in that.

Déruchette still heard, from time to time, the sound of the bagpipe.

Mess Lethierry had also heard this bagpipe. By degrees he had come to remark this persevering musician under Déruchette’s window. A tender strain, too; all the more suspicious. A nocturnal gallant was a thing not to his taste. His wish was to marry Déruchette in his own time, when she was willing and he was willing, purely and simply, without any romance, or music, or anything of that sort. Irritated at it, he had at last kept a watch, and he fancied that he had detected Gilliatt. He passed his fingers through his beard — a sign of anger — and grumbled out, “What has that fellow got to pipe about? He is in love with Déruchette, that is clear. You waste your time, young man. Any one who wants Déruchette must come to me, and not loiter about playing the flute.”

An event of importance, long foreseen, occurred soon afterwards. It was announced that the Reverend Jaquemin Hérode was appointed surrogate of the Bishop of Winchester, dean of the island, and rector of St. Peter’s Port, and that he would leave St. Sampson for St. Peter’s immediately after his successor should be installed.

It could not be long to the arrival of the new rector. He was a gentleman of Norman extraction, Monsieur Ebenezer Caudray.

Some facts were known about the new rector, which the benevolent and malevolent interpreted in a contrary sense. He was known to be young and poor, but his youth was tempered with much learning, and his poverty by good expectations. In the dialect specially invented for the subject of riches and inheritances, death goes by the name of “expectations.” He was the nephew and heir of the aged and opulent dean of St. Asaph. At the death of this old gentleman he would be a rich man. M. Caudray had distinguished relations. He was almost entitled to the quality of “Honourable.” As regarded his doctrine, people judged differently. He was an Anglican, but, according to the expression of Bishop Tillotson, a “libertine” — that is, in reality, one who was very severe. He repudiated all pharisaism. He was a friend rather of the Presbytery than the Episcopacy. He dreamed of the Primitive Church of the days when even Adam had the right to choose his Eve, and when Frumentinus, Bishop of Hierapolis, carried off a young maiden to make her his wife, and said to her parents, “Her will is such, and such is mine. You are no longer her mother, and you are no longer her father. I am the Bishop of Hierapolis, and this is my wife. Her father is in heaven.” If the common belief could be trusted, M. Caudray subordinated the text, “Honour thy father and thy mother,” to that other text, in his eyes of higher significance, “The woman is the flesh of the man. She shall leave her father and mother to follow her husband.” This tendency, however, to circumscribe the parental authority and to favour religiously every mode of forming the conjugal tie, is peculiar to all Protestantism, particularly in England, and singularly so in America.

A DESERVED SUCCESS HAS ALWAYS ITS DETRACTORS

At this period the affairs of Mess Lethierry were in this position: — The Durande had well fulfilled all his expectations. He had paid his debts, repaired his misfortunes, discharged his obligations at Brême, met his acceptances at St. Malo. He had paid off the mortgage upon his house at the Bravées, and had bought up all the little local rent charges upon the property. He was also the proprietor of a great productive capital. This was the Durande herself. The net revenue from the boat was about a thousand pounds sterling per annum, and the traffic was constantly increasing. Strictly speaking, the Durande constituted his entire fortune. She was also the fortune of the island. The carriage of cattle being one of the most profitable portions of her trade, he had been obliged, in order to facilitate the stowage, and the embarking and disembarking of animals, to do away with the luggage-boxes and the two boats. It was, perhaps, imprudent. The Durande had but one boat — namely, her long-boat; but this was an excellent one.

Ten years had elapsed since Rantaine’s robbery.

This prosperity of the Durande had its weak point. It inspired no confidence. People regarded it as a risk. Lethierry’s good fortune was looked upon as exceptional. He was considered to have gained by a lucky rashness. Some one in the Isle of Wight who had imitated him had not succeeded. The enterprise had ruined the shareholders. The engines, in fact, were badly constructed. But people shook their heads. Innovations have always to contend with the difficulty that few wish them well. The least false step compromises them.

One of the commercial oracles of the Channel Islands, a certain banker from Paris, named Jauge, being consulted upon a steamboat speculation, was reported to have turned his back, with the remark, “An investment is it you propose to me? Exactly; an investment in smoke.”

On the other hand, the sailing vessels had no difficulty in finding capitalists to take shares in a venture. Capital, in fact, was obstinately in favour of sails, and as obstinately against boilers and paddle-wheels. At Guernsey, the Durande was indeed a fact, but steam was not yet an established principle. Such is the fanatical spirit of conservatism in opposition to progress. They said of Lethierry, “It is all very well; but he could not do it a second time.” Far from encouraging, his example inspired timidity. Nobody would have dared to risk another Durande.

VI

THE SLOOP “CASHMERE” SAVES A SHIPWRECKED CREW

The equinoctial gales begin early in the Channel. The sea there is narrow, and the winds disturb it easily. The westerly gales begin from the month of February, and the waves are beaten about from every quarter. Navigation becomes an anxious matter. The people on the coasts look to the signal-post, and begin to watch for vessels in distress. The sea is then like a cut-throat in ambush for his victim. An invisible trumpet sounds the alarm of war with the elements, furious blasts spring up from the horizon, and a terrible wind soon begins to blow. The dark night whistles and howls. In the depth of the clouds the black tempest distends its cheeks, and the storm arises.

The wind is one danger; the fogs are another.

Fogs have from all time been the terror of mariners. In certain fogs microscopic prisms of ice are found in suspension, to which Mariotte attributes halos, mock suns, and paraselenes. Storm-fogs are of a composite character; various gases of unequal specific gravity combine with the vapour of water, and arrange themselves, layer over layer, in an order which divides the dense mist into zones. Below ranges the iodine; above the iodine is the sulphur; above the sulphur the brome; above the brome the phosphorus. This, in a certain manner, and making allowance for electric and magnetic tension, explains several phenomena, as the St. Elmo’s Fire of Columbus and Magellan, the flying stars moving about the ships, of which Seneca speaks; the two flames, Castor and Pollux, mentioned by Plutarch; the Roman legion, whose spears appeared to Cæsar to take fire; the peak of the Chateau of Duino in Friuli which the sentinel made to sparkle by touching it with his lance; and perhaps even those fulgurations from the earth which the ancients called Satan’s terrestrial lightnings. At the equator, an immense mist seems permanently to encircle the globe. It is known as the cloud-ring. The function of the cloud-ring is to temper the heat of the tropics, as that of the Gulf-stream is to mitigate the coldness of the Pole. Under the cloud-ring fogs are fatal. These are what are called horse latitudes. It was here that navigators of bygone ages were accustomed to cast their horses into the sea to lighten the ship in stormy weather, and to economise the fresh water when becalmed. Columbus said, “Nube abaxo ex muerte,” death lurks in the low cloud. The Etruscans, who bear the same relation to meteorology which the Chaldeans did to astronomy, had two high priests — the high priest of the thunder, and the high priest of the clouds. The “fulgurators” observed the lightning, and the weather sages watched the mists. The college of Priest-Augurs was consulted by the Syrians, the Phœnicians, the Pelasgi, and all the primitive navigators of the ancient Mare Internum. The origin of tempests was, from that time forward, partially understood. It is intimately connected with the generation of fogs, and is, properly speaking, the same phenomenon. There exist upon the ocean three regions of fogs, one equatorial and two polar. The mariners give them but one name, the pitch-pot.

In all latitudes, and particularly in the Channel, the equinoctial fogs are dangerous. They shed a sudden darkness over the sea. One of the perils of fogs, even when not very dense, arises from their preventing the mariners perceiving the change of the bed of the sea by the variations of the colour of the water. The result is a dangerous concealment of the approach of sands and breakers. The vessel steers towards the shoals without receiving any warning. Frequently the fogs leave a ship no resource except to lie-to, or to cast anchor. There are as many shipwrecks from the fogs as from the winds.

After a very violent squall succeeding one of these foggy days, the mail-boat Cashmere arrived safely from England. It entered at St. Peter’s Port as the first gleam of day appeared upon the sea, and at the very moment when the cannon of Castle Cornet announced the break of day. The sky had cleared: the sloop Cashmere was anxiously expected, as she was to bring the new rector of St. Sampson.

A little after the arrival of the sloop, a rumour ran through the town that she had been hailed during the night at sea by a long-boat containing a shipwrecked crew.

HOW AN IDLER HAD THE GOOD FORTUNE TO BE SEEN BY A FISHERMAN

On that very night, at the moment when the wind abated, Gilliatt had gone out with his nets, without, however, taking his famous old Dutch boat too far from the coast.

As he was returning with the rising tide, towards two o’clock in the afternoon, the sun was shining brightly, and he passed before the Beast’s Horn to reach the little bay of the Bû de la Rue. At that moment he fancied that he saw, in the projection of the “Gild-Holm-’Ur” seat a shadow, which was not that of the rock. He steered his vessel nearer, and was able to perceive a man sitting in the “Gild-Holm-’Ur.” The sea was already very high, the rock encircled by the waves, and escape entirely cut off. Gilliatt made signs to the man. The stranger remained motionless. Gilliatt drew nearer; the man was asleep.

He was attired in black. “He looks like a priest,” thought Gilliatt. He approached still nearer, and could distinguish the face of a young man.

The features were unknown to him.

The rock, happily, was peaked; there was a good depth. Gilliatt wore off, and succeeded in skirting the rocky wall. The tide raised the bark so high that Gilliatt, by standing upon the gunwale of the sloop, could touch the man’s feet. He raised himself upon the planking, and stretched out his hands. If he had fallen at that moment, it is doubtful if he would have risen again on the water; the waves were rolling in between the boat and the rock, and destruction would have been inevitable. He pulled the foot of the sleeping man. “Ho! there. What are you doing in this place?”

The man aroused, and muttered —

“I was looking about.”

He was now completely awake, and continued —

“I have just arrived in this part. I came this way on a pleasure trip. I have passed the night on the sea: the view from here seemed beautiful. I was weary, and fell asleep.”

“Ten minutes later, and you would have been drowned.”

“Ha!”

“Jump into my bark.”

Gilliatt kept the bark fast with his foot, clutched the rock with one hand, and stretched out the other to the stranger in black, who sprang quickly into the boat. He was a fine young man.

Gilliatt seized the tiller, and in two minutes his boat entered the bay of the Bû de la Rue.

The young man wore a round hat and a white cravat; and his long black frock-coat was buttoned up to the neck. He had fair hair, which he wore en couronne. He had a somewhat feminine cast of features, a clear eye, a grave manner.

Meanwhile the boat had touched the ground. Gilliatt passed the cable through the mooring-ring, then turned and perceived the young man holding out a sovereign in a very white hand.

Gilliatt moved the hand gently away.

There was a pause. The young man was the first to break the silence.

“You have saved me from death.”

“Perhaps,” replied Gilliatt.

The moorings were made fast, and they went ashore.

The stranger continued —

“I owe you my life, sir.”

“No matter.”

This reply from Gilliatt was again followed by a pause.

“Do you belong to this parish?”

“No,” replied Gilliatt.

“To what parish, then?”

Gilliatt lifted up his right hand, pointed to the sky, and said —

“To that yonder.”

The young man bowed, and left him.

After walking a few paces, the stranger stopped, felt in his pocket, drew out a book, and returning towards Gilliatt, offered it to him.

“Permit me to make you a present of this.”

Gilliatt took the volume.

It was a Bible.

An instant after, Gilliatt, leaning upon the parapet, was following the young man with his eyes as he turned the angle of the path which led to St. Sampson.

By little and little he lowered his gaze, forgot all about the stranger — knew no more whether the “Gild-Holm-’Ur” existed. Everything disappeared before him in the bottomless depth of a reverie.

There was one abyss which swallowed up all his thought. This was Déruchette.

A voice calling him, aroused him from this dream.

“Ho there, Gilliatt!”

He recognised the voice and looked up.

“What is the matter, Sieur Landoys?”

It was, in fact, Sieur Landoys, who was passing along the road about one hundred paces from the Bû de la Rue in his phaeton, drawn by one little horse. He had stopped to hail Gilliatt, but he seemed hurried.

“There is news, Gilliatt.”

“Where is that?”

“At the Bravées.”

“What is it?”

“I am too far off to tell you the story.”

Gilliatt shuddered.

“Is Miss Déruchette going to be married?”

“No; but she had better look out for a husband.”

“What do you mean?”

“Go up to the house, and you will learn.”

And Sieur Landoys whipped on his horse.

THE REVOLVER

CONVERSATIONS AT THE JEAN AUBERGE

Sieur Clubin was a man who bided his time. He was short in stature, and his complexion was yellow. He had the strength of a bull. His sea life had not tanned his skin; his flesh had a sallow hue; it was the colour of a wax candle, of which his eyes, too, had something of the steady light. His memory was peculiarly retentive. With him, to have seen a man once, was to have him like a note in a note-book. His quiet glance took possession of you. The pupil of his eye received the impression of a face, and kept it like a portrait. The face might grow old, but Sieur Clubin never lost it; it was impossible to cheat that tenacious memory. Sieur Clubin was curt in speech, grave in manner, bold in action. No gestures were ever indulged in by him. An air of candour won everybody to him at first; many people thought him artless. He had a wrinkle in the corner of his eye, astonishingly expressive of simplicity. As we have said, no abler mariner existed; no one like him for reefing a sail, for keeping a vessel's head to the wind, or the sails well set. Never did reputation for religion and integrity stand higher than his. To have suspected him would have been to bring yourself under suspicion. He was on terms of intimacy with Monsieur Rébuchet, a money-changer at St. Malo, who lived in the Rue St. Vincent, next door to the armourer's; and Monsieur Rébuchet would say, "I would leave my shop in Clubin's hands."

Sieur Clubin was a widower; his wife, like himself, had enjoyed a high reputation for probity. She had died with a fame for incorruptible virtue. If the bailli had whispered gallant things in her ear, she would have impeached him before the king. If a saint had made love to her, she would have told it to the priest. This couple, Sieur and Dame Clubin, had realised in Torteval the ideal of the English epithet "respectable." Dame Clubin's reputation was as the snowy whiteness of the swan; Sieur Clubin's like that of ermine itself — a spot would have been fatal to him. He could hardly have picked up a pin without making inquiries for the owner. He would send round the town-crier about a box of matches. One day he went into a wine-shop at St. Servan, and said to the man who kept it, “Three years ago I breakfasted here; you made a mistake in the bill;” and he returned the man thirteen sous. He was the very personification of probity, with a certain compression of the lips indicative of watchfulness.

He seemed, indeed, always on the watch — for what? For rogues probably.

Every Tuesday he commanded the Durande on her passage from Guernsey to St. Malo. He arrived at St. Malo on the Tuesday evening, stayed two days there to discharge and take in a new cargo, and started again for Guernsey on Friday morning.

There was at that period, at St. Malo, a little tavern near the harbour, which was called the “Jean Auberge.”

The construction of the modern quays swept away this house. At this period, the sea came up as far as the St. Vincent and Dinan gates. St. Merlan and St. Servan communicated with each other by covered carts and other vehicles, which passed to and fro among vessels lying high and dry, avoiding the buoys, the anchors, and cables, and running the risk now and then of smashing their leathern hoods against the lowered yards, or the end of a jibboom. Between the tides, the coachmen drove their horses over those sands, where, six hours afterwards, the winds would be beating the rolling waves. The four-and-twenty carrying dogs of St. Malo, who tore to pieces a naval officer in 1770, were accustomed to prowl about this beach. This excess of zeal on their part led to the destruction of the pack. Their nocturnal barkings are no longer heard between the little and the great Talard.

Sieur Clubin was accustomed to stay at the Jean Auberge. The French office of the Durande was held there.

The custom-house officers and coast-guardmen came to take their meals and to drink at the Jean Auberge. They had their separate tables. The custom-house officers of Binic found it convenient for the service to meet there with their brother officers of St. Malo.

Captains of vessels came there also; but they ate at another table.

Sieur Clubin sat sometimes at one, sometimes at the other table, but preferred the table of the custom-house men to that of the sea captains. He was always welcome at either.

The tables were well served. There were strange drinks especially provided for foreign sailors. A dandy sailor from Bilboa could have been supplied there with a helada. People drank stout there, as at Greenwich; or brown gueuse, as at Antwerp.

Masters of vessels who came from long voyages and privateersmen sometimes appeared at the captains' table, where they exchanged news. "How are sugars? That commission is only for small lots. — The brown kinds, however, are going off. Three thousand bags of East India, and five hundred hogsheads of Sagua. — Take my word, the opposition will end by defeating Villèle. — What about indigo? Only seven serons of Guatemala changed hands. — The Nanino-Julia is in the roads; a pretty three-master from Brittany. — The two cities of La Plata are at loggerheads again. — When Monte Video gets fat, Buenos Ayres grows lean. — It has been found necessary to transfer the cargo of the Regina-Cœli, which has been condemned at Callao. — Cocoas go off briskly. — Caraque bags are quoted at one hundred and thirty-four, and Trinidad's at seventy-three. — It appears that at the review in the Champ de Mars, the people cried, 'Down with the ministers!' — The raw salt Saladeros hides are selling — ox-hides at sixty francs, and cows' at forty-eight. — Have they passed the Balkan? — What is Diebitsch about? — Aniseed is in demand at San Francisco. Plagniol olive oil is quiet. — Gruyère cheese, in bulk, is thirty-two francs the quintal. — Well, is Leon XII. dead?" etc., etc.

All these things were talked about and commented on aloud. At the table of the custom-house and coast-guard officers they spoke in a lower key.

Matters of police and revenue on the coast and in the ports require, in fact, a little more privacy, and a little less clearness in the conversation.

The sea-captains' table was presided over by an old captain of a large vessel, M. Gertrais-Gaboureau. M. Gertrais-Gaboureau could hardly be regarded as a man; he was rather a living barometer. His long life at sea had given him a surprising power of prognosticating the state of the weather. He seemed to issue a decree for the weather to-morrow. He sounded the winds, and felt the pulse, as it were, of the tides. He might be imagined requesting the clouds to show their tongue — that is to say, their forked lightnings. He was the physician of the wave, the breeze, and the squall. The ocean was his patient. He had travelled round the world like a doctor going his visits, examining every kind of climate in its good and bad condition. He was profoundly versed in the pathology of the seasons. Sometimes he would be heard delivering himself in this fashion— “The barometer descended in 1796 to three degrees below tempest point.” He was a sailor from real love of the sea. He hated England as much as he liked the ocean. He had carefully studied English seamanship, and considered himself to have discovered its weak point. He would explain how the Sovereign of 1637 differed from the Royal William of 1670, and from the Victory of 1775. He compared their build as to their forecastles and quarter-decks. He looked back with regret to the towers upon the deck, and the funnel-shaped tops of the Great Harry of 1514 — probably regarding them from the point of view of convenient lodging-places for French cannon-balls. In his eyes, nations only existed for their naval institutions. He indulged in some odd figures of speech on this subject. He considered the term “The Trinity House” as sufficiently indicating England. The “Northern Commissioners” were in like manner synonymous in his mind with Scotland; the “Ballast Board,” with Ireland. He was full of nautical information. He was, in himself, a marine alphabet and almanack, a tariff and low-water mark, all combined. He knew by heart all the lighthouse dues — particularly those of the English coast — one penny per ton for passing before this; one farthing before that. He would tell you that the Small Rock Light which once used to burn two hundred gallons of oil, now consumes fifteen hundred. Once, aboard ship, he was attacked by a dangerous disease, and was believed to be dying. The crew assembled round his hammock, and in the midst of his groans and agony he addressed the chief carpenter with the words, “You had better make a mortise in each side of the main caps, and put in a bit of iron to help pass the top ropes through.” His habit of command had given to his countenance an expression of authority.

It was rare that the subjects of conversation at the captains’ table and at that of the custom-house men were the same. This, however, did happen to be the case in the first days of that month of February to which the course of this history has now brought us. The three-master Tamaulipas, Captain Zuela, arrived from Chili, and bound thither again, was the theme of discussion at both tables.

At the captains’ table they were talking of her cargo; and at that of the custom-house people, of certain circumstances connected with her recent proceedings.

Captain Zuela, of Copiapo, was partly a Chilian and partly a Columbian. He had taken a part in the War of Independence in a true independent fashion, adhering sometimes to Bolivar, sometimes to Morillo, according as he had found it to his interest. He had enriched himself by serving all causes. No man in the world could have been more Bourbonist, more Bonapartist, more absolutist, more liberal, more atheistical, or more devoutly catholic. He belonged to that great and renowned party which may be called the Lucrative party. From time to time he made his appearance in France on commercial voyages; and if report spoke truly, he willingly gave a passage to fugitives of any kind — bankrupts or political refugees, it was all the same to him, provided they could pay. His mode of taking them aboard was simple. The fugitive waited upon a lonely point of the coast, and at the moment of setting sail, Zuela would detach a small boat to fetch him. On his last voyage he had assisted in this way an outlaw and fugitive from justice, named Berton; and on this occasion he was suspected of being about to aid the flight of the men implicated in the affair of the Bidassoa. The police were informed, and had their eye upon him.

This period was an epoch of flights and escapes. The Restoration in France was a reactionary movement. Revolutions are fruitful of voluntary exile; and restorations of wholesale banishments. During the first seven or eight years which followed the return of the Bourbons, panic was universal — in finance, in industry, in commerce, men felt the ground tremble beneath them. Bankruptcies were numerous in the commercial world; in the political, there was a general rush to escape. Lavalette had taken flight, Lefebvre Desnouettes had taken flight, Delon had taken flight. Special tribunals were again in fashion — plus Treetaillon. People instinctively shunned the Pont de Saumur, the Esplanade de la Réole, the wall of the Observatoire in Paris, the tower of Taurias d’Avignon — dismal landmarks in history where the period of reaction has left its sign-spots, on which the marks of that blood-stained hand are still visible. In London the Thistlewood affair, with its ramifications in France: in Paris the Trogoff trial, with its ramifications in Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy, had increased the motives for anxiety and flight, and given an impetus to that mysterious rout which left so many gaps in the social system of that day. To find a place of safety, this was the general care. To be implicated was to be ruined. The spirit of the military tribunals had survived their institution. Sentences were matters of favour. People fled to Texas, to the Rocky Mountains, to Peru, to Mexico. The men of the Loire, traitors then, but now regarded as patriots, had founded the Champ d'Asile. Béranger in one of his songs says —

“Barbarians! we are Frenchmen born;
Pity us, glorious, yet forlorn.”

Self-banishment was the only resource left. Nothing, perhaps, seems simpler than flight, but that monosyllable has a terrible significance. Every obstacle is in the way of the man who slips away. Taking to flight necessitates disguise. Persons of importance — even illustrious characters — were reduced to these expedients, only fit for malefactors. Their independent habits rendered it difficult for them to escape through the meshes of authority. A rogue who violates the conditions of his ticket-of-leave comports himself before the police as innocently as a saint; but imagine innocence constrained to act a part; virtue disguising its voice; a glorious reputation hiding under a mask. Yonder passer-by is a man of well-earned celebrity; he is in quest of a false passport. The equivocal proceedings of one absconding from the reach of the law is no proof that he is not a hero. Ephemeral but characteristic features of the time of which our so-called regular history takes no note, but which the true painter of the age will bring out into relief. Under cover of these flights and concealments of honest men, genuine rogues, less watched and suspected, managed often to get clear off. A scoundrel, who found it convenient to disappear, would take advantage of the general pell-mell, tack himself on to the political refugees, and, thanks to his greater skill in the art, would contrive to appear in that dim twilight more honest even than his honest neighbours. Nothing looks more awkward and confused sometimes than honesty unjustly condemned. It is out of its element, and is almost sure to commit itself.

It is a curious fact, that this voluntary expatriation, particularly with honest folks, appeared to lead to every strange turn of fortune. The modicum of civilisation which a scamp brought with him from London or Paris became, perhaps, a valuable stock in trade in some primitive country, ingratiated him with the people, and enabled him to strike into new paths. There is nothing impossible in a man's escaping thus from the laws, to reappear elsewhere as a dignitary among the priesthood. There was something phantasmagorial in these sudden disappearances; and more than one such flight has led to events like the marvels of a dream. An escapade of this kind, indeed, seemed to end naturally in the wild and wonderful; as when some broken bankrupt suddenly decamps to turn up again twenty years later as Grand Vizier to the Mogul, or as a king in Tasmania.

Rendering assistance to these fugitives was an established trade, and, looking to the abundance of business of that kind, was a highly profitable one. It was generally carried on as a supplementary branch of certain recognised kinds of commerce. A person, for instance, desiring to escape to England, applied to the smugglers; one who desired to get to America, had recourse to sea-captains like Zuela.

II

CLUBIN OBSERVES SOMEONE

Zuela came sometimes to take refreshment at the Jean Auberge. Clubin knew him by sight.

For that matter Clubin was not proud. He did not disdain even to know scamps by sight. He went so far sometimes as to cultivate even a closer acquaintance with them; giving his hand in the open street, or saying good-day to them. He talked English with the smugglers, and jabbered Spanish with the contrebandistas. On this subject he had at command a number of apologetic phrases. “Good,” he said, “can be extracted out of the knowledge of evil. The gamekeeper may find advantage in knowing the poacher. The good pilot may sound the depths of a pirate, who is only a sort of hidden rock. I test the quality of a scoundrel as a doctor will test a poison.” There was no answering a battery of proverbs like this. Everybody gave Clubin credit for his shrewdness. People praised him for not indulging in a ridiculous delicacy. Who, then, should dare to speak scandal of him on this point? Everything he did was evidently “for the good of the service.” With him, all was straightforward. Nothing could stain his good fame. Crystal might more easily become sullied. This general confidence in him was the natural reward of a long life of integrity, the crowning advantage of a settled reputation. Whatever Clubin might do, or appear to do, was sure to be interpreted favourably. He had attained almost to a state of impeccability. Over and above this, “he is very wary,” people said: and from a situation which in others would have given rise to suspicion, his integrity would extricate itself, with a still greater halo of reputation for ability. This reputation for ability mingled harmoniously with his fame for perfect simplicity of character. Great simplicity and great talents in conjunction are not uncommon. The compound constitutes one of the varieties of the virtuous man, and one of the most valuable. Sieur Clubin was one of those men who might be found in intimate conversation with a sharper or a thief, without suffering any diminution of respect in the minds of their neighbours.

The Tamaulipas had completed her loading. She was ready for sea, and was preparing to sail very shortly.

One Tuesday evening the Durande arrived at St. Malo while it was still broad daylight. Sieur Clubin, standing upon the bridge of the vessel, and superintending the manœuvres necessary for getting her into port, perceived upon the sandy beach near the Petit-Bey, two men, who were conversing between the rocks, in a solitary spot. He observed them with his sea-glass, and recognised one of the men. It was Captain Zuela. He seemed to recognise the other also.

This other was a person of high stature, a little grey. He wore the broad-brimmed hat and the sober clothing of the Society of Friends. He was probably a Quaker. He lowered his gaze with an air of extreme diffidence.

On arriving at the Jean Auberge, Sieur Clubin learnt that the Tamaulipas was preparing to sail in about ten days.

It has since become known that he obtained information on some other points.

That night he entered the gunsmith’s shop in the St. Vincent Street, and said to the master:

“Do you know what a revolver is?”

“Yes,” replied the gunsmith. “It is an American weapon.”

“It is a pistol with which a man can carry on a conversation.”

“Exactly: an instrument which comprises in itself both the question and the answer.”

“And the rejoinder too.”

“Precisely, Monsieur Clubin. A rotatory clump of barrels.”

“I shall want five or six balls.”

The gunmaker twisted the corner of his lip, and made that peculiar noise with which, when accompanied by a toss of the head, Frenchmen express admiration.

“The weapon is a good one, Monsieur Clubin.”

“I want a revolver with six barrels.”

“I have not one.”

“What! and you a gunmaker!”

“I do not keep such articles yet. You see, it is a new thing. It is only just coming into vogue. French makers, as yet, confine themselves to the simple pistol.”

“Nonsense.”

“It has not yet become an article of commerce.”

“Nonsense, I say.”

“I have excellent pistols.”

“I want a revolver.”

“I agree that it is more useful. Stop, Monsieur Clubin!”

“What?”

“I believe I know where there is one at this moment in St. Malo; to be had a bargain.”

“A revolver?”

“Yes.”

“For sale?”

“Yes.”

“Where is that?”

“I believe I know; or I can find out.”

“When can you give me an answer?”

“A bargain; but of good quality.”

“When shall I return?”

“If I procure you a revolver, remember, it will be a good one.”

“When will you give me an answer?”

“After your next voyage.”

“Do not mention that it is for me,” said Clubin.

III

CLUBIN CARRIES AWAY SOMETHING AND BRINGS BACK NOTHING

Sieur Clubin completed the loading of the Durande, embarked a number of cattle and some passengers, and left St. Malo for Guernsey, as usual, on the Friday morning.

On that same Friday, when the vessel had gained the open, which permits the captain to absent himself a moment from the place of command, Clubin entered his cabin, shut himself in, took a travelling bag which he kept there, put into one of its compartments some biscuit, some boxes of preserves, a few pounds of chocolate in sticks, a chronometer, and a sea telescope, and passed through the handles a cord, ready prepared to sling it if necessary. Then he descended into the hold, went into the compartment where the cables are kept, and was seen to come up again with one of those knotted ropes heavy with pieces of metal, which are used for ship caulkers at sea and by robbers ashore. Cords of this kind are useful in climbing.

Having arrived at Guernsey, Clubin repaired to Torteval. He took with him the travelling bag and the knotted cord, but did not bring them back again.

Let us repeat once for all, the Guernsey which we are describing is that ancient Guernsey which no longer exists, and of which it would be impossible to find a parallel now anywhere except in the country. There it is still flourishing, but in the towns it has passed away. The same remarks apply to Jersey. St. Helier’s is as civilised as Dieppe, St. Peter’s Port as L’Orient. Thanks to the progress of civilisation, thanks to the admirably enterprising spirit of that brave island people, everything has been changed during the last forty years in the Norman Archipelago. Where there was darkness there is now light. With these premises let us proceed.

At that period, then, which is already so far removed from us as to have become historical, smuggling was carried on very extensively in the Channel. The smuggling vessels abounded, particularly on the western coast of Guernsey. People of that peculiarly clever kind who know, even in the smallest details, what went on half a century ago, will even cite you the names of these suspicious craft, which were almost always Austrians or Guiposeans. It is certain that a week scarcely ever passed without one or two being seen either in Saint's Bay or at Pleinmont. Their coming and going had almost the character of a regular service. A cavern in the cliffs at Sark was called then, and is still called, the "Shops" ("Les Boutiques"), from its being the place where these smugglers made their bargains with the purchasers of their merchandise. This sort of traffic had in the Channel a dialect of its own, a vocabulary of contraband technicalities now forgotten, and which was to the Spanish what the "Levantine" is to the Italian.

On many parts of the English coast smuggling had a secret but cordial understanding with legitimate and open commerce. It had access to the house of more than one great financier, by the back-stairs it is true; and its influence extended itself mysteriously through all the commercial world, and the intricate ramifications of manufacturing industry. Merchant on one side, smuggler on the other; such was the key to the secret of many great fortunes. Séguin affirmed it of Bourgain, Bourgain of Séguin. We do not vouch for their accusations; it is possible that they were calumniating each other. However this may have been, it is certain that the contraband trade, though hunted down by the law, was flourishing enough in certain financial circles. It had relations with "the very best society." Thus the brigand Mandrin, in other days, found himself occasionally tête-à-tête with the Count of Charolais; for this underhand trade often contrived to put on a very respectable appearance; kept a house of its own with an irreproachable exterior.

All this necessitated a host of manœuvres and connivances, which required impenetrable secrecy. A contrabandist was entrusted with a good many things, and knew how to keep them secret. An inviolable confidence was the condition of his existence. The first quality, in fact, in a smuggler was strict honour in his own circle. No discreetness, no smuggling. Fraud has its secrets like the priest's confessional.

These secrets were indeed, as a rule, faithfully kept. The contrabandist swore to betray nothing, and he kept his word; nobody was more trustworthy than the genuine smuggler. The Judge Alcade of Oyarzun captured a smuggler one day, and put him to torture to compel him to disclose the name of the capitalist who secretly supported him. The smuggler refused to tell. The capitalist in question was the Judge Alcade himself. Of these two accomplices, the judge and the smuggler, the one had been compelled, in order to appear in the eyes of the world to fulfil the law, to put the other to the torture, which the other had patiently borne for the sake of his oath.

The two most famous smugglers who haunted Pleinmont at that period were Blasco and Blasquito. They were Tocayos. This was a sort of Spanish or Catholic relationship which consisted in having the same patron saint in heaven; a thing, it will be admitted, not less worthy of consideration than having the same father upon earth.

When a person was initiated into the furtive ways of the contraband business, nothing was more easy, or, from a certain point of view, more troublesome. It was sufficient to have no fear of dark nights, to repair to Pleinmont, and to consult the oracle located there.

IV

PLEINMONT

Pleinmont, near Torteval, is one of the three corners of the island of Guernsey. At the extremity of the cape there rises a high turfy hill, which looks over the sea.

The height is a lonely place. All the more lonely from there being one solitary house there.

This house adds a sense of terror to that of solitude.

It is popularly believed to be haunted.

Haunted or not, its aspect is singular.

Built of granite, and rising only one story high, it stands in the midst of the grassy solitude. It is in a perfectly good condition as far as exterior is concerned; the walls are thick and the roof is sound. Not a stone is wanting in the sides, not a tile upon the roof. A brick-built chimney-stack forms the angle of the roof. The building turns its back to the sea, being on that side merely a blank wall. On examining this wall, however, attentively, the visitor perceives a little window bricked up. The two gables have three dormer windows, one fronting the east, the others fronting the west, but both are bricked up in like manner. The front, which looks inland, has alone a door and windows. This door, too, is walled in, as are also the two windows of the ground-floor. On the first floor — and this is the feature which is most striking as you approach — there are two open windows; but these are even more suspicious than the blind windows. Their open squares look dark even in broad day, for they have no panes of glass, or even window-frames. They open simply upon the dusk within. They strike the imagination like hollow eye-sockets in a human face. Inside all is deserted. Through the gaping casements you may mark the ruin within. No panellings, no woodwork; all bare stone. It is like a windowed sepulchre, giving liberty to the spectres to look out upon the daylight world. The rains sap the foundations on the seaward side. A few nettles, shaken by the breeze, flourish in the lower part of the walls. Far around the horizon there is no other human habitation. The house is a void; the abode of silence: but if you place your ear against the wall and listen, you may distinguish a confused noise now and then, like the flutter of wings. Over the walled door, upon the stone which forms its architrave, are sculptured these letters, “Elm-Pbilg,” with the date “1780.”

The dark shadow of night and the mournful light of the moon find entrance there.

The sea completely surrounds the house. Its situation is magnificent; but for that reason its aspect is more sinister. The beauty of the spot becomes a puzzle. Why does not a human family take up its abode here? The place is beautiful, the house well-built. Whence this neglect? To these questions, obvious to the reason, succeed others, suggested by the reverie which the place inspires. Why is this cultivatable garden uncultivated? No master for it; and the bricked-up doorway? What has happened to the place? Why is it shunned by men? What business is done here? If none, why is there no one here? Is it only when all the rest of the world are asleep that some one in this spot is awake? Dark squalls, wild winds, birds of prey, strange creatures, unknown forms, present themselves to the mind, and connect themselves somehow with this deserted house. For what class of wayfarers can this be the hostelry? You imagine to yourself whirlwinds of rain and hail beating in at the open casements, and wandering through the rooms. Tempests have left their vague traces upon the interior walls. The chambers, though walled and covered in, are visited by the hurricanes. Has the house been the scene of some great crime? You may almost fancy that this spectral dwelling, given up to solitude and darkness, might be heard calling aloud for succour. Does it remain silent? Do voices indeed issue from it? What business has it on hand in this lonely place? The mystery of the dark hours rests securely here. Its aspect is disquieting at noonday; what must it be at midnight? The dreamer asks himself — for dreams have their coherence — what this house may be between the dusk of evening and the twilight of approaching dawn? Has the vast supernatural world some relation with this deserted height, which sometimes compels it to arrest its movements here, and to descend and to become visible? Do the scattered elements of the spirit world whirl around it? Does the impalpable take form and substance here? Insoluble riddles! A holy awe is in the very stones; that dim twilight has surely relations with the infinite Unknown. When the sun has gone down, the song of the birds will be hushed, the goatherd behind the hills will go homeward with his goats; reptiles, taking courage from the gathering darkness, will creep through the fissures of rocks; the stars will begin to appear, night will come, but yonder two blank casements will still be staring at the sky. They open to welcome spirits and apparitions; for it is by the names of apparitions, ghosts, phantom faces vaguely distinct, masks in the lurid light, mysterious movements of minds, and shadows, that the popular faith, at once ignorant and profound, translates the sombre relations of this dwelling with the world of darkness.

The house is “haunted;” the popular phrase comprises everything.

Credulous minds have their explanation; common-sense thinkers have theirs also. “Nothing is more simple,” say the latter, “than the history of the house. It is an old observatory of the time of the revolutionary wars and the days of smuggling. It was built for such objects. The wars being ended, the house was abandoned; but it was not pulled down, as it might one day again become useful. The door and windows have been walled to prevent people entering, or doing injury to the interior. The walls of the windows, on the three sides which face the sea, have been bricked up against the winds of the south and south-west. That is all.”

The ignorant and the credulous, however, are not satisfied. In the first place, the house was not built at the period of the wars of the Revolution. It bears the date “1780,” which was anterior to the Revolution. In the next place it was not built for an observatory. It bears the letters “Elm-Pbilg,” which are the double monogram of two families, and which indicate, according to usage, that the house was built for the use of a newly-married couple. Then it has certainly been inhabited: why then should it be abandoned? If the door and windows were bricked up to prevent people entering the house only, why were two windows left open? Why are there no shutters, no window-frames, no glass? Why were the walls bricked in on one side if not on the other? The wind is prevented from entering from the south; but why is it allowed to enter from the north?

The credulous are wrong, no doubt; but it is clear that the common-sense thinkers have not discovered the key to the mystery. The problem remains still unsolved.

It is certain that the house is generally believed to have been more useful than inconvenient to the smugglers.

The growth of superstitious terror tends to deprive facts of their true proportions. Without doubt, many of the nocturnal phenomena which have, by little and little, secured to the building the reputation of being haunted, might be explained by obscure and furtive visits, by brief sojourns of sailors near the spot, and sometimes by the precaution, sometimes by the daring, of men engaged in certain suspicious occupations concealing themselves for their dark purposes, or allowing themselves to be seen in order to inspire dread.

At this period, already a remote one, many daring deeds were possible. The police — particularly in small places — was by no means as efficient as in these days.

Add to this, that if the house was really, as was said, a resort of the smugglers, their meetings there must, up to a certain point, have been safe from interruptions precisely because the house was dreaded by the superstitious people of the country. Its ghostly reputation prevented its being visited for other reasons. People do not generally apply to the police, or officers of customs, on the subject of spectres. The superstitious rely on making the sign of the cross; not on magistrates and indictments. There is always a tacit connivance, involuntary it may be, but not the less real, between the objects which inspire fear and their victims. The terror-stricken feel a sort of culpability in having encountered their terrors; they imagine themselves to have unveiled a secret; and they have an inward fear, unknown even to themselves, of aggravating their guilt, and exciting the anger of the apparitions. All this makes them discreet. And over and above this reason, the very instinct of the credulous is silence; dread is akin to dumbness; the terrified speak little; horror seems always to whisper, “Hush!”

It must be remembered that this was a period when the Guernsey peasants believed that the Mystery of the Holy Manger is repeated by oxen and asses every year on a fixed day; a period when no one would have dared to enter a stable at night for fear of coming upon the animals on their knees.

If the local legends and stories of the people can be credited, the popular superstition went so far as to fasten to the walls of the house at Pleinmont things of which the traces are still visible — rats without feet, bats without wings, and bodies of other dead animals. Here, too, were seen toads crushed between the pages of a Bible, bunches of yellow lupins, and other strange offerings, placed there by imprudent passers-by at night, who, having fancied that they had seen something, hoped by these small sacrifices to obtain pardon, and to appease the ill-humours of were-wolves and evil spirits. In all times, believers of this kind have flourished; some even in very high places. Cæsar consulted Saganius, and Napoleon Mademoiselle

Lenormand. There are a kind of consciences so tender, that they must seek indulgences even from Beelzebub. “May God do, and Satan not undo,” was one of the prayers of Charles the Fifth. They come to persuade themselves that they may commit sins even against the Evil One; and one of their cherished objects was, to be irreproachable even in the eyes of Satan. We find here an explanation of those adorations sometimes paid to infernal spirits. It is only one more species of fanaticism. Sins against the devil certainly exist in certain morbid imaginations. The fancy that they have violated the laws of the lower regions torments certain eccentric casuists; they are haunted with scruples even about offending the demons. A belief in the efficacy of devotions to the spirits of the Brocken or Armuyr, a notion of having committed sins against hell, visionary penances for imaginary crimes, avowals of the truth to the spirit of falsehood, self-accusation before the origin of all evil, and confessions in an inverted sense — are all realities, or things at least which have existed. The annals of criminal procedure against witchcraft and magic prove this in every page. Human folly unhappily extends even thus far: when terror seizes upon a man he does not stop easily. He dreams of imaginary faults, imaginary purifications, and clears out his conscience with the old witches’ broom.

Be this as it may, if the house at Pleinmont had its secrets, it kept them to itself; except by some rare chance, no one went there to see. It was left entirely alone. Few people, indeed, like to run the risk of an encounter with the other world.

Owing to the terror which it inspired, and which kept at a distance all who could observe or bear testimony on the subject, it had always been easy to obtain an entrance there at night by means of a rope ladder, or even by the use of the first ladder coming to hand in one of the neighbouring fields. A consignment of goods or provisions left there might await in perfect safety the time and opportunity for a furtive embarkation. Tradition relates that forty years ago a fugitive — for political offences as some affirm, for commercial as others say — remained for some time concealed in the haunted house at Pleinmont; whence he finally succeeded in embarking in a fishing-boat for England. From England a passage is easily obtained to America.

Tradition also avers that provisions deposited in this house remain there untouched, Lucifer and the smugglers having an interest in inducing whoever places them there to return.

From the summit of the house, there is a view to the south of the Hanway Rocks, at about a mile from the shore.

These rocks are famous. They have been guilty of all the evil deeds of which rocks are capable. They are the most ruthless destroyers of the sea. They lie in a treacherous ambush for vessels in the night. They have contributed to the enlargement of the cemeteries at Torteval and Rocquaine.

A lighthouse was erected upon these rocks in 1862. At the present day, the Hanways light the way for the vessels which they once lured to destruction; the destroyer in ambush now bears a lighted torch in his hand; and mariners seek in the horizon, as a protector and a guide, the rock which they used to fly as a pitiless enemy. It gives confidence by night in that vast space where it was so long a terror — like a robber converted into a gendarme.

There are three Hanways: the Great Hanway, the Little Hanway, and the Mauve. It is upon the Little Hanway that the red light is placed at the present time.

This reef of rocks forms part of a group of peaks, some beneath the sea, some rising out of it. It towers above them all; like a fortress, it has advanced works: on the side of the open sea, a chain of thirteen rocks; on the north, two breakers — the High Fourquiés, the Needles, and a sandbank called the Hérouée. On the south, three rocks — the Cat Rock, the Percée, and the Herpin Rock; then two banks — the South Bank and the Muet: besides which, there is, on the side opposite Pleinmont, the Tas de Pois d’Aval.

To swim across the channel from the Hanways to Pleinmont is difficult, but not impossible. We have already said that this was one of the achievements of Clubin. The expert swimmer who knows this channel can find two resting-places, the Round Rock, and further on, a little out of the course, to the left, the Red Rock.

THE BIRDS'-NESTERS

It was near the period of that Saturday which was passed by Sieur Clubin at Torteval that a curious incident occurred, which was little heard of at the time, and which did not generally transpire till a long time afterwards. For many things, as we have already observed, remain undivulged, simply by reason of the terror which they have caused in those who have witnessed them.

In the night-time between Saturday and Sunday — we are exact in the matter of the date, and we believe it to be correct — three boys climbed up the hill at Pleinmont. The boys returned to the village: they came from the seashore. They were what are called, in the corrupt French of that part, "déniquoiseaux," or birds'-nesters. Wherever there are cliffs and cleft-rocks overhanging the sea, the young birds'-nesters abound. The reader will remember that Gilliatt interfered in this matter for the sake of the birds as well as for the sake of the children.

The "déniquoiseaux" are a sort of sea-urchins, and are not a very timid species.

The night was very dark. Dense masses of cloud obscured the zenith. Three o'clock had sounded in the steeple of Torteval which is round and pointed like a magician's hat.

Why did the boys return so late? Nothing more simple. They had been searching for sea-gulls' nests in the Tas de Pois d'Aval. The season having been very mild, the pairing of the birds had begun very early. The children watching the fluttering of the male and female about their nests, and excited by the pursuit, had forgotten the time. The waters had crept up around them; they had no time to regain the little bay in which they had moored their boat, and they were compelled to wait upon one of the peaks of the Tas de Pois for the ebb of the tide. Hence their late return. Mothers wait on such occasions in feverish anxiety for the return of their children, and when they find them safe, give vent to their joy in the shape of anger, and relieve their tears by dealing them a sound drubbing. The boys accordingly hastened their steps, but in fear and trembling. Their haste was of that sort which is glad of an excuse for stopping, and which is not inconsistent with a reluctance to reach their destination; for they had before them the prospect of warm embraces, to be followed with an inevitable thrashing.

One only of the boys had nothing of this to fear. He was an orphan: a French boy, without father or mother, and perfectly content just then with his motherless condition; for nobody taking any interest in him, his back was safe from the dreaded blows. The two others were natives of Guernsey, and belonged to the parish of Torteval.

Having climbed the grassy hill, the three birds'-nesters reached the tableland on which was situate the haunted house.

They began by being in fear, which is the proper frame of mind of every passer-by; and particularly of every child at that hour and in that place.

They had a strong desire to take to their heels as fast as possible, and a strong desire, also, to stay and look.

They did stop.

They looked towards the solitary building.

It was all dark and terrible.

It stood in the midst of the solitary plain — an obscure block, a hideous but symmetrical excrescence; a high square mass with right-angled corners, like an immense altar in the darkness.

The first thought of the boys was to run: the second was to draw nearer. They had never seen this house before. There is such a thing as a desire to be frightened arising from curiosity. They had a little French boy with them, which emboldened them to approach.

It is well known that the French have no fear.

Besides, it is reassuring to have company in danger; to be frightened in the company of two others is encouraging.

And then they were a sort of hunters accustomed to peril. They were children; they were used to search, to rummage, to spy out hidden things. They were in the habit of peeping into holes; why not into this hole? Hunting is exciting. Looking into birds' nests perhaps gives an itch for looking a little into a nest of ghosts. A rummage in the dark regions. Why not?

From prey to prey, says the proverb, we come to the devil. After the birds, the demons. The boys were on the way to learn the secret of those terrors of which their parents had told them. To be on the track of hobgoblin tales — nothing could be more attractive. To have long stories to tell like the good housewives. The notion was tempting.

All this mixture of ideas, in their state of half-confusion, half-instinct, in the minds of the Guernsey birds’-nesters, finally screwed their courage to the point. They approached the house.

The little fellow who served them as a sort of moral support in the adventure was certainly worthy of their confidence. He was a bold boy — an apprentice to a ship-caulker; one of those children who have already become men. He slept on a little straw in a shed in the ship-caulker’s yard, getting his own living, having red hair, and a loud voice; climbing easily up walls and trees, not encumbered with prejudices in the matter of property in the apples within his reach; a lad who had worked in the repairing dock for vessels of war — a child of chance, a happy orphan, born in France, no one knew exactly where; ready to give a centime to a beggar; a mischievous fellow, but a good one at heart; one who had talked to Parisians. At this time he was earning a shilling a day by caulking the fishermen’s boats under repair at the Pêqueries. When he felt inclined he gave himself a holiday, and went birds’-nesting. Such was the little French boy.

The solitude of the place impressed them with a strange feeling of dread. They felt the threatening aspect of the silent house. It was wild and savage. The naked and deserted plateau terminated in a precipice at a short distance from its steep incline. The sea below was quiet. There was no wind. Not a blade of grass stirred.

The birds’-nesters advanced by slow steps, the French boy at their head, and looking towards the house.

One of them, afterwards relating the story, or as much of it as had remained in his head, added, “It did not speak.”

They came nearer, holding their breath, as one might approach a savage animal.

They had climbed the hill at the side of the house which descended to seaward towards a little isthmus of rocks almost inaccessible. Thus they had come pretty near to the building; but they saw only the southern side, which was all walled up. They did not dare to approach by the other side, where the terrible windows were.

They grew bolder, however; the caulker’s apprentice whispered, “Let’s veer to larboard. That’s the handsome side. Let’s have a look at the black windows.”

The little band accordingly “veered to larboard,” and came round to the other side of the house.

The two windows were lighted up.

The boys took to their heels.

When they had got to some distance, the French boy, however, returned.

“Hillo!” said he, “the lights have vanished.”

The light at the windows had, indeed, disappeared. The outline of the building was seen as sharply defined as if stamped out with a punch against the livid sky.

Their fear was not abated, but their curiosity had increased. The birds’-nesters approached.

Suddenly the light reappeared at both windows at the same moment.

The two young urchins from Torteval took to their heels and vanished. The daring French boy did not advance, but he kept his ground.

He remained motionless, confronting the house and watching it.

The light disappeared, and appeared again once more. Nothing could be more horrible. The reflection made a vague streak of light upon the grass, wet with the night dew. All of a moment the light cast upon the walls of the house two huge dark profiles, and the shadows of enormous heads.

The house, however, being without ceilings, and having nothing left but its four walls and roof, one window could not be lighted without the other.

Perceiving that the caulker’s apprentice kept his ground, the other birds’-nesters returned, step by step, and one after the other, trembling and curious. The caulker’s apprentice whispered to them, “There are ghosts in the house. I have seen the nose of one.” The two Torteval boys got behind their companion, standing tiptoe against his shoulder; and thus sheltered, and taking him for their shield, felt bolder and watched also.

The house on its part seemed also to be watching them. There it stood in the midst of that vast darkness and silence, with its two glaring eyes. These were its upper windows. The light vanished, reappeared, and vanished again, in the fashion of these unearthly illuminations. These sinister intermissions had, probably, some connection with the opening and shutting of the infernal regions. The air-hole of a sepulchre has thus been seen to produce effects like those from a dark lantern.

Suddenly a dark form, like that of a human being, ascended to one of the windows, as if from without, and plunged into the interior of the house.

To enter by the window is the custom with spirits.

The light was for a moment more brilliant, then went out, and appeared no more. The house became dark. The noises resembled voices. This is always the case. When there was anything to be seen it is silent. When all became invisible again, noises were heard.

There is a silence peculiar to night-time at sea. The repose of darkness is deeper on the water than on the land. When there is neither wind nor wave in that wild expanse, over which, in ordinary time, even the flight of eagles makes no sound, the movement of a fly could be heard. This sepulchral quiet gave a dismal relief to the noises which issued from the house.

“Let us look,” said the French boy.

And he made a step towards the house.

The others were so frightened that they resolved to follow him. They did not dare even to run away alone.

Just as they had passed a heap of fagots, which for some mysterious reason seemed to inspire them with a little courage in that solitude, a white owl flew towards them from a bush. The owls have a suspicious sort of flight, a sidelong skim which is suggestive of mischief afloat. The bird passed near the boys, fixing upon them its round eyes, bright amidst the darkness.

A shudder ran through the group behind the French boy.

He looked up at the owl and said:

“Too late, my bird; I will look.”

And he advanced.

The crackling sound made by his thick-nailed boots among the furze bushes did not prevent his hearing the noise in the house, which rose and fell with the continuousness and the calm accent of a dialogue.

A moment afterwards the boy added:

“Besides, it is only fools who believe in spirits.”

Insolence in the face of danger rallies the cowardly, and inspirits them to go on.

The two Torteval lads resumed their march, quickening their steps behind the caulker’s apprentice.

The haunted house seemed to them to grow larger before their eyes. This optical illusion of fear is founded in reality. The house did indeed grow larger, for they were coming nearer to it.

Meanwhile the voices in the house took a tone more and more distinct. The children listened. The ear, too, has its power of exaggerating. It was different to a murmur, more than a whispering, less than an uproar. Now and then one or two words, clearly articulated, could be caught. These words, impossible to be understood, sounded strangely. The boys stopped and listened; then went forward again.

“It’s the ghosts talking,” said the caulker’s apprentice; “but I don’t believe in ghosts.”

The Torteval boys were sorely tempted to shrink behind the heap of fagots, but they had already left it far behind; and their friend the caulker continued to advance towards the house. They trembled at remaining with him; but they dared not leave him.

Step by step, and perplexed, they followed. The caulker’s apprentice turned towards them and said —

“You know it isn’t true. There are no such things.”

The house grew taller and taller. The voices became more and more distinct.

They drew nearer.

And now they could perceive within the house something like a muffled light. It was a faint glimmer, like one of those effects produced by dark lanterns, already referred to, and which are common at the midnight meetings of witches.

When they were close to the house they halted.

One of the two Torteval boys ventured on an observation:

“It isn’t spirits: it is ladies dressed in white.”

“What’s that hanging from the window?” asked the other.

“It looks like a rope.”

“It is only a hangman’s rope,” said the French boy, authoritatively. “That’s what they use. Only I don’t believe in them.”

And in three bounds, rather than steps, he found himself against the wall of the building.

The two others, trembling, imitated him, and came pressing against him, one on his right side, the other on his left. The boys applied their ears to the wall. The sounds continued.

The following was the conversation of the phantoms: —

“Asi, entendido esta?”
“Entendido.”
“Dicho?”
“Dicho.”
“Aqui esperara un hombre, y podra marcharse en Inglaterra con Blasquito.”
“Pagando?”

“So that is understood?”

“Perfectly.”

“As is arranged?”

“As is arranged.”

“A man will wait here, and can accompany Blasquito to England.”

“Paying the expense?”

"Pagando."
"Blasquito tomara al hombre en su barca."
"Sin buscar para conocer a su pais?"
"No nos toca."
"Ni a su nombre del hombre?"
"No se pide el nombre, pero se pesa la bolsa."

"Bien: esperara el hombre en esa casa."

"Tenga que comer."

"Tendra."

"Onde?"

"En este saco que he llevado."

"Muy bien."

"Puedo dexar el saco aqui?"

"Los contrabandistas no son ladrones."

"Y vosotros, cuando marchais?"

"Mañana por la mañana. Si su hombre de usted parado podria venir con nosotros."

"Parado no esta."

"Hacienda suya."

"Cuantos dias esperara alli?"

“Paying the expense.”
“Blasquito will take the man in his bark.”
“Without seeking to know what country he belongs to?”
“That is no business of ours.”
“Without asking his name?”
“We do not ask for names; we only feel the weight of the purse.”
“Good: the man shall wait in this house.”
“He must have provisions.”
“He will be furnished with them.”
“How?”
“From this bag which I have brought.”
“Very good.”
“Can I leave this bag here?”
“Smugglers are not robbers.”
“And when do you go?”
“To-morrow morning. If your man was ready he could come with us.”
“He is not prepared.”
“That is his affair.”
“How many days will he have to wait in this house?”

“Dos, tres, quatro dias; menos o mas.”

“Es cierto que el Blasquito vendra?”

“Cierto.”

“En est Plainmont?”

“En est Plainmont.”

“A qual semana?”

“La que viene.”

“A qual dia?”

“Viernes, o sabado, o domingo.”

“No peuede faltar?”

“Es mi tocayo.”

“Por qualquiera tiempo viene?”

“Qualquiera. No tieme. Soy el Blasco, es el Blasquito.”

“Asi, no puede faltar de venir en Guernesey?”

“Vengo a un mes, y viene al otro mes.”

“Entiendo.”

“A cuentar del otro sabado, desde hoy en ocho, no se parasan cinco dias sin que venga el Blasquito.”

“Pero un muy malo mar?”

“Egurraldia gaiztoa.”

“Two, three, or four days; more or less.”

“Is it certain that Blasquito will come?”

“Certain.”

“Here to Pleinmont?”

“To Pleinmont.”

“When?”

“Next week.”

“What day?”

“Friday, Saturday, or Sunday.”

“May he not fail?”

“He is my Tocayo.”

“Will he come in any weather?”

“At any time. He has no fear. My name is Blasco, his Blasquito.”

“So he cannot fail to come to Guernsey?”

“I come one month — he the other.”

“I understand.”

“Counting from Saturday last, one week from to-day, five days cannot elapse without bringing Blasquito.”

“But if there is much sea?”

“Bad weather?”

“Si.”

“No vendria el Blasquito tan pronto, pero vendria.”

“Donde vendra?”

“De Vilvao.”

“Onde ira?”

“En Portland.”

“Bien.”

“O en Tor Bay.”

“Mejor.”

“Su humbre de usted puede estarse quieto.”

“No traidor sera, el Blasquito?”

“Los cobardes son traidores. Somos valientes. El mar es la iglesia del invierno. La traicion es la iglesia del infierno.”

“No se entiende a lo que dicemos?”

“Escuchar a nosotros y mirar a nosotros es imposible. La espanta hace alli el desierto.”

“Lo sè.”

“Quien se atravesaria a escuchar?”

“Es verdad.”

“Y escucharian que no entiendrian. Hablamos a una

“Yes.”

“Blasquito will not come so quickly, but he will come.”

“Whence will he come?”

“From Bilbao.”

“Where will he be going?”

“To Portland.”

“Good.”

“Or to Torbay.”

“Better still.”

“Your man may rest easy.”

“Blasquito will betray nothing?”

“Cowards are the only traitors. We are men of courage. The sea is the church of winter. Treason is the church of hell.”

“No one hears what we say?”

“It is impossible to be seen or overheard. The people’s fear of this spot makes it deserted.”

“I know it.”

“Who is there who would dare to listen here?”

“True.”

“Besides, if they listened, none would understand. We lengua fiera y nuestra que no se conoce. Despues que la sabeis, eries con nosotros.”

“Soy viendo para componer las haciendas con ustedes.”

“Bueno.”

“Y allora me voy.”

“Mucho.”

“Digame usted, hombre. Si el pasagero quiere que el Blasquito le lleven en unguna otra parte que Portland o Tor Bay?”

“Tenga onces.”

“El Blasquito hara lo que querra el hombre?”

“El Blasquito hace lo que quieren las onces.”

“Es menester mucho tiempo para ir en Tor Bay?”

“Como quiere el viento.”

“Ocho horas?”

“Menos, o mas.”

“El Blasquito obedecera al pasagero?”

“Si le obedece el mar al Blasquito.”

“Bien pagado sera.”

“El oro es el oro. El viento es el viento.”

“Mucho.”

speak a wild language of our own, which nobody knows hereabouts. As you know it, you are one of us."

"I came only to make these arrangements with you."

"Very good."

"I must now take my leave."

"Be it so."

"Tell me; suppose the passenger should wish Blasquito to take him anywhere else than to Portland or Torbay?"

"Let him bring some gold coins."

"Will Blasquito consult the stranger's convenience?"

"Blasquito will do whatever the gold coins command."

"Does it take long to go to Torbay?"

"That is as it pleases the winds."

"Eight hours?"

"More or less."

"Will Blasquito obey the passenger?"

"If the sea will obey Blasquito."

"He will be well rewarded."

"Gold is gold; and the sea is the sea."

"That is true."

“El hombre hace lo que puede con el oro. Dios con el viento hace lo que quiere.”

“Aqui sera viernes el que desea marcharse con Blasquito.”

“Pues.”

“A qual momento llega Blasquito.”

“A la noche. A la noche se llega, a la noche se marcha. Tenemos una muger quien se llama el mar, y una quien se llama la noche.”

“La muger puede faltar, la hermana no.”

“Todo dicho esta. Abour, hombres.”

“Buenas tardes. Un golpe de aquardiente?”

“Gracias.”

“Es mejor que xarope.”

“Tengo vuestra palabra.”

“Mi nombre es Pundonor.”

“Sea usted con Dios.”

“Ereis gentleman, y soy caballero.”

“Man with his gold does what he can. Heaven with its winds does what it will.”

“The man who is to accompany Blasquito will be here on Friday.”

“Good.”

“At what hour will Blasquito appear?”

“In the night. We arrive by night; and sail by night. We have a wife who is called the sea, and a sister called night. The wife betrays sometimes; but the sister never.”

“All is settled, then. Good-night, my men.”

“Good-night. A drop of brandy first?”

“Thank you.”

“That is better than a syrup.”

“I have your word.”

“My name is Point-of-Honour.”

“Adieu.”

“You are a gentleman: I am a caballero.”

It was clear that only devils could talk in this way. The children did not listen long. This time they took to flight in earnest; the French boy, convinced at last, running even quicker than the others.

On the Tuesday following this Saturday, Sieur Clubin returned to St. Malo, bringing back the Durande.

The Tamaulipas was still at anchor in the roads.

Sieur Clubin, between the whiffs of his pipe, said to the landlord of the Jean Auberge:

“Well; and when does the Tamaulipas get under way?”

“The day after to-morrow — Thursday,” replied the landlord.

On that evening, Clubin supped at the coast-guard officers’ table; and, contrary to his habit, went out after his supper. The consequence of his absence was, that he could not attend to the office of the Durande, and thus lost a little in the matter of freights. This fact was remarked in a man ordinarily punctual.

It appeared that he had chatted a few moments with his friend the money-changer.

He returned two hours after Noguette had sounded the Curfew bell. The Brazilian bell sounds at ten o’clock. It was therefore midnight.

VI

THE JACRESSADE

Forty years ago, St. Malo possessed an alley known by the name of the "Ruelle Coutanchez." This alley no longer exists, having been removed for the improvements of the town.

It was a double row of houses, leaning one towards the other, and leaving between them just room enough for a narrow rivulet, which was called the street. By stretching the legs, it was possible to walk on both sides of the stream, touching with head or elbows, as you went, the houses either on the right or the left. These old relics of mediæval Normandy have almost a human interest. Tumbledown houses and sorcerers always go together. Their leaning stories, their overhanging walls, their bowed penthouses, and their old thick-set irons, seem like lips, chin, nose, and eyebrows. The garret window is the blind eye. The walls are the wrinkled and blotchy cheeks. The opposite houses lay their foreheads together as if they were plotting some malicious deed. All those words of ancient villany — like cut-throat, "slit-weazand," and the like — are closely connected with architecture of this kind.

One of these houses in the alley — the largest and the most famous, or notorious — was known by the name of the Jacressade.

The Jacressade was a lodging-house for people who do not lodge. In all towns, and particularly in sea-ports, there is always found beneath the lowest stratum of society a sort of residuum: vagabonds who are more than a match for justice; rovers after adventures; chemists of the swindling order, who are always dropping their lives into the melting-pot; people in rags of every shape, and in every style of wearing them; withered fruits of roguery; bankrupt existences; consciences that have filed their schedule; men who have failed in the house-breaking trade (for the great masters of burglary move in a higher sphere); workmen and workwomen in the trade of wickedness; oddities, male and female; men in coats out at elbows; scoundrels reduced to indigence; rogues who have missed the wages of roguery; men who have been hit in the social duel; harpies who have no longer any prey; petty larceners; queux in the double and unhappy meaning of that word. Such are the constituents of that living mass. Human nature is here reduced to something bestial. It is the refuse of the social state, heaped up in an obscure corner, where from time to time descends that dreaded broom which is known by the name of police. In St. Malo, the Jacressade was the name of this corner.

It is not in dens of this sort that we find the high-class criminals — the robbers, forgers, and other great products of ignorance and poverty. If murder is represented here, it is generally in the person of some coarse drunkard; in the matter of robbery, the company rarely rise higher than the mere sharper. The vagrant is there; but not the highwayman. It would not, however, be safe to trust this distinction. This last stage of vagabondage may have its extremes of scoundrelism. It was on an occasion, when casting their nets into the Epi-scié — which was in Paris what the Jacressade was in St. Malo — that the police captured the notorious Lacenaire.

These lurking-places refuse nobody. To fall in the social scale has a tendency to bring men to one level. Sometimes honesty in tatters found itself there. Virtue and probity have been known before now to be brought to strange passes. We must not judge always by appearances, even in the palace or at the galleys. Public respect, as well as universal reprobation, requires testing. Surprising results sometimes spring from this principle. An angel may be discovered in the stews; a pearl in the dunghill. Such sad and dazzling discoveries are not altogether unknown.

The Jacressade was rather a courtyard than a house; and more of a well than a courtyard. It had no stories looking on the street. Its façade was simply a high wall, with a low gateway. You raised the latch, pushed the gate, and were at once in the courtyard.

In the midst of this yard might be perceived a round hole, encircled with a margin of stones, and even with the ground. The yard was small, the well large. A broken pavement surrounded it.

The courtyard was square, and built on three sides only. On the side of the street was only the wall; facing you as you entered the gateway stood the house, the two wings of which formed the sides to right and left.

Any one entering there after nightfall, at his own risk and peril, would have heard a confused murmur of voices; and, if there had been moonlight or starlight enough to give shape to the obscure forms before his eyes, this is what he would have seen.

The courtyard: the well. Around the courtyard, in front of the gate, a lean-to or shed, in a sort of horse-shoe form, but with square corners; a rotten gallery, with a roof of joists supported by stone pillars at unequal distances. In the centre, the well; around the well, upon a litter of straw, a kind of circular chaplet, formed of the soles of boots and shoes; some trodden down at heel, some showing the toes of the wearers, some the naked heels. The feet of men, women, and children, all asleep.

Beyond these feet, the eye might have distinguished, in the shadow of the shed, bodies, drooping heads, forms stretched out lazily, bundles of rags of both sexes, a promiscuous assemblage, a strange and revolting mass of life. The accommodation of this sleeping chamber was open to all, at the rate of two sous a week. On a stormy night the rain fell upon the feet, the whirling snow settled on the bodies of those wretched sleepers.

Who were these people? The unknown. They came there at night, and departed in the morning. Creatures of this kind form part of the social fabric. Some stole in during the darkness, and paid nothing. The greater part had scarcely eaten during the day. All kinds of vice and baseness, every sort of moral infection, every species of distress were there. The same sleep settled down upon all in this bed of filth. The dreams of all these companions in misery went on side by side. A dismal meeting-place, where misery and weakness, half-sobered debauchery, weariness from long walking to and fro, with evil thoughts, in quest of bread, pallor with closed eyelids, remorse, envy, lay mingled and festering in the same miasma, with faces that had the look of death, and dishevelled hair mixed with the filth and sweepings of the streets. Such was the putrid heap of life fermenting in this dismal spot. An unlucky turn of the wheel of fortune, a ship arrived on the day before, a discharge from prison, a dark night, or some other chance, had cast them here, to find a miserable shelter. Every day brought some new accumulation of such misery. Let him enter who would, sleep who could, speak who dared; for it was a place of whispers. The new comers hastened to bury themselves in the mass, or tried to seek oblivion in sleep, since there was none in the darkness of the place. They snatched what little of themselves they could from the jaws of death. They closed their eyes in that confusion of horrors which every day renewed. They were the embodiment of misery, thrown off from society, as the scum is from the sea.

It was not every one who could even get a share of the straw. More than one figure was stretched out naked upon the flags. They lay down worn out with weariness, and awoke paralysed. The well, without lid or parapet, and thirty feet in depth, gaped open night and day. Rain fell around it; filth accumulated about, and the gutters of the yard ran down and filtered through its sides. The pail for drawing the water stood by the side. Those who were thirsty drank there; some, disgusted with life, drowned themselves in it — slipped from their slumber in the filthy shed into that profounder sleep. In the year 1819, the body of a boy, of fourteen years old, was taken up out of this well.

To be safe in this house, it was necessary to be of the “right sort.” The uninitiated were regarded with suspicion.

Did these miserable wretches, then, know each other? No; yet they scented out the genuine guest of the Jacressade.

The mistress of the house was a young and rather pretty woman, wearing a cap trimmed with ribbons. She washed herself now and then with water from the well. She had a wooden leg.

At break of day, the courtyard became empty. Its inmates dispersed.

An old cock and some other fowls were kept in the courtyard, where they raked among the filth of the place all day long. A long horizontal beam, supported by posts, traversed the yard — a gibbet-shaped erection, not out of keeping with the associations of the place. Sometimes on the morrow of a rainy-day, a silk dress, mudded and wet, would be seen hanging out to dry upon this beam. It belonged to the woman with the wooden leg.

Over the shed, and like it, surrounding the yard, was a story, and above this story a loft. A rotten wooden ladder, passing through a hole in the roof of the shed, conducted to this story; and up this ladder the woman would climb, sometimes staggering while its crazy rounds creaked beneath her.

The occasional lodgers, whether by the week or the night, slept in the courtyard; the regular inmates lived in the house.

Windows without a pane of glass, door-frames with no door, fireplaces without stoves; such were the chief features of the interior. You might pass from one room to the other, indifferently, by a long square aperture which had been the door, or by a triangular hole between the joists of the partitions. The fallen plaster of the ceiling lay about the floor. It was difficult to say how the old house still stood erect. The high winds indeed shook it. The lodgers ascended as they could by the worn and slippery steps of the ladder. Everything was open to the air. The wintry atmosphere was absorbed into the house, like water into a sponge. The multitude of spiders seemed alone to guarantee the place against falling to pieces immediately.

There was no sign of furniture. Two or three paillasses were in the corner, their ticking torn in parts, and showing more dust than straw within. Here and there were a water-pot and an earthen pipkin. A close, disagreeable odour haunted the rooms.

The windows looked out upon the square yard. The scene was like the interior of a scavenger's cart. The things, not to speak of the human beings, which lay rusting, mouldering, and putrefying there, were indescribable. The fragments seemed to fraternise together. Some fell from the walls, others from the living tenants of the place. The débris were sown with their tatters.

Besides the floating population which bivouacked nightly in the square yard, the Jacressade had three permanent lodgers — a charcoal man, a rag-picker, and a "gold-maker." The charcoal man and the rag-picker occupied two of the paillasses of the first story; the "gold-maker," a chemist, lodged in the loft, which was called, no one knew why, the garret. Nobody knew where the woman slept. The "gold-maker" was a poet in a small way. He inhabited a room in the roof, under the tiles — a chamber with a narrow window, and a large stone fireplace forming a gulf, in which the wind howled at will. The garret window having no frame, he had nailed across it a piece of iron sheathing, part of the wreck of a ship. This sheathing left little room for the entrance of light and much for the entrance of cold. The charcoal-man paid rent from time to time in the shape of a sack of charcoal; the rag-picker paid with a bowl of grain for the fowls every week; the "gold-maker" did not pay at all. Meanwhile the latter consumed the very house itself for fuel. He had pulled down the little woodwork which remained; and every now and then he took from the wall or the roof a lath or some scantling, to heat his crucible. Upon the partition, above the rag-picker's mattress, might have been seen two columns of figures, marked in chalk by the rag-picker himself from week to week — a column of threes, and a column of fives — according as the bowl of grain had cost him three liards or five centimes. The gold-pot of the "chemist" was an old fragment of a bomb-shell, promoted by him to the dignity of a crucible, in which he mixed his ingredients. The transmutation of metals absorbed all his thoughts. He was determined before he died to revenge himself by breaking the windows of orthodox science with the real philosopher's stone. His furnace consumed a good deal of wood. The hand-rail of the stairs had disappeared. The house was slowly burning away. The landlady said to him, “You will leave us nothing but the shell.” He mollified her by addressing her in verses.

Such was the Jacressade.

A boy of twelve, or, perhaps, sixteen — for he was like a dwarf, with a large wen upon his neck, and always carrying a broom in his hand — was the domestic of the place.

The habitués entered by the gateway of the courtyard; the public entered by the shop.

In the high wall, facing the street, and to the right of the entrance to the courtyard, was a square opening, serving at once as a door and a window. This was the shop. The square opening had a shutter and a frame — the only shutter in all the house which had hinges and bolts. Behind this square aperture, which was open to the street, was a little room, a compartment obtained by curtailing the sleeping shed in the courtyard. Over the door, passers-by read the inscription in charcoal, “Curiosities sold here.” On three boards, forming the shop front, were several china pots without ears, a Chinese parasol made of goldbeater’s skin, and ornamented with figures, torn here and there, and impossible to open or shut; fragments of iron, and shapeless pieces of old pottery, and dilapidated hats and bonnets, three or four shells, some packets of old bone and metal buttons, a tobacco-box with a portrait of Marie-Antoinette, and a dog’s-eared volume of Boisbertrand’s Algebra. Such was the stock of the shop; this assortment completed the “curiosities.” The shop communicated by a back door with the yard in which was the well. It was furnished with a table and a stool. The woman with a wooden leg presided at the counter.

NOCTURNAL BUYERS AND MYSTERIOUS SELLERS

Clubin had been absent from the Jean Auberge all the evening of Tuesday. On the Wednesday night he was absent again.

In the dusk of that evening, two strangers penetrated into the mazes of the Ruelle Coutanchez. They stopped in front of the Jacressade. One of them knocked at the window; the door of the shop opened, and they entered. The woman with the wooden leg met them with the smile which she reserved for respectable citizens. There was a candle on the table.

The strangers were, in fact, respectable citizens. The one who had knocked said, "Good-day, mistress. I have come for that affair."

The woman with the wooden leg smiled again, and went out by the back-door leading to the courtyard, and where the well was. A moment afterwards the back-door was opened again, and a man stood in the doorway. He wore a cap and a blouse. It was easy to see the shape of something under his blouse. He had bits of old straw in his clothes, and looked as if he had just been aroused from sleep.

He advanced and exchanged glances with the strangers. The man in the blouse looked puzzled, but cunning; he said —

"You are the gunsmith?"

The one who had tapped at the window replied —

"Yes; you are the man from Paris?"

"Known as Redskin. Yes."

"Show me the thing."

The man took from under his blouse a weapon extremely rare at that period in Europe. It was a revolver.

The weapon was new and bright. The two strangers examined it. The one who seemed to know the house, and whom the man in the blouse had called "the gunsmith," tried the mechanism. He passed the weapon to the other, who appeared less at home there, and kept his back turned to the light.

The gunsmith continued —

"How much?"

The man in the blouse replied —

"I have just brought it from America. Some people bring monkeys, parrots, and other animals, as if the French people were savages. For myself I brought this. It is a useful invention."

"How much?" inquired the gunsmith again.

"It is a pistol which turns and turns."

"How much?"

"Bang! the first fire. Bang! the second fire. Bang! the third fire. What a hailstorm of bullets! That will do some execution."

"The price?"

"There are six barrels."

"Well, well, what do you want for it?"

"Six barrels; that is six Louis."

"Will you take five?"

"Impossible. One Louis a ball. That is the price."

"Come, let us do business together. Be reasonable."

"I have named a fair price. Examine the weapon, Mr. Gunsmith."

"I have examined it."

"The barrel twists and turns like Talleyrand himself. The weapon ought to be mentioned in the Dictionary of Weathercocks. It is a gem."

"I have looked at it."

"The barrels are of Spanish make."

"I see they are."

"They are twisted. This is how this twisting is done. They empty into a forge the basket of a collector of old iron. They fill it full of these old scraps, with old nails, and broken horseshoes swept out of farriers' shops."

"And old sickle-blades."

"I was going to say so, Mr. Gunsmith. They apply to all this rubbish a good sweating heat, and this makes a magnificent material for gun-barrels."

"Yes; but it may have cracks, flaws, or crosses."

"True; but they remedy the crosses by little twists, and avoid the risk of doublings by beating hard. They bring their mass of iron under the great hammer; give it two more good sweating heats. If the iron has been heated too much, they re-temper it with dull heats, and lighter hammers. And then they take out their stuff and roll it well; and with this iron they manufacture you a weapon like this."

"You are in the trade, I suppose?"

"I am of all trades."

“The barrels are pale-coloured.”

“That’s the beauty of them, Mr. Gunsmith. The tint is obtained with antimony.”

“It is settled, then, that we give you five Louis?”

“Allow me to observe that I had the honour of saying six.”

The gunsmith lowered his voice.

“Hark you, master. Take advantage of the opportunity. Get rid of this thing. A weapon of this kind is of no use to a man like you. It will make you remarked.”

“It is very true,” said the Parisian. “It is rather conspicuous. It is more suited to a gentleman.”

“Will you take five Louis?”

“No, six; one for every shot.”

“Come, six Napoleons.”

“I will have six Louis.”

“You are not a Bonapartist, then. You prefer a Louis to a Napoleon.”

The Parisian nicknamed “Redskin” smiled.

“A Napoleon is greater,” said he, “but a Louis is worth more.”

“Six Napoleons.”

“Six Louis. It makes a difference to me of four-and-twenty francs.”

“The bargain is off in that case.”

“Good: I keep the toy.”

“Keep it.”

“Beating me down! a good idea! It shall never be said that I got rid like that of a wonderful specimen of ingenuity.”

“Good-night, then.”

“It marks a whole stage in the progress of making pistols, which the Chesapeake Indians call Nortay-u-Hah.”

“Five Louis, ready money. Why, it is a handful of gold.”

“‘Nortay-u-Hah,’ that signifies ‘short gun.’ A good many people don’t know that.”

“Will you take five Louis, and just a bit of silver?”

“I said six, master.”

The man who kept his back to the candle, and who had not yet spoken, was spending his time during the dialogue in turning and testing the mechanism of the pistol. He approached the armourer’s ear and whispered —

“Is it a good weapon?”

“Excellent.”

“I will give the six Louis.”

Five minutes afterwards, while the Parisian nicknamed “Redskin” was depositing the six Louis which he had just received in a secret slit under the breast of his blouse, the armourer and his companion carrying the revolver in his trousers pocket, stepped out into the straggling street.

VIII

A “CANNON” OFF THE RED BALL AND THE BLACK

On the morrow, which was a Thursday, a tragic circumstance occurred at a short distance from St. Malo, near the peak of the “Décollé,” a spot where the cliff is high and the sea deep.

A line of rocks in the form of the top of a lance, and connecting themselves with the land by a narrow isthmus, stretch out there into the water, ending abruptly with a large peak-shaped breaker. Nothing is commoner in the architecture of the sea. In attempting to reach the plateau of the peaked rock from the shore, it was necessary to follow an inclined plane, the ascent of which was here and there somewhat steep.

It was upon a plateau of this kind, towards four o’clock in the afternoon, that a man was standing, enveloped in a large military cape, and armed; a fact easy to be perceived from certain straight and angular folds in his mantle. The summit on which this man was resting was a rather extensive platform, dotted with large masses of rock, like enormous paving-stones, leaving between them narrow passages. This platform, on which a kind of thick, short grass grew here and there, came to an end on the sea side in an open space, leading to a perpendicular escarpment. The escarpment, rising about sixty feet above the level of the sea, seemed cut down by the aid of a plumb-line. Its left angle, however, was broken away, and formed one of those natural staircases common to granite cliffs worn by the sea, the steps of which are somewhat inconvenient, requiring sometimes the strides of a giant or the leaps of an acrobat. These stages of rock descended perpendicularly to the sea, where they were lost. It was a break-neck place. However, in case of absolute necessity, a man might succeed in embarking there, under the very wall of the cliff.

A breeze was sweeping the sea. The man wrapped in his cape and standing firm, with his left hand grasping his right shoulder, closed one eye, and applied the other to a telescope. He seemed absorbed in anxious scrutiny. He had approached the edge of the escarpment, and stood there motionless, his gaze immovably fixed on the horizon. The tide was high; the waves were beating below against the foot of the cliffs.

The object which the stranger was observing was a vessel in the offing, and which was manœuvring in a strange manner. The vessel, which had hardly left the port of St. Malo an hour, had stopped behind the Banquetiers. It had not cast anchor, perhaps because the bottom would only have permitted it to bear to leeward on the edge of the cable, and because the ship would have strained on her anchor under the cutwater. Her captain had contented himself with lying-to.

The stranger, who was a coast-guardman, as was apparent from his uniform cape, watched all the movements of the three-master, and seemed to note them mentally. The vessel was lying-to, a little off the wind, which was indicated by the backing of the small topsail, and the bellying of the main-topsail. She had squared the mizen, and set the topmast as close as possible, and in such a manner as to work the sails against each other, and to make little way either on or off shore. Her captain evidently did not care to expose his vessel much to the wind, for he had only braced up the small mizen-topsail. In this way, coming crossway on, he did not drift at the utmost more than half a league an hour.

It was still broad daylight, particularly on the open sea, and on the heights of the cliff. The shores below were becoming dark.

The coast-guardman, still engaged in his duty, and carefully scanning the offing, had not thought of observing the rocks at his side and at his feet. He turned his back towards the difficult sort of causeway which formed the communication between his resting-place and the shore. He did not, therefore, remark that something was moving in that direction. Behind a fragment of rock, among the steps of that causeway, something like the figure of a man had been concealed, according to all appearances, since the arrival of the coast-guardman. From time to time a head issued from the shadow behind the rock; looked up and watched the watcher. The head, surmounted by a wide-brimmed American hat, was that of the Quaker-looking man, who, ten days before, was talking among the stones of the Petit-Bey to Captain Zuela.

Suddenly, the curiosity of the coast-guardman seemed to be still more strongly awakened. He polished the glass of his telescope quickly with his sleeve, and brought it to bear closely upon the three-master.

A little black spot seemed to detach itself from her side.

The black spot, looking like a small insect upon the water, was a boat.

The boat seemed to be making for the shore. It was manned by several sailors, who were pulling vigorously.

She pulled crosswise by little and little, and appeared to be approaching the Pointe du Décollé.

The gaze of the coast-guardman seemed to have reached its most intense point. No movement of the boat escaped it. He had approached nearer still to the verge of the rock.

At that instant a man of large stature appeared on one of the rocks behind him. It was the Quaker. The officer did not see him.

The man paused an instant, his arms at his sides, but with his fists doubled; and with the eye of a hunter, watching for his prey, he observed the back of the officer.

Four steps only separated them. He put one foot forward, then stopped; took a second step, and stopped again. He made no movement except the act of walking; all the rest of his body was motionless as a statue. His foot fell upon the tufts of grass without noise. He made a third step, and paused again. He was almost within reach of the coast-guard, who stood there still motionless with his telescope. The man brought his two closed fists to a level with his collar-bone, then struck out his arms sharply, and his two fists, as if thrown from a sling, struck the coast-guardman on the two shoulders. The shock was decisive. The coast-guardman had not the time to utter a cry. He fell head first from the height of the rock into the sea. His boots appeared in the air about the time occupied by a flash of lightning. It was like the fall of a stone in the sea, which instantly closed over him.

Two or three circles widened out upon the dark water.

Nothing remained but the telescope, which had dropped from the hands of the man, and lay upon the turf.

The Quaker leaned over the edge of the escarpment a moment, watched the circles vanishing on the water, waited a few minutes, and then rose again, singing in a low voice:

“The captain of police is dead,
Through having lost his life.”

He knelt down a second time. Nothing reappeared. Only at the spot where the officer had been engulfed, he observed on the surface of the water a sort of dark spot, which became diffused with the gentle lapping of the waves. It seemed probable that the coast-guardman had fractured his skull against some rock under water, and that his blood caused the spot in the foam. The Quaker, while considering the meaning of this spot, began to sing again:

"Not very long before he died,
The luckless man was still alive."

He did not finish his song.

He heard an extremely soft voice behind him, which said:

"Is that you, Rantaine? Good-day. You have just killed a man!"

He turned. About fifteen paces behind him, in one of the passages between the rocks, stood a little man holding a revolver in his hand.

The Quaker answered:

"As you see. Good-day, Sieur Clubin."

The little man started.

"You know me?"

"You knew me very well," replied Rantaine.

Meanwhile they could hear a sound of oars on the sea. It was the approach of the boat which the officer had observed.

Sieur Clubin said in a low tone, as if speaking to himself:

"It was done quickly."

"What can I do to oblige you?" asked Rantaine.

"Oh, a trifling matter! It is very nearly ten years since I saw you. You must have been doing well. How are you?"

"Well enough," answered Rantaine. "How are you?"

"Very well," replied Clubin.

Rantaine advanced a step towards Clubin.

A little sharp click caught his ear. It was Sieur Clubin who was cocking his revolver.

"Rantaine, there are about fifteen paces between us. It is a nice distance. Remain where you are."

"Very well," said Rantaine. "What do you want with me?"

"I! Oh, I have come to have a chat with you."

Rantaine did not offer to move again. Sieur Clubin continued:

"You assassinated a coast-guardman just now."

Rantaine lifted the flap of his hat, and replied:

"You have already done me the honour to mention it."

"Exactly; but in terms less precise. I said a man: I say now, a coast-guardman. The man wore the number 619. He was the father of a family; leaves a wife and five children."

"That is no doubt correct," said Rantaine.

There was a momentary pause.

"They are picked men — those coast-guard people," continued Clubin; "almost all old sailors."

"I have remarked," said Rantaine, "that people generally do leave a wife and five children."

Sieur Clubin continued:

"Guess how much this revolver cost me?"

"It is a pretty tool," said Rantaine.

"What do you guess it at?"

"I should guess it at a good deal."

"It cost me one hundred and forty-four francs."

"You must have bought that," said Rantaine, "at the shop in the Ruelle Coutanchez."

Clubin continued:

"He did not cry out. The fall stopped his voice, no doubt."

"Sieur Clubin, there will be a breeze to-night."

"I am the only one in the secret."

"Do you still stay at the Jean Auberge?"

"Yes: you are not badly served there."

"I remember getting some excellent sour-krout there."

"You must be exceedingly strong, Rantaine. What shoulders you have! I should be sorry to get a tap from you. I, on the other hand, when I came into the world, looked so spare and sickly, that they despaired of rearing me."

"They succeeded though; which was lucky."

"Yes: I still stay at the Jean Auberge."

"Do you know, Sieur Clubin, how I recognised you? It was from your having recognised me. I said to myself, there is nobody like Sieur Clubin for that."

And he advanced a step.

"Stand back where you were, Rantaine."

Rantaine fell back, and said to himself:

"A fellow becomes like a child before one of those weapons."

Sieur Clubin continued:

"The position of affairs is this: we have on our right, in the direction of St. Enogat, at about three hundred paces from here, another coast-guardman — his number is 618 — who is still alive; and on our left, in the direction of St. Lunaire — a customs station. That makes seven armed men who could be here, if necessary, in five minutes. The rock would be surrounded; the way hither guarded. Impossible to elude them. There is a corpse at the foot of this rock.”

Rantaine took a side-way glance at the revolver.

“As you say, Rantaine, it is a pretty tool. Perhaps it is only loaded with powder; but what does that matter? A report would be enough to bring an armed force — and I have six barrels here.”

The measured sound of the oars became very distinct. The boat was not far off.

The tall man regarded the little man curiously. Sieur Clubin spoke in a voice more and more soft and subdued.

“Rantaine, the men in the boat which is coming, knowing what you did here just now, would lend a hand and help to arrest you. You are to pay Captain Zuela ten thousand francs for your passage. You would have made a better bargain, by the way, with the smugglers of Pleinmont; but they would only have taken you to England; and besides, you cannot risk going to Guernsey, where they have the pleasure of knowing you. To return, then, to the position of affairs — if I fire, you are arrested. You are to pay Zuela for your passage ten thousand francs. You have already paid him five thousand in advance. Zuela would keep the five thousand and be gone. These are the facts. Rantaine, you have managed your masquerading very well. That hat — that queer coat — and those gaiters make a wonderful change. You forgot the spectacles; but did right to let your whiskers grow.”

“Rantaine, you have on a pair of American breeches, with a double fob. In one side you keep your watch. Take care of it.”

“Thank you, Sieur Clubin.”

“In the other is a little box made of wrought iron, which opens and shuts with a spring. It is an old sailor’s tobacco-box. Take it out of your pocket, and throw it over to me.”

“Why, this is robbery.”

“You are at liberty to call the coast-guardman.”

And Clubin fixed his eye on Rantaine.

“Stay, Mess Clubin,” said Rantaine, making a slight forward movement, and holding out his open hand.

The title “Mess” was a delicate flattery.

"Stay where you are, Rantaine."

"Mess Clubin, let us come to terms. I offer you half."

Clubin crossed his arms, still showing the barrels of his revolver.

"Rantaine, what do you take me for? I am an honest man."

And he added after a pause:

"I must have the whole."

Rantaine muttered between his teeth, "This fellow's of a stern sort."

The eye of Clubin lighted up, his voice became clear and sharp as steel. He cried:

"I see that you are labouring under a mistake. Robbery is your name, not mine. My name is Restitution. Hark you, Rantaine. Ten years ago you left Guernsey one night, taking with you the cash-box of a certain partnership concern, containing fifty thousand francs which belonged to you, but forgetting to leave behind you fifty thousand francs which were the property of another. Those fifty thousand francs, the money of your partner, the excellent and worthy Mess Lethierry, make at present, at compound interest, calculated for ten years, eighty thousand six hundred and sixty-six francs. You went into a money-changer's yesterday. I'll give you his name — Rébuchet, in St. Vincent Street. You counted out to him seventy-six thousand francs in French bank-notes; in exchange for which he gave you three notes of the Bank of England for one thousand pounds sterling each, plus the exchange. You put these bank-notes in the iron tobacco-box, and the iron tobacco-box into your double fob on the right-hand side. On the part of Mess Lethierry, I shall be content with that. I start to-morrow for Guernsey, and intend to hand it to him. Rantaine, the three-master lying-to out yonder is the Tamaulipas. You have had your luggage put aboard there with the other things belonging to the crew. You want to leave France. You have your reasons. You are going to Arequipa. The boat is coming to fetch you. You are awaiting it. It is at hand. You can hear it. It depends on me whether you go or stay. No more words. Fling me the tobacco-box."

Rantaine dipped his hand in the fob, drew out a little box, and threw it to Clubin. It was the iron tobacco-box. It fell and rolled at Clubin's feet.

Clubin knelt without lowering his gaze; felt about for the box with his left hand, keeping all the while his eyes and the six barrels of the revolver fixed upon Rantaine.

Then he cried:

"Turn your back, my friend."

Rantaine turned his back.

Sieur Clubin put the revolver under one arm, and touched the spring of the tobacco-box. The lid flew open.

It contained four bank-notes; three of a thousand pounds, and one of ten pounds.

He folded up the three bank-notes of a thousand pounds each, replaced them in the iron tobacco-box, shut the lid again, and put it in his pocket.

Then he picked up a stone, wrapped it in the ten-pound note, and said:

“You may turn round again.”

Rantaine turned.

Sieur Clubin continued:

“I told you I would be contented with three thousand pounds. Here, I return you ten pounds.”

And he threw to Rantaine the note enfolding the stone.

Rantaine, with a movement of his foot, sent the bank-note and the stone into the sea.

“As you please,” said Clubin. “You must be rich. I am satisfied.”

The noise of oars, which had been continually drawing nearer during the dialogue, ceased. They knew by this that the boat had arrived at the base of the cliff.

“Your vehicle waits below. You can go, Rantaine.”

Rantaine advanced towards the steps of stones, and rapidly disappeared.

Clubin moved cautiously towards the edge of the escarpment, and watched him descending.

The boat had stopped near the last stage of the rocks, at the very spot where the coast-guardman had fallen.

Still observing Rantaine stepping from stone to stone, Clubin muttered:

“A good number 619. He thought himself alone. Rantaine thought there were only two there. I alone knew that there were three.”

He perceived at his feet the telescope which had dropped from the hands of the coast-guardman.

The sound of oars was heard again. Rantaine had stepped into the boat, and the rowers had pushed out to sea.

When Rantaine was safely in the boat, and the cliff was beginning to recede from his eyes, he arose again abruptly. His features were convulsed with rage; he clenched his fist and cried:

“Ha! he is the devil himself; a villain!”

A few seconds later, Clubin, from the top of the rock, while bringing his telescope to bear upon the boat, heard distinctly the following words articulated by a loud voice, and mingling with the noise of the sea:

“Sieur Clubin, you are an honest man; but you will not be offended if I write to Lethierry to acquaint him with this matter; and we have here in the boat a sailor from Guernsey, who is one of the crew of the Tamaulipas; his name is Ahier-Tostevin, and he will return to St. Malo on Zuela’s next voyage, to bear testimony to the fact of my having returned to you, on Mess Lethierry’s account, the sum of three thousand pounds sterling.”

It was Rantaine’s voice.

Clubin rarely did things by halves. Motionless as the coast-guardman had been, and in the exact same place, his eye still at the telescope, he did not lose sight of the boat for one moment. He saw it growing less amidst the waves; watched it disappear and reappear, and approach the vessel, which was lying-to; finally he recognised the tall figure of Rantaine on the deck of the Tamaulipas.

When the boat was raised, and slung again to the davits, the Tamaulipas was in motion once more. The land-breeze was fresh, and she spread all her sails. Clubin’s glass continued fixed upon her outline growing more and more indistinct; until half an hour later, when the Tamaulipas had become only a dark shape upon the horizon, growing smaller and smaller against the pale twilight in the sky.

IX

USEFUL INFORMATION FOR PERSONS WHO EXPECT OR FEAR THE ARRIVAL OF LETTERS FROM BEYOND SEA

On that evening, Sieur Clubin returned late.

One of the causes of his delay was, that before going to his inn, he had paid a visit to the Dinan gate of the town, a place where there were several wine-shops. In one of these wine-shops, where he was not known, he had bought a bottle of brandy, which he placed in the pocket of his overcoat, as if he desired to conceal it. Then, as the Durande was to start on the following morning, he had taken a turn aboard to satisfy himself that everything was in order.

When Sieur Clubin returned to the Jean Auberge, there was no one left in the lower room except the old sea-captain, M. Gertrais-Gaboureau, who was drinking a jug of ale and smoking his pipe.

M. Gertrais-Gaboureau saluted Sieur Clubin between a whiff and a draught of ale.

“How d’ye do, Captain Clubin?”

“Good evening, Captain Gertrais.”

“Well, the Tamaulipas is gone.”

“Ah!” said Clubin, “I did not observe.”

Captain Gertrais-Gaboureau expectorated, and said:

“Zuela has decamped.”

“When was that?”

“This evening.”

“Where is he gone?”

“To the devil.”

“No doubt; but where is that?”

“To Arequipa.”

“I knew nothing of it,” said Clubin.

He added:

“I am going to bed.”

He lighted his candle, walked towards the door, and returned.

“Have you ever been at Arequipa, Captain?”

“Yes; some years ago.”

“Where do they touch on that voyage?”

“A little everywhere; but the Tamaulipas will touch nowhere.”

M. Gertrais-Gaboureau emptied his pipe upon the corner of a plate and continued:

“You know the lugger called the Trojan Horse, and that fine three-master, the Trentemouzin, which are gone to Cardiff? I was against their sailing on account of the weather. They have returned in a fine state. The lugger was laden with turpentine; she sprang a leak, and in working the pumps they pumped up with the water all her cargo. As to the three-master, she has suffered most above water. Her cutwater, her headrail, the stock of her larboard anchor are broken. Her standing jibboom is gone clean by the cap. As for the jib-shrouds and bobstays, go and see what they look like. The mizenmast is not injured, but has had a severe shock. All the iron of the bowsprit has given way; and it is an extraordinary fact that, though the bowsprit itself is not scratched, it is completely stripped. The larboard-bow of the vessel is stove in a good three feet square. This is what comes of not taking advice.”

Clubin had placed the candle on the table, and had begun to readjust a row of pins which he kept in the collar of his overcoat. He continued:

“Didn’t you say, Captain, that the Tamaulipas would not touch anywhere?”

“Yes; she goes direct to Chili.”

“In that case, she can send no news of herself on the voyage.”

“I beg your pardon, Captain Clubin. In the first place, she can send any letters by vessels she may meet sailing for Europe.”

“That is true.”

“Then there is the ocean letter-box.”

“What do you mean by the ocean letter-box?”

“Don’t you know what that is, Captain Clubin?”

“No.”

“When you pass the straits of Magellan — —”

“Well.”

“Snow all round you; always bad weather; ugly down-easters, and bad seas.”

“Well.”

“When you have doubled Cape Monmouth — —”

“Well, what next?”

“Then you double Cape Valentine.”

“And then?”

“Why, then you double Cape Isidore.”

“And afterwards?”

“You double Point Anne.”

“Good. But what is it you call the ocean letter-box?”

“We are coming to that. Mountains on the right, mountains on the left. Penguins and stormy petrels all about. A terrible place. Ah! by Jove, what a howling and what cracks you get there! The hurricane wants no help. That’s the place for holding on to the sheer-rails; for reefing topsails. That’s where you take in the mainsail, and fly the jibsail; or take in the jibsail and try the stormjib. Gusts upon gusts! And then, sometimes four, five, or six days of scudding under bare poles. Often only a rag of canvas left. What a dance! Squalls enough to make a three-master skip like a flea. I saw once a cabin-boy hanging on to the jibboom of an English brig, the True Blue, knocked, jibboom and all, to ten thousand nothings. Fellows are swept into the air there like butterflies. I saw the second mate of the Revenue, a pretty schooner, knocked from under the forecross-tree, and killed dead. I have had my sheer-rails smashed, and come out with all my sails in ribbons. Frigates of fifty guns make water like wicker baskets. And the damnable coast! Nothing can be imagined more dangerous. Rocks all jagged-edged. You come, by and by, to Port Famine. There it’s worse and worse. The worst seas I ever saw in my life. The devil’s own latitudes. All of a sudden you spy the words, painted in red, ‘Post Office.’”

“What do you mean, Captain Gertrais?”

“I mean, Captain Clubin, that immediately after doubling Point Anne you see, on a rock, a hundred feet high, a great post with a barrel suspended to the top. This barrel is the letter-box. The English sailors must needs go and write up there ‘Post Office.’ What had they to do with it? It is the ocean post-office. It isn’t the property of that worthy gentleman, the King of England. The box is common to all. It belongs to every flag. Post Office! there’s a crack-jaw word for you. It produces an effect on me as if the devil had suddenly offered me a cup of tea. I will tell you now how the postal arrangements are carried out. Every vessel which passes sends to the post a boat with despatches. A vessel coming from the Atlantic, for instance, sends there its letters for Europe; and a ship coming from the Pacific, its letters for New Zealand or California. The officer in command of the boat puts his packet into the barrel, and takes away any packet he finds there. You take charge of these letters, and the ship which comes after you takes charge of yours. As ships are always going to and fro, the continent whence you come is that to which I am going. I carry your letters; you carry mine. The barrel is made fast to the post with a chain. And it rains, snows and hails! A pretty sea. The imps of Satan fly about on every side. The Tamaulipas will pass there. The barrel has a good lid with a hinge, but no padlock. You see, a fellow can write to his friends this way. The letters come safely."

"It is very curious," muttered Clubin thoughtfully.

Captain Gertrais-Gaboureau returned to his bottle of ale.

"If that vagabond Zuela should write (continued Clubin aside), the scoundrel puts his scrawl into the barrel at Magellan, and in four months I have his letter."

"Well, Captain Clubin, do you start to-morrow?"

Clubin, absorbed in a sort of somnambulism, did not notice the question; and Captain Gertrais repeated it.

Clubin woke up.

"Of course, Captain Gertrais. It is my day. I must start to-morrow morning."

"If it was my case, I shouldn't, Captain Clubin. The hair of the dog's coat feels damp. For two nights past, the sea-birds have been flying wildly round the lanthorn of the lighthouse. A bad sign. I have a storm-glass, too, which gives me a warning. The moon is at her second quarter; it is the maximum of humidity. I noticed to-day some pimpernels with their leaves shut, and a field of clover with its stalks all stiff. The worms come out of the ground to-day; the flies sting; the bees keep close to their hives; the sparrows chatter together. You can hear the sound of bells from far off. I heard to-night the Angelus at St. Lunaire. And then the sun set angry. There will be a good fog to-morrow, mark my words. I don't advise you to put to sea. I dread the fog a good deal more than a hurricane. It's a nasty neighbour that."

THE DRUNKEN STEERSMAN AND THE SOBER CAPTAIN

I

THE DOUVRES

At about five leagues out, in the open sea, to the south of Guernsey, opposite Pleinmont Point, and between the Channel Islands and St. Malo, there is a group of rocks, called the Douvres. The spot is dangerous.

This term Douvres, applied to rocks and cliffs, is very common. There is, for example, near the Côtes du Nord, a Douvre, on which a lighthouse is now being constructed, a dangerous reef; but one which must not be confounded with the rock above referred to.

The nearest point on the French coast to the Douvres is Cape Bréhat. The Douvres are a little further from the coast of France than from the nearest of the Channel Islands. The distance from Jersey may be pretty nearly measured by the extreme length of Jersey. If the island of Jersey could be turned round upon Corbière, as upon a hinge, St. Catherine’s Point would almost touch the Douvres, at a distance of more than four leagues.

In these civilised regions the wildest rocks are rarely desert places. Smugglers are met with at Hagot, custom-house men at Binic, Celts at Bréhat, oyster-dredgers at Cancale, rabbit-shooters at Césambre or Cæsar’s Island, crab-gatherers at Brecqhou, trawlers at the Minquiers, dredgers at Ecréhou, but no one is ever seen upon the Douvres.

The sea birds alone make their home there.

No spot in the ocean is more dreaded. The Casquets, where it is said the Blanche Nef was lost; the Bank of Calvados; the Needles in the Isle of Wight; the Ronesse, which makes the coast of Beaulieu so dangerous; the sunken reefs at Préel, which block the entrance to Merquel, and which necessitates the red-painted beacon in twenty fathoms of water, the treacherous approaches to Etables and Plouha; the two granite Druids to the south of Guernsey, the Old Anderlo and the Little Anderlo, the Corbière, the Hanways, the Isle of Ras, associated with terror in the proverb:

“Si jamais tu passes le Ras,
Si tu ne meurs, tu trembleras.”

the Mortes-Femmes, the Déroute between Guernsey and Jersey, the Hardent between the Minquiers and Chousey, the Mauvais Cheval between Bouley Bay and Barneville, have not so evil a reputation. It would be preferable to have to encounter all these dangers, one after the other, than the Douvres once.

In all that perilous sea of the Channel, which is the Egean of the West, the Douvres have no equal in their terrors, except the Paternoster between Guernsey and Sark.

From the Paternoster, however, it is possible to give a signal — a ship in distress there may obtain succour. To the north rises Dicard or D’Icare Point, and to the south Grosnez. From the Douvres you can see nothing.

Its associations are the storm, the cloud, the wild sea, the desolate waste, the uninhabited coast. The blocks of granite are hideous and enormous — everywhere perpendicular wall — the severe inhospitality of the abyss.

It is in the open sea; the water about is very deep. A rock completely isolated like the Douvres attracts and shelters creatures which shun the haunts of men. It is a sort of vast submarine cave of fossil coral branches — a drowned labyrinth. There, at a depth to which divers would find it difficult to descend, are caverns, haunts, and dusky mazes, where monstrous creatures multiply and destroy each other. Huge crabs devour fish and are devoured in their turn. Hideous shapes of living things, not created to be seen by human eyes, wander in this twilight. Vague forms of antennæ, tentacles, fins, open jaws, scales, and claws, float about there, quivering, growing larger, or decomposing and perishing in the gloom, while horrible swarms of swimming things prowl about seeking their prey.

To gaze into the depths of the sea is, in the imagination, like beholding the vast unknown, and from its most terrible point of view. The submarine gulf is analogous to the realm of night and dreams. There also is sleep, unconsciousness, or at least apparent unconsciousness, of creation. There, in the awful silence and darkness, the rude first forms of life, phantom-like, demoniacal, pursue their horrible instincts.

Forty years ago, two rocks of singular form signalled the Douvres from afar to passers on the ocean. They were two vertical points, sharp and curved — their summits almost touching each other. They looked like the two tusks of an elephant rising out of the sea; but they were tusks, high as tall towers, of an elephant huge as a mountain. These two natural towers, rising out of the obscure home of marine monsters, only left a narrow passage between them, where the waves rushed through. This passage, tortuous and full of angles, resembled a straggling street between high walls. The two twin rocks are called the Douvres. There was the Great Douvre and the Little Douvre; one was sixty feet high, the other forty. The ebb and flow of the tide had at last worn away part of the base of the towers, and a violent equinoctial gale on the 26th of October, 1859, overthrew one of them. The smaller one, which still remains, is worn and tottering.

One of the most singular of the Douvres is a rock known as “The Man.” This still exists. Some fisherman in the last century visiting this spot found on the height of the rock a human body. By its side were a number of empty sea-shells. A sailor escaped from shipwreck had found a refuge there; had lived some time upon rock limpets, and had died. Hence its name of “The Man.”

The solitudes of the sea are peculiarly dismal. The things which pass there seem to have no relation to the human race; their objects are unknown. Such is the isolation of the Douvres. All around, as far as eye can reach, spreads the vast and restless sea.

II

AN UNEXPECTED FLASK OF BRANDY

On the Friday morning, the day after the departure of the Tamaulipas, the Durande started again for Guernsey.

She left St. Malo at nine o'clock. The weather was fine; no haze. Old Captain Gertrais-Gaboureau was evidently in his dotage.

Sieur Clubin's numerous occupations had decidedly been unfavourable to the collection of freight for the Durande. He had only taken aboard some packages of Parisian articles for the fancy shops of St. Peter's Port; three cases for the Guernsey hospital, one containing yellow soap and long candles, and the other French shoe leather for soles, and choice Cordovan skins. He brought back from his last cargo a case of crushed sugar and three chests of congou tea, which the French custom-house would not permit to pass. He had embarked very few cattle; some bullocks only. These bullocks were in the hold loosely tethered.

There were six passengers aboard; a Guernsey man, two inhabitants of St. Malo, dealers in cattle: a "tourist," — a phrase already in vogue at this period — a Parisian citizen, probably travelling on commercial affairs, and an American, engaged in distributing Bibles.

Without reckoning Clubin, the crew of the Durande amounted to seven men; a helmsman, a stoker, a ship's carpenter, and a cook — serving as sailors in case of need — two engineers, and a cabin boy. One of the two engineers was also a practical mechanic. This man, a bold and intelligent Dutch negro, who had originally escaped from the sugar plantations of Surinam, was named Imbrancam. The negro, Imbrancam, understood and attended admirably to the engine. In the early days of the "Devil Boat," his black face, appearing now and then at the top of the engine-room stairs, had contributed not a little to sustain its diabolical reputation.

The helmsman, a native of Guernsey, but of a family originally from Cotentin, bore the name of Tangrouille. The Tangrouilles were an old noble family.

This was strictly true. The Channel Islands are like England, an aristocratic region. Castes exist there still. The castes have their peculiar ideas, which are, in fact, their protection. These notions of caste are everywhere similar; in Hindostan, as in Germany, nobility is won by the sword; lost by soiling the hands with labour: but preserved by idleness. To do nothing, is to live nobly; whoever abstains from work is honoured. A trade is fatal. In France, in old times, there was no exception to this rule, except in the case of glass manufacturers. Emptying bottles being then one of the glories of gentlemen, making them was probably, for that reason, not considered dishonourable. In the Channel archipelago, as in Great Britain, he who would remain noble must contrive to be rich. A working man cannot possibly be a gentleman. If he has ever been one, he is so no longer. Yonder sailor, perhaps, descends from the Knights Bannerets, but is nothing but a sailor. Thirty years ago, a real Gorges, who would have had rights over the Seigniory of Gorges, confiscated by Philip Augustus, gathered seaweed, naked-footed, in the sea. A Carteret is a waggoner in Sark. There are at Jersey a draper, and at Guernsey a shoemaker, named Gruchy, who claim to be Grouchys, and cousins of the Marshal of Waterloo. The old registers of the Bishopric of Coutances make mention of a Seigniory of Tangroville, evidently from Tancarville on the lower Seine, which is identical with Montmorency. In the fifteenth century, Johan de Héroudeville, archer and étoffe of the Sire de Tangroville, bore behind him “son corset et ses autres harnois.” In May, 1371, at Pontorson, at the review of Bertrand du Guesclin, Monsieur de Tangroville rendered his homage as Knight Bachelor. In the Norman islands, if a noble falls into poverty, he is soon eliminated from the order. A mere change of pronunciation is enough. Tangroville becomes Tangrouille: and the thing is done.

This had been the fate of the helmsman of the Durande.

At the Bordagé of St. Peter’s Port, there is a dealer in old iron named Ingrouille, who is probably an Ingroville. Under Lewis le Gros the Ingrovilles possessed three parishes in the district of Valognes. A certain Abbé Trigan has written an Ecclesiastical History of Normandy. This chronicler Trigan was the curé of the Seigniory of Digoville. The Sire of Digoville, if he had sunk to a lower grade, would have been called Digouille.

Tangrouille, this probable Tancarville, and possible Montmorency, had an ancient noble quality, but a grave failing for a steersman; he got drunk occasionally.

Sieur Clubin had obstinately determined to retain him. He answered for his conduct to Mess Lethierry.

Tangrouille the helmsman never left the vessel; he slept aboard.

On the eve of their departure, when Sieur Clubin came at a late hour to inspect the vessel, the steersman was in his hammock asleep.

In the night Tangrouille awoke. It was his nightly habit. Every drunkard who is not his own master has his secret hiding-place. Tangrouille had his, which he called his store. The secret store of Tangrouille was in the hold. He had placed it there to put others off the scent. He thought it certain that his hiding-place was known only to himself. Captain Clubin, being a sober man himself, was strict. The little rum or gin which the helmsman could conceal from the vigilant eyes of the captain, he kept in reserve in this mysterious corner of the hold, and nearly every night he had a stolen interview with the contents of this store. The surveillance was rigorous, the orgie was a poor one, and Tangrouille's nightly excesses were generally confined to two or three furtive draughts. Sometimes it happened that the store was empty. This night Tangrouille had found there an unexpected bottle of brandy. His joy was great; but his astonishment greater. From what cloud had it fallen? He could not remember when or how he had ever brought it into the ship. He soon, however, consumed the whole of it; partly from motives of prudence, and partly from a fear that the brandy might be discovered and seized. The bottle he threw overboard. In the morning, when he took the helm, Tangrouille exhibited a slight oscillation of the body.

He steered, however, pretty nearly as usual.

With regard to Clubin, he had gone, as the reader knows, to sleep at the Jean Auberge.

Clubin always wore, under his shirt, a leathern travelling belt, in which he kept a reserve of twenty guineas; he took this belt off only at night. Inside the belt was his name "Clubin," written by himself on the rough leather, with thick lithographer's ink, which is indelible.

On rising, just before his departure, he put into this girdle the iron box containing the seventy-five thousand francs in bank-notes; then, as he was accustomed to do, he buckled the belt round his body.

III

CONVERSATIONS INTERRUPTED

The Durande started pleasantly. The passengers, as soon as their bags and portmanteaus were installed upon and under the benches, took that customary survey of the vessel which seems indispensable under the circumstances. Two of the passengers — the tourist and the Parisian — had never seen a steam-vessel before, and from the moment the paddles began to revolve, they stood admiring the foam. Then they looked with wonderment at the smoke. Then they examined one by one, and almost piece by piece upon the upper and lower deck, all those naval appliances such as rings, grapnels, hooks and bolts, which, with their nice precision and adaptation, form a kind of colossal bijouterie — a sort of iron jewellery, fantastically gilded with rust by the weather. They walked round the little signal gun upon the upper deck. “Chained up like a sporting dog,” observed the tourist. “And covered with a waterproof coat to prevent its taking cold,” added the Parisian. As they left the land further behind, they indulged in the customary observations upon the view of St. Malo. One passenger laid down the axiom that the approach to a place by sea is always deceptive; and that at a league from the shore, for example, nothing could more resemble Ostend than Dunkirk. He completed his series of remarks on Dunkirk by the observation that one of its two floating lights painted red was called Ruytingen, and the other Mardyck.

St. Malo, meanwhile, grew smaller in the distance, and finally disappeared from view.

The aspect of the sea was a vast calm. The furrow left in the water by the vessel was a long double line edged with foam, and stretching straight behind them as far as the eye could see.

A straight line drawn from St. Malo in France to Exeter in England would touch the island of Guernsey. The straight line at sea is not always the one chosen. Steam-vessels, however, have, to a certain extent, a power of following the direct course denied to sailing ships.

The wind in co-operation with the sea is a combination of forces. A ship is a combination of appliances. Forces are machines of infinite power. Machines are forces of limited power. That struggle which we call navigation is between these two organisations, the one inexhaustible, the other intelligent.

Mind, directing the mechanism, forms the counterbalance to the infinite power of the opposing forces. But the opposing forces, too, have their organisation. The elements are conscious of where they go, and what they are about. No force is merely blind. It is the function of man to keep watch upon these natural agents, and to discover their laws.

While these laws are still in great part undiscovered, the struggle continues, and in this struggle navigation, by the help of steam, is a perpetual victory won by human skill every hour of the day, and upon every point of the sea. The admirable feature in steam navigation is, that it disciplines the very ship herself. It diminishes her obedience to the winds, and increases her docility to man.

The Durande had never worked better at sea than on that day. She made her way marvellously.

Towards eleven o’clock, a fresh breeze blowing from the nor’-nor’-west, the Durande was off the Minquiers, under little steam, keeping her head to the west, on the starboard tack, and close up to the wind. The weather was still fine and clear. The trawlers, however, were making for shore.

By little and little, as if each one was anxious to get into port, the sea became clear of the boats.

It could not be said that the Durande was keeping quite her usual course. The crew gave no thought to such matters. The confidence in the captain was absolute; yet, perhaps through the fault of the helmsman, there was a slight deviation. The Durande appeared to be making rather towards Jersey than Guernsey. A little after eleven the captain rectified the vessel’s course, and put her head fair for Guernsey. It was only a little time lost, but in short days time lost has its inconveniences. It was a February day, but the sun shone brightly.

Tangrouille, in his half-intoxicated state, had not a very sure arm, nor a very firm footing. The result was, that the helmsman lurched pretty often, which also retarded progress.

The wind had almost entirely fallen.

The Guernsey passenger, who had a telescope in his hand, brought it to bear from time to time upon a little cloud of grey mist, lightly moved by the wind, in the extreme western horizon. It resembled a fleecy down sprinkled with dust.

Captain Clubin wore his ordinary austere, Puritan-like expression of countenance. He appeared to redouble his attention.

All was peaceful and almost joyous on board the Durande. The passengers chatted. It is possible to judge of the state of the sea in a passage with the eyes closed, by noting the tremolo of the conversation about you. The full freedom of mind among the passengers answers to the perfect tranquillity of the waters.

It is impossible, for example, that a conversation like the following could take place otherwise than on a very calm sea.

“Observe that pretty green and red fly.”

“It has lost itself out at sea, and is resting on the ship.”

“Flies do not soon get tired.”

“No doubt; they are light; the wind carries them.”

“An ounce of flies was once weighed, and afterwards counted; and it was found to comprise no less than six thousand two hundred and sixty-eight.”

The Guernsey passenger with the telescope had approached the St. Malo cattle dealers; and their talk was something in this vein:

“The Aubrac bull has a round and thick buttock, short legs, and a yellowish hide. He is slow at work by reason of the shortness of his legs.”

“In that matter the Salers beats the Aubrac.”

“I have seen, sir, two beautiful bulls in my life. The first has the legs low, the breast thick, the rump full, the haunches large, a good length of neck to the udder, withers of good height, the skin easy to strip. The second had all the signs of good fattening, a thick-set back, neck and shoulders strong, coat white and brown, rump sinking.”

“That’s the Cotentin race.”

“Yes; with a slight cross with the Angus or Suffolk bull.”

“You may believe it if you please, sir, but I assure you in the south they hold shows of donkeys.”

“Shows of donkeys?”

“Of donkeys, on my honour. And the ugliest are the most admired.”

“Ha! it is the same as with the mule shows. The ugly ones are considered best.”

“Exactly. Take also the Poitevin mares; large belly, thick legs.”

“The best mule known is a sort of barrel upon four posts.”

“Beauty in beasts is a different thing from beauty in men.”

“And particularly in women.”

“That is true.”

“As for me, I like a woman to be pretty.”

“I am more particular about her being well dressed.”

“Yes; neat, clean, and well set off.”

“Looking just new. A pretty girl ought always to appear as if she had just been turned out by a jeweller.”

“To return to my bulls; I saw these two sold at the market at Thouars.”

“The market at Thouars; I know it very well. The Bonneaus of La Rochelle, and the Babas corn merchants at Marans, I don’t know whether you have heard of them attending that market.”

The tourist and the Parisian were conversing with the American of the Bibles.

“Sir,” said the tourist, “I will tell you the tonnage of the civilised world. France 716,000 tons; Germany 1,000,000; the United States, 5,000,000; England, 5,500,000; add the small vessels. Total 12,904,000 tons, carried in 145,000 vessels scattered over the waters of the globe.”

The American interrupted:

“It is the United States, sir, which have 5,500,000.”

“I agree,” said the tourist. “You are an American?”

“Yes, sir.”

“I agree again.”

There was a pause. The American missionary was considering whether this was a case for the offer of a Bible.

“Is it true, sir,” asked the tourist, “that you have a passion for nicknames in America, so complete, that you confer them upon all your celebrated men, and that you call your famous Missouri banker, Thomas Benton, ‘Old Lingot’?”

“Yes; just as we call Zachary Taylor ‘Old Zach.’”

“Because Jackson is hard as hickory wood; and because Harrison beat the redskins at Tippecanoe.”

“It is an odd fashion that of yours.”

“It is our custom. We call Van Buren ‘The Little Wizard;’ Seward, who introduced the small bank-notes, ‘Little Billy;’ and Douglas, the democrat senator from Illinois, who is four feet high and very eloquent, ‘The Little Giant.’ You may go from Texas to the State of Maine without hearing the name of Mr. Cass. They say the ‘Great Michiganer.’ Nor the name of Clay; they say ‘The miller’s boy with the scar.’ Clay is the son of a miller.”

“I should prefer to say ‘Clay’ or ‘Cass,’” said the Parisian. “It’s shorter.”

“Then you would be out of the fashion. We call Corwin, who is the Secretary of the Treasury, ‘The Waggoner-boy;’ Daniel Webster, ‘Black Dan.’ As to Winfield Scott, as his first thought after beating the English at Chippeway, was to sit down to dine, we call him ‘Quick — a basin of soup.’”

The small white mist perceived in the distance had become larger. It filled now a segment of fifteen degrees above the horizon. It was like a cloud loitering along the water for want of wind to stir it. The breeze had almost entirely died away. The sea was glassy. Although it was not yet noon, the sun was becoming pale. It lighted but seemed to give no warmth.

“I fancy,” said the tourist, “that we shall have a change of weather.”

“Probably rain,” said the Parisian.

“Or fog,” said the American.

“In Italy,” remarked the tourist, “Molfetta is the place where there falls the least rain; and Tolmezzo, where there falls the most.”

At noon, according to the usage of the Channel Islands, the bell sounded for dinner. Those dined who desired. Some passengers had brought with them provisions, and were eating merrily on the after-deck. Clubin did not eat.

While this eating was going on, the conversations continued.

The Guernsey man, having probably a scent for Bibles, approached the American. The latter said to him:

“You know this sea?”

“Very well; I belong to this part.”

“And I, too,” said one of the St. Malo men.

The native of Guernsey followed with a bow and continued:

“We are fortunately well out at sea now; I should not have liked a fog when we were off the Minquiers.”

The American said to the St. Malo man:

“Islanders are more at home on the sea than the folks of the coast.”

“True; we coast people are only half dipped in salt water.”

“What are the Minquiers?” asked the American.

The St. Malo man replied:

“They are an ugly reef of rocks.”

"There are also the Grelets," said the Guernsey man.

"Parblus!" ejaculated the other.

"And the Chouas," added the Guernsey man.

The inhabitant of St. Malo laughed.

"As for that," said he, "there are the Savages also."

"And the Monks," observed the Guernsey man.

"And the Duck," cried the St. Maloite.

"Sir," remarked the inhabitant of Guernsey, "you have an answer for everything."

The tourist interposed with a question:

"Have we to pass all that legion of rocks?"

"No; we have left it to the sou'-south-east. It is behind us."

And the Guernsey passenger continued:

"Big and little rocks together, the Grelets have fifty-seven peaks."

"And the Minquiers forty-eight," said the other.

The dialogue was now confined to the St. Malo and the Guernsey passenger.

"It strikes me, Monsieur St. Malo, that there are three rocks which you have not included."

"I mentioned all."

"From the Derée to the Maître Ile."

"And Les Maisons?"

"Yes; seven rocks in the midst of the Minquiers."

"I see you know the very stones."

"If I didn't know the stones, I should not be an inhabitant of St. Malo."

"It is amusing to hear French people's reasonings."

The St. Malo man bowed in his turn, and said:

"The Savages are three rocks."

"And the Monks two."

"And the Duck one."

"The Duck; this is only one, of course."

"No: for the Suarde consists of four rocks."

"What do you mean by the Suarde?" asked the inhabitant of Guernsey.

"We call the Suarde what you call the Chouas."

"It is a queer passage, that between the Chouas and the Duck."

"It is impassable except for the birds."

"And the fish."

“Scarcely: in bad weather they give themselves hard knocks against the walls.”

“There is sand near the Minquiers?”

“Around the Maisons.”

“There are eight rocks visible from Jersey.”

“Visible from the strand of Azette; that’s correct: but not eight; only seven.”

“At low water you can walk about the Minquiers?”

“No doubt; there would be sand above water.”

“And what of the Dirouilles?”

“The Dirouilles bear no resemblance to the Minquiers.”

“They are very dangerous.”

“They are near Granville.”

“I see that you St. Malo people, like us, enjoy sailing in these seas.”

“Yes,” replied the St. Malo man, “with the difference that we say, ‘We have the habit,’ you, ‘We are fond.’”

“You make good sailors.”

“I am myself a cattle merchant.”

“Who was that famous sailor born of St. Malo?”

“Surcouf?”

“Another?”

“Duguay-Trouin.”

Here the Parisian commercial man chimed in:

“Duguay-Trouin? He was captured by the English. He was as agreeable as he was brave. A young English lady fell in love with him. It was she who procured him his liberty.”

At this moment a voice like thunder was heard crying out:

“You are drunk, man!”

IV

CAPTAIN CLUBIN DISPLAYS ALL HIS GREAT QUALITIES

Everybody turned.

It was the captain calling to the helmsman.

Sieur Clubin’s tone and manner evidenced that he was extremely angry, or that he wished to appear so.

A well-timed burst of anger sometimes removes responsibility, and sometimes shifts it on to other shoulders.

The captain, standing on the bridge between the two paddle-boxes, fixed his eyes on the helmsman. He repeated, between his teeth, “Drunkard.” The unlucky Tangrouille hung his head.

The fog had made progress. It filled by this time nearly one-half of the horizon. It seemed to advance from every quarter at the same time. There is something in a fog of the nature of a drop of oil upon the water. It enlarged insensibly. The light wind moved it onward slowly and silently. By little and little it took possession of the ocean. It was coming chiefly from the north-west, dead ahead: the ship had it before her prow, like a line of cliff moving vast and vague. It rose from the sea like a wall. There was an exact point where the wide waters entered the fog, and were lost to sight.

This line of the commencement of the fog was still above half-a-league distant. The interval was visibly growing less and less. The Durande made way; the fog made way also. It was drawing nearer to the vessel, while the vessel was drawing nearer to it.

Clubin gave the order to put on more steam, and to hold off the coast.

Thus for some time they skirted the edge of the fog; but still it advanced. The vessel, meanwhile, sailed in broad sunlight.

Time was lost in these manœuvres, which had little chance of success. Nightfall comes quickly in February. The native of Guernsey was meditating upon the subject of this fog. He said to the St. Malo men:

“It will be thick!”

“An ugly sort of weather at sea,” observed one of the St. Malo men.

The other added:

“A kind of thing which spoils a good passage.”

The Guernsey passenger approached Clubin, and said:

“I’m afraid, Captain, that the fog will catch us.”

Clubin replied:

“I wished to stay at St. Malo, but I was advised to go.”

“By whom?”

“By some old sailors.”

“You were certainly right to go,” said the Guernsey man. “Who knows whether there will not be a tempest to-morrow? At this season you may wait and find it worse.”

A few moments later, the Durande entered the fog bank.

The effect was singular. Suddenly those who were on the after-deck could not see those forward. A soft grey medium divided the ship in two.

Then the entire vessel passed into the fog. The sun became like a dull red moon. Everybody suddenly shivered. The passengers put on their overcoats, and the sailors their tarpaulins. The sea, almost without a ripple, was the more menacing from its cold tranquillity. All was pale and wan. The black funnel and the heavy smoke struggled with the dewy mist which enshrouded the vessel.

Dropping to westward was now useless. The captain kept the vessel’s head again towards Guernsey, and gave orders to put on the steam.

The Guernsey passenger, hanging about the engine-room hatchway, heard the negro Imbrancam talking to his engineer comrade. The passenger listened. The negro said:

“This morning, in the sun, we were going half steam on; now, in the fog, we put on steam.”

The Guernsey man returned to Clubin.

“Captain Clubin, a look-out is useless; but have we not too much steam on?”

“What can I do, sir? We must make up for time lost through the fault of that drunkard of a helmsman.”

“True, Captain Clubin.”

And Clubin added:

“I am anxious to arrive. It is foggy enough by day: it would be rather too much at night.”

The Guernsey man rejoined his St. Malo fellow-passengers, and remarked:

“We have an excellent captain.”

At intervals, great waves of mist bore down heavily upon them, and blotted out the sun; which again issued out of them pale and sickly. The little that could be seen of the heavens resembled the long strips of painted sky, dirty and smeared with oil, among the old scenery of a theatre.

The Durande passed close to a cutter which had cast anchor for safety. It was the Shealtiel of Guernsey. The master of the cutter remarked the high speed of the steam-vessel. It struck him also, that she was not in her exact course. She seemed to him to bear to westward too much. The apparition of this vessel under full steam in the fog surprised him.

Towards two o'clock the weather had become so thick that the captain was obliged to leave the bridge, and plant himself near the steersman. The sun had vanished, and all was fog. A sort of ashy darkness surrounded the ship. They were navigating in a pale shroud. They could see neither sky nor water.

There was not a breath of wind.

The can of turpentine suspended under the bridge, between the paddle-boxes, did not even oscillate.

The passengers had become silent.

The Parisian, however, hummed between his teeth the song of Béranger — "Un jour le bon Dieu s'éveillant."

One of the St. Malo passengers addressed him:

"You are from Paris, sir?"

"Yes, sir. Il mit la tête à la fenêtre."

"What do they do in Paris?"

"Leur planète a péri, peut-être. — In Paris, sir, things are going on very badly."

"Then it's the same ashore as at sea."

"It is true; we have an abominable fog here."

"One which might involve us in misfortunes."

The Parisian exclaimed:

"Yes; and why all these misfortunes in the world? Misfortunes! What are they sent for, these misfortunes? What use do they serve? There was the fire at the Odéon theatre, and immediately a number of families thrown out of employment. Is that just? I don't know what is your religion, sir, but I am puzzled by all this."

"So am I," said the St. Malo man.

"Everything that happens here below," continued the Parisian, "seems to go wrong. It looks as if Providence, for some reason, no longer watched over the world."

The St. Malo man scratched the top of his head, like one making an effort to understand. The Parisian continued:

"Our guardian angel seems to be absent. There ought to be a decree against celestial absenteeism. He is at his country-house, and takes no notice of us; so all gets in disorder. It is evident that this guardian is not in the government; he is taking holiday, leaving some vicar — some seminarist angel, some wretched creature with sparrows'-wings — to look after affairs."

Captain Clubin, who had approached the speakers during this conversation, laid his hand upon the shoulder of the Parisian.

"Silence, sir," he said. "Keep a watch upon your words. We are upon the sea."

No one spoke again aloud.

After a pause of five minutes, the Guernsey man, who had heard all this, whispered in the ear of the St. Malo passenger:

"A religious man, our captain."

It did not rain, but all felt their clothing wet. The crew took no heed of the way they were making; but there was increased sense of uneasiness. They seemed to have entered into a doleful region. The fog makes a deep silence on the sea; it calms the waves, and stifles the wind. In the midst of this silence, the creaking of the Durande communicated a strange, indefinable feeling of melancholy and disquietude.

They passed no more vessels. If afar off, in the direction of Guernsey or in that of St. Malo, any vessels were at sea outside the fog, the Durande, submerged in the dense cloud, must have been invisible to them; while her long trail of smoke attached to nothing, looked like a black comet in the pale sky.

Suddenly Clubin roared out:

"Hang-dog! you have played us an ugly trick. You will have done us some damage before we are out of this. You deserve to be put in irons. Get you gone, drunkard!"

And he seized the helm himself.

The steersman, humbled, shrunk away to take part in the duties forward.

The Guernsey man said:

“That will save us.”

The vessel was still making way rapidly.

Towards three o’clock, the lower part of the fog began to clear, and they could see the sea again.

A mist can only be dispersed by the sun or the wind. By the sun is well; by the wind is not so well. At three o’clock in the afternoon, in the month of February, the sun is always weak. A return of the wind at this critical point in a voyage is not desirable. It is often the forerunner of a hurricane.

If there was any breeze, however, it was scarcely perceptible.

Clubin with his eye on the binnacle, holding the tiller and steering, muttered to himself some words like the following, which reached the ears of the passengers:

“No time to be lost; that drunken rascal has retarded us.”

His visage, meanwhile, was absolutely without expression.

The sea was less calm under the mist. A few waves were distinguishable. Little patches of light appeared on the surface of the water. These luminous patches attract the attention of the sailors. They indicate openings made by the wind in the overhanging roof of fog. The cloud rose a little, and then sunk heavier. Sometimes the density was perfect. The ship was involved in a sort of foggy iceberg. At intervals this terrible circle opened a little, like a pair of pincers; showed a glimpse of the horizon, and then closed again.

Meanwhile the Guernsey man, armed with his spyglass, was standing like a sentinel in the fore part of the vessel.

An opening appeared for a moment, and was blotted out again.

The Guernsey man returned alarmed.

“Captain Clubin!”

“What is the matter?”

“We are steering right upon the Hanways.”

“You are mistaken,” said Clubin, coldly.

The Guernsey man insisted.

“I am sure of it.”

“Impossible.”

“I have just seen the rock in the horizon.”

“Where?”

“Out yonder.”

“It is the open sea there. Impossible.”

And Clubin kept the vessel’s head to the point indicated by the passenger.

The Guernsey man seized his spyglass again.

A moment later he came running aft again.

“Captain!”

“Well.”

“Tack about!”

“Why?”

“I am certain of having seen a very high rock just ahead. It is the Great Hanway.”

“You have seen nothing but a thicker bank of fog.”

“It is the Great Hanway. Tack, in the name of Heaven!”

Clubin gave the helm a turn.

V

CLUBIN REACHES THE CROWNING-POINT OF GLORY

A crash was heard. The ripping of a vessel's side upon a sunken reef in open sea is the most dismal sound of which man can dream. The Durande's course was stopped short.

Several passengers were knocked down with the shock and rolled upon the deck.

The Guernsey man raised his hands to heaven:

"We are on the Hanways. I predicted it."

A long cry went up from the ship.

"We are lost."

The voice of Clubin, dry and short, was heard above all.

"No one is lost! Silence!"

The black form of Imbrancam, naked down to the waist, issued from the hatchway of the engine-room.

The negro said with self-possession:

"The water is gaining, Captain. The fires will soon be out."

The moment was terrible.

The shock was like that of a suicide. If the disaster had been wilfully sought, it could not have been more terrible. The Durande had rushed upon her fate as if she had attacked the rock itself. A point had pierced her sides like a wedge. More than six feet square of planking had gone; the stem was broken, the prow smashed, and the gaping hull drank in the sea with a horrible gulping noise. It was an entrance for wreck and ruin. The rebound was so violent that it had shattered the rudder pendants; the rudder itself hung unhinged and flapping. The rock had driven in her keel. Round about the vessel nothing was visible except a thick, compact fog, now become sombre. Night was gathering fast.

The Durande plunged forward. It was like the effort of a horse pierced through the entrails by the horns of a bull. All was over with her.

Tangrouille was sobered. Nobody is drunk in the moment of a shipwreck. He came down to the quarter-deck, went up again, and said:

"Captain, the water is gaining rapidly in the hold. In ten minutes it will be up to the scupper-holes."

The passengers ran about bewildered, wringing their hands, leaning over the bulwarks, looking down in the engine-room, and making every other sort of useless movement in their terror. The tourist had fainted.

Clubin made a sign with his hand, and they were silent. He questioned Imbrancam:

"How long will the engines work yet?"

"Five or six minutes, sir."

Then he interrogated the Guernsey passenger:

"I was at the helm. You saw the rock. On which bank of the Hanways are we?"

"On the Mauve. Just now, in the opening in the fog, I saw it clearly."

"If we're on the Mauve," remarked Clubin, "we have the Great Hanway on the port side, and the Little Hanway on the starboard bow; we are a mile from the shore."

The crew and passengers listened, fixing their eyes anxiously and attentively on the captain.

Lightening the ship would have been of no avail, and indeed would have been hardly possible. In order to throw the cargo overboard, they would have had to open the ports and increase the chance of the water entering. To cast anchor would have been equally useless: they were stuck fast. Besides, with such a bottom for the anchor to drag, the chain would probably have fouled. The engines not being injured, and being workable while the fires were not extinguished, that is to say, for a few minutes longer, they could have made an effort, by help of steam and her paddles, to turn her astern off the rocks; but if they had succeeded, they must have settled down immediately. The rock, indeed, in some degree stopped the breach and prevented the entrance of the water. It was at least an obstacle; while the hole once freed, it would have been impossible to stop the leak or to work the pumps. To snatch a poniard from a wound in the heart is instant death to the victim. To free the vessel from the rock would have been simply to founder.

The cattle, on whom the water was gaining in the hold, were lowing piteously.

Clubin issued orders:

"Launch the long boat."

Imbrancam and Tangrouille rushed to execute the order. The boat was eased from her fastenings. The rest of the crew looked on stupefied.

“All hands to assist,” cried Clubin.

This time all obeyed.

Clubin, self-possessed, continued to issue his orders in that old sea dialect, which French sailors of the present day would scarcely understand.

“Haul in a rope — Get a cable if the capstan does not work — Stop heaving — Keep the blocks clear — Lower away there — Bring her down stern and bows — Now then, all together, lads — Take care she don’t lower stern first — There’s too much strain on there — Hold the laniard of the stock tackle — Stand by there!”

The long boat was launched.

At that instant the Durande’s paddles stopped, and the smoke ceased — the fires were drowned.

The passengers slipped down the ladder, and dropped hurriedly into the long boat. Imbrancam lifted the fainting tourist, carried him into the boat, and then boarded the vessel again.

The crew made a rush after the passengers — the cabin boy was knocked down, and the others were trampling upon him.

Imbrancam barred their passage.

“Not a man before the lad,” he said.

He kept off the sailors with his two black arms, picked up the boy, and handed him down to the Guernsey man, who was standing upright in the boat.

The boy saved, Imbrancam made way for the others, and said:

“Pass on!”

Meanwhile Clubin had entered his cabin, and had made up a parcel containing the ship’s papers and instruments. He took the compass from the binnacle, handed the papers and instruments to Imbrancam, and the compass to Tangrouille, and said to them:

“Get aboard the boat.”

They obeyed. The crew had taken their places before them.

“Now,” cried Clubin, “push off.”

A cry arose from the long boat.

“What about yourself, Captain?”

“I will remain here.”

Shipwrecked people have little time to deliberate, and not much for indulging in tender feeling. Those who were in the long boat and in comparative safety, however, felt an emotion which was not altogether selfish. All the voices shouted together:

“Come with us, Captain.”

“No: I remain here.”

The Guernsey man, who had some experience of the sea, replied:

“Listen to me, Captain. You are wrecked on the Hanways. Swimming, you would have only a mile to cross to Pleinmont. In a boat you can only land at Rocquaine, which is two miles. There are breakers, and there is the fog. Our boat will not get to Rocquaine in less than two hours. It will be a dark night. The sea is rising — the wind getting fresh. A squall is at hand. We are now ready to return and bring you off; but if bad weather comes on, that will be out of our power. You are lost if you stay there. Come with us.”

The Parisian chimed in:

“The long boat is full — too full, it is true, and one more will certainly be one too many; but we are thirteen — a bad number for the boat, and it is better to overload her with a man than to take an ominous number. Come, Captain.”

Tangrouille added:

“It was all my fault — not yours, Captain. It isn’t fair for you to be left behind.”

“I have decided to remain here,” said Clubin. “The vessel must inevitably go to pieces in the tempest to-night. I won’t leave her. When the ship is lost, the captain is already dead. People shall not say I didn’t do my duty to the end. Tangrouille, I forgive you.”

Then, folding his arms, he cried:

“Obey orders! Let go the rope, and push off.”

The long-boat swayed to and fro. Imbrancam had seized the tiller. All the hands which were not rowing were raised towards the captain — every mouth cried, “Cheers for Captain Clubin.”

“An admirable fellow!” said the American.

“Sir,” replied the Guernsey man, “he is one of the worthiest seamen afloat.”

Tangrouille shed tears.

“If I had had the courage,” he said, “I would have stayed with him.”

The long-boat pushed away, and was lost in the fog.

Nothing more was visible.

The beat of the oars grew fainter, and died away.

Clubin remained alone.

VI

THE INTERIOR OF AN ABYSS SUDDENLY REVEALED

When Clubin found himself upon this rock, in the midst of the fog and the wide waters, far from all sound of human life, left for dead, alone with the tide rising around him, and night settling down rapidly, he experienced a feeling of profound satisfaction.

He had succeeded.

His dream was realised. The acceptance which he had drawn upon destiny at so long a date had fallen due at last.

With him, to be abandoned there was, in fact, to be saved.

He was on the Hanways, one mile from the shore; he had about him seventy-five thousand francs. Never was shipwreck more scientifically accomplished. Nothing had failed. It is true, everything had been foreseen. From his early years Clubin had had an idea to stake his reputation for honesty at life’s gaming-table; to pass as a man of high honour, and to make that reputation his fulcrum for other things; to bide his time, to watch his opportunity; not to grope about blindly, but to seize boldly; to venture on one great stroke, only one; and to end by sweeping off the stakes, leaving fools behind him to gape and wonder. What stupid rogues fail in twenty times, he meant to accomplish at the first blow; and while they terminated a career on the gallows, he intended to finish with a fortune. The meeting with Rantaine had been a new light to him. He had immediately laid his plan — to compel Rantaine to disgorge; to frustrate his threatened revelations by disappearing; to make the world believe him dead, the best of all modes of concealment; and for this purpose to wreck the Durande. The shipwreck was necessary to his designs. Lastly, he had the satisfaction of vanishing, leaving behind him a great renown, the crowning point of his existence. As he stood meditating on these things amid the wreck, Clubin might have been taken for some demon in a pleasant mood.

He had lived a lifetime for the sake of this one minute.

His whole exterior was expressive of the two words, “At last.” A devilish tranquillity reigned in that sallow countenance.

His dull eye, the depth of which generally seemed to be impenetrable, became clear and terrible. The inward fire of his dark spirit was reflected there.

Man’s inner nature, like that external world about him, has its electric phenomena. An idea is like a meteor; at the moment of its coming, the confused meditations which preceded it open a way, and a spark flashes forth. Bearing within oneself a power of evil, feeling an inward prey, brings to some minds a pleasure which is like a sparkle of light. The triumph of an evil purpose brightens up their visages. The success of certain cunning combinations, the attainment of certain cherished objects, the gratification of certain ferocious instincts, will manifest themselves in sinister but luminous appearances in their eyes. It is like a threatening dawn, a gleam of joy drawn out of the heart of a storm. These flashes are generated in the conscience in its states of cloud and darkness.

Some such signs were then exhibiting themselves in the pupils of those eyes. They were like nothing else that can be seen shining either above or here below.

All Clubin’s pent-up wickedness found full vent now.

He gazed into the vast surrounding darkness, and indulged in a low, irrepressible laugh, full of sinister significance.

He was rich at last! rich at last!

The unknown future of his life was at length unfolding; the problem was solved.

Clubin had plenty of time before him. The sea was rising, and consequently sustained the Durande, and even raised her at last a little. The vessel kept firmly in its place among the rocks; there was no danger of her foundering. Besides, he determined to give the long-boat time to get clear off — to go to the bottom, perhaps. Clubin hoped it might.

Erect upon the deck of the shipwrecked vessel, he folded his arms, apparently enjoying that forlorn situation in the dark night.

Hypocrisy had weighed upon this man for thirty years. He had been evil itself, yoked with probity for a mate. He detested virtue with the feeling of one who has been trapped into a hateful match. He had always had a wicked premeditation; from the time when he attained manhood he had worn the cold and rigid armour of appearances. Underneath this was the demon of self. He had lived like a bandit in the disguise of an honest citizen. He had been the soft-spoken pirate; the bond-slave of honesty. He had been confined in garments of innocence, as in oppressive mummy cloths; had worn those angel wings which the devils find so wearisome in their fallen state. He had been overloaded with public esteem. It is arduous passing for a shining light. To preserve a perpetual equilibrium amid these difficulties, to think evil, to speak goodness — here had been indeed a labour. Such a life of contradictions had been Clubin's fate. It had been his lot — not the less onerous because he had chosen it himself — to preserve a good exterior, to be always presentable, to foam in secret, to smile while grinding his teeth. Virtue presented itself to his mind as something stifling. He had felt, sometimes, as if he could have gnawed those finger-ends which he was compelled to keep before his mouth.

To live a life which is a perpetual falsehood is to suffer unknown tortures. To be premeditating indefinitely a diabolical act, to have to assume austerity; to brood over secret infamy seasoned with outward good fame; to have continually to put the world off the scent; to present a perpetual illusion, and never to be one's self — is a burdensome task. To be constrained to dip the brush in that dark stuff within, to produce with it a portrait of candour; to fawn, to restrain and suppress one's self, to be ever on the qui vive; watching without ceasing to mask latent crimes with a face of healthy innocence: to transform deformity into beauty; to fashion wickedness into the shape of perfection; to tickle, as it were, with the point of a dagger, to put sugar with poison, to keep a bridle on every gesture and keep a watch over every tone, not even to have a countenance of one's own — what can be harder, what can be more torturing. The odiousness of hypocrisy is obscurely felt by the hypocrite himself. Drinking perpetually of his own imposture is nauseating. The sweetness of tone which cunning gives to scoundrelism is repugnant to the scoundrel compelled to have it ever in the mouth; and there are moments of disgust when villainy seems on the point of vomiting its secret. To have to swallow that bitter saliva is horrible. Add to this picture his profound pride. There are strange moments in the history of such a life, when hypocrisy worships itself. There is always an inordinate egotism in roguery. The worm has the same mode of gliding along as the serpent, and the same manner of raising its head. The treacherous villain is the despot curbed and restrained, and only able to attain his ends by resigning himself to play a secondary part. He is summed-up littleness capable of enormities. The perfect hypocrite is a Titan dwarfed.

Clubin had a genuine faith that he had been ill-used. Why had not he the right to have been born rich? It was from no fault of his that it was otherwise. Deprived as he had been of the higher enjoyments of life, why had he been forced to labour — in other words, to cheat, to betray, to destroy? Why had he been condemned to this torture of flattering, cringing, fawning; to be always labouring for men’s respect and friendship, and to wear night and day a face which was not his own? To be compelled to dissimulate was in itself to submit to a hardship. Men hate those to whom they have to lie. But now the disguise was at an end. Clubin had taken his revenge.

On whom? On all! On everything!

Lethierry had never done him any but good services; so much the greater his spleen. He was revenged upon Lethierry.

He was revenged upon all those in whose presence he had felt constraint. It was his turn to be free now. Whoever had thought well of him was his enemy. He had felt himself their captive long enough.

Now he had broken through his prison walls. His escape was accomplished. That which would be regarded as his death, would be, in fact, the beginning of his life. He was about to begin the world again. The true Clubin had stripped off the false. In one hour the spell was broken. He had kicked Rantaine into space; overwhelmed Lethierry in ruin; human justice in night, and opinion in error. He had cast off all humanity; blotted out the whole world.

The name of God, that word of three letters, occupied his mind but little.

He had passed for a religious man. What was he now?

There are secret recesses in hypocrisy; or rather the hypocrite is himself a secret recess.

When Clubin found himself quite alone, that cavern in which his soul had so long lain hidden, was opened. He enjoyed a moment of delicious liberty. He revelled for that moment in the open air. He gave vent to himself in one long breath.

The depth of evil within him revealed itself in his visage. He expanded, as it were, with diabolical joy. The features of Rantaine by the side of his at that moment would have shown like the innocent expression of a new-born child.

What a deliverance was this plucking off of the old mask. His conscience rejoiced in the sight of its own monstrous nakedness, as it stepped forth to take its hideous bath of wickedness. The long restraint of men’s respect seemed to have given him a peculiar relish for infamy. He experienced a certain lascivious enjoyment of wickedness. In those frightful moral abysses so rarely sounded, such natures find atrocious delights — they are the obscenities of rascality. The long-endured insipidity of the false reputation for virtue gave him a sort of appetite for shame. In this state of mind men disdain their fellows so much that they even long for the contempt which marks the ending of their unmerited homage. They feel a satisfaction in the freedom of degradation, and cast an eye of envy at baseness, sitting at its ease, clothed in ignominy and shame. Eyes that are forced to droop modestly are familiar with these stealthy glances at sin. From Messalina to Marie-Alacoque the distance is not great. Remember the histories of La Cadière and the nun of Louviers. Clubin, too, had worn the veil. Effrontery had always been the object of his secret admiration. He envied the painted courtesan, and the face of bronze of the professional ruffian. He felt a pride in surpassing her in artifices, and a disgust for the trick of passing for a saint. He had been the Tantalus of cynicism. And now, upon this rock, in the midst of this solitude, he could be frank and open. A bold plunge into wickedness — what a voluptuous sense of relief it brought with it. All the delights known to the fallen angels are summed up in this; and Clubin felt them in that moment. The long arrears of dissimulations were paid at last. Hypocrisy is an investment; the devil reimburses it. Clubin gave himself up to the intoxication of the idea, having no longer any eye upon him but that of Heaven. He whispered within himself, “I am a scoundrel,” and felt profoundly satisfied.

Never had human conscience experienced such a full tide of emotions.

He was glad to be entirely alone, and yet would not have been sorry to have had some one there. He would have been pleased to have had a witness of his fiendish joy; gratified to have had opportunity of saying to society, “Thou fool.”

The solitude, indeed, assured his triumph; but it made it less.

He was not himself to be spectator of his glory. Even to be in the pillory has its satisfaction, for everybody can see your infamy.

To compel the crowd to stand and gape is, in fact, an exercise of power. A malefactor standing upon a platform in the market-place, with the collar of iron around his neck, is master of all the glances which he constrains the multitude to turn towards him. There is a pedestal on yonder scaffolding. To be there — the centre of universal observation — is not this, too, a triumph? To direct the pupil of the public eye, is this not another form of supremacy? For those who worship an ideal wickedness, opprobrium is glory. It is a height from whence they can look down; a superiority at least of some kind; a pre-eminence in which they can display themselves royally. A gallows standing high in the gaze of all the world is not without some analogy with a throne. To be exposed is, at least, to be seen and studied.

Herein we have evidently the key to the wicked reigns of history. Nero burning Rome, Louis Quatorze treacherously seizing the Palatinate, the Prince Regent killing Napoleon slowly, Nicholas strangling Poland before the eyes of the civilised world, may have felt something akin to Clubin's joy. Universal execration derives a grandeur even from its vastness.

To be unmasked is a humiliation; but to unmask one's self is a triumph. There is an intoxication in the position, an insolent satisfaction in its contempt for appearances, a flaunting insolence in the nakedness with which it affronts the decencies of life.

These ideas in a hypocrite appear to be inconsistent, but in reality are not. All infamy is logical. Honey is gall. A character like that of Escobar has some affinity with that of the Marquis de Sade. In proof, we have Léotade. A hypocrite, being a personification of vice complete, includes in himself the two poles of perversity. Priest-like on one side, he resembles the courtesan on the other. The sex of his diabolical nature is double. It engenders and transforms itself. Would you see it in its pleasing shape? Look at it. Would you see it horrible? Turn it round.

All this multitude of ideas was floating confusedly in Clubin's mind. He analysed them little, but he felt them much.

A whirlwind of flakes of fire borne up from the pit of hell into the dark night, might fitly represent the wild succession of ideas in his soul.

Clubin remained thus some time pensive and motionless. He looked down upon his cast-off virtues as a serpent on its old skin.

Everybody had had faith in that virtue; even he himself a little.

He laughed again.

Society would imagine him dead, while he was rich. They would believe him drowned, while he was saved. What a capital trick to have played off on the stupidity of the world.

Rantaine, too, was included in that universal stupidity. Clubin thought of Rantaine with an unmeasured disdain: the disdain of the marten for the tiger. The trick had failed with Rantaine; it had succeeded with him. —Rantaine had slunk away abashed; Clubin disappeared in triumph. He had substituted himself for Rantaine — stepped between him and his mistress, and carried off her favours.

As to the future, he had no well-settled plan. In the iron tobacco-box in his girdle he had the three bank-notes. The knowledge of that fact was enough. He would change his name. There are plenty of countries where sixty thousand francs are equal to six hundred thousand. It would be no bad solution to go to one of those corners of the world, and live there honestly on the money disgorged by that scoundrel Rantaine. To speculate, to embark in commerce, to increase his capital, to become really a millionaire, that, too, would be no bad termination to his career.

For example. The great trade in coffee from Costa Rica was just beginning to be developed. There were heaps of gold to be made. He would see.

It was of little consequence. He had plenty of time to think of it. The hardest part of the enterprise was accomplished. Stripping Rantaine, and disappearing with the wreck of the Durande, were the grand achievements. All the rest was for him simple. No obstacle henceforth was likely to stop him. He had nothing more to fear. He could reach the shore with certainty by swimming. He would land at Pleinmont in the darkness; ascend the cliffs; go straight to the old haunted house; enter it easily by the help of the knotted cord, concealed beforehand in a crevice of the rocks; would find in the house his travelling-bag containing provisions and dry clothing. There he could await his opportunity. He had information. A week would not pass without the Spanish smugglers, Blasquito probably, touching at Pleinmont. For a few guineas he would obtain a passage, not to Torbay — as he had said to Blasco, to confound conjecture, and put him off the scent — but to Bilbao or Passages. Thence he could get to Vera Cruz or New Orleans. But the moment had come for taking to the water. The long boat was far enough by this time. An hour’s swimming was nothing for Clubin. The distance of a mile only separated him from the land, as he was on the Hanways.

At this point in Clubin’s meditations, a clear opening appeared in the fog bank, the formidable Douvres rocks stood before him.

VII

AN UNEXPECTED DENOUEMENT

Clubin, haggard, stared straight ahead.

It was indeed those terrible and solitary rocks.

It was impossible to mistake their misshapen outlines. The two twin Douvres reared their forms aloft, hideously revealing the passage between them, like a snare, a cut-throat in ambush in the ocean.

They were quite close to him. The fog, like an artful accomplice, had hidden them until now.

Clubin had mistaken his course in the dense mist. Notwithstanding all his pains, he had experienced the fate of two other great navigators, Gonzalez who discovered Cape Blanco, and Fernandez, who discovered Cape Verd. The fog had bewildered him. It had seemed to him, in the confidence of his seamanship, to favour admirably the execution of his project; but it had its perils. In veering to westward he had lost his reckoning. The Guernsey man, who fancied that he recognised the Hanways, had decided his fate, and determined him to give the final turn to the tiller. Clubin had never doubted that he had steered the vessel on the Hanways.

The Durande, stove in by one of the sunken rocks of the group, was only separated from the two Douvres by a few cables' lengths.

At two hundred fathoms further was a massive block of granite. Upon the steep sides of this rock were some hollows and small projections, which might help a man to climb. The square corners of those rude walls at right angles indicated the existence of a plateau on the summit.

It was the height known by the name of "The Man."

"The Man Rock" rose even higher still than the Douvres. Its platform commanded a view over their two inaccessible peaks. This platform, crumbling at its edges, had every kind of irregularity of shape. No place more desolate or more dangerous could be imagined. The hardly perceptible waves of the open sea lapped gently against the square sides of that dark enormous mass; a sort of rest-place for the vast spectres of the sea and darkness.

All around was calm. Scarcely a breath of air or a ripple. The mind guessed darkly the hidden life and vastness of the depths beneath that quiet surface.

Clubin had often seen the Douvres from afar.

He satisfied himself that he was indeed there.

He could not doubt it.

A sudden and hideous change of affairs. The Douvres instead of the Hanways. Instead of one mile, five leagues of sea! The Douvres to the solitary shipwrecked sailor is the visible and palpable presence of death, the extinction of all hope of reaching land.

Clubin shuddered. He had placed himself voluntarily in the jaws of destruction. No other refuge was left to him than “The Man Rock.” It was probable that a tempest would arise in the night, and that the long-boat, overloaded as she was, would sink. No news of the shipwreck then would come to land. It would not even be known that Clubin had been left upon the Douvres. No prospect was now before him but death from cold and hunger. His seventy-five thousand francs would not purchase him a mouthful of bread. All the scaffolding he had built up had brought him only to this snare. He alone was the laborious architect of this crowning catastrophe. No resource — no possible escape; his triumph transformed into a fatal precipice. Instead of deliverance, a prison; instead of the long prosperous future, agony. In the glance of an eye, in the moment which the lightning occupies in passing, all his construction had fallen into ruins. The paradise dreamed of by this demon had changed to its true form of a sepulchre.

Meanwhile there had sprung up a movement in the air. The wind was rising. The fog, shaken, driven in, and rent asunder, moved towards the horizon in vast shapeless masses. As quickly as it had disappeared before, the sea became once more visible.

The cattle, more and more invaded by the waters, continued to bellow in the hold.

Night was approaching, probably bringing with it a storm.

The Durande, filling slowly with the rising tide, swung from right to left, then from left to right, and began to turn upon the rock as upon a pivot.

The moment could be foreseen when a wave must move her from her fixed position, and probably roll her over on her beam-ends.

It was not even so dark as at the instant of her striking the rocks. Though the day was more advanced, it was possible to see more clearly. The fog had carried away with it some part of the darkness. The west was without a cloud. Twilight brings a pale sky. Its vast reflection glimmered on the sea.

The Durande’s bows were lower than her stern. Her stern was, in fact, almost out of the water. Clubin mounted on the taffrail, and fixed his eyes on the horizon.

It is the nature of hypocrisy to be sanguine. The hypocrite is one who waits his opportunity. Hypocrisy is nothing, in fact, but a horrible hopefulness; the very foundation of its revolting falsehood is composed of that virtue transformed into a vice.

Strange contradiction. There is a certain trustfulness in hypocrisy. The hypocrite confides in some power, unrevealed even to himself, which permits the course of evil.

Clubin looked far and wide over the ocean.

The position was desperate, but that evil spirit did not yet despair.

He knew that after the fog, vessels that had been lying-to or riding at anchor would resume their course; and he thought that perhaps one would pass within the horizon.

And, as he had anticipated, a sail appeared.

She was coming from the east and steering towards the west.

As it approached the cut of the vessel became visible. It had but one mast, and was schooner-rigged. Her bowsprit was almost horizontal. It was a cutter.

Before a half-hour she must pass not very far from the Douvres.

Clubin said within himself, “I am saved!”

In a moment like this, a man thinks at first of nothing but his life.

The cutter was probably a strange craft. Might it not be one of the smuggling vessels on its way to Pleinmont? It might even be Blasquito himself. In that case, not only life, but fortune, would be saved; and the accident of the Douvres, by hastening the conclusion, by dispensing with the necessity for concealment in the haunted house, and by bringing the adventure to a dénouement at sea, would be turned into a happy incident.

All his original confidence of success returned fanatically to his sombre mind.

It is remarkable how easily knaves are persuaded that they deserve to succeed.

There was but one course to take.

The Durande, entangled among the rocks, necessarily mingled her outline with them, and confounded herself with their irregular shapes, among which she formed only one more mass of lines. Thus become indistinct and lost, she would not suffice, in the little light which remained, to attract the attention of the crew of the vessel which was approaching.

But a human form standing up, black against the pale twilight of the sky, upon “the Man Rock,” and making signs of distress, would doubtless be perceived, and the cutter would then send a boat to take the shipwrecked man aboard.

“The Man” was only two hundred fathoms off. To reach it by swimming was simple, to climb it easy.

There was not a minute to lose.

The bows of the Durande being low between the rocks, it was from the height of the poop where Clubin stood that he had to jump into the sea. He began by taking a sounding, and discovered that there was great depth just under the stern of the wrecked vessel. The microscopic shells of foraminifera which the adhesive matter on the lead-line brought up were intact, indicating the presence of very hollow caves under the rocks, in which the water was tranquil, however great the agitation of the surface.

He undressed, leaving his clothing on the deck. He knew that he would be able to get clothing when aboard the cutter.

He retained nothing but his leather belt.

As soon as he was stripped he placed his hand upon this belt, buckled it more securely, felt for the iron tobacco-box, took a rapid survey in the direction which he would have to follow among the breakers and the waves to gain “the Man Rock;” then precipitating himself head first, he plunged into the sea.

As he dived from a height, he plunged heavily.

He sank deep in the water, touched the bottom, skirted for a moment the submarine rocks, then struck out to regain the surface.

At that moment he felt himself seized by one foot.

THE DANGER OF OPENING A BOOK AT RANDOM

I

THE PEARL AT THE FOOT OF THE PRECIPICE

A few moments after his short colloquy with Sieur Landoys, Gilliatt was at St. Sampson.

He was troubled, even anxious. What could it be that had happened.

There was a murmur in St. Sampson like that of a startled hive. Everybody was at his door. The women were talking loud. There were people who seemed relating some occurrence and who were gesticulating. A group had gathered around them. The words could be heard, “What a misfortune!” Some faces wore a smile.

Gilliatt interrogated no one. It was not in his nature to ask questions. He was, moreover, too much moved to speak to strangers. He had no confidence in rumours. He preferred to go direct to the Bravées.

His anxiety was so great that he was not even deterred from entering the house.

The door of the great lower room opening upon the Quay, moreover, stood quite open. There was a swarm of men and women on the threshold. Everybody was going in, and Gilliatt went with the rest.

Entering he found Sieur Landoys standing near the doorposts.

“You have heard, no doubt, of this event?”

“No.”

“I did not like to call it out to you on the road. It makes me like a bird of evil omen.”

“What has happened?”

“The Durande is lost.”

There was a crowd in the great room.

The various groups spoke low, like people in a sick chamber.

The assemblage, which consisted of neighbours, the first comers, curious to learn the news, huddled together near the door with a sort of timidity, leaving clear the bottom of the room, where appeared Déruchette sitting and in tears. Mess Lethierry stood beside her.

His back was against the wall at the end of the room. His sailor's cap came down over his eyebrows. A lock of grey hair hung upon his cheek. He said nothing. His arms were motionless; he seemed scarcely to breathe. He had the look of something lifeless placed against the wall.

It was easy to see in his aspect a man whose life had been crushed within him. The Durande being gone, Lethierry had no longer any object in his existence. He had had a being on the sea; that being had suddenly foundered. What could he do now? Rise every morning: go to sleep every night. Never more to await the coming of the Durande; to see her get under way, or steer again into the port. What was a remainder of existence without object? To drink, to eat, and then? — He had crowned the labours of his life by a masterpiece: won by his devotion a new step in civilisation. The step was lost; the masterpiece destroyed. To live a few vacant years longer! where would be the good? Henceforth nothing was left for him to do. At his age men do not begin life anew. Besides, he was ruined. Poor old man!

Déruchette, sitting near him on a chair and weeping, held one of Mess Lethierry's hands in hers. Her hands were joined: his hand was clenched fast. It was the sign of the shade of difference in their two sorrows. In joined hands there is still some token of hope, in the clenched fist none.

Mess Lethierry gave up his arm to her, and let her do with it what she pleased. He was passive. Struck down by a thunderbolt, he had scarcely a spark of life left within him.

There is a degree of overwhelmment which abstracts the mind entirely from its fellowship with man. The forms which come and go within your room become confused and indistinct. They pass by, even touch you, but never really come near you. You are far away; inaccessible to them, as they to you. The intensities of joy and despair differ in this. In despair, we take cognisance of the world only as something dim and afar off: we are insensible to the things before our eyes; we lose the feeling of our own existence. It is in vain, at such times, that we are flesh and blood; our consciousness of life is none the more real: we are become, even to ourselves, nothing but a dream.

Mess Lethierry’s gaze indicated that he had reached this state of absorption.

The various groups were whispering together. They exchanged information as far as they had gathered it. This was the substance of their news.

The Durande had been wrecked the day before in the fog on the Douvres, about an hour before sunset. With the exception of the captain, who refused to leave his vessel, the crew and passengers had all escaped in the long-boat. A squall from the south-west springing up as the fog had cleared, had almost wrecked them a second time, and had carried them out to sea beyond Guernsey. In the night they had had the good fortune to meet with the Cashmere, which had taken them aboard and landed them at St. Peter’s Port. The disaster was entirely the fault of the steersman Tangrouille, who was in prison. Clubin had behaved nobly.

The pilots, who had mustered in great force, pronounced the words “The Douvres” with a peculiar emphasis. “A dreary half-way house that,” said one.

A compass and a bundle of registers and memorandum-books lay on the table; they were doubtless the compass of the Durande and the ship’s papers, handed by Clubin to Imbrancam and Tangrouille at the moment of the departure of the long-boat. They were the evidences of the magnificent self-abnegation of that man who had busied himself with saving these documents even in the presence of death itself — a little incident full of moral grandeur; an instance of sublime self-forgetfulness never to be forgotten.

They were unanimous in their admiration of Clubin; unanimous also in believing him to be saved after all. The Shealtiel cutter had arrived some hours after the Cashmere. It was this vessel which had brought the last items of intelligence. She had passed four-and-twenty hours in the same waters as the Durande. She had lain-to in the fog, and tacked about during the squall. The captain of the Shealtiel was present among the company.

This captain had just finished his narrative to Lethierry as Gilliatt entered. The narrative was a true one. Towards the morning, the storm having abated, and the wind becoming manageable, the captain of the Shealtiel had heard the lowing of oxen in the open sea. This rural sound in the midst of the waves had naturally startled him. He steered in that direction, and perceived the Durande among the Douvres. The sea had sufficiently subsided for him to approach. He hailed the wreck; the bellowing of the cattle was the sole reply. The captain of the Shealtiel was confident that there was no one aboard the Durande. The wreck still held together well, and notwithstanding the violence of the squall, Clubin could have passed the night there. He was not the man to leave go his hold very easily. He was not there, however; and therefore he must have been rescued. It was certain that several sloops and luggers, from Granville and St. Malo, must, after laying-to in the fog on the previous evening, have passed pretty near the rocks. It was evident that one of these had taken Clubin aboard. It was to be remembered that the long-boat of the Durande was full when it left the unlucky vessel; that it was certain to encounter great risks; that another man aboard would have overloaded her, and perhaps caused her to founder; and that these circumstances had no doubt weighed with Clubin in coming to his determination to remain on the wreck. His duty, however, once fulfilled, and a vessel at hand, Clubin assuredly would not have scrupled to avail himself of its aid. A hero is not necessarily an idiot. The idea of a suicide was absurd in connection with a man of Clubin’s irreproachable character. The culprit, too, was Tangrouille, not Clubin. All this was conclusive. The captain of the Shealtiel was evidently right, and everybody expected to see Clubin reappear very shortly. There was a project abroad to carry him through the town in triumph.

Two things appeared certain from the narrative of the captain: Clubin was saved, the Durande lost.

As regarded the Durande, there was nothing for it but to accept the fact; the catastrophe was irremediable. The captain of the Shealtiel had witnessed the last moments of the wreck. The sharp rock on which the vessel had been, as it were, nailed, had held her fast during the night, and resisted the shock of the tempest as if reluctant to part with its prey; but in the morning, at the moment when the captain of the Shealtiel had convinced himself that there was no one aboard to be saved, and was about to wear off again, one of those seas which are like the last angry blows of a tempest had struck her. The wave lifted her violently from her place, and with the swiftness and directness of an arrow from a bow had thrown her against the two Douvres rocks. “An infernal crash was heard,” said the captain. The vessel, lifted by the wave to a certain height, had plunged between the two rocks up to her midship frame. She had stuck fast again; but more firmly than on the submarine rocks. She must have remained there suspended, and exposed to every wind and sea.

The Durande, according to the statements of the crew of the Shealtiel, was already three parts broken up. She would evidently have foundered during the night, if the rocks had not kept her up. The captain of the Shealtiel had watched her a long time with his spyglass. He gave, with naval precision, the details of her disaster. The starboard quarter beaten in, the masts maimed, the sails blown from the bolt-ropes, the shrouds torn away, the cabin sky-lights smashed by the falling of one of the booms, the dome of the cuddy-house beaten in, the chocks of the long-boat struck away, the round-house overturned, the hinges of the rudder broken, the trusses wrenched away, the quarter-cloths demolished, the bits gone, the cross-beam destroyed, the shear-rails knocked off, the stern-post broken. As to the parts of the cargo made fast before the foremast, all destroyed, made a clean sweep of, gone to ten thousand shivers, with top ropes, iron pulleys, and chains. The Durande had broken her back; the sea now must break her up piecemeal. In a few days there would be nothing of her remaining.

It appeared that the engine was scarcely injured by all these ravages — a remarkable fact, and one which proved its excellence. The captain of the Shealtiel thought he could affirm that the crank had received no serious injury. The vessel’s masts had given way, but the funnel had resisted everything. Only the iron guards of the captain’s gangway were twisted; the paddle boxes had suffered, the frames were bruised, but the paddles had not a float missing. The machinery was intact. Such was the conviction of the captain of the Shealtiel. Imbrancam, the engineer, who was among the crowd, had the same conviction. The negro, more intelligent than many of his white companions, was proud of his engines. He lifted up his arms, opening the ten fingers of his black hands, and said to Lethierry, as he sat there silent, “Master, the machinery is alive still!”

The safety of Clubin seeming certain, and the hull of the Durande being already sacrificed, the engines became the topic of conversation among the crowd. They took an interest in it as in a living thing. They felt a delight in praising its good qualities. “That’s what I call a well-built machine,” said a French sailor. “Something like a good one,” cried a Guernsey fisherman. “She must have some good stuff in her,” said the captain of the Shealtiel, “to come out of that affair with only a few scratches.”

By degrees the machinery of the Durande became the absorbing object of their thoughts. Opinions were warm for and against. It had its enemies and its friends. More than one who possessed a good old sailing cutter, and who hoped to get a share of the business of the Durande, was not sorry to find that the Douvres rock had disposed of the new invention. The whispering became louder. The discussion grew noisy, though the hubbub was evidently a little restrained; and now and then there was a simultaneous lowering of voices out of respect to Lethierry's death-like silence.

The result of the colloquy, so obstinately maintained on all sides, was as follows: —

The engines were the vital part of the vessel. To rescue the Durande was impossible; but the machinery might still be saved. These engines were unique. To construct others similar, the money was wanting; but to find the artificer would have been still more difficult. It was remembered that the constructor of the machinery was dead. It had cost forty thousand francs. No one would risk again such a sum upon such a chance: particularly as it was now discovered that steamboats could be lost like other vessels. The accident of the Durande destroyed the prestige of all her previous success. Still, it was deplorable to think that at that very moment this valuable mechanism was still entire and in good condition, and that in five or six days it would probably go to pieces, like the vessel herself. As long as this existed, it might almost be said that there was no shipwreck. The loss of the engines was alone irreparable. To save the machinery would be almost to repair the disaster.

Save the machinery! It was easy to talk of it; but who would undertake to do it? Was it possible, even? To scheme and to execute are two different things; as different as to dream and to do. Now if ever a dream had appeared wild and impracticable, it was that of saving the engines then embedded between the Douvres. The idea of sending a ship and a crew to work upon those rocks was absurd. It could not be thought of. It was the season of heavy seas. In the first gale the chains of the anchors would be worn away and snapped upon the submarine peaks, and the vessel must be shattered on the rocks. That would be to send a second shipwreck to the relief of the first. On the miserable narrow height where the legend of the place described the shipwrecked sailor as having perished of hunger, there was scarcely room for one person. To save the engines, therefore, it would be necessary for a man to go to the Douvres, to be alone in that sea, alone in that desert, alone at five leagues from the coast, alone in that region of terrors, alone for entire weeks, alone in the presence of dangers foreseen and unforeseen — without supplies in the face of hunger and nakedness, without succour in the time of distress, without token of human life around him save the bleached bones of the miserable being who had perished there in his misery, without companionship save that of death. And besides, how was it possible to extricate the machinery? It would require not only a sailor, but an engineer; and for what trials must he not prepare. The man who would attempt such a task must be more than a hero. He must be a madman: for in certain enterprises, in which superhuman power appears necessary, there is a sort of madness which is more potent than courage. And after all, would it not be a folly to immolate oneself for a mass of rusted iron. No: it was certain that nobody would undertake to go to the Douvres on such an errand. The engine must be abandoned like the rest. The engineer for such a task would assuredly not be forthcoming. Where, indeed, should they look for such a man?

All this, or similar observations, formed the substance of the confused conversations of the crowd.

The captain of the Shealtiel, who had been a pilot, summed up the views of all by exclaiming aloud: —

“No; it is all over. The man does not exist who could go there and rescue the machinery of the Durande.”

“If I don’t go,” said Imbrancam, “it is because nobody could do it.”

The captain of the Shealtiel shook his left hand in the air with that sudden movement which expresses a conviction that a thing is impossible.

“If he existed—” continued the captain.

Déruchette turned her head impulsively, and interrupted.

“I would marry him,” she said, innocently.

There was a pause.

A man made his way out of the crowd, and standing before her, pale and anxious, said:

“You would marry him, Miss Déruchette?”

It was Gilliatt.

All eyes were turned towards him. Mess Lethierry had just before stood upright, and gazed about him. His eyes glittered with a strange light.

He took off his sailor’s cap, and threw it on the ground: then looked solemnly before him, and without seeing any of the persons present, said:

“Déruchette should be his. I pledge myself to it in God’s name.”

II

MUCH ASTONISHMENT ON THE WESTERN COAST

The full moon rose at ten o’clock on the following night; but however fine the night, however favourable the wind and sea, no fisherman thought of going out that evening either from Hogue la Perre, or Bourdeaux harbour, or Houmet Benet, or Platon, or Port Grat, or Vazon Bay, or Perrelle Bay, or Pezeries, or the Tielles or Saints’ Bay, or Little Bo, or any other port or little harbour in Guernsey; and the reason was very simple. A cock had been heard to crow at noonday.

When the cock is heard to crow at an extraordinary hour, fishing is suspended.

At dusk on that evening, however, a fisherman returning to Omptolle, met with a remarkable adventure. On the height above Houmet Paradis, beyond the Two Brayes and the Two Grunes, stands to the left the beacon of the Plattes Tougères, representing a tub reversed; and to the right, the beacon of St. Sampson, representing the face of a man. Between these two, the fisherman thought that he perceived for the first time a third beacon. What could be the meaning of this beacon? When had it been erected on that point? What shoal did it indicate? The beacon responded immediately to these interrogations. It moved, it was a mast. The astonishment of the fisherman did not diminish. A beacon would have been remarkable; a mast was still more so: it could not be a fishing-boat. When everybody else was returning, some boat was going out. Who could it be? and what was he about?

Ten minutes later the vessel, moving slowly, came within a short distance of the Omptolle fisherman. He did not recognise it. He heard the sound of rowing: there were evidently only two oars. There was probably, then, only one man aboard. The wind was northerly. The man, therefore, was evidently paddling along in order to take the wind off Point Fontenelle. There he would probably take to his sails. He intended then to double the Ancresse and Mount Crevel. What could that mean?

The vessel passed, the fisherman returned home. On that same night, at different hours, and at different points, various persons scattered and isolated on the western coast of Guernsey, observed certain facts.

As the Omptolle fisherman was mooring his bark, a carter of seaweed about half-a-mile off, whipping his horses along the lonely road from the Clôtures near the Druid stones, and in the neighbourhood of the Martello Towers 6 and 7, saw far off at sea, in a part little frequented, because it requires much knowledge of the waters, and in the direction of North Rock and the Jablonneuse, a sail being hoisted. He paid little attention to the circumstance, not being a seaman, but a carter of seaweed.

Half-an-hour had perhaps elapsed since the carter had perceived this vessel, when a plasterer returning from his work in the town, and passing round Pelée Pool, found himself suddenly opposite a vessel sailing boldly among the rocks of the Quenon, the Rousse de Mer, and the Gripe de Rousse. The night was dark, but the sky was light over the sea, an effect common enough; and he could distinguish a great distance in every direction. There was no sail visible except this vessel.

A little lower, a gatherer of crayfish, preparing his fish wells on the beach which separates Port Soif from the Port Enfer, was puzzled to make out the movements of a vessel between the Boue Corneille and the Moubrette. The man must have been a good pilot, and in great haste to reach some destination to risk his boat there.

Just as eight o’clock was striking at the Catel, the tavern-keeper at Cobo Bay observed with astonishment a sail out beyond the Boue du Jardin and the Grunettes, and very near the Susanne and the Western Grunes.

Not far from Cobo Bay, upon the solitary point of the Houmet of Vason Bay, two lovers were lingering, hesitating before they parted for the night. The young woman addressed the young man with the words, “I am not going because I don’t care to stay with you: I’ve a great deal to do.” Their farewell kiss was interrupted by a good sized sailing boat which passed very near them, making for the direction of the Messellettes.

Monsieur le Peyre des Norgiots, an inhabitant of Cotillon Pipet, was engaged about nine o’clock in the evening in examining a hole made by some trespassers in the hedge of his property called La Jennerotte, and his “friquet planted with trees.” Even while ascertaining the amount of the damage, he could not help observing a fishing-boat audaciously making its way round the Crocq Point at that hour of night.

On the morrow of a tempest, when there is always some agitation upon the sea, that route was extremely unsafe. It was rash to choose it, at least, unless the steersman knew all the channels by heart.

At half-past nine o'clock, at L'Equerrier, a trawler carrying home his net stopped for a time to observe between Colombelle and the Soufleresse something which looked like a boat. The boat was in a dangerous position. Sudden gusts of wind of a very dangerous kind are very common in that spot. The Soufleresse, or Blower, derives its name from the sudden gusts of wind which it seems to direct upon the vessels, which by rare chance find their way thither.

At the moment when the moon was rising, the tide being high and the sea being quiet, in the little strait of Li-Hou, the solitary keeper of the island of Li-Hou was considerably startled. A long black object slowly passed between the moon and him. This dark form, high and narrow, resembled a winding-sheet spread out and moving. It glided along the line of the top of the wall formed by the ridges of rock. The keeper of Li-Hou fancied that he had beheld the Black Lady.

The White Lady inhabits the Tau de Pez d'Amont; the Grey Lady, the Tau de Pez d'Aval; the Red Lady, the Silleuse, to the north of the Marquis Bank; and the Black Lady, the Grand Etacré, to the west of Li-Houmet. At night, when the moon shines, these ladies stalk abroad, and sometimes meet.

That dark form might undoubtedly be a sail. The long groups of rocks on which she appeared to be walking, might in fact be concealing the hull of a bark navigating behind them, and allowing only her sail to be seen. But the keeper asked himself, what bark would dare, at that hour, to venture herself between Li-Hou and the Pécheresses, and the Anguillières and Lérée Point? And what object could she have? It seemed to him much more probable that it was the Black Lady.

As the moon was passing the clock-tower of St. Peter in the Wood, the serjeant at Castle Rocquaine, while in the act of raising the drawbridge of the castle, distinguished at the end of the bay beyond the Haute Canée, but nearer than the Sambule, a sailing-vessel which seemed to be steadily dropping down from north to south.

On the southern coast of Guernsey behind Pleinmont, in the curve of a bay composed entirely of precipices and rocky walls rising peak-shaped from the sea, there is a singular landing-place, to which a French gentleman, a resident of the island since 1855, has given the name of "The Port on the Fourth Floor," a name now generally adopted. This port, or landing-place, which was then called the Moie, is a rocky plateau half-formed by nature, half by art, raised about forty feet above the level of the waves, and communicating with the water by two large beams laid parallel in the form of an inclined plane. The fishing-vessels are hoisted up there by chains and pulleys from the sea, and are let down again in the same way along these beams, which are like two rails. For the fishermen there is a ladder. The port was, at the time of our story, much frequented by the smugglers. Being difficult of access, it was well suited to their purposes.

Towards eleven o'clock, some smugglers — perhaps the same upon whose aid Clubin had counted — stood with their bales of goods on the summit of this platform of the Moie. A smuggler is necessarily a man on the look out, it is part of his business to watch. They were astonished to perceive a sail suddenly make its appearance beyond the dusky outline of Cape Pleinmont. It was moonlight. The smugglers observed the sail narrowly, suspecting that it might be some coast-guard cutter about to lie in ambush behind the Great Hanway. But the sail left the Hanways behind, passed to the north-west of the Boue Blondel, and was lost in the pale mists of the horizon out at sea.

"Where the devil can that boat be sailing?" asked the smuggler.

That same evening, a little after sunset, some one had been heard knocking at the door of the old house of the Bû de la Rue. It was a boy wearing brown clothes and yellow stockings, a fact that indicated that he was a little parish clerk. An old fisherwoman prowling about the shore with a lantern in her hand, had called to the boy, and this dialogue ensued between the fisherwoman and the little clerk, before the entrance to the Bû de la Rue: —

"What d'ye want, lad?"

"The man of this place."

"He's not there."

"Where is he?"

"I don't know."

"Will he be there to-morrow?"

"I don't know."

"Is he gone away?"

"I don't know."

"I've come, good woman, from the new rector of the parish, the Reverend Ebenezer Caudray, who desires to pay him a visit."

"I don't know where he is."

“The rector sent me to ask if the man who lives at the Bû de la Rue would be at home to-morrow morning.”

“I don’t know.”

A QUOTATION FROM THE BIBLE

During the twenty-four hours which followed, Mess Lethierry slept not, ate nothing, drank nothing. He kissed Déruchette on the forehead, asked after Clubin, of whom there was as yet no news, signed a declaration certifying that he had no intention of preferring a charge against anyone, and set Tangrouille at liberty.

All the morning of the next day he remained half supporting himself on the table of the office of the Durande, neither standing nor sitting: answering kindly when anyone spoke to him. Curiosity being satisfied, the Bravées had become a solitude. There is a good deal of curiosity generally mingled with the haste of condolences. The door had closed again, and left the old man again alone with Déruchette. The strange light that had shone in Lethierry's eyes was extinguished. The mournful look which filled them after the first news of the disaster had returned.

Déruchette, anxious for his sake, had, on the advice of Grace and Douce, laid silently beside him a pair of stockings, which he had been knitting, sailor fashion, when the bad news had arrived.

He smiled bitterly, and said:

"They must think me foolish."

After a quarter of an hour's silence, he added:

"These things are well when you are happy."

Déruchette carried away the stockings, and took advantage of the opportunity to remove also the compass and the ship's papers which Lethierry had been brooding over too long.

In the afternoon, a little before tea-time, the door opened and two strangers entered, attired in black. One was old, the other young.

The young one has, perhaps, already been observed in the course of this story.

The two men had each a grave air; but their gravity appeared different. The old man possessed what might be called state gravity; the gravity of the young man was in his nature. Habit engenders the one; thought the other.

They were, as their costume indicated, two clergymen, each belonging to the Established Church.

The first fact in the appearance of the younger man which might have first struck the observer was, that his gravity, though conspicuous in the expression of his features, and evidently springing from the mind, was not indicated by his person. Gravity is not inconsistent with passion, which it exalts by purifying it; but the idea of gravity could with difficulty be associated with an exterior remarkable above all for personal beauty. Being in holy orders, he must have been at least four-and-twenty, but he seemed scarcely more than eighteen. He possessed those gifts at once in harmony with, and in opposition to, each other. A soul which seemed created for exalted passion, and a body created for love. He was fair, rosy-fresh, slim, and elegant in his severe attire, and he had the cheeks of a young girl, and delicate hands. His movements were natural and lively, though subdued. Everything about him was pleasing, elegant, almost voluptuous. The beauty of his expression served to correct this excess of personal attraction. His open smile, which showed his teeth, regular and white as those of a child, had something in it pensive, even devotional. He had the gracefulness of a page, mingled with the dignity of a bishop.

His fair hair, so fair and golden as to be almost effeminate, clustered over his white forehead, which was high and well-formed. A slight double line between the eyebrows awakened associations with studious thought.

Those who saw him felt themselves in the presence of one of those natures, benevolent, innocent, and pure, whose progress is in inverse sense with that of vulgar minds; natures whom illusion renders wise, and whom experience makes enthusiasts.

His older companion was no other than Doctor Jaquemin Hérode. Doctor Jaquemin Hérode belonged to the High Church; a party whose system is a sort of popery without a pope. The Church of England was at that epoch labouring with the tendencies which have since become strengthened and condensed in the form of Puseyism. Doctor Jaquemin Hérode belonged to that shade of Anglicanism which is almost a variety of the Church of Rome. He was haughty, precise, stiff, and commanding. His inner sight scarcely penetrated outwardly. He possessed the letter in the place of the spirit. His manner was arrogant; his presence imposing. He had less the appearance of a “Reverend” than of a Monsignore. His frock-coat was cut somewhat in the fashion of a cassock. His true centre would have been Rome. He was a born Prelate of the Antechamber. He seemed to have been created expressly to fill a part in the Papal Court, to walk behind the Pontifical litter, with all the Court of Rome in abitto paonazzo. The accident of his English birth and his theological education, directed more towards the Old than the New Testament, had deprived him of that destiny. All his splendours were comprised in his preferments as Rector of St. Peter’s Port, Dean of the Island of Guernsey, and Surrogate of the Bishop of Winchester. These were, undoubtedly, not without their glories. These glories did not prevent M. Jaquemin Hérode being, on the whole, a worthy man.

As a theologian he was esteemed by those who were able to judge of such matters; he was almost an authority in the Court of Arches — that Sorbonne of England.

He had the true air of erudition; a learned contraction of the eyes; bristling nostrils; teeth which showed themselves at all times; a thin upper lip and a thick lower one. He was the possessor of several learned degrees, a valuable prebend, titled friends, the confidence of the bishop, and a Bible, which he carried always in his pocket.

Mess Lethierry was so completely absorbed that the entrance of the two priests produced no effect upon him, save a slight movement of the eyebrows.

M. Jaquemin Hérode advanced, bowed, alluded in a few sober and dignified words to his recent promotion, and mentioned that he came according to custom to introduce among the inhabitants, and to Mess Lethierry in particular, his successor in the parish, the new Rector of St. Sampson, the Rev. Ebenezer Caudray, henceforth the pastor of Mess Lethierry.

Déruchette rose.

The young clergyman, who was the Rev. Ebenezer, saluted her.

Mess Lethierry regarded Monsieur Ebenezer Caudray, and muttered, “A bad sailor.”

Grace placed chairs. The two visitors seated themselves near the table.

Doctor Hérode commenced a discourse. It had reached his ears that a serious misfortune had befallen his host. The Durande had been lost. He came as Lethierry’s pastor to offer condolence and advice. This shipwreck was unfortunate, and yet not without compensations. Let us examine our own hearts. Are we not puffed up with prosperity? The waters of felicity are dangerous. Troubles must be submitted to cheerfully. The ways of Providence are mysterious. Mess Lethierry was ruined, perhaps. But riches were a danger. You may have false friends; poverty will disperse them, and leave you alone. The Durande was reported to have brought a revenue of one thousand pounds sterling per annum. It was more than enough for the wise. Let us fly from temptations; put not our faith in gold; bow the head to losses and neglect. Isolation is full of good fruits. It was in solitude that Ajah discovered the warm springs while leading the asses of his father Zibeon. Let us not rebel against the inscrutable decrees of Providence. The holy man Job, after his misery, had put faith in riches. Who can say that the loss of the Durande may not have its advantages even of a temporal kind. He, for instance, Doctor Jaquemin Hérode had invested some money in an excellent enterprise, now in progress at Sheffield. If Mess Lethierry, with the wealth which might still remain to him, should choose to embark in the same affair, he might transfer his capital to that town. It was an extensive manufactory of arms for the supply of the Czar, now engaged in repressing insurrection in Poland. There was a good prospect of obtaining three hundred per cent. profit.

The word Czar appeared to awaken Lethierry. He interrupted Dr. Hérode.

“I want nothing to do with the Czar.”

The Reverend Jaquemin Hérode replied:

“Mess Lethierry, princes are recognised by God. It is written, ‘Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar’s.’ The Czar is Cæsar.”

Lethierry partly relapsed into his dream and muttered:

“Cæsar? who is Cæsar? I don’t know.”

The Rev. Jaquemin Hérode continued his exhortations. He did not press the question of Sheffield.

To contemn a Cæsar was republicanism. He could understand a man being a republican. In that case he could turn his thoughts towards a republic. Mess Lethierry might repair his fortune in the United States, even better than in England. If he desired to invest what remained to him at great profit, he had only to take shares in the great company for developing the resources of Texas, which employed more than twenty thousand negroes.

“I want nothing to do with slavery,” said Lethierry.

“Slavery,” replied the Reverend Hérode, “is an institution recognised by Scripture. It is written, ‘If a man smite his slave, he shall not be punished, for he is his money.’”

Grace and Douce at the door of the room listened in a sort of ecstacy to the words of the Reverend Doctor.

The doctor continued. He was, all things considered, as we have said, a worthy man; and whatever his differences, personal or connected with caste, with Mess Lethierry, he had come very sincerely to offer him that spiritual and even temporal aid which he, Doctor Jaquemin Hérode, dispensed.

If Mess Lethierry's fortune had been diminished to that point that he was unable to take a beneficial part in any speculation, Russian or American, why should he not obtain some government appointment suited to him? There were many very respectable places open to him, and the reverend gentleman was ready to recommend him. The office of Deputy-Vicomte was just vacant. Mess Lethierry was popular and respected, and the Reverend Jaquemin Hérode, Dean of Guernsey and Surrogate of the Bishop, would make an effort to obtain for Mess Lethierry this post. The Deputy-Vicomte is an important officer. He is present as the representative of His Majesty at the holding of the Sessions, at the debates of the Cohue, and at executions of justice.

Lethierry fixed his eye upon Doctor Hérode.

"I don't like hanging," he said.

Doctor Hérode, who, up to this point, had pronounced his words with the same intonation, had now a fit of severity; his tone became slightly changed.

"Mess Lethierry, the pain of death is of divine ordination. God has placed the sword in the hands of governors. It is written, 'An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.'"

The Reverend Ebenezer imperceptibly drew his chair nearer to the Reverend Doctor and said, so as to be heard only by him:

"What this man says, is dictated to him."

"By whom? By what?" demanded the Reverend Jaquemin Hérode, in the same tone.

The young man replied in a whisper, "By his conscience."

The Reverend Jaquemin Hérode felt in his pocket, drew out a thick little bound volume with clasps, and said aloud:

"Conscience is here."

The book was a Bible.

Then Doctor Hérode's tone became softer. "His wish was to render a service to Mess Lethierry, whom he respected much. As his pastor, it was his right and duty to offer counsel. Mess Lethierry, however, was free."

Mess Lethierry, plunged once more in his overwhelming absorption, no longer listened. Déruchette, seated near him, and thoughtful, also did not raise her eyes, and by her silent presence somewhat increased the embarrassment of a conversation not very animated. A witness who says nothing is a species of indefinable weight. Doctor Hérode, however, did not appear to feel it.

Lethierry no longer replying, Doctor Hérode expatiated freely. Counsel is from man; inspiration is from God. In the counsels of the priests there is inspiration. It is good to accept, dangerous to refuse them. Sochoh was seized by eleven devils for disdaining the exhortations of Nathaniel. Tiburianus was struck with a leprosy for having driven from his house the Apostle Andrew. Barjesus, a magician though he was, was punished with blindness for having mocked at the words of St. Paul. Elxai and his sisters, Martha and Martena, are in eternal torments for despising the warnings of Valentianus, who proved to them clearly that their Jesus Christ, thirty-eight leagues in height, was a demon. Aholibamah, who is also called Judith, obeyed the Councils, Reuben and Peniel listened to the counsels from on high, as their names indeed indicate. Reuben signifies son of the vision; and Peniel, “the face of God.”:

Mess Lethierry struck the table with his fist.

“Parbleu!” he cried; “it was my fault.”

“What do you mean?” asked M. Jaquemin Hérode.

“I say that it is my fault.”

“Your fault? Why?”

“Because I allowed the Durande to return on Fridays.”

M. Jaquemin Hérode whispered in Caudray’s ear:

“This man is superstitious.”

He resumed, raising his voice, and in a didactic tone:

“Mess Lethierry, it is puerile to believe in Fridays. You ought not to put faith in fables. Friday is a day just like any other. It is very often a propitious day. Melendez founded the city of Saint Augustin on a Friday; it was on a Friday that Henry the Seventh gave his commission to John Cabot; the Pilgrims of the Mayflower landed at Province Town on a Friday. Washington was born on Friday, the 22nd of February 1732; Christopher Columbus discovered America on Friday, the 12th of October 1492.”

Having delivered himself of these remarks, he rose.

Caudray, whom he had brought with him, rose also.

Grace and Douce, perceiving that the two clergymen were about to take their leave, opened the folding-doors.

Mess Lethierry saw nothing; heard nothing.

M. Jaquemin Hérode said, apart to M. Caudray:

“He does not even salute us. This is not sorrow; it is vacancy. He must have lost his reason.”

He took his little Bible, however, from the table, and held it between his hands outstretched, as one holds a bird in fear that it may fly away. This attitude awakened among the persons present a certain amount of attention. Grace and Douce leaned forward eagerly.

His voice assumed all the solemnity of which it was capable.

“Mess Lethierry,” he began, “let us not part without reading a page of the Holy Book. It is from books that wise men derive consolation in the troubles of life. The profane have their oracles; but believers have their ready resource in the Bible. The first book which comes to hand, opened by chance may afford counsel; but the Bible, opened at any page, yields a revelation. It is, above all, a boon to the afflicted. Yes, Holy Scripture is an unfailing balm for their wounds. In the presence of affliction, it is good to consult its sacred pages — to open even without choosing the place, and to read with faith the passage which we find. What man does not choose is chosen by God. He knoweth best what suiteth us. His finger pointeth invisibly to that which we read. Whatever be the page, it will infallibly enlighten. Let us seek, then, no other light; but hold fast to His. It is the word from on high. In the text which is evoked with confidence and reverence, often do we find a mysterious significance in our present troubles. Let us hearken, then, and obey. Mess Lethierry, you are in affliction, but I hold here the book of consolation. You are sick at heart, but I have here the book of spiritual health.”

The Reverend Jaquemin Hérode touched the spring of the clasp, and let his finger slip between the leaves. Then he placed his hand a moment upon the open volume, collected his thoughts, and, raising his eyes impressively, began to read in a loud voice.

The passage which he had lighted on was as follows:

“And Isaac went out to meditate in the field at the eventide, and he lifted up his eyes and saw and beheld the camels were coming.

“And Rebekah lifted up her eyes, and when she saw Isaac she lighted off the camel.

“For she had said unto the servant, What man is this that walketh in the field to meet us?

“And Isaac brought her into his mother Sarah’s tent, and took Rebekah, and she became his wife, and he loved her; and Isaac was comforted after his mother’s death.”

Caudray and Déruchette glanced at each other.

PART II. — MALICIOUS GILLIATT

BOOK I

THE ROCK

I

THE PLACE WHICH IS DIFFICULT TO REACH, AND DIFFICULT TO LEAVE

The bark which had been observed at so many points on the coast of Guernsey on the previous evening was, as the reader has guessed, the old Dutch barge or sloop. Gilliatt had chosen the channel along the coast among the rocks. It was the most dangerous way, but it was the most direct. To take the shortest route was his only thought. Shipwrecks will not wait; the sea is a pressing creditor; an hour's delay may be irreparable. His anxiety was to go quickly to the rescue of the machinery in danger.

One of his objects in leaving Guernsey was to avoid arousing attention. He set out like one escaping from justice, and seemed anxious to hide from human eyes. He shunned the eastern coast, as if he did not care to pass in sight of St. Sampson and St. Peter's Port, and glided silently along the opposite coast, which is comparatively uninhabited. Among the breakers, it was necessary to ply the oars; but Gilliatt managed them on scientific principles; taking the water quietly, and dropping it with exact regularity, he was able to move in the darkness with as little noise and as rapidly as possible. So stealthy were his movements, that he might have seemed to be bent upon some evil errand.

In truth, though embarking desperately in an enterprise which might well be called impossible, and risking his life with nearly every chance against him, he feared nothing but the possibility of some rival in the work which he had set before him.

As the day began to break, those unknown eyes which look down upon the world from boundless space might have beheld, at one of the most dangerous and solitary spots at sea, two objects, the distance between which was gradually decreasing, as the one was approaching the other. One, which was almost imperceptible in the wide movement of the waters, was a sailing boat. In this was a man. It was the sloop. The other, black, motionless, colossal, rose above the waves, a singular form. Two tall pillars issuing from the sea bore aloft a sort of cross-beam which was like a bridge between them. This bridge, so singular in shape that it was impossible to imagine what it was from a distance, touched each of the two pillars. It resembled a vast portal. Of what use could such an erection be in that open plain, the sea, which stretched around it far and wide? It might have been imagined to be a Titanic Cromlech, planted there in mid-ocean by an imperious whim, and built up by hands accustomed to proportion their labours to the great deep. Its wild outline stood well-defined against the clear sky.

The morning light was growing stronger in the east; the whiteness in the horizon deepened the shadow on the sea. In the opposite sky the moon was sinking.

The two perpendicular forms were the Douvres. The huge mass held fast between them, like an architrave between two pillars, was the wreck of the Durande.

The rock, thus holding fast and exhibiting its prey, was terrible to behold. Inanimate things look sometimes as if endowed with a dark and hostile spirit towards man. There was a menace in the attitude of the rocks. They seemed to be biding their time.

Nothing could be more suggestive of haughtiness and arrogance than their whole appearance: the conquered vessel; the triumphant abyss. The two rocks, still streaming with the tempest of the day before, were like two wrestlers sweating from a recent struggle. The wind had sunk; the sea rippled gently; here and there the presence of breakers might be detected in the graceful streaks of foam upon the surface of the waters. A sound came from the sea like the murmuring of bees. All around was level except the Douvres, rising straight, like two black columns. Up to a certain height they were completely bearded with seaweed; above this their steep haunches glittered at points like polished armour. They seemed ready to commence the strife again. The beholder felt that they were rooted deep in mountains whose summits were beneath the sea. Their aspect was full of a sort of tragic power.

Ordinarily the sea conceals her crimes. She delights in privacy. Her unfathomable deeps keep silence. She wraps herself in a mystery which rarely consents to give up its secrets. We know her savage nature, but who can tell the extent of her dark deeds? She is at once open and secret; she hides away carefully, and cares not to divulge her actions; wrecks a vessel, and, covering it with the waves, engulfs it deep, as if conscious of her guilt. Among her crimes is hypocrisy. She slays and steals, conceals her booty, puts on an air of unconsciousness, and smiles.

Here, however, was nothing of the kind. The Douvres, lifting above the level of the waters the shattered hull of the Durande, had an air of triumph. The imagination might have pictured them as two monstrous arms, reaching upwards from the gulf, and exhibiting to the tempest the lifeless body of the ship. Their aspect was like that of an assassin boasting of his evil deeds.

The solemnity of the hour contributed something to the impression of the scene. There is a mysterious grandeur in the dawn, as of the border-land between the region of consciousness and the world of our dreams. There is something spectral in that confused transition time. The immense form of the two Douvres, like a capital letter H, the Durande forming its cross stroke, appeared against the horizon in all their twilight majesty.

Gilliatt was attired in his seaman’s clothing: a Guernsey shirt, woollen stockings, thick shoes, a homespun jacket, trousers of thick stuff, with pockets, and a cap upon his head of red worsted, of a kind then much in use among sailors, and known in the last century as a galérienne.

He recognised the rocks, and steered towards them.

The situation of the Durande was exactly the contrary of that of a vessel gone to the bottom: it was a vessel suspended in the air.

No problem more strange was ever presented to a salvor.

It was broad daylight when Gilliatt arrived in the waters about the rock.

As we have said, there was but little sea. The slight agitation of the water was due almost entirely to its confinement among the rocks. Every passage, small or large, is subject to this chopping movement. The inside of a channel is always more or less white with foam. Gilliatt did not approach the Douvres without caution.

He cast the sounding lead several times.

He had a cargo to disembark.

Accustomed to long absences, he had at home a number of necessaries always ready. He had brought a sack of biscuit, another of rye-meal, a basket of salt fish and smoked beef, a large can of fresh water; a Norwegian chest painted with flowers, containing several coarse woollen shirts, his tarpaulin and his waterproof overalls, and a sheepskin which he was accustomed to throw at night over his clothes. On leaving the Bû de la Rue he had put all these things hastily into the barge, with the addition of a large loaf. In his hurry he had brought no other tools but his huge forge-hammer, his chopper and hatchet, and a knotted rope. Furnished with a grappling-iron and with a ladder of that sort, the steepest rocks become accessible, and a good sailor will find it possible to scale the rudest escarpment. In the island of Sark the visitor may see what the fishermen of the Havre Gosselin can accomplish with a knotted cord.

His nets and lines and all his fishing apparatus were in the barge. He had placed them there mechanically and by habit; for he intended, if his enterprise continued, to sojourn for some time in an archipelago of rocks and breakers, where fishing nets and tackle are of little use.

At the moment when Gilliatt was skirting the great rock the sea was retiring; a circumstance favourable to his purpose. The departing tide laid bare, at the foot of the smaller Douvre, one or two table-rocks, horizontal, or only slightly inclined, and bearing a fanciful resemblance to boards supported by crows. These table-rocks, sometimes narrow, sometimes broad, standing at unequal distances along the side of the great perpendicular column, were continued in the form of a thin cornice up to a spot just beneath the Durande, the hull of which stood swelling out between the two rocks. The wreck was held fast there as in a vice.

This series of platforms was convenient for approaching and surveying the position. It was convenient also for disembarking the contents of the barge provisionally; but it was necessary to hasten, for it was only above water for a few hours. With the rising tide the table-rocks would be again beneath the foam.

It was before these table-rocks, some level, some slanting, that Gilliatt pushed in and brought the barge to a stand. A thick mass of wet and slippery sea-wrack covered them, rendered more slippery here and there by their inclined surfaces.

Gilliatt pulled off his shoes and sprang bare-footed on to the slimy weeds, and made fast the barge to a point of rock.

Then he advanced as far as he could along the granite cornice, reached the rock immediately beneath the wreck, looked up, and examined it.

The Durande had been caught suspended, and, as it were, fitted in between the two rocks, at about twenty feet above the water. It must have been a heavy sea which had cast her there.

Such effects from furious seas have nothing surprising for those who are familiar with the ocean. To cite one example only: — On the 25th January 1840, in the Gulf of Stora, a tempest struck with its expiring force a brig, and casting it almost intact completely over the broken wreck of the corvette La Marne, fixed it immovable, bowsprit first, in a gap between the cliffs.

The Douvres, however, held only a part of the Durande.

The vessel snatched from the waves had been, as it were, uprooted from the waters by the hurricane. A whirlwind had wrenched it against the counteracting force of the rolling waves, and the vessel thus caught in contrary directions by the two claws of the tempest had snapped like a lath. The after-part with the engine and the paddles, lifted out of the foam and driven by all the fury of the cyclone into the defile of the Douvres, had plunged in up to her midship beam, and remained there. The blow had been well directed. To drive it in this fashion between the two rocks, the storm had struck it as with an enormous hammer. The forecastle carried away and rolled down by the sea, had gone to fragments among the breakers.

The hold, broken in, had scattered out the bodies of the drowned cattle upon the sea.

A large portion of the forward side and bulwarks still hung to the riders by the larboard paddle-box, and by some shattered braces easy to strike off with the blow of a hatchet.

Here and there, among beams, planks, rags of canvas, pieces of chains, and other remains of wreck were seen lying about among the rugged fragments of shattered rock.

Gilliatt surveyed the Durande attentively. The keel formed a roofing over his head.

A serene sky stretched far and wide over the waters, scarcely wrinkled with a passing breath. The sun rose gloriously in the midst of the vast azure circle.

From time to time a drop of water was detached from the wreck and fell into the sea.

II

A CATALOGUE OF DISASTERS

The Douvres differed in shape as well as in height.

Upon the Little Douvre, which was curved and pointed, long veins of reddish-coloured rock, of a comparatively soft kind, could be seen branching out and dividing the interior of the granite. At the edges of these red dykes were fractures, favourable to climbing. One of these fractures, situated a little above the wreck, had been so laboriously worn and scooped out by the splashing of the waves, that it had become a sort of niche, in which it would have been quite possible to place a statue. The granite of the Little Douvre was rounded at the surface, and, to the feel at least, soft like touchstone; but this feeling detracted nothing from its durability. The Little Douvre terminated in a point like a horn. The Great Douvre, polished, smooth, glossy, perpendicular, and looking as if cut out by the builder's square, was in one piece, and seemed made of black ivory. Not a hole, not a break in its smooth surface. The escarpment looked inhospitable. A convict could not have used it for escape, nor a bird for a place for its nest. On the summit there was a horizontal surface as upon "The Man Rock;" but the summit of the Great Douvre was inaccessible.

It was possible to scale the Little Douvre, but not to remain on the summit; it would have been possible to rest on the summit of the Great Douvre, but impossible to scale it.

Gilliatt, having rapidly surveyed the situation of affairs, returned to the barge, landed its contents upon the largest of the horizontal cornice rocks, made of the whole compact mass a sort of bale, which he rolled up in tarpaulin, fitted a sling rope to it with a hoisting block, pushed the package into a corner of the rocks where the waves could not reach it, and then clutching the Little Douvre with his hands, and holding on with his naked feet, he clambered from projection to projection, and from niche to niche, until he found himself level with the wrecked vessel high up in the air.

Having reached the height of the paddles, he sprang upon the poop.

The interior of the wreck presented a mournful aspect.

Traces of a great struggle were everywhere visible. There were plainly to be seen the frightful ravages of the sea and wind. The action of the tempest resembles the violence of a band of pirates. Nothing is more like the victim of a criminal outrage than a wrecked ship violated and stripped by those terrible accomplices, the storm-cloud, the thunder, the rain, the squall, the waves, and the breakers.

Standing upon the dismantled deck, it was natural to dream of the presence of something like a furious stamping of the spirits of the storm. Everywhere around were the marks of their rage. The strange contortions of certain portions of the ironwork bore testimony to the terrific force of the winds. The between-decks were like the cell of a lunatic, in which everything has been broken.

No wild beast can compare with the sea for mangling its prey. The waves are full of talons. The north wind bites, the billows devour, the waves are like hungry jaws. The ocean strikes like a lion with its heavy paw, seizing and dismembering at the same moment.

The ruin conspicuous in the Durande presented the peculiarity of being detailed and minute. It was a sort of horrible stripping and plucking. Much of it seemed done with design. The beholder was tempted to exclaim, “What wanton mischief!” The ripping of the planking was edged here and there artistically. This peculiarity is common with the ravages of the cyclone. To chip and tear away is the caprice of the great devastator. Its ways are like those of the professional torturer. The disasters which it causes wear a look of ingenious punishments. One might fancy it actuated by the worst passions of man. It refines in cruelty like a savage. While it is exterminating it dissects bone by bone. It torments its victim, avenges itself, and takes delight in its work. It even appears to descend to petty acts of malice.

Cyclones are rare in our latitudes, and are, for that reason, the more dangerous, being generally unexpected. A rock in the path of a heavy wind may become the pivot of a storm. It is probable that the squall had thus rotated upon the point of the Douvres, and had turned suddenly into a waterspout on meeting the shock of the rocks, a fact which explained the casting of the vessel so high among them. When the cyclone blows, a vessel is of no more weight in the wind than a stone in a sling.

The damage received by the Durande was like the wound of a man cut in twain. It was a divided trunk from which issued a mass of débris like the entrails of a body. Various kinds of cordage hung floating and trembling, chains swung chattering; the fibres and nerves of the vessel were there naked and exposed. What was not smashed was disjointed.

Fragments of the sheeting resembled currycombs bristling with nails; everything bore the appearance of ruin; a handspike had become nothing but a piece of iron; a sounding-lead, nothing but a lump of metal; a dead-eye had become a mere piece of wood; a halliard, an end of rope; a strand of cord, a tangled skein; a bolt-rope, a thread in the hem of a sail. All around was the lamentable work of demolition. Nothing remained that was not unhooked, unnailed, cracked, wasted, warped, pierced with holes, destroyed: nothing hung together in the dreadful mass, but all was torn, dislocated, broken. There was that air of drift which characterises the scene of all struggles — from the melées of men, which are called battles, to the melées of the elements, to which we give the name of chaos. Everything was sinking and dropping away; a rolling mass of planks, panelling, ironwork, cables, and beams had been arrested just at the great fracture of the hull, whence the least additional shock must have precipitated them into the sea. What remained of her powerful frame, once so triumphant, was cracked here and there, showing through large apertures the dismal gloom within.

The foam from below spat its flakes contemptuously upon this broken and forlorn outcast of the sea.

SOUND; BUT NOT SAFE

Gilliatt did not expect to find only a portion of the ship existing. Nothing in the description, in other respects so precise, of the captain of the Shealtiel had led him to anticipate this division of the vessel in the centre. It was probable that the “diabolical crash” heard by the captain of the Shealtiel marked the moment when this destruction had taken place under the blows of a tremendous sea. The captain had, doubtless, worn ship just before this last heavy squall; and what he had taken for a great sea was probably a waterspout. Later, when he drew nearer to observe the wreck, he had only been able to see the stern of the vessel — the remainder, that is to say, the large opening where the fore-part had given way, having been concealed from him among the masses of rock.

With that exception, the information given by the captain of the Shealtiel was strictly correct. The hull was useless, but the engine remained intact.

Such chances are common in the history of shipwreck. The logic of disaster at sea is beyond the grasp of human science.

The masts having snapped short, had fallen over the side; the chimney was not even bent. The great iron plating which supported the machinery had kept it together, and in one piece. The planks of the paddle-boxes were disjointed, like the leaves of wooden sunblinds; but through their apertures the paddles themselves could be seen in good condition. A few of their floats only were missing.

Besides the machinery, the great stern capstan had resisted the destruction. Its chain was there, and, thanks to its firm fixture in a frame of joists, might still be of service, unless the strain of the voyal should break away the planking. The flooring of the deck bent at almost every point, and was tottering throughout.

On the other hand, the trunk of the hull, fixed between the Douvres, held together, as we have already said, and it appeared strong.

There was something like derision in this preservation of the machinery; something which added to the irony of the misfortune. The sombre malice of the unseen powers of mischief displays itself sometimes in such bitter mockeries. The machinery was saved, but its preservation did not make it any the less lost. The ocean seemed to have kept it only to demolish it at leisure. It was like the playing of the cat with her prey.

Its fate was to suffer there and to be dismembered day by day. It was to be the plaything of the savage amusements of the sea. It was slowly to dwindle, and, as it were, to melt away. For what could be done? That this vast block of mechanism and gear, at once massive and delicate, condemned to fixity by its weight, delivered up in that solitude to the destructive elements, exposed in the gripe of the rock to the action of the wind and wave, could, under the frown of that implacable spot, escape from slow destruction, seemed a madness even to imagine.

The Durande was the captive of the Douvres.

How could she be extricated from that position?

How could she be delivered from her bondage?

The escape of a man is difficult; but what a problem was this — the escape of a vast and cumbrous machine.

IV

A PRELIMINARY SURVEY

Gilliatt was pressed on all sides by demands upon his labours. The most pressing, however, was to find a safe mooring for the barge; then a shelter for himself.

The Durande having settled down more on the larboard than on the starboard side, the right paddle-box was higher than the left.

Gilliatt ascended the paddle-box on the right. From that position, although the gut of rocks stretching in abrupt angles behind the Douvres had several elbows, he was able to study the ground-plan of the group.

This survey was the preliminary step of his operations.

The Douvres, as we have already described them, were like two high gable-ends, forming the narrow entrance to a straggling alley of small cliffs with perpendicular faces. It is not rare to find in primitive submarine formations these singular kinds of passages, which seem cut out with a hatchet.

This defile was extremely tortuous, and was never without water even in the low tides. A current, much agitated, traversed it at all times from end to end. The sharpness of its turnings was favourable or unfavourable, according to the nature of the prevailing wind; sometimes it broke the swell and caused it to fall; sometimes it exasperated it. This latter effect was the most frequent. An obstacle arouses the anger of the sea, and pushes it to excesses. The foam is the exaggeration of the waves.

The stormy winds in these narrow and tortuous passages between the rocks are subjected to a similar compression, and acquire the same malignant character. The tempest frets in its sudden imprisonment. Its bulk is still immense, but sharpened and contracted; and it strikes with the massiveness of a huge club and the keenness of an arrow. It pierces even while it strikes down. It is a hurricane contracted, like the draught through the crevice of a door.

The two chains of rocks, leaving between them this kind of street in the sea, formed stages at a lower level than the Douvres, gradually decreasing, until they sunk together at a certain distance beneath the waves.

There was another such gullet of less height than the gullet of the Douvres, but narrower still, and which formed the eastern entrance of the defile. It was evident that the double prolongation of the ridge of rocks continued the kind of street under the water as far as “The Man Rock,” which stood like a square citadel at the extremity of the group.

At low water, indeed, which was the time at which Gilliatt was observing them, the two rows of sunken rock showed their tips, some high and dry, and all visible and preserving their parallel without interruption.

“The Man” formed the boundary, and buttressed on the eastern side the entire mass of the group, which was protected on the opposite side by the two Douvres.

The whole, from a bird’s-eye view, appeared like a winding chaplet of rocks, having the Douvres at one extremity and “The Man” at the other.

The Douvres, taken together, were merely two gigantic shafts of granite protruding vertically and almost touching each other, and forming the crest of one of the mountainous ranges lying beneath the ocean. Those immense ridges are not only found rising out of the unfathomable deep. The surf and the squall had broken them up and divided them like the teeth of a saw. Only the tip of the ridge was visible; this was the group of rocks. The remainder, which the waves concealed, must have been enormous. The passage in which the storm had planted the Durande was the way between these two colossal shafts.

This passage, zigzag in form as the forked lightning, was of about the same width in all parts. The ocean had so fashioned it. Its eternal commotion produces sometimes those singular regularities. There is a sort of geometry in the action of the sea.

From one extremity to the other of the defile, the two parallel granite walls confronted each other at a distance which the midship frame of the Durande measured exactly. Between the two Douvres, the widening of the Little Douvre, curved and turned back as it was, had formed a space for the paddles. In any other part they must have been shattered to fragments.

The high double façade of rock within the passage was hideous to the sight. When, in the exploration of the desert of water which we call the ocean, we come upon the unknown world of the sea, all is uncouth and shapeless. So much as Gilliatt could see of the defile from the height of the wreck, was appalling. In the rocky gorges of the ocean we may often trace a strange permanent impersonation of shipwreck. The defile of the Douvres was one of these gorges, and its effect was exciting to the imagination. The oxydes of the rock showed on the escarpment here and there in red places, like marks of clotted blood; it resembled the splashes on the walls of an abattoir. Associations of the charnel-house haunted the place. The rough marine stones, diversely tinted — here by the decomposition of metallic amalgams mingling with the rock, there by the mould of dampness, manifested in places by purple scales, hideous green blotches, and ruddy splashes, awakened ideas of murder and extermination. It was like the unwashed walls of a chamber which had been the scene of an assassination; or it might have been imagined that men had been crushed to death there, leaving traces of their fate. The peaked rocks produced an indescribable impression of accumulated agonies. Certain spots appeared to be still dripping with the carnage; here the wall was wet, and it looked impossible to touch it without leaving the fingers bloody. The blight of massacre seemed everywhere. At the base of the double parallel escarpment, scattered along the water's edge, or just below the waves, or in the worn hollows of the rocks, were monstrous rounded masses of shingle, some scarlet, others black or purple, which bore a strange resemblance to internal organs of the body; they might have been taken for human lungs, or heart, or liver, scattered and putrefying in that dismal place. Giants might have been disembowelled there. From top to bottom of the granite ran long red lines, which might have been compared to oozings from a funeral bier.

Such aspects are frequent in sea caverns.

V

A WORD UPON THE SECRET CO-OPERATIONS OF THE ELEMENTS

Those who, by the disastrous chances of sea-voyages, happen to be condemned to a temporary habitation upon a rock in mid-ocean, find that the form of their inhospitable refuge is by no means a matter of indifference. There is the pyramidal-shaped rock, a single peak rising from the water; there is the circle rock somewhat resembling a round of great stones; and there is the corridor-rock. The latter is the most alarming of all. It is not only the ceaseless agony of the waves between its walls, or the tumult of the imprisoned sea; there are also certain obscure meteorological characteristics which appear to appertain to this parallelism of two marine rocks. The two straight sides seem a veritable electric battery.

The first result of the peculiar position of these corridor-rocks is an action upon the air and the water. The corridor-rock acts upon the waves and the wind mechanically by its form; galvanically, by the different magnetic action rendered possible by its vertical height, its masses in juxtaposition and contrary to each other.

This form of rock attracts to itself all the forces scattered in the winds, and exercises over the tempest a singular power of concentration.

Hence there is in the neighbourhood of these breakers a certain accentuation of storms.

It must be borne in mind that the wind is composite. The wind is believed to be simple; but it is by no means simple. Its power is not merely dynamic, it is chemical also; but this is not all, it is magnetic. Its effects are often inexplicable. The wind is as much electrical as aerial. Certain winds coincide with the aurores boreales. The wind blowing from the bank of the Aiguilles rolls the waves one hundred feet high; a fact observed with astonishment by Dumont-d’Urville. The corvette, he says, “knew not what to obey.”

In the south seas the waters will sometimes become inflated like an outbreak of immense tumours; and at such times the ocean becomes so terrible that the savages fly to escape the sight of it. The blasts in the north seas are different. They are mingled with sharp points of ice; and their gusts, unfit to breathe, will blow the sledges of the Esquimaux backwards in the snow. Other winds burn. The simoon of Africa is the typhoon of China and the samiel of India. Simoon, typhoon, and samiel, are believed to be the names of demons. They descend from the heights of the mountains. A storm vitrified the volcano of Toluca. This hot wind, a whirlwind of inky colour, rushing upon red clouds, is alluded to in the Vedas: "Behold the black god, who comes to steal the red cows." In all these facts we trace the presence of the electric mystery.

The wind indeed is full of it; so are the waves. The sea, too, is composite in its nature. Under its waves of water which we see, it has its waves of force which are invisible. Its constituents are innumerable. Of all the elements the ocean is the most indivisible and the most profound.

Endeavour to conceive this chaos so enormous that it dwarfs all other things to one level. It is the universal recipient, reservoir of germs of life, and mould of transformations. It amasses and then disperses, it accumulates and then sows, it devours and then creates. It receives all the waste and refuse waters of the earth, and converts them into treasure. It is solid in the iceberg, liquid in the wave, fluid in the estuary. Regarded as matter, it is a mass; regarded as a force, it is an abstraction. It equalises and unites all phenomena. It may be called the infinite in combination. By force and disturbance, it arrives at transparency. It dissolves all differences, and absorbs them into its own unity. Its elements are so numerous that it becomes identity. One of its drops is complete, and represents the whole. From the abundance of its tempests, it attains equilibrium. Plato beheld the mazy dances of the spheres. Strange fact, though not the less real, the ocean, in the vast terrestrial journey round the sun, becomes, with its flux and reflux, the balance of the globe.

In a phenomenon of the sea, all other phenomena are resumed. The sea is blown out of a waterspout as from a syphon; the storm observes the principle of the pump; the lightning issues from the sea as from the air. Aboard ships dull shocks are sometimes felt, and an odour of sulphur issues from the receptacles of chain cables. The ocean boils. "The devil has put the sea in his cauldron," said De Ruyter. In certain tempests, which characterise the equinoxes and the return to equilibrium of the prolific power of nature, vessels breasting the foam seem to give out a kind of fire, phosphoric lights chase each other along the rigging, so close sometimes to the sailors at their work that the latter stretch forth their hands and try to catch, as they fly, these birds of flame. After the great earthquake of Lisbon, a blast of hot air, as from a furnace, drove before it towards the city a wave sixty feet high. The oscillation of the ocean is closely related to the convulsions of the earth.

These immeasurable forces produce sometimes extraordinary inundations. At the end of the year 1864, one of the Maldive Islands, at a hundred leagues from the Malabar coast, actually foundered in the sea. It sunk to the bottom like a shipwrecked vessel. The fishermen who sailed from it in the morning, found nothing when they returned at night; scarcely could they distinguish their villages under the sea. On this occasion boats were the spectators of the wrecks of houses.

In Europe, where nature seems restrained by the presence of civilisation, such events are rare and are thought impossible. Nevertheless, Jersey and Guernsey originally formed part of Gaul, and at the moment while we are writing these lines, an equinoctial gale has demolished a great portion of the cliff of the Firth of Forth in Scotland.

Nowhere do these terrific forces appear more formidably conjoined than in the surprising strait known as the Lyse-Fiord. The Lyse-Fiord is the most terrible of all the gut rocks of the ocean. Their terrors are there complete. It is in the northern sea, near the inhospitable Gulf of Stavanger, and in the 59th degree of latitude. The water is black and heavy, and subject to intermitting storms. In this sea, and in the midst of this solitude, rises a great sombre street — a street for no human footsteps. None ever pass through there; no ship ever ventures in. It is a corridor ten leagues in length, between two rocky walls of three thousand feet in height. Such is the passage which presents an entrance to the sea. The defile has its elbows and angles like all these streets of the sea — never straight, having been formed by the irregular action of the water. In the Lyse-Fiord, the sea is almost always tranquil; the sky above is serene; the place terrible. Where is the wind? Not on high. Where is the thunder? Not in the heavens. The wind is under the sea; the lightnings within the rock. Now and then there is a convulsion of the water. At certain moments, when there is perhaps not a cloud in the sky, nearly half way up the perpendicular rock, at a thousand or fifteen hundred feet above the water, and rather on the southern than on the northern side, the rock suddenly thunders, lightnings dart forth, and then retire like those toys which lengthen out and spring back again in the hands of children. They contract and enlarge; strike the opposite cliff, re-enter the rock, issue forth again, recommence their play, multiply their heads and tips of flame, grow bristling with points, strike wherever they can, recommence again, and then are extinguished with a sinister abruptness. Flocks of birds fly wide in terror. Nothing is more mysterious than that artillery issuing out of the invisible. One cliff attacks the other, raining lightning blows from side to side. Their war concerns not man. It signals the ancient enmity of two rocks in the impassable gulf.

In the Lyse-Fiord, the wind whirls like the water in an estuary; the rock performs the function of the clouds; and the thunder breaks forth like volcanic fire. This strange defile is a voltaic pile; the plates of which are the double line of cliffs.

VI

A STABLE FOR THE HORSE

Gilliatt was sufficiently familiar with marine rocks to grapple in earnest with the Douvres. Before all, as we have just said, it was necessary to find a safe shelter for the barge.

The double row of reefs, which stretched in a sinuous form behind the Douvres, connected itself here and there with other rocks, and suggested the existence of blind passages and hollows opening out into the straggling way, and joining again to the principal defile like branches to a trunk.

The lower part of these rocks was covered with kelp, the upper part with lichens. The uniform level of the seaweed marked the line of the water at the height of the tide, and the limit of the sea in calm weather. The points which the water had not touched presented those silver and golden hues communicated to marine granite by the white and yellow lichen.

A crust of conoidical shells covered the rock at certain points, the dry rot of the granite.

At other points in the retreating angles, where fine sand had accumulated, ribbed on its surface rather by the wind than by the waves, appeared tufts of blue thistles.

In the indentations, sheltered from the winds, could be traced the little perforations made by the sea-urchin. This shelly mass of prickles, which moves about a living ball, by rolling on its spines, and the armour of which is composed of ten thousand pieces, artistically adjusted and welded together — the sea-urchin, which is popularly called, for some unknown reason, “Aristotle’s lantern,” wears away the granite with his five teeth, and lodges himself in the hole. It is in such holes that the samphire gatherers find them. They cut them in halves and eat them raw, like an oyster. Some steep their bread in the soft flesh. Hence its other name, “Sea-egg.”

The tips of the further reefs, left out of the water by the receding tide, extended close under the escarpment of “The Man” to a sort of creek, enclosed nearly on all sides by rocky walls. Here was evidently a possible harbourage. It had the form of a horse-shoe, and opened only on one side to the east wind, which is the least violent of all winds in that sea labyrinth.

The water was shut in there, and almost motionless. The shelter seemed comparatively safe. Gilliatt, moreover, had not much choice.

If he wished to take advantage of the low water, it was important to make haste.

The weather continued to be fine and calm. The insolent sea was for a while in a gentle mood.

Gilliatt descended, put on his shoes again, unmoored the cable, re-embarked, and pushed out into the water. He used the oars, coasting the side of the rock.

Having reached “The Man Rock,” he examined the entrance to the little creek.

A fixed, wavy line in the motionless sea, a sort of wrinkle, imperceptible to any eye but that of a sailor, marked the channel.

Gilliatt studied for a moment its lineament, almost indistinct under the water; then he held off a little in order to veer at ease, and steer well into channel; and suddenly with a stroke of the oars he entered the little bay.

He sounded.

The anchorage appeared to be excellent.

The sloop would be protected there against almost any of the contingencies of the season.

The most formidable reefs have quiet nooks of this sort. The ports which are thus found among the breakers are like the hospitality of the fierce Bedouin — friendly and sure.

Gilliatt placed the sloop as near as he could to “The Man,” but still far enough to escape grazing the rock; and he cast his two anchors.

That done, he crossed his arms, and reflected on his position.

The sloop was sheltered. Here was one problem solved. But another remained. Where could he now shelter himself?

He had the choice of two places: the sloop itself, with its corner of cabin, which was scarcely habitable, and the summit of “The Man Rock,” which was not difficult to scale.

From one or other of these refuges it was possible at low water, by jumping from rock to rock, to gain the passage between the Douvres where the Durande was fixed, almost without wetting the feet.

But low water lasts but a short while, and all the rest of the time he would be cut off either from his shelter or from the wreck by more than two hundred fathoms. Swimming among breakers is difficult at all times; if there is the least commotion in the sea it is impossible.

He was driven to give up the idea of shelter in the sloop or on “The Man.”

No resting-place was possible among the neighbouring rocks.

The summits of the lower ones disappeared twice a day beneath the rising tide.

The summits of the higher ones were constantly swept by the flakes of foam, and promised nothing but an inhospitable drenching.

No choice remained but the wreck itself.

Was it possible to seek refuge there?

Gilliatt hoped it might be.

VII

A CHAMBER FOR THE VOYAGER

Half-an-hour afterwards, Gilliatt having returned to the wreck, climbed to the deck, went below, and descended into the hold, completing the summary survey of his first visit.

By the help of the capstan he had raised to the deck of the Durande the package which he had made of the lading of the sloop. The capstan had worked well. Bars for turning it were not wanting. Gilliatt had only to take his choice among the heap of wreck.

He found among the fragments a chisel, dropped, no doubt, from the carpenter’s box, and which he added to his little stock of tools.

Besides this — for in poverty of appliances so complete everything counts for a little — he had his jack-knife in his pocket.

Gilliatt worked the whole day long on the wreck, clearing away, propping, arranging.

At nightfall he observed the following facts:

The entire wreck shook in the wind. The carcass trembled at every step he took. There was nothing stable or strong except the portion of the hull jammed between the rocks which contained the engine. There the beams were powerfully supported by the granite walls.

Fixing his home in the Durande would be imprudent. It would increase the weight; but far from adding to her burden, it was important to lighten it. To burden the wreck in any way was indeed the very contrary of what he wanted.

The mass of ruin required, in fact, the most careful management. It was like a sick man at the approach of dissolution. The wind would do sufficient to help it to its end.

It was, moreover, unfortunate enough to be compelled to work there. The amount of disturbance which the wreck would have to withstand would necessarily distress it, perhaps beyond its strength.

Besides, if any accident should happen in the night while Gilliatt was sleeping, he must necessarily perish with the vessel. No assistance was possible; all would be over. In order to help the shattered vessel, it was absolutely necessary to remain outside it.

How to be outside and yet near it, this was the problem.

The difficulty became more complicated as he considered it.

Where could he find a shelter under such conditions?

Gilliatt reflected.

There remained nothing but the two Douvres. They seemed hopeless enough.

From below, it was possible to distinguish upon the upper plateau of the Great Douvre a sort of protuberance.

High rocks with flattened summits, like the Great Douvre and “The Man,” are a sort of decapitated peaks. They abound among the mountains and in the ocean. Certain rocks, particularly those which are met with in the open sea, bear marks like half-felled trees. They have the appearance of having received blows from a hatchet. They have been subjected, in fact, to the blows of the gale, that indefatigable pioneer of the sea.

There are other still more profound causes of marine convulsions. Hence the innumerable bruises upon these primeval masses of granite. Some of these sea giants have their heads struck off.

Sometimes these heads, from some inexplicable cause, do not fall, but remain shattered on the summit of the mutilated trunk. This singularity is by no means rare. The Devil’s Rock, at Guernsey, and the Table, in the Valley of Anweiler, illustrate some of the most surprising features of this strange geological enigma.

Some such phenomena had probably fashioned the summit of the Great Douvre.

If the protuberance which could be observed on the plateau were not a natural irregularity in the stone, it must necessarily be some remaining fragment of the shattered summit.

Perhaps the fragment might contain some excavation — some hole into which a man could creep for cover. Gilliatt asked for no more.

But how could he reach the plateau? How could he scale that perpendicular wall, hard and polished as a pebble, half covered with the growth of glutinous confervæ, and having the slippery look of a soapy surface?

The ridge of the plateau was at least thirty feet above the deck of the Durande.

Gilliatt took out of his box of tools the knotted cord, hooked it to his belt by the grapnel, and set to work to scale the Little Douvre. The ascent became more difficult as he climbed. He had forgotten to take off his shoes, a fact which increased the difficulty. With great labour and straining, however, he reached the point. Safely arrived there, he raised himself and stood erect. There was scarcely room for his two feet. To make it his lodging would be difficult. A Stylite might have contented himself there; Gilliatt, more luxurious in his requirements, wanted something more commodious.

The Little Douvre, leaning towards the great one, looked from a distance as if it was saluting it, and the space between the Douvres, which was some score of feet below, was only eight or ten at the highest points.

From the spot to which he had climbed, Gilliatt saw more distinctly the rocky excrescence which partly covered the plateau of the Great Douvre.

This plateau rose three fathoms at least above his head.

A precipice separated him from it. The curved escarpment of the Little Douvre sloped away out of sight beneath him.

He detached the knotted rope from his belt, took a rapid glance at the dimensions of the rock, and slung the grapnel up to the plateau.

The grapnel scratched the rock, and slipped. The knotted rope with the hooks at its end fell down beneath his feet, swinging against the side of the little Douvre.

He renewed the attempt; slung the rope further, aiming at the granite protuberance, in which he could perceive crevices and scratches.

The cast was, this time, so neat and skilful, that the hooks caught.

He pulled from below. A portion of the rock broke away, and the knotted rope with its heavy iron came down once more, striking the escarpment beneath his feet.

He slung the grapnel a third time.

It did not fall.

He put a strain upon the rope; it resisted. The grapnel was firmly anchored.

The hooks had caught in some fracture of the plateau which he could not see.

It was necessary to trust his life to that unknown support.

He did not hesitate.

The matter was urgent. He was compelled to take the shortest route.

Moreover, to descend again to the deck of the Durande, in order to devise some other step, was impossible. A slip was probable, and a fall almost certain. It was easier to climb than to descend.

Gilliatt’s movements were decisive, as are those of all good sailors. He never wasted force. He always proportioned his efforts to the work in hand. Hence the prodigies of strength which he executed with ordinary muscles. His biceps were no more powerful than that of ordinary men; but his heart was firmer. He added, in fact, to strength which is physical, energy which belongs to the moral faculties.

The feat to be accomplished was appalling.

It was to cross the space between the two Douvres, hanging only by this slender line.

Oftentimes in the path of duty and devotedness, the figure of death rises before men to present these terrible questions:

Wilt thou do this? asks the shadow.

Gilliatt tested the cord again; the grappling-iron held firm.

Wrapping his left hand in his handkerchief, he grasped the knotted cord with his right hand, which he covered with his left; then stretching out one foot, and striking out sharply with the other against the rock, in order that the impetus might prevent the rope twisting, he precipitated himself from the height of the Little Douvre on to the escarpment of the great one.

The shock was severe.

There was a rebound.

His clenched fists struck the rocks in their turn; the handkerchief had loosened, and they were scratched; they had indeed narrowly escaped being crushed.

Gilliatt remained hanging there a moment dizzy.

He was sufficiently master of himself not to let go his hold of the cord.

A few moments passed in jerks and oscillations before he could catch the cord with his feet; but he succeeded at last.

Recovering himself, and holding the cord at last between his naked feet as with two hands, he gazed into the depth below.

He had no anxiety about the length of the cord, which had many a time served him for great heights. The cord, in fact, trailed upon the deck of the Durande.

Assured of being able to descend again, he began to climb hand over hand, and still clinging with his feet.

In a few moments he had gained the summit.

Never before had any creature without wings found a footing there. The plateau was covered in parts with the dung of birds. It was an irregular trapezium, a mass struck off from the colossal granitic prism of the Great Douvre. This block was hollowed in the centre like a basin — a work of the rain.

Gilliatt, in fact, had guessed correctly.

At the southern angle of the block, he found a mass of superimposed rocks, probably fragments of the fallen summit. These rocks, looking like a heap of giant paving-stones, would have left room for a wild beast, if one could have found its way there, to secrete himself between them. They supported themselves confusedly one against the other, leaving interstices like a heap of ruins. They formed neither grottoes nor caves, but the pile was full of holes like a sponge. One of these holes was large enough to admit a man.

This recess had a flooring of moss and a few tufts of grass. Gilliatt could fit himself in it as in a kind of sheath. The recess at its entrance was about two feet high. It contracted towards the bottom. Stone coffins sometimes have this form. The mass of rocks behind lying towards the south-west, the recess was sheltered from the showers, but was open to the cold north wind.

Gilliatt was satisfied with the place.

The two chief problems were solved; the sloop had a harbour, and he had found a shelter.

The chief merit of his cave was its accessibility from the wreck.

The grappling-iron of the knotted cord having fallen between two blocks, had become firmly hooked, but Gilliatt rendered it more difficult to give way by rolling a huge stone upon it.

He was now free to operate at leisure upon the Durande.

Henceforth he was at home.

The Great Douvre was his dwelling; the Durande was his workshop.

Nothing was more simple for him than going to and fro, ascending and descending.

He dropped down easily by the knotted cord on to the deck.

The day’s work was a good one, the enterprise had begun well; he was satisfied, and began to feel hungry.

He untied his basket of provisions, opened his knife, cut a slice of smoked beef, took a bite out of his brown loaf, drank a draught from his can of fresh water, and supped admirably.

To do well and eat well are two satisfactions. A full stomach resembles an easy conscience.

This supper was ended, and there was still before him a little more daylight. He took advantage of it to begin the lightening of the wreck — an urgent necessity.

He had passed part of the day in gathering up the fragments. He put on one side, in the strong compartment which contained the machine, all that might become of use to him, such as wood, iron, cordage, and canvas. What was useless he cast into the sea.

The cargo of the sloop hoisted on to the deck by the capstan, compact as he had made it, was an encumbrance. Gilliatt surveyed the species of niche, at a height within his reach, in the side of the Little Douvre. These natural closets, not shut in, it is true, are often seen in the rocks. It struck him that it was possible to trust some stores to this depôt, and he accordingly placed in the back of the recess his two boxes containing his tools and his clothing, and his two bags holding the rye-meal and the biscuit. In the front — a little too near the edge perhaps, but he had no other place — he rested his basket of provisions.

He had taken care to remove from the box of clothing his sheepskin, his loose coat with a hood, and his waterproof overalls.

To lessen the hold of the wind upon the knotted cord, he made the lower extremity fast to one of the riders of the Durande.

The Durande being much driven in, this rider was bent a good deal, and it held the end of the cord as firmly as a tight hand.

There was still the difficulty of the upper end of the cord. To control the lower part was well, but at the summit of the escarpment at the spot where the knotted cord met the ridge of the plateau, there was reason to fear that it would be fretted and worn away by the sharp angle of the rock.

Gilliatt searched in the heap of rubbish in reserve, and took from it some rags of sail-cloth, and from a bunch of old cables he pulled out some strands of rope-yarn with which he filled his pockets.

A sailor would have guessed that he intended to bind with these pieces of sail-cloth and ends of yarn the part of the knotted rope upon the edge of the rock, so as to preserve it from all friction — an operation which is called “keckling.”

Having provided himself with these things, he drew on his overalls over his legs, put on his waterproof coat over his jacket, drew its hood over his red cap, hung the sheepskin round his neck by the two legs, and clothed in this complete panoply, he grasped the cord, now firmly fixed to the side of the Great Douvre, and mounted to the assault of that sombre citadel in the sea.

In spite of his scratched hands, Gilliatt easily regained the summit.

The last pale tints of sunset were fading in the sky. It was night upon the sea below. A little light still lingered upon the height of the Douvre.

Gilliatt took advantage of this remains of daylight to bind the knotted rope. He wound it round again and again at the part which passed over the edge of the rock, with a bandage of several thicknesses of canvas strongly tied at every turn. The whole resembled in some degree the padding which actresses place upon their knees, to prepare them for the agonies and supplications of the fifth act.

This binding completely accomplished, Gilliatt rose from his stooping position.

For some moments, while he had been busied in his task, he had had a confused sense of a singular fluttering in the air.

It resembled, in the silence of the evening, the noise which an immense bat might make with the beating of its wings.

Gilliatt raised his eyes.

A great black circle was revolving over his head in the pale twilight sky.

Such circles are seen in pictures round the heads of saints. These, however, are golden on a dark ground, while the circle around Gilliatt was dark upon a pale ground. The effect was strange. It spread round the Great Douvre like the aureole of night.

The circle drew nearer, then retired; grew narrower, and then spread wide again.

It was an immense flight of gulls, seamews, and cormorants; a vast multitude of affrighted sea birds.

The Great Douvre was probably their lodging, and they were coming to rest for the night. Gilliatt had taken a chamber in their home. It was evident that their unexpected fellow-lodger disturbed them.

A man there was an object they had never beheld before.

Their wild flutter continued for some time.

They seemed to be waiting for the stranger to leave the place.

Gilliatt followed them dreamily with his eyes.

The flying multitude seemed at last to give up their design. The circle suddenly took a spiral form, and the cloud of sea birds came down upon “The Man Rock” at the extremity of the group, where they seemed to be conferring and deliberating.

Gilliatt, after settling down in his alcove of granite, and covering a stone for a pillow for his head, could hear the birds for a long time chattering one after the other, or croaking, as if in turns.

Then they were silent, and all were sleeping — the birds upon their rock, Gilliatt upon his.

VIII

IMPORTUNÆQUE VOLUCRES

Gilliatt slept well; but he was cold, and this awoke him from time to time. He had naturally placed his feet at the bottom, and his head at the entrance to his cave. He had not taken the precaution to remove from his couch a number of angular stones, which did not by any means conduce to sleep.

Now and then he half-opened his eyes.

At intervals he heard loud noises. It was the rising tide entering the caverns of the rocks with a sound like the report of a cannon.

All the circumstances of his position conspired to produce the effect of a vision. Hallucinations seemed to surround him. The vagueness of night increased this effect; and Gilliatt felt himself plunged into some region of unrealities. He asked himself if all were not a dream?

Then he dropped to sleep again; and this time, in a veritable dream, found himself at the Bû de la Rue, at the Bravées, at St. Sampson. He heard Déruchette singing; he was among realities. While he slept he seemed to wake and live; when he awoke again he appeared to be sleeping.

In truth, from this time forward he lived in a dream.

Towards the middle of the night a confused murmur filled the air. Gilliatt had a vague consciousness of it even in his sleep. It was perhaps a breeze arising.

Once, when awakened by a cold shiver, he opened his eyes a little wider than before. Clouds were moving in the zenith; the moon was flying through the sky, with one large star following closely in her footsteps.

Gilliatt’s mind was full of the incidents of his dreams. The wild outlines of things in the darkness were exaggerated by this confusion with the impressions of his sleeping hours.

At daybreak he was half-frozen; but he slept soundly.

The sudden daylight aroused him from a slumber which might have been dangerous. The alcove faced the rising sun.

Gilliatt yawned, stretched himself, and sprang out of his sleeping place.

His sleep had been so deep that he could not at first recall the circumstances of the night before.

By degrees the feeling of reality returned, and he began to think of breakfast.

The weather was calm; the sky cool and serene. The clouds were gone; the night wind had cleared the horizon, and the sun rose brightly. Another fine day was commencing. Gilliatt felt joyful.

He threw off his overcoat and his leggings; rolled them up in the sheepskin with the wool inside, fastened the roll with a length of rope-yarn, and pushed it into the cavern for a shelter in case of rain.

This done, he made his bed — an operation which consisted in removing the stones which had annoyed him in the night.

His bed made, he slid down the cord on to the deck of the Durande, and approached the niche where he had placed his basket of provisions. As it was very near the edge, the wind in the night had swept it down, and rolled it into the sea.

It was evident that it would not be easy to recover it. There was a spirit of mischief and malice in a wind which had sought out his basket in that position.

It was the commencement of hostilities. Gilliatt understood the token.

To those who live in a state of rude familiarity with the sea, it becomes natural to regard the wind as an individuality, and the rocks as sentient beings.

Nothing remained but the biscuit and the rye-meal, except the shell-fish, on which the shipwrecked sailor had supported a lingering existence upon "The Man Rock."

It was useless to think of subsisting by net or line fishing. Fish are naturally averse to the neighbourhood of rocks. The drag and bow net fishers would waste their labour among the breakers, the points of which would be destructive only to their nets.

Gilliatt breakfasted on a few limpets which he plucked with difficulty from the rocks. He narrowly escaped breaking his knife in the attempt.

While he was making his spare meal, he was sensible of a strange disturbance on the sea. He looked around.

It was a swarm of gulls and seamews which had just alighted upon some low rocks, and were beating their wings, tumbling over each other, screaming, and shrieking. All were swarming noisily upon the same point. This horde with beaks and talons were evidently pillaging something.

It was Gilliatt's basket.

Rolled down upon a sharp point by the wind, the basket had burst open. The birds had gathered round immediately. They were carrying off in their beaks all sorts of fragments of provisions. Gilliatt recognised from the distance his smoked beef and his salted fish.

It was their turn now to be aggressive. The birds had taken to reprisals. Gilliatt had robbed them of their lodging, they deprived him of his supper.

IX

THE ROCK, AND HOW GILLIATT USED IT

A week passed.

Although it was in the rainy season no rain fell, a fact for which Gilliatt felt thankful. But the work he had entered upon surpassed, in appearance at least, the power of human hand or skill. Success appeared so improbable that the attempt seemed like madness.

It is not until a task is fairly grappled with that its difficulties and perils become fully manifest. There is nothing like making a commencement for making evident how difficult it will be to come to the end. Every beginning is a struggle against resistance. The first step is an exorable undeceiver. A difficulty which we come to touch pricks like a thorn.

Gilliatt found himself immediately in the presence of obstacles.

In order to raise the engine of the Durande from the wreck in which it was three-fourths buried, with any chance of success — in order to accomplish a salvage in such a place and in such a season, it seemed almost necessary to be a legion of men. Gilliatt was alone; a complete apparatus of carpenters' and engineers' tools and implements were wanted. Gilliatt had a saw, a hatchet, a chisel, and a hammer. He wanted both a good workshop and a good shed; Gilliatt had not a roof to cover him. Provisions, too, were necessary, but he had not even bread.

Any one who could have seen Gilliatt working on the rock during all that first work might have been puzzled to determine the nature of his operations. He seemed to be no longer thinking either of the Durande or the two Douvres. He was busy only among the breakers: he seemed absorbed in saving the smaller parts of the shipwreck. He took advantage of every high tide to strip the reefs of everything which the shipwreck had distributed among them. He went from rock to rock, picking up whatever the sea had scattered — tatters of sail-cloth, pieces of iron, splinters of panels, shattered planking, broken yards — here a beam, there a chain, there a pulley.

At the same time he carefully surveyed all the recesses of the rocks. To his great disappointment none were habitable. He had suffered from the cold in the night, where he lodged between the stones on the summit of the rock, and he would gladly have found some better refuge.

Two of those recesses were somewhat extensive. Although the natural pavement of rock was almost everywhere oblique and uneven it was possible to stand upright, and even to walk within them. The wind and the rain wandered there at will, but the highest tides did not reach them. They were near the Little Douvre, and were approachable at any time. Gilliatt decided that one should serve him as a storehouse, the other as a forge.

With all the sail, rope-bands, and all the reef-earrings he could collect, he made packages of the fragments of wreck, tying up the wood and iron in bundles, and the canvas in parcels. He lashed all these together carefully. As the rising tide approached these packages, he began to drag them across the reefs to his storehouse. In the hollow of the rocks he had found a top rope, by means of which he had been able to haul even the large pieces of timber. In the same manner he dragged from the sea the numerous portions of chains which he found scattered among the breakers.

Gilliatt worked at these tasks with astonishing activity and tenacity. He accomplished whatever he attempted — nothing could withstand his ant-like perseverance.

At the end of the week he had gathered into this granite warehouse of marine stores, and ranged into order, all this miscellaneous and shapeless mass of salvage. There was a corner for the tacks of sails and a corner for sheets. Bow-lines were not mixed with halliards; parrels were arranged according to their number of holes. The coverings of rope-yarn, unwound from the broken anchorings, were tied in bunches; the dead-eyes without pulleys were separated from the tackle-blocks. Belaying-pins, bullseyes, preventer-shrouds, down-hauls, snatch-blocks, pendents, kevels, trusses, stoppers, sailbooms, if they were not completely damaged by the storm, occupied different compartments. All the cross-beams, timber-work, uprights, stanchions, mast-heads, binding-strakes, portlids, and clamps, were heaped up apart. Wherever it was possible, he had fixed the fragments of planks, from the vessel’s bottom, one in the other. There was no confusion between reef-points and nippers of the cable, nor of crow’s-feet with towlines; nor of pulleys of the small with pulleys of the large ropes; nor of fragments from the waist with fragments from the stern. A place had been reserved for a portion of the cat-harpings of the Durande, which had supported the shrouds of the topmast and the futtock-shrouds. Every portion had its place. The entire wreck was there classed and ticketed. It was a sort of chaos in a storehouse.

A stay-sail, fixed by huge stones, served, though torn and damaged, to protect what the rain might have injured.

Shattered as were the bows of the wreck, he had succeeded in saving the two cat-heads with their three pulley-blocks.

He had found the bowsprit too, and had had much trouble in unrolling its gammoning; it was very hard and tight, having been, according to custom, made by the help of the windlass, and in dry weather. Gilliatt, however, persevered until he had detached it, this thick rope promising to be very useful to him.

He had been equally successful in discovering the little anchor which had become fast in the hollow of a reef, where the receding tide had left it uncovered.

In what had been Tangrouille's cabin he had found a piece of chalk, which he preserved carefully. He reflected that he might have some marks to make.

A fire-bucket and several pails in pretty good condition completed this stock of working materials.

All that remained of the store of coal of the Durande he carried into the warehouse.

In a week this salvage of débris was finished; the rock was swept clean, and the Durande was lightened. Nothing remained now to burden the hull except the machinery.

The portion of the fore-side bulwarks which hung to it did not distress the hull. The mass hung without dragging, being partly sustained by a ledge of rock. It was, however, large and broad, and heavy to drag, and would have encumbered his warehouse too much. This bulwarking looked something like a boat-builder's stocks. Gilliatt left it where it was.

He had been profoundly thoughtful during all this labour. He had sought in vain for the figure-head — the "doll," as the Guernsey folks called it, of the Durande. It was one of the things which the waves had carried away for ever. Gilliatt would have given his hands to find it — if he had not had such peculiar need of them at that time.

At the entrance to the storehouse and outside were two heaps of refuse — a heap of iron good for forging, and a heap of wood good for burning.

Gilliatt was always at work at early dawn. Except his time of sleep, he did not take a moment of repose.

The wild sea birds, flying hither and thither, watched him at his work.

X

THE FORGE

The warehouse completed, Gilliatt constructed his forge.

The other recess which he had chosen had within it a species of passage like a gallery in a mine of pretty good depth. He had had at first an idea of making this his lodging, but the draught was so continuous and so persevering in this passage that he had been compelled to give it up. This current of air, incessantly renewed, first gave him the notion of the forge. Since it could not be his chamber, he was determined that this cabin should be his smithy. To bend obstacles to our purposes is a great step towards triumph. The wind was Gilliatt's enemy. He had set about making it his servant.

The proverb applied to certain kinds of men— "Fit for everything, good for nothing" — may also be applied to the hollows of rocks. They give no advantages gratuitously. On one side we find a hollow fashioned conveniently in the shape of a bath; but it allows the water to run away through a fissure. Here is a rocky chamber, but without a roof; here a bed of moss, but oozy with wet; here an arm-chair, but one of hard stone.

The forge which Gilliatt intended was roughly sketched out by nature; but nothing could be more troublesome than to reduce this rough sketch to manageable shape, to transform this cavern into a laboratory and smith's shop. With three or four large rocks, shaped like a funnel, and ending in a narrow fissure, chance had constructed there a species of vast ill-shapen blower, of very different power to those huge old forge bellows of fourteen feet long, which poured out at every breath ninety-eight thousand inches of air. This was quite a different sort of construction. The proportions of the hurricane cannot be definitely measured.

This excess of force was an embarrassment. The incessant draught was difficult to regulate.

The cavern had two inconveniences; the wind traversed it from end to end; so did the water.

This was not the water of the sea, but a continual little trickling stream, more like a spring than a torrent.

The foam, cast incessantly by the surf upon the rocks and sometimes more than a hundred feet in the air, had filled with sea water a natural cave situated among the high rocks overlooking the excavation. The overflowings of this reservoir caused, a little behind the escarpment, a fall of water of about an inch in breadth, and descending four or five fathoms. An occasional contribution from the rains also helped to fill the reservoir. From time to time a passing cloud dropped a shower into the rocky basin, always overflowing. The water was brackish, and unfit to drink, but clear. This rill of water fell in graceful drops from the extremities of the long marine grasses, as from the ends of a length of hair.

He was struck with the idea of making this water serve to regulate the draught in the cave. By the means of a funnel made of planks roughly and hastily put together to form two or three pipes, one of which was fitted with a valve, and of a large tub arranged as a lower reservoir, without checks or counterweight, and completed solely by air-tight stuffing above and air-holes below, Gilliatt, who, as we have already said, was handy at the forge and at the mechanic's bench, succeeded in constructing, instead of the forge-bellows, which he did not possess, an apparatus less perfect than what is known now-a-days by the name of a "cagniardelle," but less rude than what the people of the Pyrenees anciently called a "trompe."

He had some rye-meal, and he manufactured with it some paste. He had also some white rope, which picked out into tow. With this paste and tow, and some bits of wood, he stopped all the crevices of the rock, leaving only a little air passage made of a powder-flask which he had found aboard the Durande, and which had served for loading the signal gun. This powder-flask was directed horizontally to a large stone, which Gilliatt made the hearth of the forge. A stopper made of a piece of tow served to close it in case of need.

After this, he heaped up the wood and coal upon the hearth, struck his steel against the bare rock, caught a spark upon a handful of loose tow, and having ignited it, soon lighted his forge fire.

He tried the blower: it worked well.

Gilliatt felt the pride of a Cyclops: he was the master of air, water, and fire. Master of the air; for he had given a kind of lungs to the wind, and changed the rude draught into a useful blower. Master of water, for he had converted the little cascade into a "trompe." Master of fire, for out of this moist rock he had struck a flame.

The cave being almost everywhere open to the sky, the smoke issued freely, blackening the curved escarpment. The rocks which seemed destined for ever to receive only the white foam, became now familiar with the blackening smoke.

Gilliatt selected for an anvil a large smooth round stone, of about the required shape and dimensions. It formed a base for the blows of his hammer; but one that might fly and was very dangerous. One of the extremities of this block, rounded and ending in a point, might, for want of anything better, serve instead of a conoid bicorn; but the other kind of bicorn of the pyramidal form was wanting. It was the ancient stone anvil of the Troglodytes. The surface, polished by the waves, had almost the firmness of steel.

He regretted not having brought his anvil. As he did not know that the Durande had been broken in two by the tempest, he had hoped to find the carpenter's chest and all his tools generally kept in the forehold. But it was precisely the fore-part of the vessel which had been carried away.

These two excavations which he had found in the rock were contiguous. The warehouse and the forge communicated with each other.

Every evening, when his work was ended, he supped on a little biscuit, moistened in water, a sea-urchin or a crab, or a few châtaignes de mer, the only food to be found among those rocks; and shivering like his knotted cord, mounted again to sleep in his cell upon the Great Douvre.

The very materialism of his daily occupation increased the kind of abstraction in which he lived. To be steeped too deeply in realities is in itself a cause of visionary moods. His bodily labour, with its infinite variety of details, detracted nothing from the sensation of stupor which arose from the strangeness of his position and his work. Ordinary bodily fatigue is a thread which binds man to the earth; but the very peculiarity of the enterprise he was engaged in kept him in a sort of ideal twilight region. There were times when he seemed to be striking blows with his hammer in the clouds. At other moments his tools appeared to him like arms. He had a singular feeling, as if he was repressing or providing against some latent danger of attack. Untwisting ropes, unravelling threads of yarn in a sail, or propping up a couple of beams, appeared to him at such times like fashioning engines of war. The thousand minute pains which he took about his salvage operations produced at last in his mind the effect of precautions against aggressions little concealed, and easy to anticipate. He did not know the words which express the ideas, but he perceived them. His instincts became less and less those of the worker; his habits more and more those of the savage man.

His business there was to subdue and direct the powers of nature. He had an indistinct perception of it. A strange enlargement of his ideas!

Around him, far as eye could reach, was the vast prospect of endless labour wasted and lost. Nothing is more disturbing to the mind than the contemplation of the diffusion of forces at work in the unfathomable and illimitable space of the ocean. The mind tends naturally to seek the object of these forces. The unceasing movement in space, the unwearying sea, the clouds that seem ever hurrying somewhere, the vast mysterious prodigality of effort, all this is a problem. Whither does this perpetual movement tend? What do these winds construct? What do these giant blows build up? These howlings, shocks, and sobbings of the storm, what do they end in? and what is the business of this tumult? The ebb and flow of these questionings is eternal, as the flux and reflux of the sea itself. Gilliatt could answer for himself; his work he knew, but the agitation which surrounded him far and wide at all times perplexed him confusedly with its eternal questionings. Unknown to himself, mechanically, by the mere pressure of external things, and without any other effect than a strange, unconscious bewilderment, Gilliatt, in this dreamy mood, blended his own toil somehow with the prodigious wasted labour of the sea-waves. How, indeed, in that position, could he escape the influence of that mystery of the dread, laborious ocean? how do other than meditate, so far as meditation was possible, upon the vacillation of the waves, the perseverance of the foam, the imperceptible wearing down of rocks, the furious beatings of the four winds? How terrible that perpetual recommencement, that ocean bed, those Danaïdes-like clouds, all that travail and weariness for no end!

For no end? Not so! But for what? O Thou Infinite Unknown, Thou only knowest!

XI

DISCOVERY

A rock near the coast is sometimes visited by men; a rock in mid-ocean never. What object could any one have there? No supplies can be drawn thence; no fruit-trees are there, no pasturage, no beasts, no springs of water fitted for man’s use. It stands aloft, a rock with its steep sides and summits above water, and its sharp points below. Nothing is to be found there but inevitable shipwreck.

This kind of rocks, which in the old sea dialect were called Isolés, are, as we have said, strange places. The sea is alone there; she works her own will. No token of terrestrial life disturbs her. Man is a terror to the sea; she is shy of his approach, and hides from him her deeds. But she is bolder among the lone sea rocks. The everlasting soliloquy of the waves is not troubled there. She labours at the rock, repairs its damage, sharpens its peaks, makes them rugged or renews them. She pierces the granite, wears down the soft stone, and denudes the hard; she rummages, dismembers, bores, perforates, and grooves; she fills the rock with cells, and makes it sponge-like, hollows out the inside, or sculptures it without. In that secret mountain which is hers, she makes to herself caves, sanctuaries, palaces. She has her splendid and monstrous vegetation, composed of floating plants which bite, and of monsters which take root; and she hides away all this terrible magnificence in the twilight of her deeps. Among the isolated rocks no eye watches over her; no spy embarrasses her movements. It is there that she develops at liberty her mysterious side, which is inaccessible to man. Here she keeps all strange secretions of life. Here that the unknown wonders of the sea are assembled.

Promontories, forelands, capes, headlands, breakers, and shoals are veritable constructions. The geological changes of the earth are trifling compared with the vast operations of the ocean. These breakers, these habitations in the sea, these pyramids, and spouts of the foam are the practicers of a mysterious art which the author of this book has somewhere called “the Art of Nature.” Their style is known by its vastness. The effects of chance seem here design. Its works are multiform. They abound in the mazy entanglement of the rock-coral groves, the sublimity of the cathedral, the extravagance of the pagoda, the amplitude of the mountain, the delicacy of the jeweller’s work, the horror of the sepulchre. They are filled with cells like the wasps’ nest, with dens like menageries, with subterranean passages like the haunts of moles, with dungeons like Bastiles, with ambuscades like a camp. They have their doors, but they are barricaded; their columns, but they are shattered; their towers, but they are tottering; their bridges, but they are broken. Their compartments are unaccommodating; these are fitted for the birds only, those only for fish. They are impassable. Their architectural style is variable and inconsistent; it regards or disregards at will the laws of equilibrium, breaks off, stops short, begins in the form of an archivolt, and ends in an architrave, block on block. Enceladus is the mason. A wondrous science of dynamics exhibits here its problems ready solved. Fearful overhanging blocks threaten, but fall not: the human mind cannot guess what power supports their bewildering masses. Blind entrances, gaps, and ponderous suspensions multiply and vary infinitely. The laws which regulate this Babel baffle human induction. The great unknown architect plans nothing, but succeeds in all. Rocks massed together in confusion form a monstrous monument, defy reason, yet maintain equilibrium. Here is something more than strength; it is eternity. But order is wanting. The wild tumult of the waves seems to have passed into the wilderness of stone. It is like a tempest petrified and fixed for ever. Nothing is more impressive than that wild architecture; always standing, yet always seeming to fall; in which everything appears to give support, and yet to withdraw it. A struggle between opposing lines has resulted in the construction of an edifice, filled with traces of the efforts of those old antagonists, the ocean and the storm.

This architecture has its terrible masterpieces, of which the Douvres rock was one.

The sea had fashioned and perfected it with a sinister solicitude. The snarling waters licked it into shape. It was hideous, treacherous, dark, full of hollows.

It had a complete system of submarine caverns ramifying and losing themselves in unfathomed depths. Some of the orifices of this labyrinth of passages were left exposed by the low tides. A man might enter there, but at his risk and peril.

Gilliatt determined to explore all these grottoes, for the purpose of his salvage labour. There was not one which was not repulsive. Everywhere about the caverns that strange aspect of an abattoir, those singular traces of slaughter, appeared again in all the exaggeration of the ocean. No one who has not seen in excavations of this kind, upon the walls of everlasting granite, these hideous natural frescoes, can form a notion of their singularity.

These pitiless caverns, too, were false and sly. Woe betide him who would loiter there. The rising tide filled them to their roofs.

Rock limpets and edible mosses abounded among them.

They were obstructed by quantities of shingle, heaped together in their recesses. Some of their huge smooth stones weighed more than a ton. They were of every proportion, and of every hue; but the greater part were blood coloured. Some, covered with a hairy and glutinous seaweed, seemed like large green moles boring a way into the rock.

Several of the caverns terminated abruptly in the form of a demi-cupola. Others, main arteries of a mysterious circulation, lengthened out in the rock in dark and tortuous fissures. They were the alleys of the submarine city; but they gradually contracted from their entrances, and at length left no way for a man to pass. Peering in by the help of a lighted torch, he could see nothing but dark hollows dripping with moisture.

One day, Gilliatt, exploring, ventured into one of these fissures. The state of the tide favoured the attempt. It was a beautiful day of calm and sunshine. There was no fear of any accident from the sea to increase the danger.

Two necessities, as we have said, compelled him to undertake these explorations. He had to gather fragments of wreck and other things to aid him in his labour, and to search for crabs and crayfish for his food. Shell-fish had begun to fail him on the rocks.

The fissure was narrow, and the passage difficult. Gilliatt could see daylight beyond. He made an effort, contorted himself as much as he could, and penetrated into the cave as far as he was able.

He had reached, without suspecting it, the interior of the rock, upon the point of which Clubin had steered the Durande. Though abrupt and almost inaccessible without, it was hollowed within. It was full of galleries, pits, and chambers, like the tomb of an Egyptian king. This network of caverns was one of the most complicated of all that labyrinth, a labour of the water, the undermining of the restless sea. The branches of the subterranean maze probably communicated with the sea without by more than one issue, some gaping at the level of the waves, the others profound and invisible. It was near here, but Gilliatt knew it not, that Clubin had dived into the sea.

In this crocodile cave — where crocodiles, it is true, were not among the dangers — Gilliatt wound about, clambered, struck his head occasionally, bent low and rose again, lost his footing and regained it many times, advancing laboriously. By degrees the gallery widened; a glimmer of daylight appeared, and he found himself suddenly at the entrance to a cavern of a singular kind.

XII

THE INTERIOR OF AN EDIFICE UNDER THE SEA

The gleam of daylight was fortunate.

One step further, and Gilliatt must have fallen into a pool, perhaps without bottom. The waters of these cavern pools are so cold and paralysing as to prove fatal to the strongest swimmers.

There is, moreover, no means of remounting or of hanging on to any part of their steep walls.

He stopped short. The crevice from which he had just issued ended in a narrow and slippery projection, a species of corbel in the peaked wall. He leaned against the side and surveyed it.

He was in a large cave. Over his head was a roofing not unlike the inside of a vast skull, which might have been imagined to have been recently dissected. The dripping ribs of the striated indentations of the roof seemed to imitate the branching fibres and jagged sutures of the bony cranium. A stony ceiling and a watery floor. The rippled waters between the four walls of the cave were like wavy paving tiles. The grotto was shut in on all sides. Not a window, not even an air-hole visible. No breach in the wall, no crack in the roof. The light came from below and through the water, a strange, sombre light.

Gilliatt, the pupils of whose eyes had contracted during his explorations of the dusky corridor, could distinguish everything about him in the pale glimmer.

He was familiar, from having often visited them, with the caves of Plémont in Jersey, the Creux-Maillé at Guernsey, the Boutiques at Sark; but none of these marvellous caverns could compare with the subterranean and submarine chamber into which he had made his way.

Under the water at his feet he could see a sort of drowned arch. This arch, a natural ogive, fashioned by the waves, was glittering between its two dark and profound supports. It was by this submerged porch that the daylight entered into the cavern from the open sea. A strange light shooting upward from a gulf.

The glimmer spread out beneath the waters like a large fan, and was reflected on the rocks. Its direct rays, divided into long, broad shafts, appeared in strong relief against the darkness below, and becoming brighter or more dull from one rock to another, looked as if seen here and there through plates of glass. There was light in that cave it is true; but it was the light that was unearthly. The beholder might have dreamed that he had descended in some other planet. The glimmer was an enigma, like the glaucous light from the eye-pupil of a Sphinx. The whole cave represented the interior of a death’s-head of enormous proportions, and of a strange splendour. The vault was the hollow of the brain, the arch the mouth; the sockets of the eyes were wanting. The cavern, alternately swallowing and rendering up the flux and reflux through its mouth wide opened to the full noonday without, seemed to drink in the light and vomit forth bitterness; a type of some beings intelligent and evil. The light, in traversing this inlet through the vitreous medium of the sea-water, became green, like a ray of starlight from Aldebaran. The water, filled with the moist light, appeared like a liquid emerald. A tint of aqua-marina of marvellous delicacy spread a soft hue throughout the cavern. The roof, with its cerebral lobes, and its rampant ramifications, like the fibres of nerves, gave out a tender reflection of chrysoprase. The ripples reflected on the roof were falling in order and dissolving again incessantly, and enlarging and contracting their glittering scales in a mysterious and mazy dance. They gave the beholder an impression of something weird and spectral: he wondered what prey secured, or what expectation about to be realised, moved with a joyous thrill this magnificent network of living fire. From the projections of the vault, and the angles of the rock, hung lengths of delicate fibrous plants, bathing their roots probably through the granite in some upper pool of water, and distilling from their silky ends one after the other, a drop of water like a pearl. These drops fell in the water now and then with a gentle splash. The effect of the scene was singular. Nothing more beautiful could be imagined; nothing more mournful could anywhere be found.

It was a wondrous palace, in which death sat smiling and content.

XIII

WHAT WAS SEEN THERE; AND WHAT PERCEIVED DIMLY

A place of shade, which yet was dazzling to the eyes — such was this surprising cavern.

The beating of the sea made itself felt throughout the cavern. The oscillation without raised and depressed the level of the waters within, with the regularity of respiration. A mysterious spirit seemed to fill this great organism, as it swelled and subsided in silence.

The water had a magical transparency, and Gilliatt distinguished at various depths submerged recesses, and surfaces of jutting rocks ever of a deeper and a deeper green. Certain dark hollows, too, were there, probably too deep for soundings.

On each side of the submarine porch, rude elliptical arches, filled with shallows, indicated the position of small lateral caves, low alcoves of the central cavern, accessible, perhaps, at certain tides. These openings had roofs in the form of inclined planes, and at angles more or less acute. Little sandy beaches of a few feet wide, laid bare by the action of the water, stretched inward, and were lost in these recesses.

Here and there seaweeds of more than a fathom in length undulated beneath the water, like the waving of long tresses in the wind; and there were glimpses of a forest of sea plants.

Above and below the surface of the water, the wall of the cavern from top to bottom — from the vault down to the depth at which it became invisible — was tapestried with that prodigious efflorescence of the sea, rarely perceived by human eyes, which the old Spanish navigators called praderias del mar. A luxuriant moss, having all the tints of the olive, enlarged and concealed the protuberances of granite. From all the jutting points swung the thin fluted strips of varech, which sailors use as their barometers. The light breath which stirred in the cavern waved to and fro their glossy bands.

Under these vegetations there showed themselves from time to time some of the rarest bijoux of the casket of the ocean; ivory shells, strombi, purple-fish, univalves, struthiolaires, turriculated cerites. The bell-shaped limpet shells, like tiny huts, were everywhere adhering to the rocks, distributed in settlements, in the alleys between which prowled oscabrions, those beetles of the sea. A few large pebbles found their way into the cavern; shell-fish took refuge there. The crustacea are the grandees of the sea, who, in their lacework and embroidery, avoid the rude contact of the pebbly crowd. The glittering heap of their shells, in certain spots under the wave, gave out singular irradiations, amidst which the eye caught glimpses of confused azure and gold, and mother-of-pearl, of every tint of the water.

Upon the side of the cavern, a little above the water-line, a magnificent and singular plant, attaching itself, like a fringe, to the border of seaweed, continued and completed it. This plant, thick, fibrous, inextricably intertwined, and almost black, exhibited to the eye large confused and dusky festoons, everywhere dotted with innumerable little flowers of the colour of lapis-lazuli. In the water they seemed to glow like small blue flames. Out of the water they were flowers; beneath it they were sapphires. The water rising and inundating the basement of the grotto clothed with these plants, seemed to cover the rock with gems.

At every swelling of the wave these flowers increased in splendour, and at every subsidence grew dull again. So it is with the destiny of man; aspiration is life, the outbreathing of the spirit is death.

One of the marvels of the cavern was the rock itself. Forming here a wall, there an arch, and here again a pillar or pilaster, it was in places rough and bare, and sometimes close beside, was wrought with the most delicate natural carving. Strange evidences of mind mingled with the massive stolidity of the granite. It was the wondrous art-work of the ocean. Here a sort of panel, cut square, and covered with round embossments in various positions, simulated a vague bas-relief. Before this sculpture, with its obscure designs, a man might have dreamed of Prometheus roughly sketching for Michael Angelo. It seemed as if that great genius with a few blows of his mallet could have finished the indistinct labours of the giant. In other places the rock was damasked like a Saracen buckler, or engraved like a Florentine vase. There were portions which appeared like Corinthian brass, then like arabesques, as on the door of a mosque; then like Runic stones with obscure and mystic prints of claws. Plants with twisted creepers and tendrils, crossing and recrossing upon the groundwork of golden lichens, covered it with filigree. The grotto resembled in some wise a Moorish palace. It was a union of barbarism and of goldsmith’s work, with the imposing and rugged architecture of the elements.

The magnificent stains and moulderings of the sea covered, as with velvet, the angles of granite. The escarpments were festooned with large-flowered bindweed, sustaining itself with graceful ease, and ornamenting the walls as by intelligent design. Wall-pellitories showed their strange clusters in tasteful arrangement. The wondrous light which came from beneath the water, at once a submarine twilight and an Elysian radiance, softened down and blended all harsh lineaments. Every wave was a prism. The outlines of things under these rainbow-tinted undulations produced the chromatic effects of optical glasses made too convex. Solar spectra shot through the waters. Fragments of rainbows seemed floating in that transparent dawn. Elsewhere — in other corners — there was discernible a kind of moonlight in the water. Every kind of splendour seemed to mingle there, forming a strange sort of twilight. Nothing could be more perplexing or enigmatical than the sumptuous beauties of this cavern. Enchantment reigned over all. The fantastic vegetation, the rude masonry of the place seemed to harmonise. It was a happy marriage this, between these strange wild things. The branches seeming but to touch one another clung closely each to each. The stern rock and the pale flower met in a passionate embrace. Massive pillars had capitals and entwining wreaths of delicate garlands, that quivered through every fibre, suggestive of fairy fingers tickling the feet of a Behemoth, and the rock upheld the plant, and the plant clasped the rock with unnatural joy of attraction.

The effect produced by the mysterious reconciliation of these strange forms was of a supreme and inexpressible beauty.

The works of nature, not less than the works of genius, contain the absolute, and produce an impression of awe. Something unexpected about them imperiously insists on our mental submission; we are conscious of a premeditation beyond our human scope, and at no time are they more startling than when we suddenly become aware of the beauty that is mingled with their terror.

This hidden grotto was, if we may use the expression, siderealised. There was everything in it to surprise and overwhelm. An apocalyptic light illuminated this crypt. One could not tell if that which the eyes looked upon was a reality, for reality bore the impress of the impossible. One could see, and touch, and know that one was standing there, and yet it was difficult to believe in it all.

Was it daylight which entered by this casement beneath the sea? Was it indeed water which trembled in this dusky pool? Were not these arched roofs and porches fashioned out of sunset clouds to imitate a cavern to men’s eyes? What stone was that beneath the feet? Was not this solid shaft about to melt and pass into thin air? What was that cunning jewellery of glittering shells, half seen beneath the wave? How far away were life, and the green earth, and human faces? What strange enchantment haunted that mystic twilight? What blind emotion, mingling its sympathies with the uneasy restlessness of plants beneath the wave?

At the extremity of the cavern, which was oblong, rose a Cyclopean archivolte, singularly exact in form. It was a species of cave within a cave, of tabernacle within a sanctuary. Here, behind a sheet of bright verdure, interposed like the veil of a temple, arose a stone out of the waves, having square sides, and bearing some resemblance to an altar. The water surrounded it in all parts. It seemed as if a goddess had just descended from it. One might have dreamed there that some celestial form beneath that crypt or upon that altar dwelt for ever pensive in naked beauty, but grew invisible at the approach of mortals. It was hard to conceive that majestic chamber without a vision within. The day-dream of the intruder might evoke again the marvellous apparition. A flood of chaste light falling upon white shoulders scarcely seen; a forehead bathed with the light of dawn; an Olympian visage oval-shaped; a bust full of mysterious grace; arms modestly drooping; tresses unloosened in the aurora; a body delicately modelled of pure whiteness, half-wrapped in a sacred cloud, with the glance of a virgin; a Venus rising from the sea, or Eve issuing from chaos; such was the dream which filled the mind.

It seemed improbable that no phantom figure haunted this abode. Some woman’s form, the embodiment of a star, had no doubt but shortly left the altar. Enveloped in this atmosphere of mute adoration the mind pictured an Amphitryon, a Tethys, some Diana capable of passion, some idealistic figure formed of light, looking softly down in the surrounding dusk. It was she who had left behind in the cave this perfumed luminosity, an emanation from her star-body. The dazzling phantom was no longer visible, she was only revealed by the invisible, and the sense of her presence lingered, setting the whole being voluptuously a-quiver. The goddess had departed, but divinity remained.

The beauty of the recess seemed made for this celestial presence. It was for the sake of this deity, this fairy of the pearl caverns, this queen of the Zephyrs, this Grace born of the waves, it was for her — as the mind, at least, imagined — that this subterranean dwelling had been thus religiously walled in, so that nothing might ever trouble the reverent shadows and the majestic silence round about that divine spirit.

Gilliatt, who was a kind of seer amid the secrets of nature, stood there musing, and sensible of confused emotions.

Suddenly, at a few feet below him, in the delightful transparence of that water like liquid jewels, he became sensible of the approach of something of mystic shape. A species of long ragged band was moving amidst the oscillation of the waves. It did not float, but darted about of its own will. It had an object; was advancing somewhere rapidly. The object had something of the form of a jester's bauble with points, which hung flabby and undulating. It seemed covered with a dust incapable of being washed away by the water. It was more than horrible; it was foul. The beholder felt that it was something monstrous. It was a living thing; unless, indeed, it were but an illusion. It seemed to be seeking the darker portion of the cavern, where at last it vanished. The heavy shadows grew darker as its sinister form glided into them, and disappeared.

THE LABOUR

I

THE RESOURCES OF ONE WHO HAS NOTHING

The cavern did not easily part with its explorers. The entry had been difficult; going back was more difficult still. Gilliatt, however, succeeded in extricating himself; but he did not return there. He had found nothing of what he was in quest of, and he had not the time to indulge curiosity.

He put the forge in operation at once. Tools were wanting; he set to work and made them.

For fuel he had the wreck; for motive force the water; for his bellows the wind; for his anvil a stone; for art his instinct; for power his will.

He entered with ardour upon his sombre labours.

The weather seemed to smile upon his work. It continued to be dry and free from equinoctial gales. The month of March had come, but it was tranquil. The days grew longer. The blue of the sky, the gentleness of all the movements of the scene, the serenity of the noontide, seemed to exclude the idea of mischief. The waves danced merrily in the sunlight. A Judas kiss is the first step to treachery; of such caresses the ocean is prodigal. Her smile, like that of woman's sometimes, cannot be trusted.

There was little wind. The hydraulic bellows worked all the better for that reason. Much wind would have embarrassed rather than aided it. Gilliatt had a saw; he manufactured for himself a file. With the saw he attacked the wood; with the file the metal. Then he availed himself of the two iron hands of the smith — the pincers and the pliers. The pincers gripe, the pliers handle; the one is like the closed hand, the other like the fingers. By degrees he made for himself a number of auxiliaries, and constructed his armour. With a piece of hoop-wood he made a screen for his forge-fire.

One of his principal labours was the sorting and repair of pulleys. He mended both the blocks and the sheaves of tackle. He cut down the irregularities of all broken joists, and reshaped the extremities. He had, as we have said, for the necessities of his carpentry, a quantity of pieces of wood, stored away, and arranged according to the forms, the dimensions, and the nature of their grain; the oak on one side, the pine on the other; the short pieces like riders, separated from the straight pieces like binding strakes. This formed his reserve of supports and levers, of which he might stand in great need at any moment.

Any one who intends to construct hoisting tackle ought to provide himself with beams and small cables. But that is not sufficient. He must have cordage. Gilliatt restored the cables, large and small. He frayed out the tattered sails, and succeeded in converting them into an excellent yarn, of which he made twine. With this he joined the ropes. The joins, however, were liable to rot. It was necessary, therefore, to hasten to make use of these cables. He had only been able to make white tow, for he was without tar.

The ropes mended, he proceeded to repair the chains.

Thanks to the lateral point of the stone anvil, which served the part of the conoid bicorn, he was able to forge rings rude in shape but strong. With these he fastened together the severed lengths of chains, and made long pieces.

To work at a forge without assistance is something more than troublesome. He succeeded nevertheless. It is true that he had only to forge and shape articles of comparatively small size, which he was able to handle with the pliers in one hand, while he hammered with the other.

He cut into lengths the iron bars of the captain’s bridge on which Clubin used to pass to and fro from paddle-box to paddle-box giving his orders; forged at one extremity of each piece a point, and at the other a flat head. By this means he manufactured large nails of about a foot in length. These nails, much used in pontoon making, are useful in fixing anything in rocks.

What was his object in all these labours? We shall see.

He was several times compelled to renew the blade of his hatchet and the teeth of his saw. For renotching the saw he had manufactured a three-sided file.

Occasionally he made use of the capstan of the Durande. The hook of the chain broke: he made another.

By the aid of his pliers and pincers, and by using his chisel as a screwdriver, he set to work to remove the two paddle-wheels of the vessel; an object which he accomplished. This was rendered practicable by reason of a peculiarity in their construction. The paddle-boxes which covered them served him to stow them away. With the planks of these paddle-boxes, he made two cases in which he deposited the two paddles, piece by piece, each part being carefully numbered.

His lump of chalk became precious for this purpose.

He kept the two cases upon the strongest part of the wreck.

When these preliminaries were completed, he found himself face to face with the great difficulty. The problem of the engine of the Durande was now clearly before him.

Taking the paddle-wheels to pieces had proved practicable. It was very different with the machinery.

In the first place, he was almost entirely ignorant of the details of the mechanism. Working thus blindly he might do some irreparable damage. Then, even in attempting to dismember it, if he had ventured on that course, far other tools would be necessary than such as he could fabricate with a cavern for a forge, a wind-draught for bellows, and a stone for an anvil. In attempting, therefore, to take to pieces the machinery, there was the risk of destroying it.

The attempt seemed at first sight wholly impracticable.

The apparent impossibility of the project rose before him like a stone wall, blocking further progress.

What was to be done?

II

WHEREIN SHAKESPEARE AND ÆSCHYLUS MEET

Gilliatt had a notion.

Since the time of the carpenter-mason of Salbris, who, in the sixteenth century, in the dark ages of science — long before Amontons had discovered the first law of electricity, or Lahire the second, or Coulomb the third — without other helper than a child, his son, with ill-fashioned tools, in the chamber of the great clock of La Charité-sur-Loire, resolved at one stroke five or six problems in statics and dynamics inextricably intervolved like the wheels in a block of carts and waggons — since the time of that grand and marvellous achievement of the poor workman, who found means, without breaking a single piece of wire, without throwing one of the teeth of the wheels out of gear, to lower in one piece, by a marvellous simplification, from the second story of the clock-tower to the first, that massive monitor of the hours, made all of iron and brass, "large as the room in which the man watches at night from the tower," with its motion, its cylinders, its barrels, its drum, its hooks, and its weights, the barrel of its spring steel-yard, its horizontal pendulum, the holdfasts of its escapement, its reels of large and small chains, its stone weights, one of which weighed five hundred pounds, its bells, its peals, its jacks that strike the hours — since the days, I say, of the man who accomplished this miracle, and of whom posterity knows not even the name — nothing that could be compared with the project which Gilliatt was meditating had ever been attempted.

The ponderousness, the delicacy, the involvement of the difficulties were not less in the machinery of the Durande than in the clock of La Charité-sur-Loire.

The untaught mechanic had his helpmate — his son; Gilliatt was alone.

A crowd gathered together from Meung-sur-Loire, from Nevers, and even from Orleans, able at time of need to assist the mason of Salbris, and to encourage him with their friendly voices. Gilliatt had around him no voices but those of the wind; no crowd but the assemblage of waves.

There is nothing more remarkable than the timidity of ignorance, unless it be its temerity. When ignorance becomes daring, she has sometimes a sort of compass within herself — the intuition of the truth, clearer oftentimes in a simple mind than in a learned brain.

Ignorance invites to an attempt. It is a state of wonderment, which, with its concomitant curiosity, forms a power. Knowledge often enough disconcerts and makes over-cautious. Gama, had he known what lay before him, would have recoiled before the Cape of Storms. If Columbus had been a great geographer, he might have failed to discover America.

The second successful climber of Mont Blanc was the savant, Saussure; the first the goatherd, Balmat.

These instances I admit are exceptions, which detract nothing from science, which remains the rule. The ignorant man may discover; it is the learned who invent.

The sloop was still at anchor in the creek of “The Man Rock,” where the sea left it in peace. Gilliatt, as will be remembered, had arranged everything for maintaining constant communication with it. He visited the sloop and measured her beam carefully in several parts, but particularly her midship frame. Then he returned to the Durande and measured the diameter of the floor of the engine-room. This diameter, of course, without the paddles, was two feet less than the broadest part of the deck of his bark. The machinery, therefore, might be put aboard the sloop.

But how could it be got there?

III

GILLIATT'S MASTERPIECE COMES TO THE RESCUE OF THAT OF LETHIERRY

Any fisherman who had been mad enough to loiter in that season in the neighbourhood of Gilliatt's labours about this time would have been repaid for his hardihood, by a singular sight between the two Douvres.

Before his eyes would have appeared four stout beams, at equal distances, stretching from one Douvre to the other, and apparently forced into the rock, which is the firmest of all holds. On the Little Douvre, their extremities were laid and buttressed upon the projections of rock. On the Great Douvre, they had been driven in by blows of a hammer, by the powerful hand of a workman standing upright upon the beam itself. These supports were a little longer than the distance between the rocks. Hence the firmness of their hold; and hence, also, their slanting position. They touched the Great Douvre at an acute, and the Little Douvre at an obtuse angle. Their inclination was only slight; but it was unequal, which was a defect. But for this defect, they might have been supposed to be prepared to receive the planking of a deck. To these four beams were attached four sets of hoisting apparatus, each having its pendent and its tackle-fall, with the bold peculiarity of having the tackle-blocks with two sheaves at one extremity of the beam, and the simple pulleys at the opposite end. This distance, which was too great not to be perilous, was necessitated by the operations to be effected. The blocks were firm, and the pulleys strong. To this tackle-gear cables were attached, which from a distance looked like threads; while beneath this apparatus of tackle and carpentry, in the air, the massive hull of the Durande seemed suspended by threads.

She was not yet suspended, however. Under the cross beams, eight perpendicular holes had been made in the deck, four on the port, and four on the starboard side of the engine; eight other holes had been made beneath them through the keel. The cables, descending vertically from the four tackle-blocks, through the deck, passed out at the keel, and under the machinery, re-entered the ship by the holes on the other side, and passing again upward through the deck, returned, and were wound round the beams. Here a sort of jigger-tackle held them in a bunch bound fast to a single cable, capable of being directed by one arm. The single cable passed over a hook, and through a dead-eye, which completed the apparatus, and kept it in check. This combination compelled the four tacklings to work together, and acting as a complete restraint upon the suspending powers, became a sort of dynamical rudder in the hand of the pilot of the operation, maintaining the movements in equilibrium. The ingenious adjustment of this system of tackling had some of the simplifying qualities of the Weston pulley of these times, with a mixture of the antique polyspaston of Vitruvius. Gilliatt had discovered this, although he knew nothing of the dead Vitruvius or of the still unborn Weston. The length of the cables varied, according to the unequal declivity of the cross-beams. The ropes were dangerous, for the untarred hemp was liable to give way. Chains would have been better in this respect, but chains would not have passed well through the tackle-blocks.

The apparatus was full of defects; but as the work of one man, it was surprising. For the rest, it will be understood that many details are omitted which would render the construction perhaps intelligible to practical mechanics, but obscure to others.

The top of the funnel passed between the two beams in the middle.

Gilliatt, without suspecting it, had reconstructed, three centuries later, the mechanism of the Salbris carpenter — a mechanism rude and incorrect, and hazardous for him who would dare to use it.

Here let us remark, that the rudest defects do not prevent a mechanism from working well or ill. It may limp, but it moves. The obelisk in the square of St. Peter’s at Rome is erected in a way which offends against all the principles of statics. The carriage of the Czar Peter was so constructed that it appeared about to overturn at every step; but it travelled onward for all that. What deformities are there in the machinery of Marly! Everything that is heterodox in hydraulics. Yet it did not supply Louis XIV. any the less with water.

Come what might, Gilliatt had faith. He had even anticipated success so confidently as to fix in the bulwarks of the sloop, on the day when he measured its proportions, two pairs of corresponding iron rings on each side, exactly at the same distances as the four rings on board the Durande, to which were attached the four chains of the funnel.

He had in his mind a very complete and settled plan. All the chances being against him, he had evidently determined that all the precautions at least should be on his side.

He did some things which seemed useless; a sign of attentive premeditation.

His manner of proceeding would, as we have said, have puzzled an observer, even though familiar with mechanical operations.

A witness of his labour who had seen him, for example, with enormous efforts, and at the risk of breaking his neck, driving with blows of his hammer eight or ten great nails which he had forged into the base of the two Douvres at the entrance of the defile between them, would have had some difficulty in understanding the object of these nails, and would probably have wondered what could be the use of all that trouble.

If he had then seen him measuring the portion of the fore bulwark which had remained, as we have described it, hanging on by the wreck, then attaching a strong cable to the upper edge of that portion, cutting away with strokes of his hatchet the dislocated fastenings which held it, then dragging it out of the defile, pushing the lower part by the aid of the receding tide, while he dragged the upper part; finally, by great labour, fastening with the cable this heavy mass of planks and piles wider than the entrance of the defile itself, with the nails driven into the base of the Little Douvre, the observer would perhaps have found it still more difficult to comprehend, and might have wondered why Gilliatt, if he wanted for the purpose of his operations to disencumber the space between the two rocks of this mass, had not allowed it to fall into the sea, where the tide would have carried it away.

Gilliatt had probably his reasons.

In fixing the nails in the basement of the rocks, he had taken advantage of all the cracks in the granite, enlarged them where needful, and driven in first of all wedges of wood, in which he fixed the nails. He made a rough commencement of similar preparations in the two rocks which rose at the other extremity of the narrow passage on the eastern side. He furnished with plugs of wood all the crevices, as if he desired to keep these also ready to hold nails or clamps; but this appeared to be a simple precaution, for he did not use them further. He was compelled to economise, and only to use his materials as he had need, and at the moment when the necessity for them came. This was another addition to his numerous difficulties.

As fast as one labour was accomplished another became necessary. Gilliatt passed without hesitation from task to task, and resolutely accomplished his giant strides.

IV

SUB RE

The aspect of the man who accomplished all these labours became terrible. Gilliatt in his multifarious tasks expended all his strength at once, and regained it with difficulty.

Privations on the one hand, lassitude on the other, had much reduced him. His hair and beard had grown long. He had but one shirt which was not in rags. He went about bare-footed, the wind having carried away one of his shoes and the sea the other. Fractures of the rude and dangerous stone anvil which he used had left small wounds upon his hands and arms, the marks of labour. These wounds, or rather scratches, were superficial; but the keen air and the salt sea irritated them continually.

He was generally hungry, thirsty, and cold.

His store of fresh water was gone; his rye-meal was used or eaten. He had nothing left but a little biscuit.

This he broke with his teeth, having no water in which to steep it.

By little and little, and day by day, his powers decreased.

The terrible rocks were consuming his existence.

How to obtain food was a problem; how to get drink was a problem; how to find rest was a problem.

He ate when he was fortunate enough to find a crayfish or a crab; he drank when he chanced to see a sea-bird descend upon a point of rock; for on climbing up to the spot he generally found there a hollow with a little fresh water. He drank from it after the bird; sometimes with the bird; for the gulls and seamews had become accustomed to him, and no longer flew away at his approach. Even in his greatest need of food he did not attempt to molest them. He had, as will be remembered, a superstition about birds. The birds on their part — now that his hair was rough and wild and his beard long — had no fear of him. The change in his face gave them confidence; he had lost resemblance to men, and taken the form of the wild beast.

The birds and Gilliatt, in fact, had become good friends. Companions in poverty, they helped each other. As long as he had had any meal, he had crumbled for them some little bits of the cakes he made. In his deeper distress they showed him in their turn the places where he might find the little pools of water.

He ate the shell-fish raw. Shell-fish help in a certain degree to quench the thirst. The crabs he cooked. Having no kettle, he roasted them between two stones made red-hot in his fire, after the manner of the savages of the Feroe islands.

Meanwhile signs of the equinoctial season had begun to appear. There came rain — an angry rain. No showers or steady torrents, but fine, sharp, icy, penetrating points which pierced to his skin through his clothing, and to his bones through his skin. It was a rain which yielded little water for drinking, but which drenched him none the less.

Chary of assistance, prodigal of misery — such was the character of these rains. During one week Gilliatt suffered from them all day and all night.

At night, in his rocky recess, nothing but the overpowering fatigue of his daily work enabled him to get sleep. The great sea-gnats stung him, and he awakened covered with blisters.

He had a kind of low fever, which sustained him; this fever is a succour which destroys. By instinct he chewed the mosses, or sucked the leaves of wild cochlearia, scanty tufts of which grew in the dry crevices of the rocks. Of his suffering, however, he took little heed. He had no time to spare from his work to the consideration of his own privations. The rescue of the machinery of the Durande was progressing well. That sufficed for him.

Every now and then, for the necessities of his work, he jumped into the water, swam to some point, and gained a footing again. He simply plunged into the sea and left it, as a man passes from one room in his dwelling to another.

His clothing was never dry. It was saturated with rain water, which had no time to evaporate, and with sea water, which never dries. He lived perpetually wet.

Living in wet clothing is a habit which may be acquired. The poor groups of Irish people — old men, mothers, girls almost naked, and infants — who pass the winter in the open air, under the snow and rain, huddled together, sometimes at the corners of houses in the streets of London, live and die in this condition.

To be soaked with wet, and yet to be thirsty: Gilliatt grew familiar with this strange torture. There were times when he was glad to suck the sleeve of his loose coat.

The fire which he made scarcely warmed him. A fire in open air yields little comfort. It burns on one side, and freezes on the other.

Gilliatt often shivered even while sweating over his forge.

Everywhere about him rose resistance amidst a terrible silence. He felt himself the enemy of an unseen combination. There is a dismal non possumus in nature. The inertia of matter is like a sullen threat. A mysterious persecution environed him. He suffered from heats and shiverings. The fire ate into his flesh; the water froze him; feverish thirst tormented him; the wind tore his clothing; hunger undermined the organs of the body. The oppression of all these things was constantly exhausting him. Obstacles silent, immense, seemed to converge from all points, with the blind irresponsibility of fate, yet full of a savage unanimity. He felt them pressing inexorably upon him. No means were there of escaping from them. His sufferings produced the impression of some living persecutor. He had a constant sense of something working against him, of a hostile form ever present, ever labouring to circumvent and to subdue him. He could have fled from the struggle; but since he remained, he had no choice but to war with this impenetrable hostility. He asked himself what it was. It took hold of him, grasped him tightly, overpowered him, deprived him of breath. The invisible persecutor was destroying him by slow degrees. Every day the oppression became greater, as if a mysterious screw had received another turn.

His situation in this dreadful spot resembled a duel, in which a suspicion of some treachery haunts the mind of one of the combatants.

Now it seemed a coalition of obscure forces which surrounded him. He felt that there was somewhere a determination to be rid of his presence. It is thus that the glacier chases the loitering ice-block.

Almost without seeming to touch him this latent coalition had reduced him to rags; had left him bleeding, distressed, and, as it were, hors de combat, even before the battle. He laboured, indeed, not the less — without pause or rest; but as the work advanced, the workman himself lost ground. It might have been fancied that Nature, dreading his bold spirit, adopted the plan of slowly undermining his bodily power. Gilliatt kept his ground, and left the rest to the future. The sea had begun by consuming him; what would come next?

The double Douvres — that dragon made of granite, and lying in ambush in mid-ocean — had sheltered him. It had allowed him to enter, and to do his will; but its hospitality resembled the welcome of devouring jaws.

The desert, the boundless surface, the unfathomable space around him and above, so full of negatives to man’s will; the mute, inexorable determination of phenomena following their appointed course; the grand general law of things, implacable and passive; the ebbs and flows; the rocks themselves, dark Pleiades whose points were each a star amid vortices, a centre of an irradiation of currents; the strange, indefinable conspiracy to stifle with indifference the temerity of a living being; the wintry winds, the clouds, and the beleaguering waves enveloped him, closed round him slowly, and in a measure shut him in, and separated him from companionship, like a dungeon built up by degrees round a living man. All against him; nothing for him; he felt himself isolated, abandoned, enfeebled, sapped, forgotten. His storehouse empty, his tools broken or defective; he was tormented with hunger and thirst by day, with cold by night. His sufferings had left him with wounds and tatters, rags covering sores, torn hands, bleeding feet, wasted limbs, pallid cheeks, and eyes bright with a strange light; but this was the steady flame of his determination.

The virtue of a man is betrayed by his eyes. How much of the man there is in us may be read in their depths. We make ourselves known by the light that gleams beneath our brows. The petty natures wink at us, the larger send forth flashes. If there is no brilliancy under the lids, there is no thought in the brain, no love in the heart. Those who love desire, and those who desire sparkle and flash. Determination gives a fire to the glance, a magnificent fire that consumes all timid thoughts.

It is the self-willed ones who are sublime. He who is only brave, has but a passing fit, he who is only valiant has temperament and nothing more, he who is courageous has but one virtue. He who persists in the truth is the grand character. The secret of great hearts may be summed up in the word: Perseverando. Perseverance is to courage what the wheel is to the lever; it is the continual renewing of the centre of support. Let the desired goal be on earth or in heaven, only make for the goal. Everything is in that; in the first case one is a Columbus, in the second a god. Not to allow conscience to argue or the will to fail — this is the way to suffering and glory. In the world of ethics to fall does not exclude the possibility of soaring, rather does it give impetus to flight. The mediocrities allow themselves to be dissuaded by the specious obstacles — the great ones never. To perish is their perhaps, to conquer their conviction. You may propose many good reasons to the martyr why he should not allow himself to be stoned to death. Disdain of every reasonable objection begets that sublime victory of the vanquished which we call martyrdom.

All his efforts seemed to tend to the impossible. His success was trifling and slow. He was compelled to expend much labour for very little results. This it was that gave to his struggle its noble and pathetic character.

That it should have required so many preparations, so much toil, so many cautious experiments, such nights of hardship, and such days of danger, merely to set up four beams over a shipwrecked vessel, to divide and isolate the portion that could be saved, and to adjust to that wreck within a wreck four tackle-blocks with their cables was only the result of his solitary labour. Fate had decreed him the work, and necessity obliged him to carry it out.

That solitary position Gilliatt had more than accepted; he had deliberately chosen it. Dreading a competitor, because a competitor might have proved a rival, he had sought for no assistance. The overwhelming enterprise, the risk, the danger, the toil multiplied by itself, the possible destruction of the salvor in his work, famine, fever, nakedness, distress — he had chosen all these for himself! Such was his selfishness. He was like a man placed in some terrible chamber which is being slowly exhausted of air. His vitality was leaving him by little and little. He scarcely perceived it.

Exhaustion of the bodily strength does not necessarily exhaust the will. Faith is only a secondary power; the will is the first. The mountains, which faith is proverbially said to move, are nothing beside that which the will can accomplish. All that Gilliatt lost in vigour, he gained in tenacity. The destruction of the physical man under the oppressive influence of that wild surrounding sea, and rock, and sky, seemed only to reinvigorate his moral nature.

Gilliatt felt no fatigue; or, rather, would not yield to any. The refusal of the mind to recognise the failings of the body is in itself an immense power.

He saw nothing, except the steps in the progress of his labours.

His object — now seeming so near attainment — wrapped him in perpetual illusions.

He endured all this suffering without any other thought than is comprised in the word “Forward.” His work flew to his head; the strength of the will is intoxicating. Its intoxication is called heroism.

He had become a kind of Job, having the ocean for the scene of his sufferings. But he was a Job wrestling with difficulty, a Job combating and making head against afflictions; a Job conquering! a combination of Job and Prometheus, if such names are not too great to be applied to a poor sailor and fisher of crabs and crayfish.

V

SUB UMBRA

Sometimes in the night-time Gilliatt woke and peered into the darkness.

He felt a strange emotion.

His eyes were opened upon the black night; the situation was dismal; full of disquietude.

There is such a thing as the pressure of darkness.

A strange roof of shadow; a deep obscurity, which no diver can explore; a light mingled with that obscurity, of a strange, subdued, and sombre kind; floating atoms of rays, like a dust of seeds or of ashes; millions of lamps, but no illumining; a vast sprinkling of fire, of which no man knows the secret; a diffusion of shining points, like a drift of sparks arrested in their course; the disorder of the whirlwind, with the fixedness of death; a mysterious and abyssmal depth; an enigma, at once showing and concealing its face; the Infinite in its mask of darkness — these are the synonyms of night. Its weight lies heavily on the soul of man.

This union of all mysteries — the mystery of the Cosmos and the mystery of Fate — oppresses human reason.

The pressure of darkness acts in inverse proportion upon different kinds of natures. In the presence of night man feels his own incompleteness. He perceives the dark void and is sensible of infirmity. It is like the vacancy of blindness. Face to face with night, man bends, kneels, prostrates himself, crouches on the earth, crawls towards a cave, or seeks for wings. Almost always he shrinks from that vague presence of the Infinite Unknown. He asks himself what it is; he trembles and bows the head. Sometimes he desires to go to it.

To go whither?

He can only answer, “Yonder.”

But what is that? and what is there?

This curiosity is evidently forbidden to the spirit of man; for all around him the roads which bridge that gulf are broken up or gone. No arch exists for him to span the Infinite. But there is attraction in forbidden knowledge, as in the edge of the abyss. Where the footstep cannot tread, the eye may reach; where the eye can penetrate no further, the mind may soar. There is no man, however feeble or insufficient his resources, who does not essay. According to his nature he questions or recoils before that mystery. With some it has the effect of repressing; with others it enlarges the soul. The spectacle is sombre, indefinite.

Is the night calm and cloudless? It is then a depth of shadow. Is it stormy? It is then a sea of cloud. Its limitless deeps reveal themselves to us, and yet baffle our gaze: close themselves against research, but open to conjecture. Its innumerable dots of light only make deeper the obscurity beyond. Jewels, scintillations, stars; existences revealed in the unknown universes; dread defiances to man's approach; landmarks of the infinite creation; boundaries there, where there are no bounds; sea-marks impossible, and yet real, numbering the fathoms of those infinite deeps. One microscopic glittering point; then another; then another; imperceptible, yet enormous. Yonder light is a focus; that focus is a star; that star is a sun; that sun is a universe; that universe is nothing. For all numbers are as zero in the presence of the Infinite.

These worlds, which yet are nothing, exist. Through this fact we feel the difference which separates the being nothing from the not to be.

The inaccessible joined to the inexplicable, such is the universe. From the contemplation of the universe is evolved a sublime phenomenon: the soul growing vast through its sense of wonder. A reverent fear is peculiar to man; the beasts know no such fear.

His intelligence becomes conscious in this august terror of its own power and its own weakness.

Darkness has unity, hence arises horror; at the same time it is complex, and hence terror. Its unity weighs on the spirit and destroys all desire of resistance. Its complexity causes us to look around on all sides; apparently we have reason to fear sudden happenings. We yield and yet are on guard. We are in presence of the whole, hence submission; and of the many, hence defiance.

The unity of darkness contains a multiple, a mysterious plurality — visible in matter, realised in thought. Silence rules all; another reason for watchfulness.

Night — and he who writes this has said it elsewhere — is the right and normal condition of that special part of creation to which we belong. Light, brief of duration here as throughout space, is but the nearness of a star. This universal, prodigious night does not fulfil itself, without friction, and all such friction in such a mechanism means what we call evil. We feel this darkness to be evil, a latent denial of divine order, the implicit blasphemy of the real rebelling against the ideal. Evil complicates, by one knows not what hydra-headed monstrosity, the vast, cosmic whole.

Everywhere it arises and resists.

It is the tempest, and hinders the hastening ship; it is chaos, and trammels the birth of a world. Good is one; evil is ubiquitous. Evil dislocates the logic of Life. It causes the bird to devour the fly and the comet to destroy the planet. Evil is a blot on the page of creation.

The darkness of night is full of vertiginous uncertainty.

Whoso would sound its depths is submerged, and struggles therein.

What fatigue to be compared to this contemplation of shadows. It is the study of annihilation.

There is no sure hold on which the soul may rest. There are ports of departure, and no havens for arrival. The interlacing of contradictory solutions; all the branches of doubt seen at a glance; the ramifications of phenomena budding limitlessly from some undefined impulse; laws intersecting each other; an incomprehensible promiscuity causing the mineral to become vegetable; the vegetable to rise to higher life; thought to gather weight; love to shine and gravitation to attract; the immense range presented to view by all questions, extending itself into the limitless obscurity; the half seen, suggesting the unknown; the cosmic correlation appearing clearly, not to sight but to intelligence, in the vast, dim space; the invisible become visible — these are the great overshadowing! Man lives beneath it. He is ignorant of detail, but he carries, in such proportion as he is able to bear, the weight of the monstrous whole. This obsession prompted the astronomy of the Chaldean shepherds. Involuntary revelations flow from creation; hints of science fall from it unconsciously and are absorbed by the ignorant. Every solitary, impregnated in this mysterious way, becomes, without being aware of it, a natural philosopher.

The darkness is indivisible. It is inhabited. Inhabited by the changeless absolute; inhabited also by change. Action exists there, disquieting thought! An awful creative will works out its phases. Premeditations, Powers, fore-ordained Destinies, elaborate there together an incommensurable work. A life of horror and terror is hidden therein. There are vast evolutions of suns; the stellar family, the planetary family; zodiacal pollen; the Quid Divinum of currents; effluvia, polarisations, and attractions; there are embraces and antagonisms; a magnificent flux and reflux of universal antithesis; the imponderable, free-floating around fixed centres; there is the sap of globes and light beyond globes; the wandering atom, the scattered germ, the processes of fecundity, meetings for union and for combat; unimagined profusion, distances which are as a dream, vertiginous orbits, the rush of worlds into the incalculable; marvels following each other in the obscurity. One mechanism works throughout in the breath of fleeing spheres, and the wheels that we know are turning. The sage conjectures; the ignorant man believes and trembles. These things exist and yet are hidden; they are inexpugnable, beyond reach, beyond approach.

We are convinced and oppressed — we feel, we know not what dark evidence within us; we realise nothing, but are crushed by the impalpable.

All is incomprehensible, but nothing is unintelligible.

And add to all that, the tremendous question: Is this immanent universe a Being?

We exist beneath the shadow. We look; we listen. And meanwhile the dark earth rolls onward. The flowers are conscious of this tremendous motion; the one opens at eleven in the evening and the other at five in the morning. Astounding sense of law! And in other depths of wonder, the drop of water is a world; the infusoria breed; animalculæ display gigantic fecundity, the imperceptible reveals its grandeur, immensity manifests itself, in an inverse sense; there are algæ that produce in an hour thirteen hundred millions of their kind. Every enigma is propounded in one. The irreducible is before us. Hence we are constrained to some kind of faith. An involuntary belief is the result. But belief does not ensure peace of mind. Faith has an extraordinary desire to take shape. Hence religions. Nothing is so overwhelming as a formless faith.

And despite of thought or desire or inward resistance, to look at the darkness is to fall into profound and wondering meditation. What can we make of these phenomena! How should we act beneath their united forces? To divide such weight of oppression is impossible. What reverie can follow all these mystic vistas? What abstruse revelations arise, stammering, and are obscure from their very mass, as a hesitating speech. Darkness is silence, but such a silence suggests everything. One majestic thought is the result: God — God is the irrepressible idea that springs within man’s soul. Syllogisms, feuds, negations, systems, religions cannot destroy it. This idea is affirmed by the whole dark universe. Yet unrest is everywhere in fearful immanence. The wondrous correlation of forces is manifested in the upholding of the balanced darkness. The universe is suspended and nothing falls. Incessant and immeasurable changes operate without accident or destruction. Man participates in the constant changes, and in experiencing such he names them Destiny. But where does destiny begin? And where does nature end? What difference is there between an event and a season? between a sorrow and a rainfall? between a virtue and a star? An hour, is it not a rolling wave? The wheels of creation revolve mechanically regardless of man. The starry sky is a vision of wheels, pendulums, and counterpoise.

He who contemplates it cannot but ponder upon it.

It is the whole reality and yet the whole abstraction. And nothing more. We are in prison and at the mercy of the darkness, and no evasion is possible.

We are an integral part of the working of this unknown whole; and we feel the mystery within us fraternising with the mystery beyond us. Hence the sublimity of Death. What anguish! And yet what bliss to belong to the Infinite, and through the sense of the Infinite to recognise our inevitable immortality, the possibility of an eternity; to grasp amid this prodigious deluge of universal life, the persistent, imperishable Me; to look at the stars and say, The living soul within me is akin to you; to gaze into darkness and cry, I am as unfathomable as thou! Such immensity is of night, and, added to solitude, weighed heavily on Gilliatt’s mind.

Did he understand it? No.

Did he feel it? Yes.

All these vague imaginings, increased and intensified by solitude, weighed upon Gilliatt.

He understood them little, but he felt them. His was a powerful intellect clouded; a great spirit wild and untaught.

VI

GILLIATT PLACES THE SLOOP IN READINESS

This rescue of the machinery of the wreck as meditated by Gilliatt was, as we have already said, like the escape of a criminal from a prison — necessitating all the patience and industry recorded of such achievements; industry carried to the point of a miracle, patience only to be compared with a long agony. A certain prisoner named Thomas, at the Mont Saint Michel, found means of secreting the greater part of a wall in his paillasse. Another at Tulle, in 1820, cut away a quantity of lead from the terrace where the prisoners walked for exercise. With what kind of knife? No one would guess. And melted this lead with what fire? None have ever discovered; but it is known that he cast it in a mould made of the crumbs of bread. With this lead and this mould he made a key, and with this key succeeded in opening a lock of which he had never seen anything but the keyhole. Some of this marvellous ingenuity Gilliatt possessed. He had once climbed and descended from the cliff at Boisrosé. He was the Baron Trenck of the wreck, and the Latude of her machinery.

The sea, like a jailor, kept watch over him.

For the rest, mischievous and inclement as the rain had been, he had contrived to derive some benefit from it. He had in part replenished his stock of fresh water; but his thirst was inextinguishable, and he emptied his can as fast as he filled it.

One day — it was on the last day of April or the first of May — all was at length ready for his purpose.

The engine-room was, as it were, enclosed between the eight cables hanging from the tackle-blocks, four on one side, four on the other. The sixteen holes upon the deck and under the keel, through which the cables passed, had been hooped round by sawing. The planking had been sawed, the timber cut with the hatchet, the ironwork with a file, the sheathing with the chisel. The part of the keel immediately under the machinery was cut squarewise, and ready to descend with it while still supporting it. All this frightful swinging mass was held only by one chain, which was itself only kept in position by a filed notch. At this stage, in such a labour and so near its completion, haste is prudence.

The water was low; the moment favourable.

Gilliatt had succeeded in removing the axle of the paddles, the extremities of which might have proved an obstacle and checked the descent. He had contrived to make this heavy portion fast in a vertical position within the engine-room itself.

It was time to bring his work to an end. The workman, as we have said, was not weary, for his will was strong; but his tools were. The forge was by degrees becoming impracticable. The blower had begun to work badly. The little hydraulic fall being of sea-water, saline deposits had encrusted the joints of the apparatus, and prevented its free action.

Gilliatt visited the creek of “The Man Rock,” examined the sloop, and assured himself that all was in good condition, particularly the four rings fixed to starboard and to larboard; then he weighed anchor, and worked the heavy barge-shaped craft with the oars till he brought it alongside the two Douvres. The defile between the rocks was wide enough to admit it. There was also depth enough. On the day of his arrival he had satisfied himself that it was possible to push the sloop under the Durande.

The feat, however, was difficult; it required the minute precision of a watchmaker. The operation was all the more delicate from the fact that, for his objects, he was compelled to force it in by the stern, rudder first. It was necessary that the mast and the ringing of the sloop should project beyond the wreck in the direction of the sea.

These embarrassments rendered all Gilliatt’s operations awkward. It was not like entering the creek of “The Man,” where it was a mere affair of the tiller. It was necessary here to push, drag, row, and take soundings all together. Gilliatt consumed but a quarter of an hour in these manœuvres; but he was successful.

In fifteen or twenty minutes the sloop was adjusted under the wreck. It was almost wedged in there. By means of his two anchors he moored the boat by head and stern. The strongest of the two was placed so as to be efficient against the strongest wind that blows, which was that from the south-west. Then by the aid of a lever and the capstan, he lowered into the sloop the two cases containing the pieces of the paddle-wheel, the slings of which were all ready. The two cases served as ballast.

Relieved of these encumbrances, he fastened to the hook of the chain of the capstan the sling of the regulating tackle-gear, intending to check the pulleys.

Owing to the peculiar objects of this labour, the defects of the old sloop became useful qualities. It had no deck; her burden therefore would have greater depth, and could rest upon the hold. Her mast was very forward — too far forward indeed for general purposes; her contents therefore would have more room, and the mast standing thus beyond the mass of the wreck, there would be nothing to hinder its disembarkation. It was a mere shell, or case for receiving it; but nothing is more stable than this on the sea.

While engaged in these operations, Gilliatt suddenly perceived that the sea was rising. He looked around to see from what quarter the wind was coming.

VII

SUDDEN DANGER

The breeze was scarcely perceptible; but what there was came from the west. A disagreeable habit of the winds during the equinoxes.

The rising sea varies much in its effects upon the Douvres rocks, depending upon the quarter of the wind.

According to the gale which drives them before it, the waves enter the rocky corridor either from the east or from the west. Entering from the east, the sea is comparatively gentle; coming from the west, it is always furious. The reason of this is, that the wind from the east blowing from the land has not had time to gather force; while the westerly winds, coming from the Atlantic, blow unchecked from a vast ocean. Even a very slight breeze, if it comes from the west, is serious. It rolls the huge billows from the illimitable space and dashes the waves against the narrow defile in greater bulk than can find entrance there.

A sea which rolls into a gulf is always terrible. It is the same with a crowd of people: a multitude is a sort of fluid body. When the quantity which can enter is less than the quantity endeavouring to force a way, there is a fatal crush among the crowd, a fierce convulsion on the water. As long as the west wind blows, however slight the breeze, the Douvres are twice a day subjected to that rude assault. The sea rises, the tide breasts up, the narrow gullet gives little entrance, the waves, driven against it violently, rebound and roar, and a tremendous surf beats the two sides of the gorge. Thus the Douvres, during the slightest wind from the west, present the singular spectacle of a sea comparatively calm without, while within the rocks a storm is raging. This tumult of waters, altogether confined and circumscribed, has nothing of the character of a tempest. It is a mere local outbreak among the waves, but a terrible one. As regards the winds from the north and south, they strike the rocks crosswise, and cause little surf in the passage. The entrance by the east, a fact which must be borne in mind, was close to “The Man Rock.” The dangerous opening to the west was at the opposite extremity, exactly between the two Douvres.

It was at this western entrance that Gilliatt found himself with the wrecked Durande, and the sloop made fast beneath it.

A catastrophe seemed inevitable. There was not much wind, but it was sufficient for the impending mischief.

Before many hours, the swell which was rising would be rushing with full force into the gorge of the Douvres. The first waves were already breaking. This swell, and eddy of the entire Atlantic, would have behind it the immense sea. There would be no squall; no violence, but a simple overwhelming wave, which commencing on the coasts of America, rolls towards the shores of Europe with an impetus gathered over two thousand leagues. This wave, a gigantic ocean barrier, meeting the gap of the rocks, must be caught between the two Douvres, standing like watch-towers at the entrance, or like pillars of the defile. Thus swelled by the tide, augmented by resistance, driven back by the shoals, and urged on by the wind, it would strike the rock with violence, and with all the contortions from the obstacles it had encountered, and all the frenzy of a sea confined in limits, would rush between the rocky walls, where it would reach the sloop and the Durande, and, in all probability, destroy them.

A shield against this danger was wanting. Gilliatt had one.

The problem was to prevent the sea reaching it at one bound; to obstruct it from striking, while allowing it to rise; to bar the passage without refusing it admission; to prevent the compression of the water in the gorge, which was the whole danger; to turn an eruption into a simple flood; to extract as it were from the waves all their violence, and constrain the furies to be gentle; it was, in fact, to substitute an obstacle which will appease, for an obstacle which irritates.

Gilliatt, with all that dexterity which he possessed, and which is so much more efficient than mere force, sprang upon the rocks like a chamois among the mountains or a monkey in the forest; using for his tottering and dizzy strides the smallest projecting stone; leaping into the water, and issuing from it again; swimming among the shoals and clambering the rocks, with a rope between his teeth and a mallet in his hand. Thus he detached the cable which kept suspended and also fast to the basement of the Little Douvre the end of the forward side of the Durande; fashioned out of some ends of hawsers a sort of hinges, holding this bulwark to the huge nails fixed in the granite; swung this apparatus of planks upon them, like the gates of a great dock, and turned their sides, as he would turn a rudder, outward to the waves, which pushed the extremities upon the Great Douvre, while the rope hinges detained the other extremities upon the Little Douvre; next he contrived, by means of the huge nails placed beforehand for the purpose, to fix the same kind of fastenings upon the Great Douvre as on the little one; made completely fast the vast mass of woodwork against the two pillars of the gorge, slung a chain across this barrier like a baldric upon a cuirass; and in less than an hour, this barricade against the sea was complete and the gullet of the rocks closed as by a folding-door.

This powerful apparatus, a heavy mass of beams and planks, which laid flat would have made a raft, and upright formed a wall, had by the aid of the water been handled by Gilliatt with the adroitness of a juggler. It might almost have been said that the obstruction was complete before the rising sea had the time to perceive it.

It was one of those occasions on which Jean Bart would have employed the famous expression which he applied to the sea every time he narrowly escaped shipwreck. "We have cheated the Englishman;" for it is well known that when that famous admiral meant to speak contemptuously of the ocean he called it "the Englishman."

The entrance to the defile being thus protected, Gilliatt thought of the sloop. He loosened sufficient cable for the two anchors to allow her to rise with the tide; an operation similar to what the mariners of old called "mouiller avec des embossures." In all this, Gilliatt was not taken the least by surprise; the necessity had been foreseen. A seaman would have perceived it by the two pulleys of the top ropes cut in the form of snatch-blocks, and fixed behind the sloop, through which passed two ropes, the ends of which were slung through the rings of the anchors.

Meanwhile the tide was rising fast; the half flood had arrived, a moment when the shock of the waves, even in comparatively moderate weather, may become considerable. Exactly what Gilliatt expected came to pass. The waves rolled violently against the barrier, struck it, broke heavily and passed beneath. Outside was the heavy swell; within, the waters ran quietly. He had devised a sort of marine Furculæ caudinæ. The sea was conquered.

VIII

MOVEMENT RATHER THAN PROGRESS

The moment so long dreaded had come.

The problem now was to place the machinery in the bark.

Gilliatt remained thoughtful for some moments, holding the elbow of his left arm in his right hand, and applying his left hand to his forehead.

Then he climbed upon the wreck, one part of which, containing the engine, was to be parted from it, while the other remained.

He severed the four slings which fixed the four chains from the funnel on the larboard and the starboard sides. The slings being only of cord, his knife served him well enough for this purpose.

The four chains set free, hung down along the sides of the funnel.

From the wreck he climbed up to the apparatus which he had constructed, stamped with his feet upon the beams, inspected the tackle-blocks, looked to the pulleys, handled the cables, examined the eking-pieces, assured himself that the untarred hemp was not saturated through, found that nothing was wanting and nothing giving way; then springing from the height of the suspending props on to the deck, he took up his position near the capstan, in the part of the Durande which he intended to leave jammed in between the two Douvres. This was to be his post during his labours.

Earnest, but troubled with no impulses but what were useful to his work, he took a final glance at the hoisting-tackle, then seized a file and began to saw with it through the chain which held the whole suspended.

The rasping of the file was audible amidst the roaring of the sea.

The chain from the capstan, attached to the regulating gear, was within his reach, quite near his hand.

Suddenly there was a crash. The link which he was filing snapped when only half cut through: the whole apparatus swung violently. He had only just time sufficient to seize the regulating gear.

The severed chain beat against the rock; the eight cables strained; the huge mass, sawed and cut through, detached itself from the wreck; the belly of the hull opened, and the iron flooring of the engine-room was visible below the keel.

If he had not seized the regulating tackle at that instant it would have fallen. But his powerful hand was there, and it descended steadily.

When the brother of Jean Bart, Peter Bart, that powerful and sagacious toper, that poor Dunkirk fisherman, who used to talk familiarly with the Grand Admiral of France, went to the rescue of the galley Langeron, in distress in the Bay of Ambleteuse, endeavouring to save the heavy floating mass in the midst of the breakers of that furious bay, he rolled up the mainsail, tied it with sea-reeds, and trusted to the ties to break away of themselves, and give the sail to the wind at the right moment. Just so Gilliatt trusted to the breaking of the chain; and the same eccentric feat of daring was crowned with the same success.

The tackle, taken in hand by Gilliatt, held out and worked well. Its function, as will be remembered, was to moderate the powers of the apparatus, thus reduced from many to one, by bringing them into united action. The gear had some similarity to a bridle of a bowline, except that instead of trimming a sail it served to balance a complicated mechanism.

Erect, and with his hand upon the capstan, Gilliatt, so to speak, was enabled to feel the pulse of the apparatus.

It was here that his inventive genius manifested itself.

A remarkable coincidence of forces was the result.

While the machinery of the Durande, detached in a mass, was lowering to the sloop, the sloop rose slowly to receive it. The wreck and the salvage vessel assisting each other in opposite ways, saved half the labour of the operation.

The tide swelling quietly between the two Douvres raised the sloop and brought it nearer to the Durande. The sea was more than conquered; it was tamed and broken in. It became, in fact, part and parcel of the organisation of power.

The rising waters lifted the vessel without any sort of shock, gently, and almost with precaution, as one would handle porcelain.

Gilliatt combined and proportioned the two labours, that of the water and that of the apparatus; and standing steadfast at the capstan, like some terrible statue obeyed by all the movement around it at the same moment, regulated the slowness of the descent by the slow rise of the sea.

There was no jerk given by the waters, no slip among the tackle. It was a strange collaboration of all the natural forces subdued. On one side, gravitation lowering the huge bulk, on the other the sea raising the bark.

The attraction of heavenly bodies which causes the tide, and the attractive force of the earth, which men call weight, seemed to conspire together to aid his plans. There was no hesitation, no stoppage in their service; under the dominance of mind these passive forces became active auxiliaries. From minute to minute the work advanced; the interval between the wreck and the sloop diminished insensibly. The approach continued in silence, and as in a sort of terror of the man who stood there. The elements received his orders and fulfilled them.

Nearly at the moment when the tide ceased to raise it, the cable ceased to slide. Suddenly, but without commotion, the pulleys stopped. The vast machine had taken its place in the bark, as if placed there by a powerful hand. It stood straight, upright, motionless, firm. The iron floor of the engine-room rested with its four corners evenly upon the hold.

The work was accomplished.

Gilliatt contemplated it, lost in thought.

He was not the spoiled child of success. He bent under the weight of his great joy. He felt his limbs, as it were, sinking; and contemplating his triumph, he, who had never been shaken by danger, began to tremble.

He gazed upon the sloop under the wreck and at the machinery in the sloop. He seemed to feel it hard to believe it true. It might have been supposed that he had never looked forward to that which he had accomplished. A miracle had been wrought by his hands, and he contemplated it in bewilderment.

His reverie lasted but a short time.

Starting like one awakening from a deep sleep, he seized his saw, cut the eight cables, separated now from the sloop, thanks to the rising of the tide, by only about ten feet; sprang aboard, took a bunch of cord, made four slings, passed them through the rings prepared beforehand, and fixed on both sides aboard the sloop the four chains of the funnel which only an hour before had been still fastened to their places aboard the Durande.

The funnel being secured, he disengaged the upper part of the machinery. A square portion of the planking of the Durande was adhering to it; he struck off the nails and relieved the sloop of this encumbrance of planks and beams; which fell over on to the rocks — a great assistance in lightening it.

For the rest, the sloop, as has been foreseen, behaved well under the burden of the machinery. It had sunk in the water, but only to a good water-line. Although massive, the engine of the Durande was less heavy than the pile of stones and the cannon which he had once brought back from Herm in the sloop.

All then was ended; he had only to depart.

IX

A SLIP BETWEEN CUP AND LIP

All was not ended.

To re-open the gorge thus closed by the portion of the Durande’s bulwarks, and at once to push out with the sloop beyond the rocks, nothing could appear more clear and simple. On the ocean every minute is urgent. There was little wind; scarcely a wrinkle on the open sea. The afternoon was beautiful, and promised a fine night. The sea, indeed, was calm, but the ebb had begun. The moment was favourable for starting. There would be the ebb-tide for leaving the Douvres; and the flood would carry him into Guernsey. It would be possible to be at St. Sampson’s at daybreak.

But an unexpected obstacle presented itself. There was a flaw in his arrangements which had baffled all his foresight.

The machinery was freed; but the chimney was not.

The tide, by raising the sloop to the wreck suspended in the air, had diminished the dangers of the descent, and abridged the labour. But this diminution of the interval had left the top of the funnel entangled in the kind of gaping frame formed by the open hull of the Durande. The funnel was held fast there as between four walls.

The services rendered by the sea had been accompanied by that unfortunate drawback. It seemed as if the waves, constrained to obey, had avenged themselves by a malicious trick.

It is true that what the flood-tide had done, the ebb would undo.

The funnel, which was rather more than three fathoms in height, was buried more than eight feet in the wreck. The water-level would fall about twelve feet. Thus the funnel descending with the falling tide would have four feet of room to spare, and would clear itself easily.

But how much time would elapse before that release would be completed? Six hours.

In six hours it would be near midnight. What means would there be of attempting to start at such an hour? What channel could he find among all those breakers, so full of dangers even by day? How was he to risk his vessel in the depth of black night in that inextricable labyrinth, that ambuscade of shoals?

There was not help for it. He must wait for the morrow. These six hours lost, entailed a loss of twelve hours at least.

He could not even advance the labour by opening the mouth of the gorge. His breakwater was necessary against the next tide.

He was compelled to rest. Folding his arms was almost the only thing which he had not yet done since his arrival on the rocks.

This forced inaction irritated, almost vexed him with himself, as if it had been his fault. He thought “what would Déruchette say of me if she saw me thus doing nothing?”

And yet this interval for regaining his strength was not unnecessary.

The sloop was now at his command; he determined to pass the night in it.

He mounted once more to fetch his sheepskin upon the Great Douvre; descended again, supped off a few limpets and châtaignes de mer, drank, being very thirsty, a few draughts of water from his can, which was nearly empty, enveloped himself in the skin, the wool of which felt comforting, lay down like a watch-dog beside the engine, drew his red cap over his eyes and slept.

His sleep was profound. It was such sleep as men enjoy who have completed a great labour.

X

SEA-WARNINGS

In the middle of the night he awoke suddenly and with a jerk like the recoil of a spring.

He opened his eyes.

The Douvres, rising high over his head, were lighted up as by the white glow of burning embers. Over all the dark escarpment of the rock there was a light like the reflection of a fire.

Where could this fire come from?

It was from the water.

The aspect of the sea was extraordinary.

The water seemed a-fire. As far as the eye could reach, among the reefs and beyond them, the sea ran with flame. The flame was not red; it had nothing in common with the grand living fires of volcanic craters or of great furnaces. There was no sparkling, no glare, no purple edges, no noise. Long trails of a pale tint simulated upon the water the folds of a winding-sheet. A trembling glow was spread over the waves. It was the spectre of a great fire, rather than the fire itself. It was in some degree like the glow of unearthly flames lighting the inside of a sepulchre. A burning darkness.

The night itself, dim, vast, and wide-diffused, was the fuel of that cold flame. It was a strange illumination issuing out of blindness. The shadows even formed part of that phantom-fire.

The sailors of the Channel are familiar with those indescribable phosphorescences, full of warning for the navigator. They are nowhere more surprising than in the “Great V,” near Isigny.

By this light, surrounding objects lose their reality. A spectral glimmer renders them, as it were, transparent. Rocks become no more than outlines. Cables of anchors look like iron bars heated to a white heat. The nets of the fishermen beneath the water seem webs of fire. The half of the oar above the waves is dark as ebony, the rest in the sea like silver. The drops from the blades uplifted from the water fall in starry showers upon the sea. Every boat leaves a furrow behind it like a comet’s tail. The sailors, wet and luminous, seem like men in flames. If you plunge a hand into the water, you withdraw it clothed in flame. The flame is dead, and is not felt. Your arm becomes a firebrand. You see the forms of things in the sea roll beneath the waves as in liquid fire. The foam twinkles. The fish are tongues of fire, or fragments of the forked lightning, moving in the depths.

The reflection of this brightness had passed over the closed eyelids of Gilliatt in the sloop. It was this that had awakened him.

His awakening was opportune.

The ebb tide had run out, and the waters were beginning to rise again. The funnel, which had become disengaged during his sleep, was about to enter again into the yawning hollow above it.

It was rising slowly.

A rise of another foot would have entangled it in the wreck again. A rise of one foot is equivalent to half-an-hour's tide. If he intended, therefore, to take advantage of that temporary deliverance once more within his reach, he had just half-an-hour before him.

He leaped to his feet.

Urgent as the situation was, he stood for a few moments meditative, contemplating the phosphorescence of the waves.

Gilliatt knew the sea in all its phases. Notwithstanding all her tricks, and often as he had suffered from her terrors, he had long been her companion. That mysterious entity which we call the ocean had nothing in its secret thoughts which he could not divine. Observation, meditation, and solitude, had given him a quick perception of coming changes, of wind, or cloud, or wave.

Gilliatt hastened to the top ropes and payed out some cable; then being no longer held fast by the anchors, he seized the boat-hook of the sloop, and pushed her towards the entrance to the gorge some fathoms from the Durande, and quite near to the breakwater. Here, as the Guernsey sailors say, it had du rang. In less than ten minutes the sloop was withdrawn from beneath the carcase of the wreck. There was no further danger of the funnel being caught in a trap. The tide might rise now.

And yet Gilliatt's manner was not that of one about to take his departure.

He stood considering the light upon the sea once more; but his thoughts were not of starting. He was thinking of how to fix the sloop again, and how to fix it more firmly than ever, though near to the exit from the defile.

Up to this time he had only used the two anchors of the sloop and had not yet employed the little anchor of the Durande, which he had found, as will be remembered, among the breakers. This anchor had been deposited by him in readiness for any emergency, in a corner of the sloop, with a quantity of hawsers, and blocks of top-ropes, and his cable, all furnished beforehand with large knots, which prevented its dragging. He now let go this third anchor, taking care to fasten the cable to a rope, one end of which was slung through the anchor ring, while the other was attached to the windlass of the sloop. In this manner he made a kind of triangular, triple anchorage, much stronger than the moorings with two anchors. All this indicated keen anxiety, and a redoubling of precautions. A sailor would have seen in this operation something similar to an anchorage in bad weather, when there is fear of a current which might carry the vessel under the wind.

The phosphorescence which he had been observing, and upon which his eye was now fixed once more, was threatening, but serviceable at the same time. But for it he would have been held fast locked in sleep, and deceived by the night. The strange appearance upon the sea had awakened him, and made things about him visible.

The light which it shed among the rocks was, indeed, ominous; but disquieting as it appeared to be to Gilliatt, it had served to show him the dangers of his position, and had rendered possible his operations in extricating the sloop. Henceforth, whenever he should be able to set sail, the vessel, with its freight of machinery, would be free.

And yet the idea of departing was further than ever from his mind. The sloop being fixed in its new position, he went in quest of the strongest chain which he had in his store-cavern, and attaching it to the nails driven into the two Douvres, he fortified from within with this chain the rampart of planks and beams, already protected from without by the cross chain. Far from opening the entrance to the defile, he made the barrier more complete.

The phosphorescence lighted him still, but it was diminishing. The day, however, was beginning to break.

Suddenly he paused to listen.

XI

A WORD TO THE WISE IS ENOUGH

A feeble, indistinct sound seemed to reach his ear from somewhere in the far distance.

At certain hours the great deeps give forth a murmuring noise.

He listened a second time. The distant noise recommenced. Gilliatt shook his head like one who recognises at last something familiar to him.

A few minutes later he was at the other extremity of the alley between the rocks, at the entrance facing the east, which had remained open until then, and by heavy blows of his hammer was driving large nails into the sides of the gullet near “The Man Rock,” as he had done at the gullet of the Douvres.

The crevices of these rocks were prepared and well furnished with timber, almost all of which was heart of oak. The rock on this side being much broken up, there were abundant cracks, and he was able to fix even more nails there than in the base of the two Douvres.

Suddenly, and as if some great breath had passed over it, the luminous appearance on the waters vanished. The twilight becoming paler every moment, assumed its functions.

The nails being driven, Gilliatt dragged beams and cords, and then chains to the spot; and without taking his eyes off his work, or permitting his mind to be diverted for a moment, he began to construct across the gorge of “The Man” with beams fixed horizontally, and made fast by cables, one of those open barriers which science has now adopted under the name of breakwaters.

Those who have witnessed, for example, at La Rocquaine in Guernsey, or at Bourg-d’Eau in France, the effect produced by a few posts fixed in the rock, will understand the power of these simple preparations. This sort of breakwater is a combination of what is called in France épi with what is known in England as “a dam.” The breakwater is the chevaux-de-frise of fortifications against tempests. Man can only struggle against the sea by taking advantage of this principle of dividing its forces.

Meanwhile, the sun had risen, and was shining brightly. The sky was clear, the sea calm.

Gilliatt pressed on his work. He, too, was calm; but there was anxiety in his haste. He passed with long strides from rock to rock, and returned dragging wildly sometimes a rider, sometimes a binding strake. The utility of all this preparation of timbers now became manifest. It was evident that he was about to confront a danger which he had foreseen.

A strong iron bar served him as a lever for moving the beams.

The work was executed so fast that it was rather a rapid growth than a construction. He who has never seen a military pontooner at his work can scarcely form an idea of this rapidity.

The eastern gullet was still narrower than the western. There were but five or six feet of interval between the rocks. The smallness of this opening was an assistance. The space to be fortified and closed up being very little, the apparatus would be stronger, and might be more simple. Horizontal beams, therefore, sufficed, the upright ones being useless.

The first cross pieces of the breakwater being fixed, Gilliatt mounted upon them and listened once more.

The murmurs had become significant.

He continued his construction. He supported it with the two cat-heads of the Durande, bound to the frame of beams by cords passed through the three pulley-sheaves. He made the whole fast by chains.

The construction was little more than a colossal hurdle, having beams for rods and chains in the place of wattles.

It seemed woven together, quite as much as built.

He multiplied the fastenings, and added nails where they were necessary.

Having obtained a great quantity of bar iron from the wreck, he had been able to make a large number of these heavy nails.

While still at work, he broke some biscuit with his teeth. He was thirsty, but he could not drink, having no more fresh water. He had emptied the can at his meal of the evening before.

He added afterwards four or five more pieces of timber; then climbed again upon the barrier and listened.

The noises from the horizon had ceased; all was still.

The sea was smooth and quiet; deserving all those complimentary phrases which worthy citizens bestow upon it when satisfied with a trip. “A mirror,” “a pond,” “like oil,” and so forth. The deep blue of the sky responded to the deep green tint of the ocean. The sapphire and the emerald hues vied with each other. Each were perfect. Not a cloud on high, not a line of foam below. In the midst of all this splendour, the April sun rose magnificently. It was impossible to imagine a lovelier day.

On the verge of the horizon a flight of birds of passage formed a long dark line against the sky. They were flying fast as if alarmed.

Gilliatt set to work again to raise the breakwater.

He raised it as high as he could; as high, indeed, as the curving of the rocks would permit.

Towards noon the sun appeared to him to give more than its usual warmth. Noon is the critical time of the day. Standing upon the powerful frame which he had built up, he paused again to survey the wide expanse.

The sea was more than tranquil. It was a dull dead calm. No sail was visible. The sky was everywhere clear; but from blue it had become white. The whiteness was singular. To the west, and upon the horizon, was a little spot of a sickly hue. The spot remained in the same place, but by degrees grew larger. Near the breakers the waves shuddered; but very gently.

Gilliatt had done well to build his breakwater.

A tempest was approaching.

The elements had determined to give battle.

BOOK III

THE STRUGGLE

I

EXTREMES MEET

Nothing is more threatening than a late equinox.

The appearance of the sea presents a strange phenomenon, resulting from what may be called the arrival of the ocean winds.

In all seasons, but particularly at the epoch of the Syzygies, at the moment when least expected, the sea sometimes becomes singularly tranquil. That vast perpetual movement ceases; a sort of drowsiness and languor overspreads it; and it seems weary and about to rest. Every rag of bunting, from the tiny streamer of the fishing-boat to the great flag of ships of war, droops against the mast. The admiral’s flag, the Royal and Imperial ensigns sleep alike.

Suddenly all these streamers begin to flutter gently.

If there happen to be clouds, the moment has then come for marking the formation of the cirri; if the sun is setting, for observing the red tints of the horizon; or if it be night and there is a moon, for looking attentively for the halo.

It is then that the captain or commander of a squadron, if he happen to possess one of those storm indicators, the inventor of which is unknown, notes his instrument carefully and takes his precautions against the south wind, if the clouds have an appearance like dissolved sugar; or against the north, if they exfoliate in crystallisations like brakes of brambles, or like fir woods. Then, too, the poor Irish or Breton fisherman, after having consulted some mysterious gnomon engraved by the Romans or by demons upon one of those straight enigmatical stones, which are called in Brittany Menhir, and in Ireland Cruach, hauls his boat up on the shore.

Meanwhile the serenity of sky and ocean continues. The day dawns radiant, and Aurora smiles. It was this which filled the old poets and seers with religious horror; for men dared to suspect the falsity of the sun. Solem quis dicere falsum audeat?

The sombre vision of nature’s secret laws is interdicted to man by the fatal opacity of surrounding things. The most terrible and perfidious of her aspects is that which masks the convulsions of the deep.

Some hours, and even days sometimes, pass thus. Pilots raise their telescopes here and there. The faces of old seamen have always an expression of severity left upon them by the vexation of perpetually looking out for changes.

Suddenly a great confused murmur is heard. A sort of mysterious dialogue takes place in the air.

Nothing unusual is seen.

The wide expanse is tranquil.

Yet the noises increase. The dialogue becomes more audible.

There is something beyond the horizon.

Something terrible. It is the wind.

The wind; or rather that populace of Titans which we call the gale. The unseen multitude.

India knew them as the Maroubs, Judea as the Keroubim, Greece as the Aquilones. They are the invisible winged creatures of the Infinite. Their blasts sweep over the earth.

II

THE OCEAN WINDS

They come from the immeasurable deep. Their wide wings need the breadth of the ocean gulf; the spaciousness of desert solitudes. The Atlantic, the Pacific — those vast blue plains — are their delight. They hasten thither in flocks. Commander Page witnessed, far out at sea, seven waterspouts at once. They wander there, wild and terrible! The ever-ending yet eternal flux and reflux is their work. The extent of their power, the limits of their will, none know. They are the Sphinxes of the abyss: Gama was their [OE]dipus. In that dark, ever-moving expanse, they appear with faces of cloud. He who perceives their pale lineaments in that wide dispersion, the horizon of the sea, feels himself in presence of an unsubduable power. It might be imagined that the proximity of human intelligence disquieted them, and that they revolted against it. The mind of man is invincible, but the elements baffle him. He can do nothing against the power which is everywhere, and which none can bind. The gentle breath becomes a gale, smites with the force of a war-club, and then becomes gentle again. The winds attack with a terrible crash, and defend themselves by fading into nothingness. He who would encounter them must use artifice. Their varying tactics, their swift redoubled blows, confuse. They fly as often as they attack. They are tenacious and impalpable. Who can circumvent them? The prow of the Argo, cut from an oak of Dodona's grove, that mysterious pilot of the bark, spoke to them, and they insulted that pilot-goddess. Columbus, beholding their approach at La Pinta, mounted upon the poop, and addressed them with the first verses of St. John's Gospel. Surcouf defied them: "Here come the gang," he used to say. Napier greeted them with cannon-balls. They assume the dictatorship of chaos.

Chaos is theirs, in which to wreak their mysterious vengeance: the den of the winds is more monstrous than that of lions. How many corpses lie in its deep recesses, where the howling gusts sweep without pity over that obscure and ghastly mass! The winds are heard wheresoever they go, but they give ear to none. Their acts resemble crimes. None know on whom they cast their hoary surf; with what ferocity they hover over shipwrecks, looking at times as if they flung their impious foam-flakes in the face of heaven. They are the tyrants of unknown regions. “Luoghi spaventosi,” murmured the Venetian mariners.

The trembling fields of space are subjected to their fierce assaults. Things unspeakable come to pass in those deserted regions. Some horseman rides in the gloom; the air is full of a forest sound; nothing is visible; but the tramp of cavalcades is heard. The noonday is overcast with sudden night; a tornado passes. Or it is midnight, which suddenly becomes bright as day; the polar lights are in the heavens. Whirlwinds pass in opposite ways, and in a sort of hideous dance, a stamping of the storms upon the waters. A cloud overburdened opens and falls to earth. Other clouds, filled with red light, flash and roar; then frown again ominously. Emptied of their lightnings, they are but as spent brands. Pent-up rains dissolve in mists. Yonder sea appears a fiery furnace in which the rains are falling: flames seem to issue from the waves. The white gleam of the ocean under the shower is reflected to marvellous distances. The different masses transform themselves into uncouth shapes. Monstrous whirlpools make strange hollows in the sky. The vapours revolve, the waves spin, the giddy Naiads roll; sea and sky are livid; noises as of cries of despair are in the air.

Great sheaves of shadow and darkness are gathered up, trembling in the far depths of the sky. Now and then there is a convulsion. The rumour becomes tumult as the wave becomes surge. The horizon, a confused mass of strata, oscillating ceaselessly, murmurs in a continual undertone. Strange and sudden outbursts break through the monotony. Cold airs rush forth, succeeded by warm blasts. The trepidation of the sea betokens anxious expectation, agony, terror profound. Suddenly the hurricane comes down, like a wild beast, to drink of the ocean: a monstrous draught! The sea rises to the invisible mouth; a mound of water is formed; the swell increases, and the waterspout appears; the Prester of the ancients, stalactite above, stalagmite below, a whirling double-inverted cone, a point in equilibrium upon another, the embrace of two mountains — a mountain of foam ascending, a mountain of vapour descending — terrible coition of the cloud and the wave. Like the column in Holy Writ, the waterspout is dark by day and luminous by night. In its presence the thunder itself is silent and seems cowed.

The vast commotion of those solitudes has its gamut, a terrible crescendo. There are the gust, the squall, the storm, the gale, the tempest, the whirlwind, the waterspout — the seven chords of the lyre of the winds, the seven notes of the firmament. The heavens are a clear space, the sea a vast round; but a breath passes, they have vanished, and all is fury and wild confusion.

Such are these inhospitable realms.

The winds rush, fly, swoop down, dwindle away, commence again; hover above, whistle, roar, and smile; they are frenzied, wanton, unbridled, or sinking at ease upon the raging waves. Their howlings have a harmony of their own. They make all the heavens sonorous. They blow in the cloud as in a trumpet; they sing through the infinite space with the mingled tones of clarions, horns, bugles, and trumpets — a sort of Promethean fanfare.

Such was the music of ancient Pan. Their harmonies are terrible. They have a colossal joy in the darkness. They drive and disperse great ships. Night and day, in all seasons, from the tropics to the pole, there is no truce; sounding their fatal trumpet through the tangled thickets of the clouds and waves, they pursue the grim chase of vessels in distress. They have their packs of bloodhounds, and take their pleasure, setting them to bark among the rocks and billows. They huddle the clouds together, and drive them diverse. They mould and knead the supple waters as with a million hands.

The water is supple because it is incompressible. It slips away without effort. Borne down on one side, it escapes on the other. It is thus that waters become waves, and that the billows are a token of their liberty.

III

THE NOISES EXPLAINED

The grand descent of winds upon the world takes place at the equinoxes. At this period the balance of tropic and pole librates, and the vast atmospheric tides pour their flood upon one hemisphere and their ebb upon another. The signs of Libra and Aquarius have reference to these phenomena.

It is the time of tempests.

The sea awaits their coming, keeping silence.

Sometimes the sky looks sickly. Its face is wan. A thick dark veil obscures it. The mariners observe with uneasiness the angry aspect of the clouds.

But it is its air of calm contentment which they dread the most. A smiling sky in the equinoxes is the tempest in gay disguise. It was under skies like these that “The Tower of Weeping Women,” in Amsterdam, was filled with wives and mothers scanning the far horizon.

When the vernal or autumnal storms delay to break, they are gathering strength; hoarding up their fury for more sure destruction. Beware of the gale that has been long delayed. It was Angot who said that “the sea pays well old debts.”

When the delay is unusually long, the sea betokens her impatience only by a deeper calm, but the magnetic intensity manifests itself by what might be called a fiery humour in the sea. Fire issues from the waves; electric air, phosphoric water. The sailors feel a strange lassitude. This time is particularly perilous for iron vessels; their hulls are then liable to produce variations of the compass, leading them to destruction. The transatlantic steam-vessel Iowa perished from this cause.

To those who are familiar with the sea, its aspect at these moments is singular. It may be imagined to be both desiring and fearing the approach of the cyclone. Certain unions, though strongly urged by nature, are attended by this strange conjunction of terror and desire. The lioness in her tenderest moods flies from the lion. Thus the sea, in the fire of her passion, trembles at the near approach of her union with the tempest. The nuptials are prepared. Like the marriages of the ancient emperors, they are celebrated with immolations. The fête is heralded with disasters.

Meanwhile, from yonder deeps, from the great open sea, from the unapproachable latitudes, from the lurid horizon of the watery waste, from the utmost bounds of the free ocean, the winds pour down.

Listen; for this is the famous equinox.

The storm prepares mischief. In the old mythology these entities were recognised, indistinctly moving, in the grand scene of nature. Eolus plotted with Boreas. The alliance of element with element is necessary; they divide their task. One has to give impetus to the wave, the cloud, the stream: night is an auxiliary, and must be employed. There are compasses to be falsified, beacons to be extinguished, lanterns of lighthouses to be masked, stars to be hidden. The sea must lend her aid. Every storm is preceded by a murmur. Behind the horizon line there is a premonitory whispering among the hurricanes.

This is the noise which is heard afar off in the darkness amidst the terrible silence of the sea.

It was this significant whispering which Gilliatt had noted. The phosphorescence on the water had been the first warning: this murmur the second.

If the demon Legion exists, he is assuredly no other than the wind.

The wind is complex, but the air is one.

Hence it follows that all storms are mixed — a principle which results from the unity of the air.

The entire abyss of heaven takes part in a tempest: the entire ocean also. The totality of its forces is marshalled for the strife. A wave is the ocean gulf; a gust is a gulf of the atmosphere. A contest with a storm is a contest with all the powers of sea and sky.

It was Messier, that great authority among naval men, the pensive astronomer of the little lodge at Cluny, who said, “The wind comes from everywhere and is everywhere.” He had no faith in the idea of winds imprisoned even in inland seas. With him there were no Mediterranean winds; he declared that he recognised them as they wandered about the earth. He affirmed that on a certain day, at a certain hour, the Föhn of the Lake of Constance, the ancient Favonius of Lucretius, had traversed the horizon of Paris; on another day, the Bora of the Adriatic; on another day, the whirling Notus, which is supposed to be confined in the round of the Cyclades. He indicated their currents. He did not believe it impossible that the “Autan,” which circulates between Corsica and the Balearic Isles, could escape from its bounds. He did not admit the theory of winds imprisoned like bears in their dens. It was he, too, who said that “every rain comes from the tropics, and every flash of lightning from the pole.” The wind, in fact, becomes saturated with electricity at the intersection of the colures which marks the extremity of the axis, and with water at the equator; bringing moisture from the equatorial line and the electric fluid from the poles.

The wind is ubiquitous.

It is certainly not meant by this that the winds never move in zones. Nothing is better established than the existence of those continuous air currents; and aerial navigation by means of the wind boats, to which the passion for Greek terminology has given the name of “aeroscaphes,” may one day succeed in utilising the chief of these streams of wind. The regular course of air streams is an incontestable fact. There are both rivers of wind and rivulets of wind, although their branches are exactly the reverse of water currents: for in the air it is the rivulets which flow out of the rivers, and the smaller rivers which flow out of the great streams instead of falling into them. Hence instead of concentration we have dispersion.

The united action of the winds and the unity of the atmosphere result from this dispersion. The displacement of one molecule produces the displacement of another. The vast body of air becomes subject to one agitation. To these profound causes of coalition we must add the irregular surface of the earth, whose mountains furrow the atmosphere, contorting and diverting the winds from their course, and determining the directions of counter currents in infinite radiations.

The phenomenon of the wind is the oscillation of two oceans one against the other; the ocean of air, superimposed upon the ocean of water, rests upon these currents, and is convulsed with this vast agitation.

The indivisible cannot produce separate action. No partition divides wave from wave. The islands of the Channel feel the influence of the Cape of Good Hope. Navigation everywhere contends with the same monster; the sea is one hydra. The waves cover it as with a coat of scales. The ocean is Ceto.

Upon that unity reposes an infinite variety.

IV

TURBA TURMA

According to the compass there are thirty-two winds, that is to say, thirty-two points. But these directions may be subdivided indefinitely. Classed by its directions, the wind is incalculable; classed by its kinds, it is infinite. Homer himself would have shrunk from the task of enumerating them.

The polar current encounters the tropical current. Heat and cold are thus combined; the equilibrium is distributed by a shock, the wave of wind issues forth and is distended, scattered and broken up in every direction in fierce streams. The dispersion of the gusts shakes the streaming locks of the wind upon the four corners of the horizon.

All the winds which blow are there. The wind of the Gulf Stream, which disgorges the great fogs of Newfoundland; the wind of Peru, in the region of silent heavens, where no man ever heard the thunder roar; the wind of Nova Scotia, where flies the great auk (Alca impennis) with his furrowed beak; the iron whirlwinds of the Chinese seas; the wind of Mozambique, which destroys the canoes and junks; the electric wind, which the people of Japan denounce by the beating of a gong; the African wind, which blows between Table Mountain and the Devil’s Peak, where it gains its liberty; the currents of the equator, which pass over the trade winds, describing a parabola, the summit of which is always to the west; the Plutonian wind, which issues from craters, the terrible breath of flames; the singular wind peculiar to the volcano Awa, which occasions a perpetual olive tint in the north; the Java monsoon, against which the people construct those casemates known as hurricane houses; the branching north winds called by the English “Bush winds;” the curved squalls of the Straits of Malacca, observed by Horsburgh; the powerful south-west wind, called Pampero in Chili, and Rebojo at Buenos Ayres, which carries the great condor out to sea, and saves him from the pit where the Indian, concealed under a bullock-hide newly stripped, watches for him, lying on his back and bending his great bow with his feet; the chemical wind, which, according to Lemery, produces thunder-bolts from the clouds; the Harmattan of the Caffres; the Polar snow-driver, which harnesses itself to the everlasting icebergs; the wind of the Gulf of Bengal, which sweeps over a continent to pillage the triangular town of wooden booths at Nijni-Novogorod, in which is held the great fair of Asia; the wind of the Cordilleras, agitator of great waves and forests; the wind of the Australian Archipelago, where the bee-hunters take the wild hives hidden under the forks of the branches of the giant eucalyptus; the Sirocco, the Mistral, the Hurricane, the dry winds, the inundating and diluvian winds, the torrid winds, which scatter dust from the plains of Brazil upon the streets of Genoa, which both obey and revolt against diurnal rotation, and of which Herrara said, "Malo viento torna contra el sol;" those winds which hunt in couples, conspiring mischief, the one undoing the work of the other; and those old winds which assailed Columbus on the coast of Veragua, and which during forty days, from the 21st of October to the 28th of November 1520, delayed and nearly frustrated Magellan's approach to the Pacific; and those which dismasted the Armada and confounded Philip II. Others, too, there are, of the names of which there is no end. The winds, for instance, which carry showers of frogs and locusts, and drive before them clouds of living things across the ocean; those which blow in what are called "Wind-leaps," and whose function is to destroy ships at sea; those which at a single blast throw the cargo out of trim, and compel the vessel to continue her course half broadside over; the winds which construct the circum-cumuli; the winds which mass together the circum-strati; the dark heavy winds swelled with rains; the winds of the hailstorms; the fever winds, whose approach sets the salt springs and sulphur springs of Calabria boiling; those which give a glittering appearance to the fur of African panthers, prowling among the bushes of Cape Ferro; those which come shaking from the cloud, like the tongue of a trigonocephal, the terrible forked lightning; and those which bring whirlwinds of black snow. Such is the legion of winds.

The Douvres rock heard their distant tramp at the moment when Gilliatt was constructing his breakwater.

As we have said, the wind means the combination of all the winds of the earth.

V

GILLIATT'S ALTERNATIVES

The mysterious forces had chosen their time well.

Chance, if chance exists, is sometimes far-seeing.

While the sloop had been anchored in the little creek of "The Man Rock," and as long as the machinery had been prisoned in the wreck, Gilliatt's position had been impregnable. The sloop was in safety; the machinery sheltered. The Douvres, which held the hull of the Durande fast, condemned it to slow destruction, but protected it against unexpected accidents. In any event, one resource had remained to him. If the engine had been destroyed, Gilliatt would have been uninjured. He had still the sloop by which to escape.

But to wait till the sloop was removed from the anchorage where she was inaccessible; to allow it to be fixed in the defile of the Douvres; to watch until the sloop, too, was, as it were, entangled in the rocks; to permit him to complete the salvage, the moving, and the final embarkation of the machinery; to do no damage to that wonderful construction by which one man was enabled to put the whole aboard his bark; to acquiesce, in fact, in the success of his exploits so far; this was but the trap which the elements had laid for him. Now for the first time he began to perceive in all its sinister characteristics the trick which the sea had been meditating so long.

The machinery, the sloop, and their master were all now within the gorge of the rocks. They formed but a single point. One blow, and the sloop might be dashed to pieces on the rock, the machinery destroyed, and Gilliatt drowned.

The situation could not have been more critical.

The sphinx, which men have imagined concealing herself in the cloud, seemed to mock him with a dilemma.

"Go or stay."

To go would have been madness; to remain was terrible.

VI

THE COMBAT

Gilliatt ascended to the summit of the Great Douvre.

From hence he could see around the horizon.

The western side was appalling. A wall of cloud spread across it, barring the wide expanse from side to side, and ascending slowly from the horizon towards the zenith. This wall, straight lined, vertical, without a crevice in its height, without a rent in its structure, seemed built by the square and measured by the plumb-line. It was cloud in the likeness of granite. Its escarpment, completely perpendicular at the southern extremity, curved a little towards the north, like a bent sheet of iron, presenting the steep slippery face of an inclined plane. The dark wall enlarged and grew; but its entablature never ceased for a moment to be parallel with the horizon line, which was almost indistinguishable in the gathering darkness. Silently, and altogether, the airy battlements ascended. No undulation, no wrinkle, no projection changed its shape or moved its place. The aspect of this immobility in movement was impressive. The sun, pale in the midst of a strange sickly transparence, lighted up this outline of the Apocalypse. Already the cloudy bank had blotted out one half the space of the sky: shelving like the fearful talus of the abyss. It was the uprising of a dark mountain between earth and heaven.

It was night falling suddenly upon midday.

There was a heat in the air as from an oven door, coming from that mysterious mass on mass. The sky, which from blue had become white, was now turning from white to a slatey grey. The sea beneath was leaden-hued and dull. There was no breath, no wave, no noise. Far as eye could reach, the desert ocean. No sail was visible on any side. The birds had disappeared. Some monstrous treason seemed abroad.

The wall of cloud grew visibly larger.

This moving mountain of vapours, which was approaching the Douvres, was one of those clouds which might be called the clouds of battle. Sinister appearances; some strange, furtive glance seemed cast upon the beholder through that obscure mass up-piled.

The approach was terrible.

Gilliatt observed it closely, and muttered to himself, “I am thirsty enough, but you will give me plenty to drink.”

He stood there motionless a few moments, his eye fixed upon the cloud bank, as if mentally taking a sounding of the tempest.

His galérienne was in the pocket of his jacket; he took it out and placed it on his head. Then he fetched from the cave, which had so long served him for a sleeping-place, a few things which he had kept there in reserve; he put on his overalls, and attired himself in his waterproof overcoat, like a knight who puts on his armour at the moment of battle. He had no shoes; but his naked feet had become hardened to the rocks.

This preparation for the storm being completed, he looked down upon his breakwater, grasped the knotted cord hurriedly, descended from the plateau of the Douvre, stepped on to the rocks below, and hastened to his store cavern. A few moments later he was at work. The vast silent cloud might have heard the strokes of his hammer. With the nails, ropes, and beams which still remained, he constructed for the eastern gullet a second frame, which he succeeded in fixing at ten or twelve feet from the other.

The silence was still profound. The blades of grass between the cracks of the rocks were not stirred.

The sun disappeared suddenly. Gilliatt looked up.

The rising cloud had just reached it. It was like the blotting out of day, succeeded by a mingled pale reflection.

The immense wall of cloud had changed its appearance. It no longer retained its unity. It had curved on reaching the zenith, whence it spread horizontally over the rest of the heavens. It had now its various stages. The tempest formation was visible, like the strata in the side of a trench. It was possible to distinguish the layers of the rain from the beds of hail. There was no lightning, but a horrible, diffused glare; for the idea of horror may be attached to light. The vague breathing of the storm was audible; the silence was broken by an obscure palpitation. Gilliatt, silent also, watched the giant blocks of vapour grouping themselves overhead forming the shapeless mass of clouds. Upon the horizon brooded and lengthened out a band of mist of ashen hue; in the zenith, another band of lead colour. Pale, ragged fragments of cloud hung from the great mass above upon the mist below. The pile of cloud which formed the background was wan, dull, gloomy. A thin, whitish transverse cloud, coming no one could tell whither, cut the high dark wall obliquely from north to south. One of the extremities of this cloud trailed along the surface of the sea. At the point where it touched the waters, a dense red vapour was visible in the midst of the darkness. Below it, smaller clouds, quite black and very low, were flying as if bewildered or moved by opposite currents of air. The immense cloud beyond increased from all points at once, darkened the eclipse, and continued to spread its sombre pall. In the east, behind Gilliatt, there was only one clear porch in the heavens, which was rapidly being closed. Without any feeling of wind abroad, a strange flight of grey downy particles seemed to pass; they were fine and scattered as if some gigantic bird had been plucked of its plumage behind the bank of cloud. A dark compact roof had gradually formed itself, which on the verge of the horizon touched the sea, and mingled in darkness with it. The beholder had a vague sense of something advancing steadily towards him. It was vast, heavy, ominous. Suddenly an immense peal of thunder burst upon the air.

Gilliatt himself felt the shock. The rude reality in the midst of that visionary region has something in it terrific. The listener might fancy that he hears something falling in the chamber of giants. No electric flash accompanied the report. It was a blind peal. The silence was profound again. There was an interval, as when combatants take up their position. Then appeared slowly, one after the other, great shapeless flashes; these flashes were silent. The wall of cloud was now a vast cavern, with roofs and arches. Outlines of forms were traceable among them; monstrous heads were vaguely shadowed forth; rocks seemed to stretch out; elephants bearing turrets, seen for a moment, vanished. A column of vapour, straight, round, and dark, and surmounted by a white mist, simulated the form of a colossal steam-vessel engulfed, hissing, and smoking beneath the waves. Sheets of cloud undulated like folds of giant flags. In the centre, under a thick purple pall, a nucleus of dense fog sunk motionless, inert, impenetrable by the electric fires; a sort of hideous fœtus in the bosom of the tempest.

Suddenly Gilliatt felt a breath moving his hair. Two or three large spots of rain fell heavily around him on the rock. Then there was a second thunder-clap. The wind was rising.

The terror of darkness was at its highest point. The first peal of thunder had shaken the sea; the second rent the wall of cloud from top to base; breach was visible; the pent-up deluge rushed towards it; the rent became like a gulf filled with rain. The outpouring of the tempest had begun.

The moment was terrible.

Rain, wind, lightnings, thunder, waves swirling upwards to the clouds, foam, hoarse noises, whistlings, mingled together like monsters suddenly unloosened.

For a solitary man, imprisoned with an overloaded vessel, between two dangerous rocks in mid-ocean, no crisis could have been more menacing. The danger of the tide, over which he had triumphed, was nothing compared with the danger of the tempest.

Surrounded on all sides by dangers, Gilliatt, at the last moment, and before the crowning peril, had developed an ingenious strategy. He had secured his basis of operations in the enemies' territory; had pressed the rock into his service. The Douvres, originally his enemy, had become his second in that immense duel. Out of that sepulchre he had constructed a fortress. He was built up among those formidable sea ruins. He was blockaded, but well defended. He had, so to speak, set his back against the wall, and stood face to face with the hurricane. He had barricaded the narrow strait, that highway of the waves. This, indeed, was the only possible course. It seemed as if the ocean, like other despots, might be brought to reason by the aid of barricades. The sloop might be considered secure on three sides. Closely wedged between the two interior walls of the rock, made fast by three anchorings, she was sheltered from the north by the Little Douvre, on the south by the Great one; terrible escarpments, more accustomed to wreck vessels than to save them. On the western side she was protected by the frame of timbers made fast and nailed to the rocks — a tried barrier which had withstood the rude flood-tide of the sea; a veritable citadel-gate, having for its sides the columns of the rock — the two Douvres themselves. Nothing was to be feared from that side. It was on the eastern side only that there was danger.

On that side there was no protection but the breakwater. A breakwater is an apparatus for dividing and distributing. It requires at least two frames. Gilliatt had only had time to construct one. He was compelled to build the second in the very presence of the tempest.

Fortunately the wind came from the north-west. The wind is not always adroit in its attacks. The north-west wind, which is the ancient "galerno," had little effect upon the Douvres. It assailed the rocks in flank, and drove the waves neither against the one nor the other of the two gullets; so that instead of rushing into a defile, they dashed themselves against a wall.

But the currents of the wind are curved, and it was probable that there would be some sudden change. If it should veer to the east before the second frame could be constructed the peril would be great. The irruption of the sea into the gorge would be complete, and all would probably be lost.

The wildness of the storm went on increasing. The essence of a tempest is the rapid succession of its blows. That is its strength; but it is also its weakness. Its fury gives the opportunity to human intelligence, and man spies its weak points for his defence; but under what overwhelming assaults! No respite, no interruption, no truce, no pause for taking breath. There seems an unspeakable cowardice in that prodigality of inexhaustible resources.

All the tumult of the wide expanse rushed towards the Douvres. Voices were heard in the darkness. What could they be? The ancient terror of the sea was there. At times they seemed to speak as if some one was uttering words of command. There were clamours, strange trepidations, and then that majestic roar which the mariners call the “Ocean cry.” The indefinite and flying eddies of the wind whistled, while curling the waves and flinging them like giant quoits, cast by invisible athletes, against the breakers. The enormous surf streamed over all the rocks; torrents above; foam below. Then the roaring was redoubled. No uproar of men or beasts could yield an idea of that din which mingled with the incessant breaking of the sea. The clouds cannonaded, the hailstones poured their volleys, the surf mounted to the assault. As far as eye could reach, the sea was white; ten leagues of yeasty water filled the horizon. Doors of fire were opened, clouds seemed burnt by clouds, and showed like smoke above a nebulous red mass, resembling burning embers. Floating conflagrations rushed together and amalgamated, each changing the shape of the other. From the midst of the dark roof a terrible arsenal appeared to be emptied out, hurling downward from the gulf, pell-mell, waterspouts, hail torrents, purple fire, phosphoric gleams, darkness, and lightnings.

Meanwhile Gilliatt seemed to pay no attention to the storm. His head was bent over his work. The second framework began to approach completion. To every clap of thunder he replied with a blow of his hammer, making a cadence which was audible even amidst that tumult. He was bareheaded, for a gust had carried away his galérienne.

He suffered from a burning thirst. Little pools of rain had formed in the rocks around him. From time to time he took some water in the hollow of his hand and drank. Then, without even looking upward to observe the storm, he applied himself anew to his task.

All might depend upon a moment. He knew the fate that awaited him if his breakwater should not be completed in time. Of what avail could it be to lose a moment in looking for the approach of death?

The turmoil around him was like that of a vast bubbling cauldron. Crash and uproar were everywhere. Sometimes the lightning seemed to descend a sort of ladder. The electric flame returned incessantly to the same points of the rock, where there were probably metallic veins. Hailstones fell of enormous size. Gilliatt was compelled to shake the folds of his overcoat, even the pockets of which became filled with hail.

The storm had now rotated to the west, and was expending its fury upon the barricades of the two Douvres. But Gilliatt had faith in his breakwaters, and with good reason. These barricades, made of a great portion of the forepart of the Durande, took the shock of the waves easily. Elasticity is a resistance. The experiments of Stephenson establish the fact that against the waves, which are themselves elastic, a raft of timber, joined and chained together in a certain fashion, will form a more powerful obstacle than a breakwater of masonry. The barriers of the Douvres fulfilled these conditions. They were, moreover, so ingeniously made fast, that the waves striking them beneath were like hammers beating in nails, pressing and consolidating the work upon the rocks. To demolish them it would have been necessary to overthrow the Douvres themselves. The surf, in fact, was only able to cast over upon the sloop some flakes of foam. On that side, thanks to the barrier, the tempest ended only in harmless insult. Gilliatt turned his back upon the scene. He heard composedly its useless rage upon the rocks behind him.

The foam-flakes coming from all sides were like flights of down. The vast irritated ocean deluged the rocks, dashed over them and raged within, penetrated into the network of their interior fissures, and issued again from the granitic masses by the narrow chinks, forming a kind of inexhaustible fountains playing peacefully in the midst of that deluge. Here and there a silvery network fell gracefully from these spouts in the sea.

The second frame of the eastern barrier was nearly completed. A few more knots of rope and ends of chains and this new rampart would be ready to play its part in barring out the storm.

Suddenly there was a great brightness; the rain ceased; the clouds rolled asunder; the wind had just shifted; a sort of high, dark window opened in the zenith, and the lightnings were extinguished. The end seemed to have come. It was but the commencement.

The change of wind was from the north-west to the north-east.

The storm was preparing to burst forth again with a new legion of hurricanes. The north was about to mount to the assault. Sailors call this dreaded moment of transition the “Return storm.” The southern wind brings most rain, the north wind most lightning.

The attack, coming now from the east, was directed against the weak point of the position.

This time Gilliatt interrupted his work and looked around him.

He stood erect, upon a curved projection of the rock behind the second barrier, which was nearly finished. If the first frame had been carried away, it would have broken down the second, which was not yet consolidated, and must have crushed him. Gilliatt, in the place that he had chosen, must in that case have been destroyed before seeing the sloop, the machinery, and all his work shattered and swallowed up in the gulf. Such was the possibility which awaited him. He accepted it, and contemplated it sternly.

In that wreck of all his hope, to die at once would have been his desire; to die first, as he would have regarded it — for the machinery produced in his mind the effect of a living being. He moved aside his hair, which was beaten over his eyes by the wind, grasped his trusty mallet, drew himself up in a menacing attitude, and awaited the event.

He was not kept long in suspense.

A flash of lightning gave the signal; the livid opening in the zenith closed; a driving torrent of rain fell; then all became dark, save where the lightnings broke forth once more. The attack had recommenced in earnest.

A heavy swell, visible from time to time in the blaze of the lightning, was rolling in the east beyond “The Man Rock.” It resembled a huge wall of glass. It was green and without foam, and it stretched across the wide expanse. It was advancing towards the breakwater, increasing as it approached. It was a singular kind of gigantic cylinder, rolling upon the ocean. The thunder kept up a hollow rumbling.

The great wave struck “The Man Rock,” broke in twain, and passed beyond. The broken wave, rejoined, formed a mountain of water, and instead of advancing in parallel line as before, came down perpendicularly upon the breakwater.

The shock was terrific: the whole wave became a roaring surf.

It is impossible for those who have not witnessed them to imagine those snowy avalanches which the sea thus precipitates, and under which it engulfs for the moment rocks of more than a hundred feet in height, such, for example, as the Great Anderlo at Guernsey, and the Pinnacle at Jersey. At Saint Mary of Madagascar it passes completely over the promontory of Tintingue.

For some moments the sea drowned everything. Nothing was visible except the furious waters, an enormous breadth of foam, the whiteness of a winding-sheet blowing in the draught of a sepulchre; nothing was heard but the roaring storm working devastation around.

When the foam subsided, Gilliatt was still standing at his post.

The barrier had stood firm. Not a chain was broken, not a nail displaced. It had exhibited under the trial the two chief qualities of a breakwater; it had proved flexible as a hurdle and firm as a wall. The surf falling upon it had dissolved into a shower of drops.

A river of foam rushing along the zigzags of the defile subsided as it approached the sloop.

The man who had put this curb upon the fury of the ocean took no rest.

The storm fortunately turned aside its fury for a moment. The fierce attack of the waves was renewed upon the wall of the rock. There was a respite, and Gilliatt took advantage of it to complete the interior barrier.

The daylight faded upon his labours. The hurricane continued its violence upon the flank of the rocks with a mournful solemnity. The stores of fire and water in the sky poured out incessantly without exhausting themselves. The undulations of the wind above and below were like the movements of a dragon.

Nightfall brought scarcely any deeper night. The change was hardly felt, for the darkness was never complete. Tempests alternately darkening and illumining by their lightnings, are merely intervals of the visible and invisible. All is pale glare, and then all is darkness. Spectral shapes issue forth suddenly, and return as suddenly into the deep shade.

A phosphoric zone, tinged with the hue of the aurora borealis, appeared like ghastly flames behind the dense clouds, giving to all things a wan aspect, and making the rain-drifts luminous.

This uncertain light aided Gilliatt, and directed him in his operations. By its help he was enabled to raise the forward barrier. The breakwater was now almost complete. As he was engaged in making fast a powerful cable to the last beam, the gale blew directly in his face. This compelled him to raise his head. The wind had shifted abruptly to the north-east. The assault upon the eastern gullet recommenced. Gilliatt cast his eyes around the horizon. Another great wall of water was approaching.

The wave broke with a great shock; a second followed; then another and another still; then five or six almost together; then a last shock of tremendous force.

This last wave, which was an accumulation of forces, had a singular resemblance to a living thing. It would not have been difficult to imagine in the midst of that swelling mass the shapes of fins and gill-coverings. It fell heavily and broke upon the barriers. Its almost animal form was torn to pieces in the shape of spouts and gushes, resembling the crushing to death of some sea hydra upon that block of rocks and timbers. The swell rushed through, subsiding but devastating as it went. The huge wave seemed to bite and cling to its victim as it died. The rock shook to its base. A savage howling mingled with the roar; the foam flew far like the spouting of a leviathan.

The subsidence exhibited the extent of the ravages of the surf. This last escalade had not been ineffectual. The breakwater had suffered this time. A long and heavy beam, torn from the first barrier, had been carried over the second, and hurled violently upon the projecting rock on which Gilliatt had stood but a moment before. By good fortune he had not returned there. Had he done so, his death had been inevitable.

There was a remarkable circumstance in the fall of this beam, which by preventing the framework rebounding, saved Gilliatt from greater dangers. It even proved useful to him, as will be seen, in another way.

Between the projecting rock and the interior wall of the defile there was a large interval, something like the notch of an axe, or the split of a wedge. One of the extremities of the timber hurled into the air by the waves had stuck fast into this notch in falling. The gap had become enlarged.

Gilliatt was struck with an idea. It was that of bearing heavily on the other extremity.

The beam caught by one end in the nook, which it had widened, projected from it straight as an outstretched arm. This species of arm projected parallel with the anterior wall of the defile, and the disengaged end stretched from its resting place about eighteen or twenty inches. A good distance for the object to be attained.

Gilliatt raised himself by means of his hands, feet, and knees to the escarpment, and then turned his back, pressing both his shoulders against the enormous lever. The beam was long, which increased its raising power. The rock was already loosened; but he was compelled to renew his efforts again and again. The sweat-drops rolled from his forehead as rapidly as the spray. The fourth attempt exhausted all his powers. There was a cracking noise; the gap spreading in the shape of a fissure, opened its vast jaws, and the heavy mass fell into the narrow space of the defile with a noise like the echo of the thunder.

The mass fell straight, and without breaking; resting in its bed like a Druid cromlech precipitated in one piece.

The beam which had served as a lever descended with the rock, and Gilliatt, stumbling forward as it gave way, narrowly escaped falling.

The bed of the pass at this part was full of huge round stones, and there was little water. The monolith lying in the boiling foam, the flakes of which fell on Gilliatt where he stood, stretched from side to side of the great parallel rocks of the defile, and formed a transversal wall, a sort of cross-stroke between the two escarpments. Its two ends touched the rocks. It had been a little too long to lie flat, but its summit of soft rock was struck off with the fall. The result of this fall was a singular sort of cul-de-sac, which may still be seen. The water behind this stony barrier is almost always tranquil.

This was a rampart more invincible still than the forward timbers of the Durande fixed between the two Douvres.

The barrier came opportunely.

The assaults of the sea had continued. The obstinacy of the waves is always increased by an obstacle. The first frame began to show signs of breaking up. One breach, however small, in a breakwater, is always serious. It inevitably enlarges, and there is no means of supplying its place, for the sea would sweep away the workmen.

A flash which lighted up the rocks revealed to Gilliatt the nature of the mischief; the beams broken down, the ends of rope and fragments of chain swinging in the winds, and a rent in the centre of the apparatus. The second frame was intact.

Though the block of stone so powerfully overturned by Gilliatt in the defile behind the breakwater was the strongest possible barrier, it had a defect. It was too low. The surge could not destroy, but could sweep over it.

It was useless to think of building it higher. Nothing but masses of rock could avail upon a barrier of stone; but how could such masses be detached? or, if detached, how could they be moved, or raised, or piled, or fixed? Timbers may be added, but rocks cannot.

Gilliatt was not Enceladus.

The very little height of this rocky isthmus rendered him anxious.

The effects of this fault were not long in showing themselves. The assaults upon the breakwater were incessant; the heavy seas seemed not merely to rage, but to attack with determination to destroy it. A sort of trampling noise was heard upon the jolted framework.

Suddenly the end of a binding strake, detached from the dislocated frame, was swept away over the second barrier and across the transversal rock, falling in the defile, where the water seized and carried it into the sinuosities of the pass. Gilliatt lost sight of it. It seemed probable that it would do some injury to the sloop. Fortunately, the water in the interior of the rocks, shut in on all sides, felt little of the commotion without. The waves there were comparatively trifling, and the shock was not likely to be very severe. For the rest, he had little time to spare for reflection upon this mishap. Every variety of danger was arising at once; the tempest was concentrated upon the vulnerable point; destruction was imminent.

The darkness was profound for a moment: the lightnings paused — a sort of sinister connivance. The cloud and the sea became one: there was a dull peal.

This was followed by a terrible outburst. The frame which formed the front of the barriers was swept away. The fragments of beams were visible in the rolling waters. The sea was using the first breakwater as an engine for making a breach in the second.

Gilliatt experienced the feeling of a general who sees his advanced guard driven in.

The second construction of beams resisted the shock. The apparatus behind it was powerfully secured and buttressed. But the broken frame was heavy, and was at the mercy of the waves, which were incessantly hurling it forward and withdrawing it. The ropes and chains which remained unsevered prevented its entirely breaking up, and the qualities which Gilliatt had given it as a means of defence made it, in the end, a more effective weapon of destruction. Instead of a buckler, it had become a battering-ram. Besides this, it was now full of irregularities from breaking; ends of timbers projected from all parts; and it was, as it were, covered with teeth and spikes. No sort of arm could have been more effective, or more fitted for the handling of the tempest. It was the projectile, while the sea played the part of the catapult.

The blows succeeded each other with a dismal regularity. Gilliatt, thoughtful and anxious, behind that barricaded portal, listened to the sound of death knocking loudly for admittance.

He reflected with bitterness that, but for the fatal entanglement of the funnel of the Durande in the wreck, he would have been at that very moment, and even since the morning, once more at Guernsey, in the port, with the sloop out of danger and with the machinery saved.

The dreaded moment arrived. The destruction was complete. There was a sound like a death-rattle. The entire frame of the breakwater, the double apparatus crushed and mingled confusedly, came in a whirl of foam, rushing upon the stone barricade like chaos upon a mountain, where it stopped. Here the fragments lay together, a mass of beams penetrable by the waves, but still breaking their force. The conquered barrier struggled nobly against destruction. The waves had shattered it, and in their turn were shattered against it. Though overthrown, it still remained in some degree effective. The rock which barred its passage, an immovable obstacle held it fast. The defile, as we have said, was very narrow at that point; the victorious whirlwind had driven forward, mingled and piled up the wreck of the breakwater in this narrow pass. The very violence of the assault, by heaping up the mass and driving the broken ends one into the other, had contributed to make the pile firm. It was destroyed, but immovable. A few pieces of timber only were swept away and dispersed by the waves. One passed through the air very near to Gilliatt. He felt the counter current upon his forehead.

Some waves, however, of that kind which in great tempests return with an imperturbable regularity, swept over the ruins of the breakwater. They fell into the defile, and in spite of the many angles of the passage, set the waters within in commotion. The waters began to roll through the gorge ominously. The mysterious embraces of the waves among the rocks were audible.

What means were there of preventing this agitation extending as far as the sloop? It would not require a long time for the blast of wind to create a tempest through all the windings of the pass. A few heavy seas would be sufficient to stave in the sloop and scatter her burden.

Gilliatt shuddered as he reflected.

But he was not disconcerted. No defeat could daunt his soul.

The hurricane had now discovered the true plan of attack, and was rushing fiercely between the two walls of the strait.

Suddenly a crash was heard, resounding and prolonging itself through the defile at some distance behind him: a crash more terrible than any he had yet heard.

It came from the direction of the sloop.

Something disastrous was happening there.

Gilliatt hastened towards it.

From the eastern gullet where he was, he could not see the sloop on account of the sharp turns of the pass. At the last turn he stopped and waited for the lightning.

The first flash revealed to him the position of affairs.

The rush of the sea through the eastern entrance had been met by a blast of wind from the other end. A disaster was near at hand.

The sloop had received no visible damage; anchored as she was, the storm had little power over her, but the carcase of the Durande was distressed.

In such a tempest, the wreck presented a considerable surface. It was entirely out of the sea in the air, exposed. The breach which Gilliatt had made, and which he had passed the engine through, had rendered the hull still weaker. The keelson was snapped, the vertebral column of the skeleton was broken.

The hurricane had passed over it. Scarcely more than this was needed to complete its destruction. The planking of the deck had bent like an opened book. The dismemberment had begun. It was the noise of this dislocation which had reached Gilliatt’s ears in the midst of the tempest.

The disaster which presented itself as he approached appeared almost irremediable.

The square opening which he had cut in the keel had become a gaping wound. The wind had converted the smooth-cut hole into a ragged fracture. This transverse breach separated the wreck in two. The after-part, nearest to the sloop, had remained firm in its bed of rocks. The forward portion which faced him was hanging. A fracture, while it holds, is a sort of hinge. The whole mass oscillated, as the wind moved it, with a doleful noise. Fortunately the sloop was no longer beneath it.

But this swinging movement shook the other portion of the hull, still wedged and immovable as it was between the two Douvres. From shaking to casting down the distance is not far. Under the obstinate assaults of the gale, the dislocated part might suddenly carry away the other portion, which almost touched the sloop. In this case, the whole wreck, together with the sloop and the engine, must be swept into the sea and swallowed up.

All this presented itself to his eyes. It was the end of all. How could it be prevented?

Gilliatt was one of those who are accustomed to snatch the means of safety out of danger itself. He collected his ideas for a moment. Then he hastened to his arsenal and brought his hatchet.

The mallet had served him well, it was now the turn of the axe.

He mounted upon the wreck, got a footing on that part of the planking which had not given way, and leaning over the precipice of the pass between the Douvres, he began to cut away the broken joists and the planking which supported the hanging portion of the hull.

His object was to effect the separation of the two parts of the wreck, to disencumber the half which remained firm, to throw overboard what the waves had seized, and thus share the prey with the storm. The hanging portion of the wreck, borne down by the wind and by its own weight, adhered only at one or two points. The entire wreck resembled a folding-screen, one leaf of which, half-hanging, beat against the other. Five or six pieces of the planking only, bent and started, but not broken, still held. Their fractures creaked and enlarged at every gust, and the axe, so to speak, had but to help the labour of the wind. This more than half-severed condition, while it increased the facility of the work, also rendered it dangerous. The whole might give way beneath him at any moment.

The tempest had reached its highest point. The convulsion of the sea reached the heavens. Hitherto the storm had been supreme, it had seemed to work its own imperious will, to give the impulse, to drive the waves to frenzy, while still preserving a sort of sinister lucidity. Below was fury — above, anger. The heavens are the breath, the ocean only foam, hence the authority of the wind. But the intoxication of its own horrors had confused it. It had become a mere whirlwind; it was a blindness leading to night. There are times when tempests become frenzied, when the heavens are attacked with a sort of delirium; when the firmament raves and hurls its lightnings blindly. No terror is greater than this. It is a hideous moment. The trembling of the rock was at its height. Every storm has a mysterious course, but now it loses its appointed path. It is the most dangerous point of the tempest. “At that moment,” says Thomas Fuller, “the wind is a furious maniac.” It is at that instant that that continuous discharge of electricity takes place which Piddington calls “the cascade of lightnings.” It is at that instant that in the blackest spot of the clouds, none know why, unless it be to spy the universal terror, a circle of blue light appears, which the Spanish sailors of ancient times called the eye of the tempest, el ojo de la tempestad. That terrible eye looked down upon Gilliatt.

Gilliatt on his part was surveying the heavens. He raised his head now. After every stroke of his hatchet he stood erect and gazed upwards, almost haughtily. He was, or seemed to be, too near destruction not to feel self-sustained. Would he despair? No! In the presence of the wildest fury of the ocean he was watchful as well as bold. He planted his feet only where the wreck was firm. He ventured his life, and yet was careful; for his determined spirit, too, had reached its highest point. His strength had grown tenfold greater. He had become heated with his own intrepidity. The strokes of his hatchet were like blows of defiance. He seemed to have gained in directness what the tempest had lost. A pathetic struggle! On the one hand, an indefatigable will; on the other, inexhaustible power. It was a contest with the elements for the prize at his feet. The clouds took the shape of Gorgon masks in the immensity of the heavens; every possible form of terror appeared; the rain came from the sea, the surf from the cloud; phantoms of the wind bent down; meteoric faces revealed themselves and were again eclipsed, leaving the darkness more monstrous: then there was nothing seen but the torrents coming from all sides — a boiling sea; cumuli heavy with hail, ashen-hued, ragged-edged, appeared seized with a sort of whirling frenzy; strange rattlings filled the air; the inverse currents of electricity observed by Volta darted their sudden flashes from cloud to cloud. The prolongation of the lightnings was terrible; the flashes passed near to Gilliatt. The very ocean seemed astonished. He passed to and fro upon the tottering wreck, making the deck tremble under his steps, striking, cutting, hacking with the hatchet in his hand, pallid in the gleam of the lightning, his long hair streaming, his feet naked, in rags, his face covered with the foam of the sea, but grand still amid that maelstrom of the thunderstorm.

Against these furious powers man has no weapon but his invention. Invention was Gilliatt’s triumph. His object was to allow all the dislocated portions of the wreck to fall together. For this reason he cut away the broken portions without entirely separating them, leaving some parts on which they still swung. Suddenly he stopped, holding his axe in the air. The operation was complete. The entire portion went with a crash.

The mass rolled down between the two Douvres, just below Gilliatt, who stood upon the wreck, leaning over and observing the fall. It fell perpendicularly into the water, struck the rocks, and stopped in the defile before touching the bottom. Enough remained out of the water to rise more than twelve feet above the waves. The vertical mass of planking formed a wall between the two Douvres; like the rock overturned crosswise higher up the defile, it allowed only a slight stream of foam to pass through at its two extremities, and thus was a fifth barricade improvised by Gilliatt against the tempest in that passage of the seas.

The hurricane itself, in its blind fury, had assisted in the construction of this last barrier.

It was fortunate that the proximity of the two walls had prevented the mass of wreck from falling to the bottom. This circumstance gave the barricade greater height; the water, besides, could flow under the obstacle, which diminished the power of the waves. That which passes below cannot pass over. This is partly the secret of the floating breakwater.

Henceforth, let the storm do what it might, there was nothing to fear for the sloop or the machinery. The water around them could not become agitated again. Between the barrier of the Douvres, which covered them on the west, and the barricade which protected them from the east, no heavy sea or wind could reach them.

Gilliatt had plucked safety out of the catastrophe itself. The storm had been his fellow-labourer in the work.

This done, he took a little water in the palm of his hand from one of the rain-pools, and drank: and then, looking upward at the storm, said with a smile, “Bungler!”

Human intelligence combating with brute force experiences an ironical joy in demonstrating the stupidity of its antagonist, and compelling it to serve the very objects of its fury, and Gilliatt felt something of that immemorial desire to insult his invisible enemy, which is as old as the heroes of the Iliad.

He descended to the sloop and examined it by the gleam of the lightning. The relief which he had been able to give to his distressed bark was well-timed. She had been much shaken during the last hour, and had begun to give way. A hasty glance revealed no serious injury. Nevertheless, he was certain that the vessel had been subjected to violent shocks. As soon as the waves had subsided, the hull had righted itself; the anchors had held fast; as to the machine, the four chains had supported it admirably.

While Gilliatt was completing this survey, something white passed before his eyes and vanished in the gloom. It was a sea-mew.

No sight could be more welcome in tempestuous weather. When the birds reappear the storm is departing. The thunder redoubled; another good sign.

The violent efforts of the storm had broken its force. All mariners know that the last ordeal is severe, but short. The excessive violence of the thunderstorm is the herald of the end.

The rain stopped suddenly. Then there was only a surly rumbling in the heavens. The storm ceased with the suddenness of a plank falling to the ground. The immense mass of clouds became disorganised. A strip of clear sky appeared between them. Gilliatt was astonished: it was broad daylight.

The tempest had lasted nearly twenty hours.

The wind which had brought the storm carried it away. A dark pile was diffused over the horizon, the broken clouds were flying in confusion across the sky. From one end to the other of the line there was a movement of retreat: a long muttering was heard, gradually decreasing, a few last drops of rain fell, and all those dark masses charged with thunder, departed like a terrible multitude of chariots.

Suddenly the wide expanse of sky became blue.

Gilliatt perceived that he was wearied. Sleep swoops down upon the exhausted frame like a bird upon its prey. He drooped and sank upon the deck of the bark without choosing his position, and there slept. Stretched at length and inert, he remained thus for some hours, scarcely distinguishable from the beams and joists among which he lay.

BOOK IV

PITFALLS IN THE WAY

I

HE WHO IS HUNGRY IS NOT ALONE

When he awakened he was hungry.

The sea was growing calmer. But there was still a heavy swell, which made his departure, for the present at least, impossible. The day, too, was far advanced. For the sloop with its burden to get to Guernsey before midnight, it was necessary to start in the morning.

Although pressed by hunger, Gilliatt began by stripping himself, the only means of getting warmth. His clothing was saturated by the storm, but the rain had washed out the sea-water, which rendered it possible to dry them.

He kept nothing on but his trousers, which he turned up nearly to the knees.

His overcoat, jacket, overalls, and sheepskin he spread out and fixed with large round stones here and there.

Then he thought of eating.

He had recourse to his knife, which he was careful to sharpen, and to keep always in good condition; and he detached from the rocks a few limpets, similar in kind to the clonisses of the Mediterranean. It is well known that these are eaten raw: but after so many labours, so various and so rude, the pittance was meagre. His biscuit was gone; but of water he had now abundance.

He took advantage of the receding tide to wander among the rocks in search of crayfish. There was extent enough of rock to hope for a successful search.

But he had not reflected that he could do nothing with these without fire to cook them. If he had taken the trouble to go to his store-cavern, he would have found it inundated with the rain. His wood and coal were drowned, and of his store of tow, which served him for tinder, there was not a fibre which was not saturated. No means remained of lighting a fire.

For the rest, his blower was completely disorganised. The screen of the hearth of his forge was broken down; the storm had sacked and devastated his workshop. With what tools and apparatus had escaped the general wreck, he could still have done carpentry work; but he could not have accomplished any of the labours of the smith. Gilliatt, however, never thought of his workshop for a moment.

Drawn in another direction by the pangs of hunger, he had pursued without much reflection his search for food. He wandered, not in the gorge of the rocks, but outside among the smaller breakers. It was there that the Durande, ten weeks previously, had first struck upon the sunken reef.

For the search that Gilliatt was prosecuting, this part was more favourable than the interior. At low water the crabs are accustomed to crawl out into the air. They seem to like to warm themselves in the sun, where they swarm sometimes to the disgust of loiterers, who recognise in these creatures, with their awkward sidelong gait, climbing clumsily from crack to crack the lower stages of the rocks like the steps of a staircase, a sort of sea vermin.

For two months Gilliatt had lived upon these vermin of the sea.

On this day, however, the crayfish and crabs were both wanting. The tempest had driven them into their solitary retreats; and they had not yet mustered courage to venture abroad. Gilliatt held his open knife in his hand, and from time to time scraped a cockle from under the bunches of seaweed, which he ate while still walking.

He could not have been far from the very spot where Sieur Clubin had perished.

As Gilliatt was determining to content himself with the sea-urchins and the châtaignes de mer, a little clattering noise at his feet aroused his attention. A large crab, startled by his approach, had just dropped into a pool. The water was shallow, and he did not lose sight of it.

He chased the crab along the base of the rock; the crab moved fast.

Suddenly it was gone.

It had buried itself in some crevice under the rock.

Gilliatt clutched the projections of the rock, and stretched out to observe where it shelved away under the water.

As he suspected, there was an opening there in which the creature had evidently taken refuge. It was more than a crevice; it was a kind of porch.

The sea entered beneath it, but was not deep. The bottom was visible, covered with large pebbles. The pebbles were green and clothed with confervæ, indicating that they were never dry. They were like the tops of a number of heads of infants, covered with a kind of green hair.

Holding his knife between his teeth, Gilliatt descended, by the help of feet and hands, from the upper part of the escarpment, and leaped into the water. It reached almost to his shoulders.

He made his way through the porch, and found himself in a blind passage, with a roof in the form of a rude arch over his head. The walls were polished and slippery. The crab was nowhere visible. He gained his feet and advanced in daylight growing fainter, so that he began to lose the power to distinguish objects.

At about fifteen paces the vaulted roof ended overhead. He had penetrated beyond the blind passage. There was here more space, and consequently more daylight. The pupils of his eyes, moreover, had dilated; he could see pretty clearly. He was taken by surprise.

He had made his way again into the singular cavern which he had visited in the previous month. The only difference was that he had entered by the way of the sea.

It was through the submarine arch, that he had remarked before, that he had just entered. At certain low tides it was accessible.

His eyes became more accustomed to the place. His vision became clearer and clearer. He was astonished. He found himself again in that extraordinary palace of shadows; saw again before his eyes that vaulted roof, those columns, those purple and blood-like stains, that vegetation rich with gems, and at the farther end, that crypt or sanctuary, and that altar-like stone. He took little notice of these details, but their impression was in his mind, and he saw that the place was unchanged.

He observed before him, at a certain height in the wall, the crevice through which he had penetrated the first time, and which, from the point where he now stood, appeared inaccessible.

Near the moulded arch, he remarked those low dark grottoes, a sort of caves within a cavern, which he had already observed from a distance. He now stood nearer to them. The entrance to the nearest to him was out of the water, and easily approachable. Nearer still than this recess he noticed, above the level of the water, and within reach of his hand, a horizontal fissure. It seemed to him probable that the crab had taken refuge there, and he plunged his hand in as far as he was able, and groped about in that dusky aperture.

Suddenly he felt himself seized by the arm. A strange indescribable horror thrilled through him.

Some living thing, thin, rough, flat, cold, slimy, had twisted itself round his naked arm, in the dark depth below. It crept upward towards his chest. Its pressure was like a tightening cord, its steady persistence like that of a screw. In less than a moment some mysterious spiral form had passed round his wrist and elbow, and had reached his shoulder. A sharp point penetrated beneath the armpit.

Gilliatt recoiled; but he had scarcely power to move! He was, as it were, nailed to the place. With his left hand, which was disengaged, he seized his knife, which he still held between his teeth, and with that hand, holding the knife, he supported himself against the rocks, while he made a desperate effort to withdraw his arm. He succeeded only in disturbing his persecutor, which wound itself still tighter. It was supple as leather, strong as steel, cold as night.

A second form, sharp, elongated, and narrow, issued out of the crevice, like a tongue out of monstrous jaws. It seemed to lick his naked body. Then suddenly stretching out, it became longer and thinner, as it crept over his skin, and wound itself round him. At the same time a terrible sense of pain, comparable to nothing he had ever known, compelled all his muscles to contract. He felt upon his skin a number of flat rounded points. It seemed as if innumerable suckers had fastened to his flesh and were about to drink his blood.

A third long undulating shape issued from the hole in the rock; seemed to feel its way about his body; lashed round his ribs like a cord, and fixed itself there.

Agony when at its height is mute. Gilliatt uttered no cry. There was sufficient light for him to see the repulsive forms which had entangled themselves about him. A fourth ligature, but this one swift as an arrow, darted towards his stomach, and wound around him there.

It was impossible to sever or tear away the slimy bands which were twisted tightly round his body, and were adhering by a number of points. Each of the points was the focus of frightful and singular pangs. It was as if numberless small mouths were devouring him at the same time.

A fifth long, slimy, riband-shaped strip issued from the hole. It passed over the others, and wound itself tightly around his chest. The compression increased his sufferings. He could scarcely breathe.

These living thongs were pointed at their extremities, but broadened like a blade of a sword towards its hilt. All belonged evidently to the same centre. They crept and glided about him; he felt the strange points of pressure, which seemed to him like mouths, change their places from time to time.

Suddenly a large, round, flattened, glutinous mass issued from beneath the crevice. It was the centre; the five thongs were attached to it like spokes to the nave of a wheel. On the opposite side of this disgusting monster appeared the commencement of three other tentacles, the ends of which remained under the rock. In the middle of this slimy mass appeared two eyes.

The eyes were fixed on Gilliatt.

He recognised the Devil-Fish.

II

THE MONSTER

It is difficult for those who have not seen it to believe in the existence of the devil-fish.

Compared to this creature, the ancient hydras are insignificant.

At times we are tempted to imagine that the vague forms which float in our dreams may encounter in the realm of the Possible attractive forces, having power to fix their lineaments, and shape living beings, out of these creatures of our slumbers. The Unknown has power over these strange visions, and out of them composes monsters. Orpheus, Homer, and Hesiod imagined only the Chimera: Providence has created this terrible creature of the sea.

Creation abounds in monstrous forms of life. The wherefore of this perplexes and affrights the religious thinker.

If terror were the object of its creation, nothing could be imagined more perfect than the devil-fish.

The whale has enormous bulk, the devil-fish is comparatively small; the jararaca makes a hissing noise, the devil-fish is mute; the rhinoceros has a horn, the devil-fish has none; the scorpion has a dart, the devil-fish has no dart; the shark has sharp fins, the devil-fish has no fins; the vespertilio-bat has wings with claws, the devil-fish has no wings; the porcupine has his spines, the devil-fish has no spines; the sword-fish has his sword, the devil-fish has none; the torpedo has its electric spark, the devil-fish has none; the toad has its poison, the devil-fish has none; the viper has its venom, the devil-fish has no venom; the lion has its talons, the devil-fish has no talons; the griffon has its beak, the devil-fish has no beak; the crocodile has its jaws, the devil-fish has no teeth.

The devil-fish has no muscular organisation, no menacing cry, no breastplate, no horn, no dart, no claw, no tail with which to hold or bruise; no cutting fins, or wings with nails, no prickles, no sword, no electric discharge, no poison, no talons, no beak, no teeth. Yet he is of all creatures the most formidably armed.

What, then, is the devil-fish? It is the sea vampire.

The swimmer who, attracted by the beauty of the spot, ventures among breakers in the open sea, where the still waters hide the splendours of the deep, or in the hollows of unfrequented rocks, in unknown caverns abounding in sea plants, testacea, and crustacea, under the deep portals of the ocean, runs the risk of meeting it. If that fate should be yours, be not curious, but fly. The intruder enters there dazzled; but quits the spot in terror.

This frightful apparition, which is always possible among the rocks in the open sea, is a greyish form which undulates in the water. It is of the thickness of a man’s arm, and in length nearly five feet. Its outline is ragged. Its form resembles an umbrella closed, and without handle. This irregular mass advances slowly towards you. Suddenly it opens, and eight radii issue abruptly from around a face with two eyes. These radii are alive: their undulation is like lambent flames; they resemble, when opened, the spokes of a wheel, of four or five feet in diameter. A terrible expansion! It springs upon its prey.

The devil-fish harpoons its victim.

It winds around the sufferer, covering and entangling him in its long folds. Underneath it is yellow; above, a dull, earthy hue: nothing could render that inexplicable shade dust coloured. Its form is spider-like, but its tints are like those of the chamelion. When irritated it becomes violet. Its most horrible characteristic is its softness.

Its folds strangle, its contact paralyses.

It has an aspect like gangrened or scabrous flesh. It is a monstrous embodiment of disease.

It adheres closely to its prey, and cannot be torn away; a fact which is due to its power of exhausting air. The eight antennæ, large at their roots, diminish gradually, and end in needle-like points. Underneath each of these feelers range two rows of pustules, decreasing in size, the largest ones near the head, the smaller at the extremities. Each row contains twenty-five of these. There are, therefore, fifty pustules to each feeler, and the creature possesses in the whole four hundred. These pustules are capable of acting like cupping-glasses. They are cartilaginous substances, cylindrical, horny, and livid. Upon the large species they diminish gradually from the diameter of a five-franc piece to the size of a split pea. These small tubes can be thrust out and withdrawn by the animal at will. They are capable of piercing to a depth of more than an inch.

This sucking apparatus has all the regularity and delicacy of a key-board. It stands forth at one moment and disappears the next. The most perfect sensitiveness cannot equal the contractibility of these suckers; always proportioned to the internal movement of the animal, and its exterior circumstances. The monster is endowed with the qualities of the sensitive plant.

This animal is the same as those which mariners call Poulps; which science designates Cephalopteræ, and which ancient legends call Krakens. It is the English sailors who call them "Devil-fish," and sometimes Bloodsuckers. In the Channel Islands they are called pieuvres.

They are rare at Guernsey, very small at Jersey; but near the island of Sark are numerous as well as very large.

An engraving in Sonnini's edition of Buffon represents a Cephaloptera crushing a frigate. Denis Montfort, in fact, considers the Poulp, or Octopod, of high latitudes, strong enough to destroy a ship. Bory Saint Vincent doubts this; but he shows that in our regions they will attack men. Near Brecq-Hou, in Sark, they show a cave where a devil-fish a few years since seized and drowned a lobster-fisher. Peron and Lamarck are in error in their belief that the "poulp" having no fins cannot swim. He who writes these lines has seen with his own eyes, at Sark, in the cavern called the Boutiques, a pieuvre swimming and pursuing a bather. When captured and killed, this specimen was found to be four English feet broad, and it was possible to count its four hundred suckers. The monster thrust them out convulsively in the agony of death.

According to Denis Montfort, one of those observers whose marvellous intuition sinks or raises them to the level of magicians, the poulp is almost endowed with the passions of man: it has its hatreds. In fact, in the Absolute to be hideous is to hate.

Hideousness struggles under the natural law of elimination, which necessarily renders it hostile.

When swimming, the devil-fish rests, so to speak, in its sheath. It swims with all its parts drawn close. It may be likened to a sleeve sewn up with a closed fist within. The protuberance, which is the head, pushes the water aside and advances with a vague undulatory movement. Its two eyes, though large, are indistinct, being of the colour of the water.

When in ambush, or seeking its prey, it retires into itself, grows smaller and condenses itself. It is then scarcely distinguishable in the submarine twilight.

At such times, it looks like a mere ripple in the water. It resembles anything except a living creature.

The devil-fish is crafty. When its victim is unsuspicious, it opens suddenly.

A glutinous mass, endowed with a malignant will, what can be more horrible?

It is in the most beautiful azure depths of the limpid water that this hideous, voracious polyp delights. It always conceals itself, a fact which increases its terrible associations. When they are seen, it is almost invariably after they have been captured.

At night, however, and particularly in the hot season, it becomes phosphorescent. These horrible creatures have their passions; their submarine nuptials. Then it adorns itself, burns and illumines; and from the height of some rock, it may be seen in the deep obscurity of the waves below, expanding with a pale irradiation — a spectral sun.

The devil-fish not only swims, it walks. It is partly fish, partly reptile. It crawls upon the bed of the sea. At these times, it makes use of its eight feelers, and creeps along in the fashion of a species of swift-moving caterpillar.

It has no blood, no bones, no flesh. It is soft and flabby; a skin with nothing inside. Its eight tentacles may be turned inside out like the fingers of a glove.

It has a single orifice in the centre of its radii, which appears at first to be neither the vent nor the mouth. It is, in fact, both one and the other. The orifice performs a double function. The entire creature is cold.

The jelly-fish of the Mediterranean is repulsive. Contact with that animated gelatinous substance which envelopes the bather, in which the hands sink, and the nails scratch ineffectively; which can be torn without killing it, and which can be plucked off without entirely removing it — that fluid and yet tenacious creature which slips through the fingers, is disgusting; but no horror can equal the sudden apparition of the devil-fish, that Medusa with its eight serpents.

No grasp is like the sudden strain of the cephaloptera.

It is with the sucking apparatus that it attacks. The victim is oppressed by a vacuum drawing at numberless points: it is not a clawing or a biting, but an indescribable scarification. A tearing of the flesh is terrible, but less terrible than a sucking of the blood. Claws are harmless compared with the horrible action of these natural air-cups. The talons of the wild beast enter into your flesh; but with the cephaloptera it is you who enter into the creature. The muscles swell, the fibres of the body are contorted, the skin cracks under the loathsome oppression, the blood spurts out and mingles horribly with the lymph of the monster, which clings to its victim by innumerable hideous mouths. The hydra incorporates itself with the man; the man becomes one with the hydra. The spectre lies upon you: the tiger can only devour you; the devil-fish, horrible, sucks your life-blood away. He draws you to him, and into himself; while bound down, glued to the ground, powerless, you feel yourself gradually emptied into this horrible pouch, which is the monster itself.

These strange animals, Science, in accordance with its habit of excessive caution even in the face of facts, at first rejects as fabulous; then she decides to observe them; then she dissects, classifies, catalogues, and labels; then procures specimens, and exhibits them in glass cases in museums. They enter then into her nomenclature; are designated mollusks, invertebrata, radiata: she determines their position in the animal world a little above the calamaries, a little below the cuttle-fish; she finds for these hydras of the sea an analogous creature in fresh water called the argyronecte: she divides them into great, medium, and small kinds; she admits more readily the existence of the small than of the large species, which is, however, the tendency of science in all countries, for she is by nature more microscopic than telescopic. She regards them from the point of view of their construction, and calls them Cephaloptera; counts their antennæ, and calls them Octopedes. This done, she leaves them. Where science drops them, philosophy takes them up.

Philosophy in her turn studies these creatures. She goes both less far and further. She does not dissect, but meditate. Where the scalpel has laboured, she plunges the hypothesis. She seeks the final cause. Eternal perplexity of the thinker. These creatures disturb his ideas of the Creator. They are hideous surprises. They are the death’s-head at the feast of contemplation. The philosopher determines their characteristics in dread. They are the concrete forms of evil. What attitude can he take towards this treason of creation against herself? To whom can he look for the solution of these riddles? The Possible is a terrible matrix. Monsters are mysteries in their concrete form. Portions of shade issue from the mass, and something within detaches itself, rolls, floats, condenses, borrows elements from the ambient darkness, becomes subject to unknown polarisations, assumes a kind of life, furnishes itself with some unimagined form from the obscurity, and with some terrible spirit from the miasma, and wanders ghostlike among living things. It is as if night itself assumed the forms of animals. But for what good? with what object? Thus we come again to the eternal questioning.

These animals are indeed phantoms as much as monsters. They are proved and yet improbable. Their fate is to exist in spite of à priori reasonings. They are the amphibia of the shore which separates life from death. Their unreality makes their existence puzzling. They touch the frontier of man's domain and people the region of chimeras. We deny the possibility of the vampire, and the cephaloptera appears. Their swarming is a certainty which disconcerts our confidence. Optimism, which is nevertheless in the right, becomes silenced in their presence. They form the visible extremity of the dark circles. They mark the transition of our reality into another. They seem to belong to that commencement of terrible life which the dreamer sees confusedly through the loophole of the night.

That multiplication of monsters, first in the Invisible, then in the Possible, has been suspected, perhaps perceived by magi and philosophers in their austere ecstasies and profound contemplations. Hence the conjecture of a material hell. The demon is simply the invisible tiger. The wild beast which devours souls has been presented to the eyes of human beings by St. John, and by Dante in his vision of Hell.

If, in truth, the invisible circles of creation continue indefinitely, if after one there is yet another, and so forth in illimitable progression; if that chain, which for our part we are resolved to doubt, really exist, the cephaloptera at one extremity proves Satan at the other. It is certain that the wrongdoer at one end proves the existence of wrong at the other.

Every malignant creature, like every perverted intelligence, is a sphinx. A terrible sphinx propounding a terrible riddle; the riddle of the existence of Evil.

It is this perfection of evil which has sometimes sufficed to incline powerful intellects to a faith in the duality of the Deity, towards that terrible bifrons of the Manichæans.

A piece of silk stolen during the last war from the palace of the Emperor of China represents a shark eating a crocodile, who is eating a serpent, who is devouring an eagle, who is preying on a swallow, who in his turn is eating a caterpillar.

All nature which is under our observation is thus alternately devouring and devoured. The prey prey on each other.

Learned men, however, who are also philosophers, and therefore optimists in their view of creation, find, or believe they find, an explanation. Among others, Bonnet of Geneva, that mysterious exact thinker, who was opposed to Buffon, as in later times Geoffrey St. Hilaire has been to Cuvier, was struck with the idea of the final object. His notions may be summed up thus: universal death necessitates universal sepulture; the devourers are the sextons of the system of nature. All created things enter into and form the elements of other. To decay is to nourish. Such is the terrible law from which not even man himself escapes.

In our world of twilight this fatal order of things produces monsters. You ask for what purpose. We find the solution here.

But is this the solution? Is this the answer to our questionings? And if so, why not some different order of things? Thus the question returns.

Let us live: be it so.

But let us endeavour that death shall be progress. Let us aspire to an existence in which these mysteries shall be made clear. Let us follow that conscience which leads us thither.

For let us never forget that the highest is only attained through the high.

III

ANOTHER KIND OF SEA-COMBAT

Such was the creature in whose power Gilliatt had fallen for some minutes.

The monster was the inhabitant of the grotto; the terrible genii of the place. A kind of sombre demon of the water.

All the splendours of the cavern existed for it alone.

On the day of the previous month when Gilliatt had first penetrated into the grotto, the dark outline, vaguely perceived by him in the ripples of the secret waters, was this monster. It was here in its home.

When entering for the second time into the cavern in pursuit of the crab, he had observed the crevice in which he supposed that the crab had taken refuge, the pieuvre was there lying in wait for prey.

Is it possible to imagine that secret ambush?

No bird would brood, no egg would burst to life, no flower would dare to open, no breast to give milk, no heart to love, no spirit to soar, under the influence of that apparition of evil watching with sinister patience in the dusk.

Gilliatt had thrust his arm deep into the opening; the monster had snapped at it. It held him fast, as the spider holds the fly.

He was in the water up to his belt; his naked feet clutching the slippery roundness of the huge stones at the bottom; his right arm bound and rendered powerless by the flat coils of the long tentacles of the creature, and his body almost hidden under the folds and cross folds of this horrible bandage.

Of the eight arms of the devil-fish three adhered to the rock, while five encircled Gilliatt. In this way, clinging to the granite on the one hand, and with the other to its human prey, it enchained him to the rock. Two hundred and fifty suckers were upon him, tormenting him with agony and loathing. He was grasped by gigantic hands, the fingers of which were each nearly a yard long, and furnished inside with living blisters eating into the flesh.

As we have said, it is impossible to tear oneself from the folds of the devil-fish. The attempt ends only in a firmer grasp. The monster clings with more determined force. Its effort increases with that of its victim; every struggle produces a tightening of its ligatures.

Gilliatt had but one resource, his knife.

His left hand only was free; but the reader knows with what power he could use it. It might have been said that he had two right hands.

His open knife was in his hand.

The antenna of the devil-fish cannot be cut; it is a leathery substance impossible to divide with the knife, it slips under the edge; its position in attack also is such that to cut it would be to wound the victim’s own flesh.

The creature is formidable, but there is a way of resisting it. The fishermen of Sark know this, as does any one who has seen them execute certain movements in the sea. The porpoises know it also; they have a way of biting the cuttle-fish which decapitates it. Hence the frequent sight on the sea of pen-fish, poulps, and cuttle-fish without heads.

The cephaloptera, in fact, is only vulnerable through the head.

Gilliatt was not ignorant of this fact.

He had never seen a devil-fish of this size. His first encounter was with one of the larger species. Another would have been powerless with terror.

With the devil-fish, as with a furious bull, there is a certain moment in the conflict which must be seized. It is the instant when the bull lowers the neck; it is the instant when the devil-fish advances its head. The movement is rapid. He who loses that moment is destroyed.

The things we have described occupied only a few moments. Gilliatt, however, felt the increasing power of its innumerable suckers.

The monster is cunning; it tries first to stupefy its prey. It seizes and then pauses awhile.

Gilliatt grasped his knife; the sucking increased.

He looked at the monster, which seemed to look at him.

Suddenly it loosened from the rock its sixth antenna, and darting it at him, seized him by the left arm.

At the same moment it advanced its head with a violent movement. In one second more its mouth would have fastened on his breast. Bleeding in the sides, and with his two arms entangled, he would have been a dead man.

But Gillian was watchful. He avoided the antenna, and at the moment when the monster darted forward to fasten on his breast, he struck it with the knife clenched in his left hand. There were two convulsions in opposite directions; that of the devil-fish and that of its prey. The movement was rapid as a double flash of lightnings.

He had plunged the blade of his knife into the flat slimy substance, and by a rapid movement, like the flourish of a whip in the air, describing a circle round the two eyes, he wrenched the head off as a man would draw a tooth.

The struggle was ended. The folds relaxed. The monster dropped away, like the slow detaching of bands. The four hundred suckers, deprived of their sustaining power, dropped at once from the man and the rock. The mass sank to the bottom of the water.

Breathless with the struggle, Gilliatt could perceive upon the stones at his feet two shapeless, slimy heaps, the head on one side, the remainder of the monster on the other.

Fearing, nevertheless, some convulsive return of his agony, he recoiled to avoid the reach of the dreaded tentacles.

But the monster was quite dead.

Gilliatt closed his knife.

IV

NOTHING IS HIDDEN, NOTHING LOST

It was time that he killed the devil-fish. He was almost suffocated. His right arm and his chest were purple. Numberless little swellings were distinguishable upon them; the blood flowed from them here and there. The remedy for these wounds is sea-water. Gilliatt plunged into it, rubbing himself at the same time with the palms of his hands. The swellings disappeared under the friction.

By stepping further into the waters he had, without perceiving, approached to the species of recess already observed by him near the crevice where he had been attacked by the devil-fish.

This recess stretched obliquely under the great walls of the cavern, and was dry. The large pebbles which had become heaped up there had raised the bottom above the level of ordinary tides. The entrance was a rather large elliptical arch; a man could enter by stooping. The green light of the submarine grotto penetrated into it and lighted it feebly.

It happened that, while hastily rubbing his skin, Gilliatt raised his eyes mechanically.

He was able to see far into the cavern.

He shuddered.

He fancied that he perceived, in the furthest depth of the dusky recess, something smiling.

Gilliatt had never heard the word “hallucination,” but he was familiar with the idea. Those mysterious encounters with the invisible, which, for the sake of avoiding the difficulty of explaining them, we call hallucinations, are in nature. Illusions or realities, visions are a fact. He who has the gift will see them. Gilliatt, as we have said, was a dreamer. He had, at times, the faculty of a seer. It was not in vain that he had spent his days in musing among solitary places.

He imagined himself the dupe of one of those mirages which he had more than once beheld when in his dreamy moods.

The opening was somewhat in the shape of a chalk-burner’s oven. It was a low niche with projections like basket-handles. Its abrupt groins contracted gradually as far as the extremity of the crypt, where the heaps of round stones and the rocky roof joined.

Gilliatt entered, and lowering his head, advanced towards the object in the distance.

There was indeed something smiling.

It was a death’s head; but it was not only the head. There was the entire skeleton. A complete human skeleton was lying in the cavern.

In such a position a bold man will continue his researches.

Gilliatt cast his eyes around. He was surrounded by a multitude of crabs. The multitude did not stir. They were but empty shells.

These groups were scattered here and there among the masses of pebbles in irregular constellations.

Gilliatt, having his eyes fixed elsewhere, had walked among them without perceiving them.

At this extremity of the crypt, where he had now penetrated, there was a still greater heap of remains. It was a confused mass of legs, antennæ, and mandibles. Claws stood wide open; bony shells lay still under their bristling prickles; some reversed showed their livid hollows. The heap was like a mêlée of besiegers who had fallen, and lay massed together.

The skeleton was partly buried in this heap.

Under this confused mass of scales and tentacles, the eye perceived the cranium with its furrows, the vertebræ, the thigh bones, the tibias, and the long-jointed finger bones with their nails. The frame of the ribs was filled with crabs. Some heart had once beat there. The green mould of the sea had settled round the sockets of the eyes. Limpets had left their slime upon the bony nostrils. For the rest, there were not in this cave within the rocks either sea-gulls, or weeds, or a breath of air. All was still. The teeth grinned.

The sombre side of laughter is that strange mockery of expression which is peculiar to a human skull.

This marvellous palace of the deep, inlaid and incrusted with all the gems of the sea, had at length revealed and told its secret. It was a savage haunt; the devil-fish inhabited it; it was also a tomb, in which the body of a man reposed.

The skeleton and the creatures around it oscillated vaguely in the reflections of the subterranean water which trembled upon the roof and wall. The horrible multitude of crabs looked as if finishing their repast.

These crustacea seemed to be devouring the carcase. Nothing could be more strange than the aspect of the dead vermin upon their dead prey.

Gilliatt had beneath his eyes the storehouse of the devil-fish.

It was a dismal sight. The crabs had devoured the man: the devil-fish had devoured the crabs.

There were no remains of clothing anywhere visible. The man must have been seized naked.

Gilliatt, attentively examining, began to remove the shells from the skeleton. What had this man been? The body was admirably dissected; it looked as if prepared for the study of anatomy; all the flesh was stripped; not a muscle remained; not a bone was missing. If Gilliatt had been learned in science, he might have demonstrated the fact. The periostea, denuded of their covering, were white and smooth, as if they had been polished. But for some green mould of sea-mosses here and there, they would have been like ivory. The cartilaginous divisions were delicately inlaid and arranged. The tomb sometimes produces this dismal mosaic work.

The body was, as it were, interred under the heap of dead crabs. Gilliatt disinterred it.

Suddenly he stooped, and examined more closely.

He had perceived around the vertebral column a sort of belt.

It was a leathern girdle, which had evidently been worn buckled upon the waist of the man when alive.

The leather was moist; the buckle rusty.

Gilliatt pulled the girdle; the vertebra of the skeleton resisted, and he was compelled to break through them in order to remove it. A crust of small shells had begun to form upon it.

He felt it, and found a hard substance within, apparently of square form. It was useless to endeavour to unfasten the buckle, so he cut the leather with his knife.

The girdle contained a little iron box and some pieces of gold. Gilliatt counted twenty guineas.

The iron box was an old sailor’s tobacco-box, opening and shutting with a spring. It was very tight and rusty. The spring being completely oxidised would not work.

Once more the knife served Gilliatt in a difficulty. A pressure with the point of the blade caused the lid to fly up.

The box was open.

There was nothing inside but pieces of paper.

A little roll of very thin sheets, folded in four, was fitted in the bottom of the box. They were damp, but not injured. The box, hermetically sealed, had preserved them. Gilliatt unfolded them.

They were three bank-notes of one thousand pounds sterling each; making together seventy-five thousand francs.

Gilliatt folded them again, replaced them in the box, taking advantage of the space which remained to add the twenty guineas; and then reclosed the box as well as he could.

Next he examined the girdle.

The leather, which had originally been polished outside, was rough within. Upon this tawny ground some letters had been traced in black thick ink. Gilliatt deciphered them, and read the words, “Sieur Clubin.”

V

THE FATAL DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SIX INCHES AND TWO FEET

Gilliatt replaced the box in the girdle, and placed the girdle in the pocket of his trousers.

He left the skeleton among the crabs, with the remains of the devil-fish beside it.

While he had been occupied with the devil-fish and the skeleton, the rising tide had submerged the entrance to the cave. He was only enabled to leave it by plunging under the arched entrance. He got through without difficulty; for he knew the entrance well, and was master of these gymnastics in the sea.

It is easy to understand the drama which had taken place there during the ten weeks preceding. One monster had preyed upon another; the devil-fish had seized Clubin.

These two embodiments of treachery had met in the inexorable darkness. There had been an encounter at the bottom of the sea between these two compounds of mystery and watchfulness; the monster had destroyed the man: a horrible fulfilment of justice.

The crab feeds on carrion, the devil-fish on crabs. The devil-fish seizes as it passes any swimming animal — an otter, a dog, a man if it can — sucks the blood, and leaves the body at the bottom of the water. The crabs are the spider-formed scavengers of the sea. Putrefying flesh attracts them; they crowd round it, devour the body, and are in their turn consumed by the devil-fish. Dead creatures disappear in the crab, the crab disappears in the pieuvre. This is the law which we have already pointed out.

The devil-fish had laid hold of him, and drowned him. Some wave had carried his body into the cave, and deposited it at the extremity of the inner cavern, where Gilliatt had discovered it.

He returned searching among the rocks for sea-urchins and limpets. He had no desire for crabs; to have eaten them now would have seemed to him like feeding upon human flesh.

For the rest, he thought of nothing but of eating what he could before starting. Nothing now interposed to prevent his departure. Great tempests are always followed by a calm, which lasts sometimes several days. There was, therefore, no danger from the sea. Gilliatt had resolved to leave the rocks on the following day. It was important, on account of the tide, to keep the barrier between the two Douvres during the night, but he intended to remove it at daybreak, to push the sloop out to sea, and set sail for St. Sampson. The light breeze which was blowing came from the south-west, which was precisely the wind which he would want.

It was in the first quarter of the moon, in the month of May; the days were long.

When Gilliatt, having finished his wanderings among the rocks, and appeased his appetite to some extent, returned to the passage between the two Douvres, where he had left the sloop, the sun had set, the twilight was increased by that pale light which comes from a crescent moon; the tide had attained its height, and was beginning to ebb. The funnel standing upright above the sloop had been covered by the foam during the tempest with a coating of salt which glittered white in the light of the moon.

This circumstance reminded Gilliatt that the storm had inundated the sloop, both with surf and rain-water, and that if he meant to start in the morning, it would be necessary to bail it out.

Before leaving to go in quest of crabs, he had ascertained that it had about six inches of water in the hold. The scoop which he used for the purpose would, he thought, be sufficient for throwing the water overboard.

On arriving at the barrier, Gilliatt was struck with terror. There were nearly two feet of water in the sloop. A terrible discovery; the bark had sprung a leak.

She had been making water gradually during his absence. Burdened as she was, two feet of water was a perilous addition. A little more, and she must inevitably founder. If he had returned but an hour later, he would probably have found nothing above water but the funnel and the mast.

There was not a minute to be lost in deliberation. It was absolutely necessary to find the leakage, stop it, and then empty the vessel, or at all events, lighten it. The pumps of the Durande had been lost in the break-up of the wreck. He was reduced to use the scoop of the bark.

To find the leak was the most urgent necessity.

Gilliatt set to work immediately, and without even giving himself time to dress. He shivered; but he no longer felt either hunger or cold.

The water continued to gain upon his vessel. Fortunately there was no wind. The slightest swell would have been fatal.

The moon went down.

Bent low, and plunged in the water deeper than his waist he groped about for a long time. He discovered the mischief at last.

During the gale, at the critical moment when the sloop had swerved, the strong bark had bumped and grazed rather violently on the rocks. One of the projections of the Little Douvre had made a fracture in the starboard side of the hull.

The leak unluckily — it might almost have been said, maliciously — had been made near the joint of the two riders, a fact which, joined with the fury of the hurricane, had prevented him perceiving it during his dark and rapid survey in the height of the storm.

The fracture was alarming on account of its size; but fortunately, although the vessel was sunk lower than usual by the weight of water, it was still above the ordinary water-line.

At the moment when the accident had occurred, the waves had rolled heavily into the defile, and had flooded through the breach; and the vessel had sunk a few inches under the additional weight, so that, even after the subsidence of the water, the weight having raised the water-line, had kept the hole still under the surface. Hence the imminence of the danger. But if he could succeed in stopping the leak, he could empty the sloop; the hole once staunched, the vessel would rise to its usual water-line, the fracture would be above water, and in this position the repair would be easy, or at least possible. He had still, as we have already said, his carpenters’ tools in good condition.

But meanwhile what uncertainty must he not endure! What perils, what chances of accidents! He heard the water rising inexorably. One shock, and all would have perished. What misery seemed in store for him. Perhaps his endeavours were even now too late.

He reproached himself bitterly. He thought that he ought to have seen the damage immediately. The six inches of water in the hold ought to have suggested it to him. He had been stupid enough to attribute these six inches of water to the rain and the foam. He was angry with himself for having slept and eaten; he taxed himself even with his weariness, and almost with the storm and the dark night. All seemed to him to have been his own fault.

These bitter self-reproaches filled his mind while engaged in his labour, but they did not prevent his considering well the work he was engaged in.

The leak had been found; that was the first step: to staunch it was the second. That was all that was possible for the moment. Joinery work cannot be carried on under water.

It was a favourable circumstance that the breach in the hull was in the space between the two chains which held the funnel fast on the starboard side. The stuffing with which it was necessary to stop it could be fixed to these chains.

The water meanwhile was gaining. Its depth was now between two and three feet; and it reached above his knees.

VI

DE PROFUNDIS AD ALTUM

Gilliatt had to his hand among his reserve of rigging for the sloop a pretty large tarpaulin, furnished with long laniards at the four corners.

He took this tarpaulin, made fast the two corners by the laniards to the two rings of the chains of the funnel on the same side as the leak, and threw it over the gunwale. The tarpaulin hung like a sheet between the Little Douvre and the bark, and sunk in the water. The pressure of the water endeavouring to enter into the hold, kept it close to the hull upon the gap. The heavier the pressure the closer the sail adhered. It was stuck by the water itself right upon the fracture. The wound of the bark was staunched.

The tarred canvas formed an effectual barrier between the interior of the hold and the waves without. Not a drop of water entered. The leak was masked, but was not stopped. It was a respite only.

Gilliatt took the scoop and began to bale the sloop. It was time that she were lightened. The labour warmed him a little, but his weariness was extreme. He was forced to acknowledge to himself that he could not complete the work of staunching the hold. He had scarcely eaten anything, and he had the humiliation of feeling himself exhausted.

He measured the progress of his work by the sinking of the level of water below his knees. The fall was slow.

Moreover, the leakage was only interrupted; the evil was moderated, not repaired. The tarpaulin pushed into the gap began to bulge inside; looking as if a fist were under the canvas, endeavouring to force it through. The canvas, strong and pitchy, resisted; but the swelling and the tension increased; it was not certain that it would not give way, and at any moment the swelling might become a rent. The irruption of water must then recommence.

In such a case, as the crews of vessels in distress know well, there is no other remedy than stuffing. The sailors take rags of every kind which they can find at hand, everything, in fact, which in their language is called “service;” and with this they push the bulging sail-cloth as far as they can into the leak.

Of this “service,” Gilliatt had none. All the rags and tow which he had stored up had been used in his operations, or carried away by the storm.

If necessary, he might possibly have been able to find some remains by searching among the rocks. The sloop was sufficiently lightened for him to leave it with safety for a quarter of an hour; but how could he make this search without a light? The darkness was complete. There was no longer any moon; nothing but the starry sky. He had no dry tow with which to make a match, no tallow to make a candle, no fire to light one, no lantern to shelter it from the wind. In the sloop and among the rocks all was confused and indistinct. He could hear the water lapping against the wounded hull, but he could not even see the crack. It was with his hands that he had ascertained the bulging of the tarpaulin. In that darkness it was impossible to make any useful search for rags of canvas or pieces of tow scattered among the breakers. Who could glean these waifs and strays without being able to see his path? Gilliatt looked sorrowfully at the sky; all those stars, he thought, and yet no light!

The water in the bark having diminished, the pressure from without increased. The bulging of the canvas became larger, and was still increasing, like a frightful abscess ready to burst. The situation, which had been improved for a short time, began to be threatening.

Some means of stopping it effectually was absolutely necessary. He had nothing left but his clothes, which he had stretched to dry upon the projecting rocks of the Little Douvre.

He hastened to fetch them, and placed them upon the gunwale of the sloop.

Then he took his tarpaulin overcoat, and kneeling in the water, thrust it into the crevice, and pushing the swelling of the sail outward, emptied it of water. To the tarpaulin coat he added the sheepskin, then his Guernsey shirt, and then his jacket. The hole received them all. He had nothing left but his sailor’s trousers, which he took off, and pushed in with the other articles. This enlarged and strengthened the stuffing.

The stopper was made, and it appeared to be sufficient.

These clothes passed partly through the gap, the sail-cloth outside enveloping them. The sea making an effort to enter, pressed against the obstacle, spread it over the gap, and blocked it. It was a sort of exterior compression.

Inside, the centre only of the bulging having been driven out, there remained all around the gap and the stuffing just thrust through a sort of circular pad formed by the tarpaulin, which was rendered still firmer by the irregularities of the fracture with which it had become entangled.

The leak was staunched, but nothing could be more precarious. Those sharp splinters of the gap which fixed the tarpaulin might pierce it and make holes, by which the water would enter; while he would not even perceive it in the darkness. There was little probability of the stoppage lasting until daylight. Gilliatt's anxiety changed its form; but he felt it increasing at the same time that he found his strength leaving him.

He had again set to work to bale out the hold, but his arms, in spite of all his efforts, could scarcely lift a scoopfull of water. He was naked and shivering. He felt as if the end were now at hand.

One possible chance flashed across his mind. There might be a sail in sight. A fishing-boat which should by any accident be in the neighbourhood of the Douvres, might come to his assistance. The moment had arrived when a helpmate was absolutely necessary. With a man and a lantern all might yet be saved. If there were two persons, one might easily bale the vessel. Since the leak was temporarily staunched, as soon as she could be relieved of this burden, she would rise, and regain her ordinary water-line. The leak would then be above the surface of the water, the repairs would be practicable, and he would be able immediately to replace the stuff by a piece of planking, and thus substitute for the temporary stoppage a complete repair. If not, it would be necessary to wait till daylight — to wait the whole night long; a delay which might prove ruinous. If by chance some ship's lantern should be in sight, Gilliatt would be able to signal it from the height of the Great Douvre. The weather was calm, there was no wind or rolling sea; there was a possibility of the figure of a man being observed moving against the background of the starry sky. A captain of a ship, or even the master of a fishing-boat, would not be at night in the waters of the Douvres without directing his glass upon the rock, by way of precaution.

Gilliatt hoped that some one might perceive him.

He climbed upon the wreck, grasped the knotted rope, and mounted upon the Great Douvre.

Not a sail was visible around the horizon; not a boat's lantern. The wide expanse, as far as eye could reach, was a desert. No assistance was possible, and no resistance possible.

Gilliatt felt himself without resources; a feeling which he had not felt until then.

A dark fatality was now his master. With all his labour, all his success, all his courage, he and his bark, and its precious burden, were about to become the sport of the waves. He had no other means of continuing the struggle; he became listless. How could he prevent the tide from returning, the water from rising, the night from continuing? The temporary stoppage which he had made was his sole reliance. He had exhausted and stripped himself in constructing and completing it; he could neither fortify nor add to it. The stopgap was such that it must remain as it was; and every further effort was useless. The apparatus, hastily constructed, was at the mercy of the waves. How would this inert obstacle work? It was this obstacle now, not Gilliatt, which had to sustain the combat, that handfull of rags, not that intelligence. The swell of a wave would suffice to re-open the fracture. More or less of pressure; the whole question was comprised in that formula.

All depended upon a brute struggle between two mechanical quantities. Henceforth he could neither aid his auxiliary, nor stop his enemy. He was no longer any other than a mere spectator of this struggle, which was one for him of life or death. He who had ruled over it, a supreme intelligence, was at the last moment compelled to resign all to a mere blind resistance.

No trial, no terror that he had yet undergone, could bear comparison with this.

From the time when he had taken up his abode upon the Douvres, he had found himself environed, and, as it were, possessed by solitude. This solitude more than surrounded, it enveloped him. A thousand menaces at once had met him face to face. The wind was always there, ready to become furious; the sea, ready to roar. There was no stopping that terrible mouth the wind, no imprisoning that dread monster the sea. And yet he had striven, he, a solitary man, had combated hand to hand with the ocean, had wrestled even with the tempest.

Many other anxieties, many other necessities had he made head against. There was no form of distress with which he had not become familiar. He had been compelled to execute great works without tools, to move vast burdens without aid, without science to resolve problems, without provisions to find food, without bed or roof to cover it, to find shelter and sleep.

Upon that solitary rock he had been subjected by turns to all the varied and cruel tortures of nature; oftentimes a gentle mother, not less often a pitiless destroyer.

He had conquered his isolation, conquered hunger, conquered thirst, conquered cold, conquered fever, conquered labour, conquered sleep. He had encountered a mighty coalition of obstacles formed to bar his progress. After his privations there were the elements; after the sea the tempest, after the tempest the devil-fish, after the monster the spectre.

A dismal irony was then the end of all. Upon this rock, whence he had thought to arise triumphant, the spectre of Clubin had only arisen to mock him with a hideous smile.

The grin of the spectre was well founded. Gilliatt saw himself ruined; saw himself no less than Clubin in the grasp of death.

Winter, famine, fatigue, the dismemberment of the wreck, the removal of the machinery, the equinoctial gale, the thunder, the monster, were all as nothing compared with this small fracture in a vessel’s planks. Against the cold one could procure — and he had procured — fire; against hunger, the shell-fish of the rocks; against thirst, the rain; against the difficulties of his great task, industry and energy; against the sea and the storm, the breakwater; against the devil-fish, the knife; but against the terrible leak he had no weapon.

The hurricane had bequeathed him this sinister farewell. The last struggle, the traitorous thrust, the treacherous side blow of the vanquished foe. In its flight the tempest had turned and shot this arrow in the rear. It was the final and deadly stab of his antagonist.

It was possible to combat with the tempest, but how could he struggle with that insidious enemy who now attacked him.

If the stoppage gave way, if the leak re-opened, nothing could prevent the sloop foundering. It would be the bursting of the ligature of the artery; and once under the water with its heavy burden, no power could raise it. The noble struggle, with two months’ Titanic labour, ended then in annihilation. To recommence would be impossible. He had neither forge nor materials. At daylight, in all probability, he was about to see all his work sink slowly and irrecoverably into the gulf. Terrible, to feel that sombre power beneath. The sea snatched his prize from his hands.

With his bark engulfed, no fate awaited him but to perish of hunger and cold, like the poor shipwrecked sailor on “The Man Rock.”

During two long months the intelligences which hover invisibly over the world had been the spectators of these things; on one hand the wide expanse, the waves, the winds, the lightnings, the meteors; on the other a man. On one hand the sea, on the other a human mind; on the one hand the infinite, on the other an atom.

The battle had been fierce, and behold the abortive issue of these prodigies of valour.

Thus did this heroism without parallel end in powerlessness; thus ended in despair that formidable struggle; that struggle of a nothing against all; that Iliad against one.

Gilliatt gazed wildly into space.

He had no clothing. He stood naked in the midst of that immensity.

Then overwhelmed by the sense of that unknown infinity, like one bewildered by a strange persecution, confronting the shadows of night, in the presence of that impenetrable darkness, in the midst of the murmur of the waves, the swell, the foam, the breeze, under the clouds, under that vast diffusion of force, under that mysterious firmament of wings, of stars, of gulfs, having around him and beneath him the ocean, above him the constellations, under the great unfathomable deep, he sank, gave up the struggle, lay down upon the rock, his face towards the stars, humbled, and uplifting his joined hands towards the terrible depths, he cried aloud, “Have mercy.”

Weighed down to earth by that immensity, he prayed.

He was there alone, in the darkness upon the rock, in the midst of that sea, stricken down with exhaustion like one smitten by lightning, naked like the gladiator in the circus, save that for circus he had the vast horizon, instead of wild beasts the shadows of darkness, instead of the faces of the crowd the eyes of the Unknown, instead of the Vestals the stars, instead of Cæsar the All-powerful.

His whole being seemed to dissolve in cold, fatigue, powerlessness, prayer, and darkness, and his eyes closed.

THE APPEAL IS HEARD

Some hours passed.

The sun rose in an unclouded sky.

Its first ray shone upon a motionless form upon the Great Douvre. It was Gilliatt.

He was still outstretched upon the rock.

He was naked, cold, and stiff; but he did not shiver. His closed eyelids were wan. It would have been difficult for a beholder to say whether the form before him was not a corpse.

The sun seemed to look upon him.

If he were not dead, he was already so near death that the slightest cold wind would have sufficed to extinguish life.

The wind began to breathe, warm and animating: it was the opening breath of May.

Meanwhile the sun ascended in the deep blue sky; its rays, less horizontal, flushed the sky. Its light became warmth. It enveloped the slumbering form.

Gilliatt moved not. If he breathed, it was only that feeble respiration which could scarcely tarnish the surface of a mirror.

The sun continued its ascent; its rays striking less and less obliquely upon the naked man. The gentle breeze which had been merely tepid became hot.

The rigid and naked body remained still without movement; but the skin seemed less livid.

The sun, approaching the zenith, shone almost perpendicularly upon the plateau of the Douvres. A flood of light descended from the heavens; the vast reflection from the glassy sea increased its splendour: the rock itself imbibed the rays and warmed the sleeper.

A sigh raised his breast.

He lived.

The sun continued its gentle offices. The wind, which was already the breath of summer and of noon, approached him like loving lips that breathed upon him softly.

Gilliatt moved.

The peaceful calm upon the sea was perfect. Its murmur was like the droning of the nurse beside the sleeping infant. The rock seemed cradled in the waves.

The sea-birds, who knew that form, fluttered above it; not with their old wild astonishment, but with a sort of fraternal tenderness. They uttered plaintive cries: they seemed to be calling to him. A sea-mew, who no doubt knew him, was tame enough to come near him. It began to caw as if speaking to him. The sleeper seemed not to hear. The bird hopped upon his shoulder, and pecked his lips softly.

Gilliatt opened his eyes.

The birds dispersed, chattering wildly.

Gilliatt arose, stretched himself like a roused lion, ran to the edge of the platform, and looked down into the space between the two Douvres.

The sloop was there, intact; the stoppage had held out; the sea had probably disturbed it but little.

All was saved.

He was no longer weary. His powers had returned. His swoon had ended in a deep sleep.

He descended and baled out the sloop, emptied the hold, raised the leakage above the water-line, dressed himself, ate, drank some water, and was joyful.

The gap in the side of his vessel, examined in broad daylight, proved to require more labour than he had thought. It was a serious fracture. The entire day was not too much for its repair.

At daybreak on the morrow, after removing the barrier and re-opening the entrance to the defile, dressed in the tattered clothing which had served to stop the leak, having about him Clubin’s girdle and the seventy-five thousand francs, standing erect in the sloop, now repaired, by the side of the machinery which he had rescued, with a favourable breeze and a good sea, Gilliatt pushed off from the Douvres.

He put the sloop’s head for Guernsey.

At the moment of his departure from the rocks, any one who had been there might have heard him singing, in an undertone, the air of “Bonnie Dundee.”

PART III. — DÉRUCHETTE

BOOK I

NIGHT AND THE MOON

I

THE HARBOUR BELL

The St. Sampson of the present day is almost a city; the St. Sampson of forty years since was almost a village.

When the winter evenings were ended and spring had come, the inhabitants were not long out of bed after sundown. St. Sampson was an ancient parish which had long been accustomed to the sound of the curfew-bell, and which had a traditional habit of blowing out the candle at an early hour. Those old Norman villages are famous for early roosting, and the villagers are generally great rearers of poultry.

The people of St. Sampson, except a few rich families among the townsfolk, are also a population of quarriers and carpenters. The port is a port of ship repairing. The quarrying of stone and the fashioning of timber go on all day long; here the labourer with the pickaxe, there the workman with the mallet. At night they sink with fatigue, and sleep like lead. Rude labours bring heavy slumbers.

One evening, in the commencement of the month of May, after watching the crescent moon for some instants through the trees, and listening to the step of Déruchette, walking alone in the cool air in the garden of the Bravées, Mess Lethierry had returned to his room looking on the harbour, and had retired to rest; Douce and Grace were already a-bed. Except Déruchette, the whole household were sleeping. Doors and shutters were everywhere closed. Footsteps were silent in the streets. Some few lights, like winking eyes about to close in rest, showed here and there in windows in the roofs, indicating the hour of domestics going to bed. Nine had already struck in the old Romanesque belfry, surrounded by ivy, which shares with the church of St. Brélade at Jersey the peculiarity of having for its date four ones (IIII), which are used to signify eleven hundred and eleven.

The popularity of Mess Lethierry at St. Sampson had been founded on his success. The success at an end, there had come a void. It might be imagined that ill-fortune is contagious, and that the unsuccessful have a plague, so rapidly are they put in quarantine. The young men of well-to-do families avoided Déruchette. The isolation around the Bravées was so complete that its inmates had not even yet heard the news of the great local event which had that day set all St. Sampson in a ferment. The rector of the parish, the Rev. Ebenezer Caudray, had become rich. His uncle, the magnificent Dean of St. Asaph, had just died in London. The news had been brought by the mail sloop, the Cashmere, arrived from England that very morning, and the mast of which could be perceived in the roads of St. Peter's Port. The Cashmere was to depart for Southampton at noon on the morrow, and, so the rumour ran, to convey the reverend gentleman, who had been suddenly summoned to England, to be present at the official opening of the will, not to speak of other urgent matters connected with an important inheritance. All day long St. Sampson had been conversing on this subject. The Cashmere, the Rev. Ebenezer, his deceased uncle, his riches, his departure, his possible preferment in the future, had formed the foundations of that perpetual buzzing. A solitary house, still uninformed on these matters, had remained at peace. This was the Bravées.

Mess Lethierry had jumped into his hammock, and lay down in his clothing.

Since the catastrophe of the Durande, to get into his hammock had been his resource. Every captive has recourse to stretching himself upon his pallet, and Mess Lethierry was the captive of his grief. To go to bed was a truce, a gain in breathing time, a suspension of ideas. He neither slept nor watched. Strictly speaking, for two months and a half — for so long was it since his misfortune — Mess Lethierry had been in a sort of somnambulism. He had not yet regained possession of his faculties. He was in that cloudy and confused condition of intellect with which those are familiar who have undergone overwhelming afflictions. His reflections were not thought, his sleep was no repose. By day he was not awake, by night not asleep. He was up, and then gone to rest, that was all. When he was in his hammock forgetfulness came to him a little. He called that sleeping. Chimeras floated about him, and within him. The nocturnal cloud, full of confused faces, traversed his brain. Sometimes it was the Emperor Napoleon dictating to him the story of his life; sometimes there were several Déruchettes; strange birds were in the trees; the streets of Lons-le-Saulnier became serpents. Nightmares were the brief respites of despair. He passed his nights in dreaming, and his days in reverie.

Sometimes he remained all the afternoon at the window of his room, which looked out upon the port, with his head drooping, his elbows on the stone, his ears resting on his fists, his back turned to the whole world, his eye fixed on the old massive iron ring fastened in the wall of the house, at only a few feet from his window, where in the old days he used to moor the Durande. He was looking at the rust which gathered on the ring.

He was reduced to the mere mechanical habit of living.

The bravest men, when deprived of their most cherished idea, will come to this. His life had become a void. Life is a voyage; the idea is the itinerary. The plan of their course gone, they stop. The object is lost, the strength of purpose gone. Fate has a secret discretionary power. It is able to touch with its rod even our moral being. Despair is almost the destitution of the soul. Only the greatest minds resist, and for what?

Mess Lethierry was always meditating, if absorption can be called meditation, in the depth of a sort of cloudy abyss. Broken words sometimes escaped him like these, “There is nothing left for me now, but to ask yonder for leave to go.”

There was a certain contradiction in that nature, complex as the sea, of which Mess Lethierry was, so to speak, the product. Mess Lethierry’s grief did not seek relief in prayer.

To be powerless is a certain strength. In the presence of our two great expressions of this blindness — destiny and nature — it is in his powerlessness that man has found his chief support in prayer.

Man seeks succour from his terror; his anxiety bids him kneel. Prayer, that mighty force of the soul, akin to mystery. Prayer addresses itself to the magnanimity of the Shades; prayer regards mystery with eyes themselves overshadowed by it, and beneath the power of its fixed and appealing gaze, we feel the possibility of the great Unknown unbending to reply.

The mere thought of such a possibility becomes a consolation.

But Mess Lethierry prayed not.

In the time when he was happy, God existed for him almost in visible contact. Lethierry addressed Him, pledged his word to Him, seemed at times to hold familiar intercourse with Him. But in the hour of his misfortune, a phenomenon not infrequent — the idea of God had become eclipsed in his mind. This happens when the mind has created for itself a deity clothed with human qualities.

In the state of mind in which he existed, there was for Lethierry only one clear vision — the smile of Déruchette. Beyond this all was dark.

For some time, apparently on account of the loss of the Durande, and of the blow which it had been to them, this pleasant smile had been rare. She seemed always thoughtful. Her birdlike playfulness, her childlike ways, were gone. She was never seen now in the morning, at the sound of the cannon which announced daybreak, saluting the rising sun with "Boom! Daylight! Come in, please!" At times her expression was very serious, a sad thing for that sweet nature. She made an effort, however, sometimes to laugh before Mess Lethierry and to divert him; but her cheerfulness grew tarnished from day to day — gathered dust like the wing of a butterfly with a pin through its body. Whether through sorrow for her uncle's sorrow — for there are griefs which are the reflections of other griefs — or whether for any other reasons, she appeared at this time to be much inclined towards religion. In the time of the old rector, M. Jaquemin Hérode, she scarcely went to church, as has been already said, four times a year. Now she was, on the contrary, assiduous in her attendance. She missed no service, neither of Sunday nor of Thursday. Pious souls in the parish remarked with satisfaction that amendment. For it is a great blessing when a girl who runs so many dangers in the world turns her thoughts towards God. That enables the poor parents at least to be easy on the subject of love-making and what not.

In the evening, whenever the weather permitted, she walked for an hour or two in the garden of the Bravées. She was almost as pensive there as Mess Lethierry, and almost always alone. Déruchette went to bed last. This, however, did not prevent Douce and Grace watching her a little, by that instinct for spying which is common to servants; spying is such a relaxation after household work.

As to Mess Lethierry, in the abstracted state of his mind, these little changes in Déruchette's habits escaped him. Moreover, his nature had little in common with the Duenna. He had not even remarked her regularity at the church. Tenacious of his prejudices against the clergy and their sermons, he would have seen with little pleasure these frequent attendances at the parish church. It was not because his own moral condition was not undergoing change. Sorrow is a cloud which changes form.

Robust natures, as we have said, are sometimes almost overthrown by sudden great misfortunes; but not quite. Manly characters such as Lethierry's experience a reaction in a given time. Despair has its backward stages. From overwhelmment we rise to dejection; from dejection to affliction; from affliction to melancholy. Melancholy is a twilight state; suffering melts into it and becomes a sombre joy. Melancholy is the pleasure of being sad.

These elegiac moods were not made for Lethierry. Neither the nature of his temperament nor the character of his misfortune suited those delicate shades. But at the moment at which we have returned to him, the reverie of his first despair had for more than a week been tending to disperse; without, however, leaving him less sad. He was more inactive, was always dull; but he was no longer overwhelmed. A certain perception of events and circumstances was returning to him, and he began to experience something of that phenomenon which may be called the return to reality.

Thus by day in the great lower room, he did not listen to the words of those about him, but he heard them. Grace came one morning quite triumphant to tell Déruchette that he had undone the cover of a newspaper.

This half acceptance of realities is in itself a good symptom, a token of convalescence. Great afflictions produce a stupor; it is by such little acts that men return to themselves. This improvement, however, is at first only an aggravation of the evil. The dreamy condition of mind in which the sufferer has lived, has served, while it lasted, to blunt his grief. His sight before was thick. He felt little. Now his view is clear, nothing escapes him; and his wounds re-open. Each detail that he perceives serves to remind him of his sorrow. He sees everything again in memory, every remembrance is a regret. All kinds of bitter aftertastes lurk in that return to life. He is better, and yet worse. Such was the condition of Lethierry. In returning to full consciousness, his sufferings had become more distinct.

A sudden shock first recalled him to a sense of reality.

One afternoon, between the 15th and 20th of April, a double-knock at the door of the great lower room of the Bravées had signalled the arrival of the postman. Douce had opened the door; there was a letter.

The letter came from beyond sea; it was addressed to Mess Lethierry, and bore the postmark "Lisbon."

Douce had taken the letter to Mess Lethierry, who was in his room. He had taken it, placed it mechanically upon the table, and had not looked at it.

The letter remained an entire week upon the table without being unsealed.

It happened, however, one morning that Douce said to Mess Lethierry:

“Shall I brush the dust off your letter, sir?”

Lethierry seemed to arouse from his lethargy.

“Ay, ay! You are right,” he said; and he opened the letter, and read as follows: —

“At Sea, 10th March.

“To Mess Lethierry of St. Sampson.

“You will be gratified to receive news of me. I am aboard the Tamaulipas, bound for the port of ‘No-return.’ Among the crew is a sailor named Ahier-Tostevin, from Guernsey, who will return and will have some facts to communicate to you. I take the opportunity of our speaking a vessel, the Herman Cortes, bound for Lisbon, to forward you this letter.

“You will be astonished to learn that I am going to be honest.

“As honest as Sieur Clubin.

“I am bound to believe that you know of certain recent occurrences; nevertheless, it is, perhaps, not altogether superfluous to send you a full account of them,

“To proceed then.

“I have returned you your money.

“Some years ago, I borrowed from you, under somewhat irregular circumstances, the sum of fifty thousand francs. Before leaving St. Malo lately, I placed in the hands of your confidential man of business, Sieur Clubin, on your account three bank-notes of one thousand pounds each; making together seventy-five thousand francs. You will no doubt find this reimbursement sufficient.

“Sieur Clubin acted for you, and received your money, including interest, in a remarkably energetic manner. He appeared to me, indeed, singularly zealous. This is, in fact, my reason for apprising you of the facts.

“Your other confidential man of business,

“Rantaine.

“Postscript — Sieur Clubin was in possession of a revolver, which will explain to you the circumstance of my having no receipt.”

He who has ever touched a torpedo, or a Leyden-jar fully charged, may have a notion of the effect produced on Mess Lethierry by the reading of this letter.

Under that envelope, in that sheet of paper folded in four, to which he had at first paid so little attention, lay the elements of an extraordinary commotion.

He recognised the writing and the signature. As to the facts which the letter contained, at first he understood nothing.

The excitement of the event, however, soon gave movement to his faculties.

The effective part of the shock he had received lay in the phenomenon of the seventy-five thousand francs entrusted by Rantaine to Clubin; this was a riddle which compelled Lethierry's brain to work. Conjecture is a healthy occupation for the mind. Reason is awakened: logic is called into play.

For some time past public opinion in Guernsey had been undergoing a reaction on the subject of Clubin: that man of such high reputation for honour during many years; that man so unanimously regarded with esteem. People had begun to question and to doubt; there were wagers pro and con. Some light had been thrown on the question in singular ways. The figure of Clubin began to become clearer, that is to say, he began to be blacker in the eyes of the world.

A judicial inquiry had taken place at St. Malo, for the purpose of ascertaining what had become of the coast-guardman, number 619. Legal perspicacity had got upon a false scent, a thing which happens not unfrequently. It had started with the hypothesis that the man had been enticed by Zuela, and shipped aboard the Tamaulipas for Chili. This ingenious supposition had led to a considerable amount of wasted conjecture. The shortsightedness of justice had failed to take note of Rantaine; but in the progress of inquiry the authorities had come upon other clues. The affair, so obscure, became complicated. Clubin had become mixed up with the enigma. A coincidence, perhaps a direct connection, had been found between the departure of the Tamaulipas and the loss of the Durande. At the wine-shop near the Dinan Gate, where Clubin thought himself entirely unknown, he had been recognised. The wine-shop keeper had talked; Clubin had bought a bottle of brandy that night. For whom? The gunsmith of St. Vincent Street, too, had talked. Clubin had purchased a revolver. For what object? The landlord of the "Jean Auberge" had talked.

Clubin had absented himself in an inexplicable manner. Captain Gertrais-Gaboureau had talked; Clubin had determined to start, although warned, and knowing that he might expect a great fog. The crew of the Durande had talked. In fact, the collection of the freight had been neglected, and the stowage badly arranged, a negligence easy to comprehend, if the captain had determined to wreck the ship. The Guernsey passenger, too, had spoken. Clubin had evidently imagined that he had run upon the Hanways. The Torteval people had spoken. Clubin had visited that neighbourhood a few days before the loss of the Durande, and had been seen walking in the direction of Pleinmont, near the Hanways. He had with him a travelling-bag. "He had set out with it, and come back without it." The birds'-nesters had spoken: their story seemed to be possibly connected with Clubin's disappearance, if instead of ghosts they supposed smugglers. Finally, the haunted house of Pleinmont itself had spoken. Persons who had determined to get information had climbed and entered the windows, and had found inside — what? The very travelling-bag which had been seen in Sieur Clubin's possession. The authorities of the Douzaine of Torteval had taken possession of the bag and had it opened. It was found to contain provisions, a telescope, a chronometer, a man's clothing, and linen marked with Clubin's initials. All this in the gossip of St. Malo and Guernsey became more and more like a case of fraud. Obscure hints were brought together; there appeared to have been a singular disregard of advice; a willingness to encounter the dangers of the fog; a suspected negligence in the stowage of the cargo. Then there was the mysterious bottle of brandy; a drunken helmsman; a substitution of the captain for the helmsman; a management of the rudder, to say the least, unskilful. The heroism of remaining behind upon the wreck began to look like roguery. Clubin besides had evidently been deceived as to the rock he was on. Granted an intention to wreck the vessel, it was easy to understand the choice of the Hanways, the shore easily reached by swimming, and the intended concealment in the haunted house awaiting the opportunity for flight. The travelling-bag, that suspicious preparative, completed the demonstration. By what link this affair connected itself with the other affair of the disappearance of the coast-guardman nobody knew. People imagined some connection, and that was all. They had a glimpse in their minds of the look-out-man, number 619, alongside of the mysterious Clubin — quite a tragic drama. Clubin possibly was not an actor in it, but his presence was visible in the side scenes.

The supposition of a wilful destruction of the Durande did not explain everything. There was a revolver in the story, with no part yet assigned to it. The revolver, probably, belonged to the other affair.

The scent of the public is keen and true. Its instinct excels in those discoveries of truth by pieces and fragments. Still, amidst these facts, which seemed to point pretty clearly to a case of barratry, there were serious difficulties.

Everything was consistent; everything coherent; but a basis was wanting.

People do not wreck vessels for the pleasure of wrecking them. Men do not run all those risks of fog, rocks, swimming, concealment, and flight without an interest. What could have been Clubin’s interest?

The act seemed plain, but the motive was puzzling.

Hence a doubt in many minds. Where there is no motive, it is natural to infer that there was no act.

The missing link was important. The letter from Rantaine seemed to supply it.

This letter furnished a motive for Clubin’s supposed crime: seventy-five thousand francs to be appropriated.

Rantaine was the Deus ex machinâ. He had descended from the clouds with a lantern in his hand. His letter was the final light upon the affair. It explained everything, and even promised a witness in the person of Ahier-Tostevin.

The part which it at once suggested for the revolver was decisive. Rantaine was undoubtedly well informed. His letter pointed clearly the explanation of the mystery.

There could be no possible palliation of Clubin’s crime. He had premeditated the shipwreck; the proofs were the preparations discovered in the haunted house. Even supposing him innocent, and admitting the wreck to have been accidental, would he not, at the last moment, when he had determined to sacrifice himself with the vessel, have entrusted the seventy-five thousand francs to the men who escaped in the long-boat. The evidence was strikingly complete. Now what had become of Clubin? He had probably been the victim of his blunder. He had doubtless perished upon the Douvres.

All this construction of surmises, which were not far from the reality, had for several days occupied the mind of Mess Lethierry. The letter from Rantaine had done him the service of setting him to think. He was at first shaken by his surprise; then he made an effort to reflect. He made another effort more difficult still, that of inquiry. He was induced to listen, and even seek conversation. At the end of a week, he had become, to a certain degree, in the world again; his thoughts had regained their coherence, and he was almost restored. He had emerged from his confused and troubled state.

Rantaine’s letter, even admitting that Mess Lethierry could ever have entertained any hope of the reimbursement of his money, destroyed that last chance.

It added to the catastrophe of the Durande this new wreck of seventy-five thousand francs. It put him in possession of that amount just so far as to make him sensible of its loss. The letter revealed to him the extreme point in his ruin.

Hence he experienced a new and very painful sensation, which we have already spoken of. He began to take an interest in his household — what it was to be in the future — how he was to set things in order; matters of which he had taken no heed for two months past. These trifling cares wounded him with a thousand tiny points, worse in their aggregate than the old despair. A sorrow is doubly burdensome which has to be endured in each item, and while disputing inch by inch with fate for ground already lost. Ruin is endurable in the mass, but not in the dust and fragments of the fallen edifice. The great fact may overwhelm, but the details torture. The catastrophe which lately fell like a thunderbolt, becomes now a cruel persecution. Humiliation comes to aggravate the blow. A second desolation succeeds the first, with features more repulsive. You descend one degree nearer to annihilation. The winding-sheet becomes changed to sordid rags.

No thought is more bitter than that of one’s own gradual fall from a social position.

Ruin is simple enough. A violent shock; a cruel turn of fate; a catastrophe once for all. Be it so. We submit, and all is over. You are ruined: it is well; you are dead? No; you are still living. On the morrow you know it well. By what? By the pricking of a pin. Yonder passer-by omits to recognise you; the tradesmen’s bills rain down upon you; and yonder is one of your enemies, who is smiling. Perhaps he is thinking of Arnal’s last pun; but it is all the same. The pun would not have appeared to him so inimitable but for your ruin. You read your own sudden insignificance even in looks of indifference. Friends who used to dine at your table become of opinion that three courses were an extravagance. Your faults are patent to the eyes of everybody; ingratitude having nothing more to expect, proclaims itself openly; every idiot has foreseen your misfortunes. The malignant pull you to pieces; the more malignant profess to pity. And then come a hundred paltry details. Nausea succeeds to grief. You have been wont to indulge in wine; you must now drink cider. Two servants, too! Why, one will be too many. It will be necessary to discharge this one, and get rid of that. Flowers in your garden are superfluous; you will plant it with potatoes. You used to make presents of your fruits to friends; you will send them henceforth to market. As to the poor, it will be absurd to think of giving anything to them. Are you not poor yourself? And then there is the painful question of dress. To have to refuse a wife a new ribbon, what a torture! To have to refuse one who has made you a gift of her beauty a trifling article; to haggle over such matters, like a miser! Perhaps she will say to you, “What! rob my garden of its flowers, and now refuse one for my bonnet!” Ah me! to have to condemn her to shabby dresses. The family table is silent. You fancy that those around it think harshly of you. Beloved faces have become clouded. This is what is meant by falling fortunes. It is to die day by day. To be struck down is like the blast of the furnace; to decay like this is the torture of the slow fire.

An overwhelming blow is a sort of Waterloo, a slow decay, a St. Helena. Destiny, incarnate in the form of Wellington, has still some dignity; but how sordid in the shape of Hudson Lowe. Fate becomes then a paltry huckster. We find the man of Campo Formio quarrelling about a pair of stockings; we see that dwarfing of Napoleon which makes England less. Waterloo and St. Helena! Reduced to humbler proportions, every ruined man has traversed those two phases.

On the evening we have mentioned, and which was one of the first evenings in May, Lethierry, leaving Déruchette to walk by moonlight in the garden, had gone to bed more depressed than ever.

All these mean and repulsive details, peculiar to worldly misfortune; all these trifling cares, which are at first insipid, and afterwards harassing, were revolving in his mind. A sullen load of miseries! Mess Lethierry felt that his fall was irremediable. What could he do? What would become of them? What sacrifices should he be compelled to impose on Déruchette? Whom should he discharge — Douce or Grace? Would they have to sell the Bravées? Would they not be compelled to leave the island? To be nothing where he had been everything; it was a terrible fall indeed.

And to know that the old times had gone for ever! To recall those journeys to and fro, uniting France with those numberless islands; the Tuesday’s departure, the Friday’s return, the crowd on the quay, those great cargoes, that industry, that prosperity, that proud direct navigation, that machinery embodying the will of man, that all-powerful boiler, that smoke, all that reality! The steamboat had been the final crown of the compass; the needle indicating the direct track, the steam-vessel following it. One proposing, the other executing. Where was she now, his Durande, that mistress of the seas, that queen who had made him a king? To have been so long the man of ideas in his own country, the man of success, the man who revolutionised navigation; and then to have to give up all, to abdicate! To cease to exist, to become a bye-word, an empty bag which once was full. To belong to the past, after having so long represented the future. To come down to be an object of pity to fools, to witness the triumph of routine, obstinacy, conservatism, selfishness, ignorance. To see the old barbarous sailing cutters crawling to and fro upon the sea: the outworn old-world prejudices young again; to have wasted a whole life; to have been a light, and to suffer this eclipse. Ah! what a sight it was upon the waves, that noble funnel, that prodigious cylinder, that pillar with its capital of smoke, that column grander than any in the Place Vendôme, for on that there was only a man, while on this stood Progress. The ocean was subdued; it was certainty upon the open sea. And had all this been witnessed in that little island, in that little harbour, in that little town of St. Sampson? Yes; it had been witnessed. And could it be that, having seen it, all had vanished to be seen no more.

All this series of regrets tortured Lethierry. There is such a thing as a mental sobbing. Never, perhaps, had he felt his misfortune more bitterly. A certain numbness follows this acute suffering. Under the weight of his sorrow he gradually dosed.

For about two hours he remained in this state, feverish, sleeping a little, meditating much. Such torpors are accompanied by an obscure labour of the brain, which is inexpressibly wearying. Towards the middle of the night, about midnight, a little before or a little after, he shook off his lethargy. He aroused, and opened his eyes. His window was directly in front of his hammock. He saw something extraordinary.

A form was before the window; a marvellous form. It was the funnel of a steam-vessel.

Mess Lethierry started, and sat upright in his bed. The hammock oscillated like a swing in a tempest. Lethierry stared. A vision filled the window-frame. There was the harbour flooded with the light of the moon, and against that glitter, quite close to his house, stood forth, tall, round, and black, a magnificent object.

The funnel of a steam-vessel was there.

Lethierry sprang out of his hammock, ran to the window, lifted the sash, leaned out, and recognised it.

The funnel of the Durande stood before him.

It was in the old place.

Its four chains supported it, made fast to the bulwarks of a vessel in which, beneath the funnel, he could distinguish a dark mass of irregular outline.

Lethierry recoiled, turned his back to the window, and dropped in a sitting posture into his hammock again.

Then he returned, and once more he saw the vision.

An instant afterwards, or in about the time occupied by a flash of lightning, he was out upon the quay, with a lantern in his hand.

A bark carrying a little backward a massive block from which issued the straight funnel before the window of the Bravées, was made fast to the mooring-ring of the Durande. The bows of the bark stretched beyond the corner of the wall of the house, and were level with the quay.

There was no one aboard.

The vessel was of a peculiar shape. All Guernsey would have recognised it. It was the old Dutch sloop.

Lethierry jumped aboard; and ran forward to the block which he saw beyond the mast.

It was there, entire, complete, intact, standing square and firm upon its cast-iron flooring; the boiler had all its rivets, the axle of the paddle-wheels was raised erect, and made fast near the boiler; the brine-pump was in its place; nothing was wanting.

Lethierry examined the machinery.

The lantern and the moon helped him in his examination. He went over every part of the mechanism.

He noticed the two cases at the sides. He examined the axle of the wheels.

He went into the little cabin; it was empty.

He returned to the engine, and felt it, looked into the boiler, and knelt down to examine it inside.

He placed his lantern within the furnace, where the light, illuminating all the machinery, produced almost the illusion of an engine-room with its fire.

Then he burst into a wild laugh, sprang to his feet, and with his eye fixed on the engine, and his arms outstretched towards the funnel, he cried aloud, “Help.”

The harbour bell was upon the quay, at a few paces distance. He ran to it, seized the chain, and began to pull it violently.

II

THE HARBOUR BELL AGAIN

Gilliatt, in fact, after a passage without accident, but somewhat slow on account of the heavy burden of the sloop, had arrived at St. Sampson after dark, and nearer ten than nine o’clock.

He had calculated the time. The half-flood had arrived. There was plenty of water, and the moon was shining; so that he was able to enter the port.

The little harbour was silent. A few vessels were moored there, with their sails brailed up to the yards, their tops over, and without lanterns. At the far end a few others were visible, high and dry in the careenage, where they were undergoing repairs; large hulls dismasted and stripped, with their planking open at various parts, lifting high the ends of their timbers, and looking like huge dead beetles lying on their backs with their legs in the air.

As soon as he had cleared the harbour mouth, Gilliatt examined the port and the quay. There was no light to be seen either at the Bravées or elsewhere. The place was deserted, save, perhaps, by some one going to or returning from the parsonage-house; nor was it possible to be sure even of this; for the night blurred every outline, and the moonlight always gives to objects a vague appearance. The distance added to the indistinctness. The parsonage-house at that period was situated on the other side of the harbour, where there stands at the present day an open mast-house.

Gilliatt had approached the Bravées quietly, and had made the sloop fast to the ring of the Durande, under Mess Lethierry’s window.

He leaped over the bulwarks, and was ashore.

Leaving the sloop behind him by the quay, he turned the angle of the house, passed along a little narrow street, then along another, did not even notice the pathway which branched off leading to the Bû de la Rue, and in a few minutes found himself at that corner of the wall where there were wild mallows with pink flowers in June, with holly, ivy, and nettles. Many a time concealed behind the bushes, seated on a stone, in the summer days, he had watched here through long hours, even for whole months, often tempted to climb the wall, over which he contemplated the garden of the Bravées and the two windows of a little room seen through the branches of the trees. The stone was there still; the bushes, the low wall, the angle, as quiet and dark as ever. Like an animal returning to its hole, gliding rather than walking, he made his way in. Once seated there, he made no movement. He looked around; saw again the garden, the pathways, the beds of flowers, the house, the two windows of the chamber. The moonlight fell upon this dream. He felt it horrible to be compelled to breathe, and did what he could to prevent it.

He seemed to be gazing on a vision of paradise, and was afraid that all would vanish. It was almost impossible that all these things could be really before his eyes; and if they were, it could only be with that imminent danger of melting into air which belongs to things divine. A breath, and all must be dissipated. He trembled with the thought.

Before him, not far off, at the side of one of the alleys in the garden, was a wooden seat painted green. The reader will remember this seat.

Gilliatt looked up at the two windows. He thought of the slumber of some one possibly in that room. Behind that wall she was no doubt sleeping. He wished himself elsewhere, yet would sooner have died than go away. He thought of a gentle breathing moving a woman’s breast. It was she, that vision, that purity in the clouds, that form haunting him by day and night. She was there! He thought of her so far removed, and yet so near as to be almost within reach of his delight; he thought of that impossible ideal drooping in slumber, and like himself, too, visited by visions; of that being so long desired, so distant, so impalpable — her closed eyelids, her face resting on her hand; of the mystery of sleep in its relations with that pure spirit, of what dreams might come to one who was herself a dream. He dared not think beyond, and yet he did. He ventured on those familiarities which the fancy may indulge in; the notion of how much was feminine in that angelic being disturbed his thoughts. The darkness of night emboldens timid imaginations to take these furtive glances. He was vexed within himself, feeling on reflection as if it were profanity to think of her so boldly; yet still constrained, in spite of himself, he tremblingly gazed into the invisible. He shuddered almost with a sense of pain as he imagined her room, a petticoat on a chair, a mantle fallen on the carpet, a band unbuckled, a handkerchief. He imagined her corset with its lace hanging to the ground, her stockings, her boots. His soul was among the stars.

The stars are made for the human heart of a poor man like Gilliatt not less than for that of the rich and great. There is a certain degree of passion by which every man becomes wrapped in a celestial light. With a rough and primitive nature, this truth is even more applicable. An uncultivated mind is easily touched with dreams.

Delight is a fulness which overflows like any other. To see those windows was almost too much happiness for Gilliatt.

Suddenly, he looked and saw her.

From the branches of a clump of bushes, already thickened by the spring, there issued with a spectral slowness a celestial figure, a dress, a divine face, almost a shining light beneath the moon.

Gilliatt felt his powers failing him: it was Déruchette.

Déruchette approached. She stopped. She walked back a few paces, stopped again, then returned and sat upon the wooden bench. The moon was in the trees, a few clouds floated among the pale stars; the sea murmured to the shadows in an undertone, the town was sleeping, a thin haze was rising from the horizon, the melancholy was profound. Déruchette inclined her head, with those thoughtful eyes which look attentive yet see nothing. She was seated sideways, and had nothing on her head but a little cap untied, which showed upon her delicate neck the commencement of her hair. She twirled mechanically a ribbon of her cap around one of her fingers; the half light showed the outline of her hands like those of a statue; her dress was of one of those shades which by night looked white: the trees stirred as if they felt the enchantment which she shed around her. The tip of one of her feet was visible. Her lowered eyelids had that vague contraction which suggests a tear checked in its course, or a thought suppressed. There was a charming indecision in the movements of her arms, which had no support to lean on; a sort of floating mingled with every posture. It was rather a gleam than a light — rather a grace than a goddess; the folds of her dress were exquisite; her face which might inspire adoration, seemed meditative, like portraits of the Virgin. It was terrible to think how near she was: Gilliatt could hear her breathe.

A nightingale was singing in the distance. The stirring of the wind among the branches set in movement, the inexpressible silence of the night. Déruchette, beautiful, divine, appeared in the twilight like a creation from those rays and from the perfumes in the air. That widespread enchantment seemed to concentre and embody itself mysteriously in her; she became its living manifestation. She seemed the outblossoming of all that shadow and silence.

But the shadow and silence which floated lightly about her weighed heavily on Gilliatt. He was bewildered; what he experienced is not to be told in words. Emotion is always new, and the word is always enough. Hence the impossibility of expressing it. Joy is sometimes overwhelming. To see Déruchette, to see herself, to see her dress, her cap, her ribbon, which she twined around her finger, was it possible to imagine it? Was it possible to be thus near her; to hear her breathe? She breathed! then the stars might breathe also. Gilliatt felt a thrill through him. He was the most miserable and yet the happiest of men. He knew not what to do. His delirious joy at seeing her annihilated him. Was it indeed Déruchette there, and he so near? His thoughts, bewildered and yet fixed, were fascinated by that figure as by a dazzling jewel. He gazed upon her neck — her hair. He did not even say to himself that all that would now belong to him, that before long — to-morrow, perhaps — he would have the right to take off that cap, to unknot that ribbon. He would not have conceived for a moment the audacity of thinking even so far. Touching in idea is almost like touching with the hand. Love was with Gilliatt like honey to the bear. He thought confusedly; he knew not what possessed him. The nightingale still sang. He felt as if about to breathe his life out.

The idea of rising, of jumping over the wall, of speaking to Déruchette, never came into his mind. If it had he would have turned and fled. If anything resembling a thought had begun to dawn in his mind, it was this: that Déruchette was there, that he wanted nothing more, and that eternity had begun.

A noise aroused them both — her from her reverie — him from his ecstasy.

Some one was walking in the garden. It was not possible to see who was approaching on account of the trees. It was the footstep of a man.

Déruchette raised her eyes.

The steps drew nearer, then ceased. The person walking had stopped. He must have been quite near. The path beside which was the bench wound between two clumps of trees. The stranger was there in the alley between the trees, at a few paces from the seat.

Accident had so placed the branches, that Déruchette could see the newcomer while Gilliatt could not.

The moon cast on the ground beyond the trees a shadow which reached to the garden seat.

Gilliatt could see this shadow.

He looked at Déruchette.

She was quite pale; her mouth was partly open, as with a suppressed cry of surprise. She had just half risen from the bench, and sunk again upon it. There was in her attitude a mixture of fascination with a desire to fly. Her surprise was enchantment mingled with timidity. She had upon her lips almost the light of a smile, with the fulness of tears in her eyes. She seemed as if transfigured by that presence; as if the being whom she saw before her belonged not to this earth. The reflection of an angel was in her look.

The stranger, who was to Gilliatt only a shadow, spoke. A voice issued from the trees, softer than the voice of a woman; yet it was the voice of a man. Gilliatt heard these words:

“I see you, mademoiselle, every Sunday and every Thursday. They tell me that once you used not to come so often. It is a remark that has been made. I ask your pardon. I have never spoken to you; it was my duty; but I come to speak to you to-day, for it is still my duty. It is right that I speak to you first. The Cashmere sails to-morrow. This is why I have come. You walk every evening in your garden. It would be wrong of me to know your habits so well, if I had not the thought that I have. Mademoiselle, you are poor; since this morning I am rich. Will you have me for your husband?”

Déruchette joined her two hands in a suppliant attitude, and looked at the speaker, silent, with fixed eyes, and trembling from head to foot.

The voice continued:

“I love you. God made not the heart of man to be silent. He has promised him eternity with the intention that he should not be alone. There is for me but one woman upon earth. It is you. I think of you as of a prayer. My faith is in God, and my hope in you. What wings I have you bear. You are my life, and already my supreme happiness.”

“Sir,” said Déruchette, “there is no one to answer in the house!”

The voice rose again:

“Yes, I have encouraged that dream. Heaven has not forbidden us to dream. You are like a glory in my eyes. I love you deeply, mademoiselle. To me you are holy innocence. I know it is the hour at which your household have retired to rest, but I had no choice of any other moment. Do you remember that passage of the Bible which some one read before us; it was the twenty-fifth chapter of Genesis. I have thought of it often since. M. Hérode said to me, you must have a rich wife. I replied no, I must have a poor wife. I speak to you, mademoiselle, without venturing to approach you; I would step even further back if it was your wish that my shadow should not touch your feet. You alone are supreme. You will come to me if such is your will. I love and wait. You are the living form of a benediction.”

“I did not know, sir,” stammered Déruchette, “that any one remarked me on Sundays and Thursdays.”

The voice continued:

“We are powerless against celestial things. The whole Law is love. Marriage is Canaan; you are to me the promised land of beauty.”

Déruchette replied, “I did not think I did wrong any more than other persons who are strict.”

The voice continued:

“God manifests his will in the flowers, in the light of dawn, in the spring; and love is of his ordaining. You are beautiful in this holy shadow of night. This garden has been tended by you; in its perfumes there is something of your breath. The affinities of our souls do not depend on us. They cannot be counted with our sins. You were there, that was all. I was there, that was all. I did nothing but feel that I loved you. Sometimes my eyes rested upon you. I was wrong, but what could I do. It was through looking at you that all happened. I could not restrain my gaze. There are mysterious impulses which are above our search. The heart is the chief of all temples. To have your spirit in my house — this is the terrestrial paradise for which I hope. Say, will you be mine. As long as I was poor, I spoke not. I know your age. You are twenty-one; I am twenty-six. I go to-morrow; if you refuse me I return no more. Oh, be my betrothed; will you not? More than once have my eyes, in spite of myself, addressed to you that question. I love you; answer me. I will speak to your uncle as soon as he is able to receive me; but I turn first to you. To Rebecca I plead for Rebecca; unless you love me not.”

Déruchette hung her head, and murmured:

“Oh! I worship him.”

The words were spoken in a voice so low, that only Gilliatt heard them.

She remained with her head lowered as if by shading her face she hoped to conceal her thoughts.

There was a pause. No leaf among the trees was stirred. It was that solemn and peaceful moment when the slumber of external things mingles with the sleep of living creatures; and night seems to listen to the beating of Nature’s heart. In the midst of that retirement, like a harmony making the silence more complete, rose the wide murmur of the sea.

The voice was heard again.

“Mademoiselle!”

Déruchette started.

Again the voice spoke.

“You are silent.”

“What would you have me say?”

“I wait for your reply.”

“God has heard it,” said Déruchette.

Then the voice became almost sonorous, and at the same time softer than before, and these words issued from the leaves as from a burning bush:

“You are my betrothed. Come then to me. Let the blue sky, with all its stars, be witness of this taking of my soul to thine; and let our first embrace be mingled with that firmament.”

Déruchette arose, and remained an instant motionless, looking straight before her, doubtless in another’s eyes. Then, with slow steps, with head erect, her arms drooping, but with the fingers of her hands wide apart, like one who leans on some unseen support, she advanced towards the trees, and was out of sight.

A moment afterwards, instead of the one shadow upon the gravelled walk, there were two. They mingled together. Gilliatt saw at his feet the embrace of those two shadows.

In certain moments of crisis, time flows from us as his sands from the hour-glass, and we have no feeling of his flight. That pair on the one hand, who were ignorant of the presence of a witness, and saw him not; on the other, that witness of their joy who could not see them, but who knew of their presence — how many minutes did they remain thus in that mysterious suspension of themselves? It would be impossible to say. Suddenly a noise burst forth at a distance. A voice was heard crying “Help!” and the harbour bell began to sound. It is probable that in those celestial transports of delight they heard no echo of that tumult.

The bell continued to ring. Any one who had sought Gilliatt then in the angle of the wall would have found him no longer there.

GRATITUDE AND DESPOTISM

I

JOY SURROUNDED BY TORTURES

Mess Lethierry pulled the bell furiously, then stopped abruptly. A man had just turned the corner of the quay. It was Gilliatt.

Lethierry ran towards him, or rather flung himself upon him; seized his hand between his own, and looked him in the face for a moment, silent. It was the silence of an explosion struggling to find an issue.

Then pulling and shaking him with violence, and squeezing him in his arms, he compelled him to enter the lower room of the Bravées, pushed back with his heel the door which had remained half opened, sat down, or sank into a chair beside a great table lighted by the moon, the reflection of which gave a vague pallor to Gilliatt’s face, and with a voice of intermingled laughter and tears, cried:

“Ah! my son; my player of the bagpipe! I knew well that it was you. The sloop, parbleu! Tell me the story. You went there, then. Why, they would have burnt you a hundred years ago! It is magic! There isn’t a screw missing. I have looked at everything already, recognised everything, handled everything. I guessed that the paddles were in the two cases. And here you are once more! I have been looking for you in the little cabin. I rang the bell. I was seeking for you. I said to myself, ‘Where is he, that I may devour him?’ You must admit that wonderful things do come to pass. He has brought back life to me. Tonnerre! you are an angel! Yes, yes; it is my engine. Nobody will believe it; people will see it, and say, ‘It can’t be true.’ Not a tap, not a pin missing. The feed-pipe has never budged an inch. It is incredible that there should have been no more damage. We have only to put a little oil. But how did you accomplish it? To think that the Durande will be moving again. The axle of the wheels must have been taken to pieces by some watchmaker. Give me your word that I am not crazy.”

He sprang to his feet, breathed a moment, and continued:

“Assure me of that. What a revolution! I pinched myself to be certain I was not dreaming. You are my child, you are my son, you are my Providence. Brave lad! To go and fetch my good old engine. In the open sea, among those cut-throat rocks. I have seen some strange things in my life; nothing like that. I have known Parisians, who were veritable demons, but I’ll defy them to have done that. It beats the Bastille. I have seen the gauchos labouring in the Pampas, with a crooked branch of a tree for a plough and a bundle of thorn-bushes for a harrow, dragged by a leathern strap; they get harvests of wheat that way, with grains as big as hedgenuts. But that is a trifle compared with your feats. You have performed a miracle — a real one. Ah! gredin! let me hug you. How they will gossip in St. Sampson. I shall set to work at once to build the boat. It is astonishing that the crank is all right. Gentlemen, he has been to the Douvres; I say to the Douvres. He went alone. The Douvres! I defy you to find a worse spot. Do you know, have they told you, that it’s proved that Clubin sent the Durande to the bottom to swindle me out of money which he had to bring me? He made Tangrouille drunk. It’s a long story. I’ll tell you another day of his piratical tricks. I, stupid idiot, had confidence in Clubin. But he trapped himself, the villain, for he couldn’t have got away. There is a God above, scoundrel! Do you see, Gilliatt, bang! bang! the irons in the fire; we’ll begin at once to rebuild the Durande. We’ll have her twenty feet longer. They build them longer now than they did. I’ll buy the wood from Dantzic and Brême. Now I have got the machinery they will give me credit again. They’ll have confidence now.”

Mess Lethierry stopped, lifted his eyes with that look which sees the heavens through the roof, and muttered, “Yes, there is a power on high!”

Then he placed the middle finger of his right hand between his two eyebrows, and tapped with his nail there, an action which indicates a project passing through the mind, and he continued:

“Nevertheless, to begin again, on a grand scale, a little ready money would have been useful. Ah! if I only had my three bank-notes, the seventy-five thousand francs that that robber Rantaine returned, and that vagabond Clubin stole.”

Gilliatt silently felt in his pocket, and drew out something which he placed before him. It was the leathern belt that he had brought back. He opened, and spread it out upon the table; in the inside the word “Clubin” could be deciphered in the light of the moon. He then took out of the pocket of the belt a box, and out of the box three pieces of paper, which he unfolded and offered to Lethierry.

Lethierry examined them. It was light enough to read the figures “1000,” and the word “thousand” was also perfectly visible. Mess Lethierry took the three notes, placed them on the table one beside the other, looked at them, looked at Gilliatt, stood for a moment dumb; and then began again, like an eruption after an explosion:

“These too! You are a marvel. My bank-notes! all three. A thousand pounds each. My seventy-five thousand francs. Why, you must have gone down to the infernal regions. It is Clubin’s belt. Pardieu! I can read his vile name. Gilliatt has brought back engine and money too. There will be something to put in the papers. I will buy some timber of the finest quality. I guess how it was; you found his carcase; Clubin mouldering away in some corner. We’ll have some Dantzic pine and Brême oak; we’ll have a first-rate planking — oak within and pine without. In old times they didn’t build so well, but their work lasted longer; the wood was better seasoned, because they did not build so much. We’ll build the hull perhaps of elm. Elm is good for the parts in the water. To be dry sometimes, and sometimes wet, rots the timbers; the elm requires to be always wet; it’s a wood that feeds upon water. What a splendid Durande we’ll build. The lawyers will not trouble me again. I shall want no more credit. I have some money of my own. Did ever any one see a man like Gilliatt. I was struck down to the ground, I was a dead man. He comes and sets me up again as firm as ever. And all the while I was never thinking about him. He had gone clean out of my mind; but I recollect everything now. Poor lad! Ah! by the way, you know you are to marry Déruchette.”

Gilliatt leaned with his back against the wall, like one who staggers, and said in a tone very low, but distinct:

“No.”

Mess Lethierry started.

“How, no!”

Gilliatt replied:

“I do not love her.”

Mess Lethierry went to the window, opened and reclosed it, took the three bank-notes, folded them, placed the iron box on top, scratched his head, seized Clubin’s belt, flung it violently against the wall, and exclaimed:

“You must be mad.”

He thrust his fists into his pockets, and exclaimed:

“You don’t love Déruchette? What! was it at me, then, that you used to play the bagpipe?”

Gilliatt, still supporting himself by the wall, turned pale, as a man near his end. As he became pale, Lethierry became redder.

“There’s an idiot for you! He doesn’t love Déruchette. Very good; make up your mind to love her, for she shall never marry any but you. A devilish pretty story that; and you think that I believe you. If there is anything really the matter with you, send for a doctor; but don’t talk nonsense. You can’t have had time to quarrel, or get out of temper with her. It is true that lovers are great fools sometimes. Come now, what are your reasons? If you have any, say. People don’t make geese of themselves without reasons. But, I have wool in my ears; perhaps I didn’t understand. Repeat to me what you said.”

Gilliatt replied:

“I said, No!”

“You said, No. He holds to it, the lunatic! You must be crazy. You said, No. Here’s a stupidity beyond anything ever heard of. Why, people have had their heads shaved for much less than that. What! you don’t like Déruchette? Oh, then, it was out of affection for the old man that you did all these things? It was for the sake of papa that you went to the Douvres, that you endured cold and heat, and was half dead with hunger and thirst, and ate the limpets off the rocks, and had the fog, the rain, and the wind for your bedroom, and brought me back my machine, just as you might bring a pretty woman her little canary that had escaped from its cage. And the tempest that we had three days ago. Do you think I don’t bear it in mind? You must have had a time of it! It was in the midst of all this misery, alongside of my old craft, that you shaped, and cut, and turned, and twisted, and dragged about, and filed, and sawed, and carpentered, and schemed, and performed more miracles there by yourself than all the saints in paradise. Ah! you annoyed me enough once with your bagpipe. They call it a biniou in Brittany. Always the same tune too, silly fellow. And yet you don’t love Déruchette? I don’t know what is the matter with you. I recollect it all now. I was there in the corner; Déruchette said, ‘He shall be my husband;’ and so you shall. You don’t love her! Either you must be mad, or else I am mad. And you stand there, and speak not a word. I tell you you are not at liberty to do all the things you have done, and then say, after all, ‘I don’t love Déruchette.’ People don’t do others services in order to put them in a passion. Well; if you don’t marry her, she shall be single all her life. In the first place, I shall want you. You must be the pilot of the Durande. Do you imagine I mean to part with you like that? No, no, my brave boy; I don’t let you go. I have got you now; I’ll not even listen to you. Where will they find a sailor like you? You are the man I want. But why don’t you speak?”

Meanwhile the harbour bell had aroused the household and the neighbourhood. Douce and Grace had risen, and had just entered the lower room, silent and astonished. Grace had a candle in her hand. A group of neighbours, townspeople, sailors, and peasants, who had rushed out of their houses, were outside on the quay, gazing in wonderment at the funnel of the Durande in the sloop. Some, hearing Lethierry’s voice in the lower room, began to glide in by the half-opened door. Between the faces of two worthy old women appeared that of Sieur Landoys, who had the good fortune always to find himself where he would have regretted to have been absent.

Men feel a satisfaction in having witnesses of their joys. The sort of scattered support which a crowd presents pleases them at such times; their delight draws new life from it. Mess Lethierry suddenly perceived that there were persons about him; and he welcomed the audience at once.

“Ah! you are here, my friends? I am very glad to see you. You know the news? That man has been there, and brought it back. How d’ye do, Sieur Landoys? When I woke up just now, the first thing I spied was the funnel. It was under my window. There’s not a nail missing. They make pictures of Napoleon’s deeds; but I think more of that than of the battle of Austerlitz. You have just left your beds, my good friends. The Durande has found you sleeping. While you are putting on your night-caps and blowing out your candles there are others working like heroes. We are a set of cowards and do-nothings; we sit at home rubbing our rheumatisms; but happily that does not prevent there being some of another stamp. The man of the Bû de la Rue has arrived from the Douvres rocks. He has fished up the Durande from the bottom of the sea; and fished up my money out of Clubin’s pocket, from a greater depth still. But how did you contrive to do it? All the powers of darkness were against you — the wind and the sea — the sea and the wind. It’s true enough that you are a magician. Those who say that are not so stupid after all. The Durande is back again. The tempests may rage now; that cuts the ground from under them. My friends, I can inform you that there was no shipwreck after all. I have examined all the machinery. It is like new, perfect. The valves go as easily as rollers. You would think them made yesterday. You know that the waste water is carried away by a tube inside another tube, through which come the waters from the boilers; this was to economise the heat. Well; the two tubes are there as good as ever. The complete engine, in fact. She is all there, her wheels and all. Ah! you shall marry her.”

“Marry the complete engine?” asked Sieur Landoys.

“No; Déruchette; yes; the engine. Both of them. He shall be my double son-in-law. He shall be her captain. Good day, Captain Gilliatt; for there will soon be a captain of the Durande. We are going to do a world of business again. There will be trade, circulation, cargoes of oxen and sheep. I wouldn’t give St. Sampson for London now. And there stands the author of all this. It was a curious adventure, I can tell you. You will read about it on Saturday in old Mauger’s Gazette. Malicious Gilliatt is very malicious. What’s the meaning of these Louis-d’ors here?”

Mess Lethierry had just observed, through the opening of the lid, that there was some gold in the box upon the notes. He seized it, opened and emptied it into the palm of his hand, and put the handful of guineas on the table.

“For the poor, Sieur Landoys. Give those sovereigns from me to the constable of St. Sampson. You recollect Rantaine’s letter. I showed it to you. Very well; I’ve got the bank-notes. Now we can buy some oak and fir, and go to work at carpentering. Look you! Do you remember the weather of three days ago? What a hurricane of wind and rain! Gilliatt endured all that upon the Douvres. That didn’t prevent his taking the wreck to pieces, as I might take my watch. Thanks to him, I am on my legs again. Old ‘Lethierry’s galley’ is going to run again, ladies and gentlemen. A nut-shell with a couple of wheels and a funnel. I always had that idea. I used to say to myself, one day I will do it. That was a good long time back. It was an idea that came in my head at Paris, at the coffee-house at the corner of the Rue Christine and the Rue Dauphine, when I was reading a paper which had an account of it. Do you know that Gilliatt would think nothing of putting the machine at Marly in his pocket, and walking about with it? He is wrought-iron, that man; tempered steel, a mariner of invaluable qualities, an excellent smith, an extraordinary fellow, more astonishing than the Prince of Hohenlohe. That is what I call a man with brains. We are children by the side of him. Sea-wolves we may think ourselves; but the sea-lion is there. Hurrah for Gilliatt! I do not know how he has done it; but certainly he must have been the devil. And how can I do other than give him Déruchette.”

For some minutes Déruchette had been in the room. She had not spoken or moved since she entered. She had glided in like a shadow, had sat down almost unperceived behind Mess Lethierry, who stood before her, loquacious, stormy, joyful, abounding in gestures, and talking in a loud voice. A little while after her another silent apparition had appeared. A man attired in black, with a white cravat, holding his hat in his hand, stood in the doorway. There were now several candles among the group, which had gradually increased in number. These lights were near the man attired in black. His profile and youthful and pleasing complexion showed itself against the dark background with the clearness of an engraving on a medal. He leaned with his shoulder against the framework of the door, and held his left hand to his forehead, an attitude of unconscious grace, which contrasted the breadth of his forehead with the smallness of his hand. There was an expression of anguish in his contracted lips, as he looked on and listened with profound attention. The standers-by having recognised M. Caudray, the rector of the parish, had fallen back to allow him to pass; but he remained upon the threshold. There was hesitation in his posture, but decision in his looks, which now and then met those of Déruchette. With regard to Gilliatt, whether by chance or design, he was in shadow, and was only perceived indistinctly.

At first Mess Lethierry did not observe Caudray, but he saw Déruchette. He went to her and kissed her fervently upon the forehead; stretching forth his hand at the same time towards the dark corner where Gilliatt was standing.

“Déruchette,” he said, “we are rich again; and there is your future husband.”

Déruchette raised her head, and looked into the dusky corner bewildered.

Mess Lethierry continued:

“The marriage shall take place immediately, if it can; they shall have a licence; the formalities here are not very troublesome; the dean can do what he pleases; people are married before they have time to turn round. It is not as in France, where you must have bans, and publications, and delays, and all that fuss. You will be able to boast of being the wife of a brave man. No one can say he is not. I thought so from the day when I saw him come back from Herm with the little cannon. But now he comes back from the Douvres with his fortune and mine, and the fortune of this country. A man of whom the world will talk a great deal more one day. You said once, ‘I will marry him;’ and you shall marry him, and you shall have little children, and I will be grandpapa; and you will have the good fortune to be the wife of a noble fellow, who can work, who can be useful to his fellow-men; a surprising fellow, worth a hundred others; a man who can rescue other people’s inventions, a providence! At all events, you will not have married, like so many other silly girls about here, a soldier or a priest, that is, a man who kills or a man who lies. But what are you doing there, Gilliatt? Nobody can see you. Douce, Grace, everybody there! Bring a light, I say. Light up my son-in-law for me. I betroth you to each other, my children: here stands your husband, here my son, Gilliatt of the Bû de la Rue, that noble fellow, that great seaman; I will have no other son-in-law, and you no other husband. I pledge my word to that once more in God’s name. Ah! you are there, Monsieur the Curé. You will marry these young people for us.”

Lethierry’s eye had just fallen upon Caudray.

Douce and Grace had done as they were directed. Two candles placed upon the table cast a light upon Gilliatt from head to foot.

“There’s a fine fellow,” said Mess Lethierry.

Gilliatt’s appearance was hideous.

He was in the condition in which he had that morning set sail from the rocks; in rags, his bare elbows showing through his sleeves; his beard long, his hair rough and wild; his eyes bloodshot, his skin peeling, his hands covered with wounds; his feet naked. Some of the blisters left by the devil-fish were still visible upon his arms.

Lethierry gazed at him.

“This is my son-in-law,” he said. “How he has struggled with the sea. He is all in rags. What shoulders; what hands. There’s a splendid fellow!”

Grace ran to Déruchette and supported her head. She had fainted.

II

THE LEATHERN TRUNK

At break of day St. Sampson was on foot, and all the people of St. Peter’s Port began to flock there. The resurrection of the Durande caused a commotion in the island not unlike what was caused by the Salette in the south of France. There was a crowd on the quay staring at the funnel standing erect in the sloop. They were anxious to see and handle the machinery; but Lethierry, after making a new and triumphant survey of the whole by daylight, had placed two sailors aboard with instructions to prevent any one approaching it. The funnel, however, furnished food enough for contemplation. The crowd gaped with astonishment. They talked of nothing but Gilliatt. They remarked on his surname of “malicious Gilliatt;” and their admiration wound up with the remark, “It is not pleasant to have people in the island who can do things like that.”

Mess Lethierry was seen from outside the house, seated at a table before the window, writing, with one eye on the paper and another on the sloop. He was so completely absorbed that he had only once stopped to call Douce and ask after Déruchette. Douce replied, “Mademoiselle has risen and is gone out.” Mess Lethierry replied, “She is right to take the air. She was a little unwell last night, owing to the heat. There was a crowd in the room. This and her surprise and joy, and the windows being all closed, overcame her. She will have a husband to be proud of.” And he had gone on with his writing. He had already finished and sealed two letters, addressed to the most important shipbuilders at Brême. He now finished the sealing of a third.

The noise of a wheel upon the quay induced him to look up. He leaned out of the window, and observed coming from the path which led to the Bû de la Rue a boy pushing a wheelbarrow. The boy was going towards St. Peter’s Port. In the barrow was a portmanteau of brown leather, studded with nails of brass and white metal.

Mess Lethierry called to the boy:

“Where are you going, my lad?”

The boy stopped, and replied:

“To the Cashmere.”

"What for?"

"To take this trunk aboard."

"Very good; you shall take these three letters too."

Mess Lethierry opened the drawer of his table, took a piece of string, tied the three letters which he had just written across and across, and threw the packet to the boy, who caught it between his hands.

"Tell the captain of the Cashmere they are my letters, and to take care of them. They are for Germany — Brême viâ London."

"I can't speak to the captain, Mess Lethierry."

"Why not?"

"The Cashmere is not at the quay."

"Ah!"

"She is in the roads."

"Ay, true; on account of the sea."

"I can only speak to the man who takes the things aboard."

"You will tell him, then, to look to the letters."

"Very well, Mess Lethierry."

"At what time does the Cashmere sail?"

"At twelve."

"The tide will flow at noon; she will have it against her."

"But she will have the wind," answered the lad.

"Boy," said Mess Lethierry, pointing with his forefinger at the engine in the sloop, "do you see that? There is something which laughs at winds and tides."

The boy put the letters in his pocket, took up the handles of the barrow again, and went on his way towards the town. Mess Lethierry called "Douce! Grace!"

Grace opened the door a little way.

"What is it, Mess?"

"Come in and wait a moment."

Mess Lethierry took a sheet of paper, and began to write. If Grace, standing behind him, had been curious, and had leaned forward while he was writing, she might have read as follows: —

"I have written to Brême for the timber. I have appointments all the morning with carpenters for the estimate. The rebuilding will go on fast. You must go yourself to the Deanery for a licence. It is my wish that the marriage should take place as soon as possible; immediately would be better. I am busy about the Durande. Do you be busy about Déruchette.”

He dated it and signed “Lethierry.” He did not take the trouble to seal it, but merely folded it in four, and handed it to Grace, saying:

“Take that to Gilliatt.”

“To the Bû de la Rue?”

“To the Bû de la Rue.”

BOOK III

THE DEPARTURE OF THE CASHMERE

I

THE HAVELET NEAR THE CHURCH

When there is a crowd at St. Sampson, St. Peter’s Port is soon deserted. A point of curiosity at a given place is like an air-pump. News travel fast in small places. Going to see the funnel of the Durande under Mess Lethierry’s window had been, since sunrise, the business of the Guernsey folks. Every other event was eclipsed by this. The death of the Dean of St. Asaph was forgotten, together with the question of the Rev. Mr. Caudray, his sudden riches, and the departure of the Cashmere. The machinery of the Durande brought back from the Douvres rocks was the order of the day. People were incredulous. The shipwreck had appeared extraordinary, the salvage seemed impossible. Everybody hastened to assure himself of the truth by the help of his own eyes. Business of every kind was suspended. Long strings of townsfolk with their families, from the “Vesin” up to the “Mess,” men and women, gentlemen, mothers with children, infants with dolls, were coming by every road or pathway to see “the thing to be seen” at the Bravées, turning their backs upon St. Peter’s Port. Many shops at St. Peter’s Port were closed. In the Commercial Arcade there was an absolute stagnation in buying and selling. The Durande alone obtained attention. Not a single shopkeeper had had a “handsell” that morning, except a jeweller, who was surprised at having sold a wedding-ring to “a sort of man who appeared in a great hurry, and who asked for the house of the Dean.” The shops which remained open were centres of gossip, where loiterers discussed the miraculous salvage. There was not a foot-passenger at the “Hyvreuse,” which is known in these days, nobody knows why, as Cambridge Park; no one was in the High Street, then called the Grande Rue; nor in Smith Street, known then only as the Rue des Forges; nobody in Hauteville. The Esplanade itself was deserted. One might have guessed it to be Sunday. A visit from a Royal personage to review the militia at the Ancresse could not have emptied the town more completely. All this hubbub about “a nobody” like Gilliatt, caused a good deal of shrugging of the shoulders among persons of grave and correct habits.

The church of St. Peter’s Port, with its three gable-ends placed side by side, its transept and its steeple, stands at the water’s side at the end of the harbour, and nearly on the landing place itself, where it welcomes those who arrive, and gives the departing “God speed.” It represents the capital letter at the beginning of that long line which forms the front of the town towards the sea.

It is both the parish church of St. Peter’s Port and the chief place of the Deanery of the whole island. Its officiating minister is the surrogate of the bishop, a clergyman in full orders.

The harbour of St. Peter’s Port, a very fine and large port at the present day, was at that epoch, and even up to ten years ago, less considerable than the harbour of St. Sampson. It was enclosed by two enormous thick walls, beginning at the water’s edge on both sides, and curving till they almost joined again at the extremities, where there stood a little white lighthouse. Under this lighthouse, a narrow gullet, bearing still the two rings of the chain with which it was the custom to bar the passage in ancient times, formed the entrance for vessels. The harbour of St. Peter’s Port might be well compared with the claws of a huge lobster opened a little way. This kind of pincers took from the ocean a portion of the sea, which it compelled to remain calm. But during the easterly winds the waves rolled heavily against the narrow entrance, the port was agitated, and it was better not to enter. This is what had happened with the Cashmere that day, which had accordingly anchored in the roads.

The vessels, during the easterly winds, preferred this course, which besides saved them the port dues. On these occasions the boatmen of the town, a hardy race of mariners whom the new port has thrown out of employment, came in their boats to fetch passengers at the landing-place or at stations on the shore, and carried them with their luggage, often in heavy seas, but always without accident, to the vessels about to sail. The east wind blows off the shore, and is very favourable for the passage to England; the vessel at such times rolls, but does not pitch.

When a vessel happened to be in the port, everybody embarked from the quay. When it was in the roads they took their choice, and embarked from any point of the coast near the moorings. The “Havelet” was one of these creeks. This little harbour (which is the signification of the word) was near the town, but was so solitary that it seemed far off. This solitude was owing to the shelter of the high cliffs of Fort St. George, which overlooked this retired inlet. The Havelet was accessible by several paths. The most direct was along the water's side. It had the advantage of leading to the town and to the church in five minutes' walk, and the disadvantage of being covered by the sea twice a day. The other paths were more or less abrupt, and led down to the creek through gaps in the steep rocks. Even in broad daylight, it was dusk in the Havelet. Huge blocks overhanging it on all sides, and thick bushes and brambles cast a sort of soft twilight upon the rocks and waves below. Nothing could be more peaceful than this spot in calm weather; nothing more tumultuous during heavy seas. There were ends of branches there which were always wet with the foam. In the spring time, the place was full of flowers, of nests, of perfumes, of birds, of butterflies, and bees. Thanks to recent improvements, this wild nook no longer exists. Fine, straight lines have taken the place of these wild features; masonry, quays, and little gardens, have made their appearance; earthwork has been the rage, and taste has finally subdued the eccentricities of the cliff, and the irregularities of the rocks below.

II

DESPAIR CONFRONTS DESPAIR

It was a little before ten o’clock in the morning. The crowd at St. Sampson, according to all appearance, was increasing. The multitude, feverish with curiosity, was moving towards the north; and the Havelet, which is in the south, was more deserted than ever.

Notwithstanding this, there was a boat there and a boatman. In the boat was a travelling bag. The boatman seemed to be waiting for some one.

The Cashmere was visible at anchor in roads, as she did not start till midday; there was as yet no sign of moving aboard.

A passer-by, who had listened from one of the ladder-paths up the cliffs overhead, would have heard a murmur of words in the Havelet, and if he had leaned over the overhanging cliff might have seen, at some distance from the boat, in a corner among the rocks and branches, where the eye of the boatman could not reach them, a man and a woman. It was Caudray and Déruchette.

These obscure nooks on the seashore, the chosen places of lady bathers, are not always so solitary as is believed. Persons are sometimes observed and heard there. Those who seek shelter and solitude in them may easily be followed through the thick bushes, and, thanks to the multiplicity and entanglement of the paths, the granite and the shrubs which favour the stolen interview may also favour the witness.

Caudray and Déruchette stood face to face, looking into each other’s eyes, and holding each other by the hand. Déruchette was speaking. Caudray was silent. A tear that had gathered upon his eyelash hung there and did not fall.

Grief and strong passion were imprinted in his calm, religious countenance. A painful resignation was there too — a resignation hostile to faith, though springing from it. Upon that face, simply devout until then, there was the commencement of a fatal expression. He who had hitherto meditated only on doctrine, had begun to meditate on Fate, an unhealthy meditation for a priest. Faith dissolves under its action. Nothing disturbs the religious mind more than that bending under the weight of the unknown. Life seems a perpetual succession of events, to which man submits. We never know from which direction the sudden blow will come. Misery and happiness enter or make their exit, like unexpected guests. Their laws, their orbit, their principle of gravitation, are beyond man’s grasp. Virtue conducts not to happiness, nor crime to retribution: conscience has one logic, fate another; and neither coincide. Nothing is foreseen. We live confusedly, and from hand to mouth. Conscience is the straight line, life is the whirlwind, which creates above man’s head either black chaos or the blue sky. Fate does not practise the art of gradations. Her wheel turns sometimes so fast that we can scarcely distinguish the interval between one revolution and another, or the link between yesterday and to-day. Caudray was a believer whose faith did not exclude reason, and whose priestly training did not shut him out from passion. Those religious systems which impose celibacy on the priesthood are not without reason for it. Nothing really destroys the individuality of the priest more than love. All sorts of clouds seemed to darken Caudray’s soul. He looked too long into Déruchette’s eyes. These two beings worshipped each other.

There was in Caudray’s eye the mute adoration of despair.

Déruchette spoke.

“You must not leave me. I shall not have strength. I thought I could bid you farewell. I cannot. Why did you come yesterday? You should not have come if you were going so soon. I never spoke to you. I loved you; but knew it not. Only that day, when M. Hérode read to us the story of Rebecca, and when your eyes met mine, my cheeks were like fire, and I thought only of how Rebecca’s face must have burnt like mine; and yet, if any one had told me yesterday that I loved you, I might have laughed at it. This is what is so terrible. It has been like a treason. I did not take heed. I went to the church, I saw you, I thought everybody there was like myself. I do not reproach you; you did nothing to make me love you; you did nothing but look at me; it is not your fault if you look at people; and yet that made me love you so much. I did not even suspect it. When you took up the book it was a flood of light; when others took it, it was but a book. You raised your eyes sometimes; you spoke of archangels; oh! you were my archangel. What you said penetrated my thoughts at once. Before then, I know not even whether I believed in God. Since I have known you, I have learnt to pray. I used to say to Douce, dress me quickly, lest I should be late at the service; and I hastened to the church. Such it was with me to love some one. I did not know the cause. I said to myself, how devout I am becoming. It is from you that I have learnt that I do not go to church for God’s service. It is true; I went for your sake. You spoke so well, and when you raised your arms to heaven, you seemed to hold my heart within your two white hands. I was foolish; but I did not know it. Shall I tell you your fault? It was your coming to me in the garden; it was your speaking to me. If you had said nothing, I should have known nothing. If you had gone, I should, perhaps, have been sad, but now I should die. Since I know that I love you, you cannot leave me. Of what are you thinking? You do not seem to listen to me.”

Caudray replied:

“You heard what was said last night?”

“Ah, me!”

“What can I do against that?”

They were silent for a moment. Caudray continued:

“There is but one duty left to me. It is to depart.”

“And mine to die. Oh! how I wish there was no sea, but only sky. It seems to me as if that would settle all, and that our departure would be the same. It was wrong to speak to me; why did you speak to me? Do not go. What will become of me? I tell you I shall die. You will be far off when I shall be in my grave. Oh! my heart will break. I am very wretched; yet my uncle is not unkind.”

It was the first time in her life that Déruchette had ever said “my uncle.” Until then she had always said “my father.”

Caudray stepped back, and made a sign to the boatman. Déruchette heard the sound of the boat-hook among the shingle, and the step of the man on the gunwale of the boat.

“No! no!” cried Déruchette.

“It must be, Déruchette,” replied Caudray.

“No! never! For the sake of an engine — impossible. Did you see that horrible man last night? You cannot abandon me thus. You are wise; you can find a means. It is impossible that you bade me come here this morning with the idea of leaving me. I have never done anything to deserve this; you can have no reproach to make me. Is it by that vessel that you intended to sail? I will not let you go. You shall not leave me. Heaven does not open thus to close so soon. I know you will remain. Besides, it is not yet time. Oh! how I love you.”

And pressing closely to him, she interlaced the fingers of each hand behind his neck, as if partly to make a bond of her two arms for detaining him, and partly with her joined hands to pray. He moved away this gentle restraint, while Déruchette resisted as long as she could.

Déruchette sank upon a projection of the rock covered with ivy, lifting by an unconscious movement the sleeve of her dress up to the elbow, and exhibiting her graceful arm. A pale suffused light was in her eyes. The boat was approaching.

Caudray held her head between his hands. He touched her hair with a sort of religious care, fixed his eyes upon her for some moments, then kissed her on the forehead fervently, and in an accent trembling with anguish, and in which might have been traced the uprooting of his soul, he uttered the word which has so often resounded in the depths of the human heart, “Farewell!”

Déruchette burst into loud sobs.

At this moment they heard a voice near them, which said solemnly and deliberately:

“Why should you not be man and wife?”

Caudray raised his head. Déruchette looked up.

Gilliatt stood before them.

He had approached by a bye-path.

He was no longer the same man that he had appeared on the previous night. He had arranged his hair, shaved his beard, put on shoes, and a white shirt, with a large collar turned over, sailor fashion. He wore a sailor’s costume, but all was new. A gold ring was on his little finger. He seemed profoundly calm. His sunburnt skin had become pale: a hue of sickly bronze overspread it.

They looked at him astonished. Though so changed, Déruchette recognised him. But the words which he had spoken were so far from what was passing in their minds at that moment, that they had left no distinct impression.

Gilliatt spoke again:

“Why should you say farewell? Be man and wife, and go together.”

Déruchette started. A trembling seized her from head to foot.

Gilliatt continued:

“Miss Lethierry is a woman. She is of age. It depends only on herself. Her uncle is but her uncle. You love each other — —”

Déruchette interrupted in a gentle voice, and asked, “How came you here?”

“Make yourselves one,” repeated Gilliatt.

Déruchette began to have a sense of the meaning of his words. She stammered out:

“My poor uncle!”

“If the marriage was yet to be,” said Gilliatt, “he would refuse. When it is over he will consent. Besides, you are going to leave here. When you return he will forgive.”

Gilliatt added, with a slight touch of bitterness, “And then he is thinking of nothing just now but the rebuilding of his boat. This will occupy his mind during your absence. The Durande will console him.”

“I cannot,” said Déruchette, in a state of stupor which was not without its gleam of joy. “I must not leave him unhappy.”

“It will be but for a short time,” answered Gilliatt.

Caudray and Déruchette had been, as it were, bewildered. They recovered themselves now. The meaning of Gilliatt’s words became plainer as their surprise diminished. There was a slight cloud still before them; but their part was not to resist. We yield easily to those who come to save. Objections to a return into Paradise are weak. There was something in the attitude of Déruchette, as she leaned imperceptibly upon her lover, which seemed to make common cause with Gilliatt’s words. The enigma of the presence of this man, and of his utterances, which, in the mind of Déruchette in particular, produced various kinds of astonishment, was a thing apart. He said to them, “Be man and wife!” This was clear; if there was responsibility, it was his. Déruchette had a confused feeling that, for many reasons, he had the right to decide upon her fate. Caudray murmured, as if plunged in thought, “An uncle is not a father.”

His resolution was corrupted by the sudden and happy turn in his ideas. The probable scruples of the clergyman melted, and dissolved in his heart’s love for Déruchette.

Gilliatt’s tone became abrupt and harsh, and like the pulsations of fever.

“There must be no delay,” he said. “You have time, but that is all. Come.”

Caudray observed him attentively; and suddenly exclaimed:

“I recognise you. It was you who saved my life.”

Gilliatt replied:

"I think not."

"Yonder," said Caudray, "at the extremity of the Banques."

"I do not know the place," said Gilliatt.

"It was on the very day that I arrived here."

"Let us lose no time," interrupted Gilliatt.

"And if I am not deceived, you are the man whom we met last night."

"Perhaps."

"What is your name?"

Gilliatt raised his voice:

"Boatman! wait there for us. We shall return soon. You asked me, Miss Lethierry, how I came to be here. The answer is very simple. I walked behind you. You are twenty-one. In this country, when persons are of age, and depend only on themselves, they may be married immediately. Let us take the path along the water-side. It is passable; the tide will not rise here till noon. But lose no time. Come with me."

Déruchette and Caudray seemed to consult each other by a glance. They were standing close together motionless. They were intoxicated with joy. There are strange hesitations sometimes on the edge of the abyss of happiness. They understood, as it were, without understanding.

"His name is Gilliatt," whispered Déruchette.

Gilliatt interrupted them with a sort of tone of authority.

"What do you linger for?" he asked. "I tell you to follow me."

"Whither?" asked Caudray.

"There!"

And Gilliatt pointed with his finger towards the spire of the church.

Gilliatt walked on before, and they followed him. His step was firm; but they walked unsteadily.

As they approached the church, an expression dawned upon those two pure and beautiful countenances, which was soon to become a smile. The approach to the church lighted them up. In the hollow eyes of Gilliatt there was the darkness of night. The beholder might have imagined that he saw a spectre leading two souls to Paradise.

Caudray and Déruchette scarcely took count of what had happened. The interposition of this man was like the branch clutched at by the drowning. They followed their guide with the docility of despair, leaning on the first comer. Those who feel themselves near death easily accept the accident which seems to save. Déruchette, more ignorant of life, was more confident.

Caudray was thoughtful. Déruchette was of age, it was true. The English formalities of marriage are simple, especially in primitive parts, where the clergyman has almost a discretionary power; but would the Dean consent to celebrate the marriage without even inquiring whether the uncle consented? This was the question. Nevertheless, they could learn. In any case there would be but a delay.

But what was this man? and if it was really he whom Lethierry the night before had declared should be his son-in-law, what could be the meaning of his actions? The very obstacle itself had become a providence. Caudray yielded; but his yielding was only the rapid and tacit assent of a man who feels himself saved from despair.

The pathway was uneven, and sometimes wet and difficult to pass. Caudray, absorbed in thought, did not observe the occasional pools of water or the heaps of shingle. But from time to time Gilliatt turned and said to him, “Take heed of those stones. Give her your hand.”

III

THE FORETHOUGHT OF SELF-SACRIFICE

It struck ten as they entered the church.

By reason of the early hour, and also on account of the desertion of the town that day, the church was empty.

At the farther end, however, near the table which in the reformed church fulfils the place of the altar, there were three persons. They were the Dean, his evangelist, and the registrar. The Dean, who was the Reverend Jaquemin Hérode, was seated; the evangelist and the registrar stood beside him.

A book was open upon the table.

Beside him, upon a credence-table, was another book. It was the parish register, and also open; and an attentive eye might have remarked a page on which was some writing, of which the ink was not yet dry. By the side of the register were a pen and a writing-desk.

The Reverend Jaquemin Hérode rose on perceiving Caudray.

“I have been expecting you,” he said. “All is ready.”

The Dean, in fact, wore his officiating robes.

Caudray looked towards Gilliatt.

The Reverend Doctor added, “I am at your service, brother;” and he bowed.

It was a bow which neither turned to right or left. It was evident from the direction of the Dean’s gaze that he did not recognise the existence of any one but Caudray, for Caudray was a clergyman and a gentleman. Neither Déruchette, who stood aside, nor Gilliatt, who was in the rear, were included in the salutation. His look was a sort of parenthesis in which none but Caudray were admitted. The observance of these little niceties constitutes an important feature in the maintenance of order and the preservation of society.

The Dean continued, with a graceful and dignified urbanity:

“I congratulate you, my colleague, from a double point of view. You have lost your uncle, and are about to take a wife; you are blessed with riches on the one hand, and happiness on the other. Moreover, thanks to the boat which they are about to rebuild, Mess Lethierry will also be rich; which is as it should be. Miss Lethierry was born in this parish; I have verified the date of her birth in the register. She is of age, and at her own disposal. Her uncle, too, who is her only relative, consents. You are anxious to be united immediately on account of your approaching departure. This I can understand; but this being the marriage of the rector of the parish, I should have been gratified to have seen it associated with a little more solemnity. I will consult your wishes by not detaining you longer than necessary. The essentials will be soon complied with. The form is already drawn up in the register, and it requires only the names to be filled in. By the terms of the law and custom, the marriage may be celebrated immediately after the inscription. The declaration necessary for the licence has been duly made. I take upon myself a slight irregularity; for the application for the licence ought to have been registered seven days in advance; but I yield to necessity and the urgency of your departure. Be it so, then. I will proceed with the ceremony. My evangelist will be the witness for the bridegroom; as regards the witness for the bride — —"

The Dean turned towards Gilliatt. Gilliatt made a movement of his head.

"That is sufficient," said the Dean.

Caudray remained motionless; Déruchette was happy, but no less powerless to move.

"Nevertheless," continued the Dean, "there is still an obstacle."

Déruchette started.

The Dean continued:

"The representative here present of Mess Lethierry applied for the licence for you, and has signed the declaration on the register." And with the thumb of his left hand the Dean pointed to Gilliatt, which prevented the necessity of his remembering his name. "The messenger from Mess Lethierry," he added, "has informed me this morning that being too much occupied to come in person, Mess Lethierry desired that the marriage should take place immediately. This desire, expressed verbally, is not sufficient. In consequence of having to grant the licence, and of the irregularity which I take upon myself, I cannot proceed so rapidly without informing myself from Mess Lethierry personally, unless some one can produce his signature. Whatever might be my desire to serve you, I cannot be satisfied with a mere message. I must have some written document."

"That need not delay us," said Gilliatt. And he presented a paper to the Dean. The Dean took it, perused it by a glance, seemed to pass over some lines as unimportant, and read aloud: "Go to the Dean for the licence. I wish the marriage to take place as soon as possible. Immediately would be better.”

He placed the paper on the table, and proceeded:

“It is signed, Lethierry. It would have been more respectful to have addressed himself to me. But since I am called on to serve a colleague, I ask no more.”

Caudray glanced again at Gilliatt. There are moments when mind and mind comprehend each other. Caudray felt that there was some deception; he had not the strength of purpose, perhaps he had not the idea of revealing it. Whether in obedience to a latent heroism, of which he had begun to obtain a glimpse; or whether from a deadening of the conscience, arising from the suddenness of the happiness placed within his reach, he uttered no word.

The Dean took the pen, and aided by the clerk, filled up the spaces in the page of the register; then he rose, and by a gesture invited Caudray and Déruchette to approach the table.

The ceremony commenced. It was a strange moment. Caudray and Déruchette stood beside each other before the minister. He who has ever dreamed of a marriage in which he himself was chief actor, may conceive something of the feeling which they experienced.

Gilliatt stood at a little distance in the shadow of the pillars.

Déruchette, on rising in the morning, desperate, thinking only of death and its associations, had dressed herself in white. Her attire, which had been associated in her mind with mourning, was suited to her nuptials. A white dress is all that is necessary for the bride.

A ray of happiness was visible upon her face. Never had she appeared more beautiful. Her features were remarkable for prettiness rather than what is called beauty. Their fault, if fault it be, lay in a certain excess of grace. Déruchette in repose, that is, neither disturbed by passion or grief, was graceful above all. The ideal virgin is the transfiguration of a face like this. Déruchette, touched by her sorrow and her love, seemed to have caught that higher and more holy expression. It was the difference between the field daisy and the lily.

The tears had scarcely dried upon her cheeks; one perhaps still lingered in the midst of her smiles. Traces of tears indistinctly visible form a pleasing but sombre accompaniment of joy.

The Dean, standing near the table, placed his finger upon the open book, and asked in a distinct voice whether they knew of any impediment to their union.

There was no reply.

"Amen!" said the Dean.

Caudray and Déruchette advanced a step or two towards the table.

"Joseph Ebenezer Caudray, wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?"

Caudray replied "I will."

The Dean continued:

"Durande Déruchette Lethierry, wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband?"

Déruchette, in an agony of soul, springing from her excess of happiness, murmured rather than uttered —

"I will."

Then followed the beautiful form of the Anglican marriage service. The Dean looked around, and in the twilight of the church uttered the solemn words:

"Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?"

Gilliatt answered, "I do!"

There was an interval of silence. Caudray and Déruchette felt a vague sense of oppression in spite of their joy.

The Dean placed Déruchette's right hand in Caudray's; and Caudray repeated after him:

"I take thee, Durande Déruchette to be my wedded wife, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish till death do us part; and thereto I plight thee my troth."

The Dean then placed Caudray's right hand in that of Déruchette, and Déruchette said after him:

"I take thee to be my wedded husband for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness or in health, to love and to cherish till death do us part; and thereto I plight thee my troth."

The Dean asked, "Where is the ring?" The question took them by surprise. Caudray had no ring; but Gilliatt took off the gold ring which he wore upon his little finger. It was probably the wedding-ring which had been sold that morning by the jeweller in the Commercial Arcade.

The Dean placed the ring upon the book; then handed it to Caudray, who took Déruchette’s little trembling left hand, passed the ring over her fourth finger, and said:

“With this ring I thee wed!”

“In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,” continued the Dean.

“Amen,” said his evangelist.

Then the Dean said, “Let us pray.”

Caudray and Déruchette turned towards the table, and knelt down.

Gilliatt, standing by, inclined his head.

So they knelt before God; while he seemed to bend under the burden of his fate.

IV

FOR YOUR WIFE: WHEN YOU MARRY

As they left the church they could see the Cashmere making preparations for her departure.

“You are in time,” said Gilliatt.

They chose again the path leading to the Havelet.

Caudray and Déruchette went before, Gilliatt this time walking behind them. They were two somnambulists. Their bewilderment had not passed away, but only changed in form. They took no heed of whither they were going, or of what they did. They hurried on mechanically, scarcely remembering the existence of anything, feeling that they were united for ever, but scarcely able to connect two ideas in their minds. In ecstasy like theirs it is as impossible to think as it is to swim in a torrent. In the midst of their trouble and darkness they had been plunged in a whirlpool of delight; they bore a paradise within themselves. They did not speak, but conversed with each other by the mysterious sympathy of their souls. Déruchette pressed Caudray’s arm to her side.

The footsteps of Gilliatt behind them reminded them now and then that he was there. They were deeply moved, but could find no words. The excess of emotion results in stupor. Theirs was delightful, but overwhelming. They were man and wife: every other idea was postponed to that. What Gilliatt had done was well; that was all that they could grasp. They experienced towards their guide a deep but vague gratitude in their hearts. Déruchette felt that there was some mystery to be explained, but not now. Meanwhile they accepted their unexpected happiness. They felt themselves controlled by the abruptness and decision of this man who conferred on them so much happiness with a kind of authority. To question him, to talk with him seemed impossible. Too many impressions rushed into their minds at once for that. Their absorption was pardonable.

Events succeed each other sometimes with the rapidity of hailstones. Their effect is overpowering; they deaden the senses. Falling upon existences habitually calm, they render incidents rapidly unintelligible even to those whom they chiefly concern; we become scarcely conscious of our own adventures; we are overwhelmed without guessing the cause, or crowned with happiness without comprehending it. For some hours Déruchette had been subjected to every kind of emotion: at first, surprise and delight at meeting Caudray in the garden; then horror at the monster whom her uncle had presented as her husband; then her anguish when the angel of her dreams spread his wings and seemed about to depart; and now her joy, a joy such as she had never known before, founded on an inexplicable enigma; the monster of last night himself restoring her lover; marriage arising out of her torture; this Gilliatt, the evil destiny of last night, become to-day her saviour! She could explain nothing to her own mind. It was evident that all the morning Gilliatt had had no other occupation than that of preparing the way for their marriage: he had done all: he had answered for Mess Lethierry, seen the Dean, obtained the licence, signed the necessary declaration; and thus the marriage had been rendered possible. But Déruchette understood it not. If she had, she could not have comprehended the reasons. They did nothing but close their eyes to the world, and — grateful in their hearts — yield themselves up to the guidance of this good demon. There was no time for explanations, and expressions of gratitude seemed too insignificant. They were silent in their trance of love.

The little power of thought which they retained was scarcely more than sufficient to guide them on their way — to enable them to distinguish the sea from the land, and the Cashmere from every other vessel.

In a few minutes they were at the little creek.

Caudray entered the boat first. At the moment when Déruchette was about to follow, she felt her sleeve held gently. It was Gilliatt, who had placed his finger upon a fold of her dress.

“Madam,” he said, “you are going on a journey unexpectedly. It has struck me that you would have need of dresses and clothes. You will find a trunk aboard the Cashmere, containing a lady’s clothing. It came to me from my mother. It was intended for my wife if I should marry. Permit me to ask your acceptance of it.”

Déruchette, partially aroused from her dream, turned towards him. Gilliatt continued, in a voice which was scarcely audible:

“I do not wish to detain you, madam, but I feel that I ought to give you some explanation. On the day of your misfortune, you were sitting in the lower room; you uttered certain words; it is easy to understand that you have forgotten them. We are not compelled to remember every word we speak. Mess Lethierry was in great sorrow. It was certainly a noble vessel, and one that did good service. The misfortune was recent; there was a great commotion. Those are things which one naturally forgets. It was only a vessel wrecked among the rocks; one cannot be always thinking of an accident. But what I wished to tell you was, that as it was said that no one would go, I went. They said it was impossible; but it was not. I thank you for listening to me a moment. You can understand, madam, that if I went there, it was not with the thought of displeasing you. This is a thing, besides, of old date. I know that you are in haste. If there was time, if we could talk about this, you might perhaps remember. But this is all useless now. The history of it goes back to a day when there was snow upon the ground. And then on one occasion that I passed you, I thought that you looked kindly on me. This is how it was. With regard to last night, I had not had time to go to my home. I came from my labour; I was all torn and ragged; I startled you, and you fainted. I was to blame; people do not come like that to strangers' houses; I ask your forgiveness. This is nearly all I had to say. You are about to sail. You will have fine weather; the wind is in the east. Farewell. You will not blame me for troubling you with these things. This is the last minute."

"I am thinking of the trunk you spoke of," replied Déruchette. "Why do you not keep it for your wife, when you marry?"

"It is most likely, madam," replied Gilliatt, "that I shall never marry."

"That would be a pity," said Déruchette; "you are so good."

And Déruchette smiled. Gilliatt returned her smile.

Then he assisted her to step into the boat.

In less than a quarter of an hour afterwards Caudray and Déruchette were aboard the Cashmere in the roads.

V

THE GREAT TOMB

Gilliatt walked along the water-side, passed rapidly through St. Peter’s Port, and then turned towards St. Sampson by the seashore. In his anxiety to meet no one whom he knew, he avoided the highways now filled with foot-passengers by his great achievement.

For a long time, as the reader knows, he had had a peculiar manner of traversing the country in all parts without being observed. He knew the bye-paths, and favoured solitary and winding routes; he had the shy habits of a wild beast who knows that he is disliked, and keeps at a distance. When quite a child, he had been quick to feel how little welcome men showed in their faces at his approach, and he had gradually contracted that habit of being alone which had since become an instinct.

He passed through the Esplanade, then by the Salerie. Now and then he turned and looked behind him at the Cashmere in the roads, which was beginning to set her sails. There was little wind; Gilliatt went faster than the Cashmere. He walked with downcast eyes among the lower rocks at the water’s edge. The tide was beginning to rise.

Suddenly he stopped, and, turning his back, contemplated for some minutes a group of oaks beyond the rocks which concealed the road to Vale. They were the oaks at the spot called the Basses Maisons. It was there that Déruchette once wrote with her finger the name of Gilliatt in the snow. Many a day had passed since that snow had melted away.

Then he pursued his way.

The day was beautiful; more beautiful than any that had yet been seen that year. It was one of those spring days when May suddenly pours forth all its beauty, and when nature seems to have no thought but to rejoice and be happy. Amidst the many murmurs from forest and village, from the sea and the air, a sound of cooing could be distinguished. The first butterflies of the year were resting on the early roses. Everything in nature seemed new — the grass, the mosses, the leaves, the perfumes, the rays of light. The sun shone as if it had never shone before. The pebbles seemed bathed in coolness. Birds but lately fledged sang out their deep notes from the trees, or fluttered among the boughs in their attempts to use their new-found wings. There was a chattering all together of goldfinches, pewits, tomtits, woodpeckers, bullfinches, and thrushes. The blossoms of lilacs, May lilies, daphnes, and melilots mingled their various hues in the thickets. A beautiful kind of water-weed peculiar to Guernsey covered the pools with an emerald green; where the kingfishers and the water-wagtails, which make such graceful little nests, came down to bathe their wings. Through every opening in the branches appeared the deep blue sky. A few lazy clouds followed each other in the azure depths. The ear seemed to catch the sound of kisses sent from invisible lips. Every old wall had its tufts of wallflowers. The plum-trees and laburnums were in blossom; their white and yellow masses gleamed through the interlacing boughs. The spring showered all her gold and silver on the woods. The new shoots and leaves were green and fresh. Calls of welcome were in the air; the approaching summer opened her hospitable doors for birds coming from afar. It was the time of the arrival of the swallows. The clusters of furze-bushes bordered the steep sides of hollow roads in anticipation of the clusters of the hawthorn. The pretty and the beautiful reigned side by side; the magnificent and the graceful, the great and the little, had each their place. No note in the great concert of nature was lost. Green microscopic beauties took their place in the vast universal plan in which all seemed distinguishable as in limpid water. Everywhere a divine fulness, a mysterious sense of expansion, suggested the unseen effort of the sap in movement. Guttering things glittered more than ever; loving natures became more tender. There was a hymn in the flowers, and a radiance in the sounds of the air. The wide-diffused harmony of nature burst forth on every side. All things which felt the dawn of life invited others to put forth shoots. A movement coming from below, and also from above, stirred vaguely all hearts susceptible to the scattered and subterranean influence of germination. The flower shadowed forth the fruit; young maidens dreamed of love. It was nature’s universal bridal. It was fine, bright, and warm; through the hedges in the meadows children were seen laughing and playing at their games. The fruit-trees filled the orchards with their heaps of white and pink blossom. In the fields were primroses, cowslips, milfoil, daffodils, daisies, speedwell, jacinths, and violets. Blue borage and yellow irises swarmed with those beautiful little pink stars which flower always in groups, and are hence called “companions.” Creatures with golden scales glided between the stones. The flowering houseleek covered the thatched roofs with purple patches. Women were plaiting hives in the open air; and the bees were abroad, mingling their humming with the murmurs from the sea. Nature, sensitive to the touch of spring, exhaled delight.

When Gilliatt arrived at St. Sampson, the water had not yet risen at the further end of the harbour, and he was able to cross it dry-footed unperceived behind the hulls of vessels fixed for repair. A number of flat stones were placed there at regular distances to make a causeway.

He was not observed. The crowd was at the other end of the port, near the narrow entrance, by the Bravées. There his name was in every mouth. They were, in fact, speaking about him so much that none paid attention to him. He passed, sheltered in some degree by the very commotion that he had caused.

He saw from afar the sloop in the place where he had moored it, with the funnel standing between its four chains; observed a movement of carpenters at their work, and confused outlines of figures passing to and fro; and he could distinguish the loud and cheery voice of Mess Lethierry giving orders.

He threaded the narrow alleys behind the Bravées. There was no one there beside him. All curiosity was concentrated on the front of the house. He chose the footpath alongside the low wall of the garden, but stopped at the angle where the wild mallow grew. He saw once more the stone where he used to pass his time; saw once more the wooden garden seat where Déruchette was accustomed to sit, and glanced again at the pathway of the alley where he had seen the embrace of two shadows which had vanished.

He soon went on his way, climbed the hill of Vale Castle, descended again, and directed his steps towards the Bû de la Rue.

The Houmet-Paradis was a solitude.

His house was in the same state in which he had left it in the morning, after dressing himself to go to St. Peter’s Port.

A window was open, through which his bagpipe might have been seen hanging to a nail upon the wall.

Upon the table was the little Bible given to him in token of gratitude by the stranger whom he now knew as Caudray.

The key was in the door. He approached; placed his hand upon it; turned it twice in the lock, put the key in his pocket, and departed.

He walked not in the direction of the town, but towards the sea.

He traversed his garden diagonally, taking the shortest way without regard to the beds, but taking care not to tread upon the plants which he placed there, because he had heard that they were favourites with Déruchette.

He crossed the parapet wall, and let himself down upon the rocks.

Going straight on, he began to follow the long ridge of rocks which connected the Bû de la Rue with the great natural obelisk of granite rising erect from the sea, which was known as the Beast’s Horn. This was the place of the Gild-Holm-’Ur seat.

He strode on from block to block like a giant among mountains. To make long strides upon a row of breakers is like walking upon the ridge of a roof.

A fisherwoman with dredge-nets, who had been walking naked-footed among the pools of sea-water at some distance, and had just regained the shore, called to him, “Take care; the tide is coming.” But he held on his way.

Having arrived at the great rock of the point, the Horn, which rises like a pinnacle from the sea, he stopped. It was the extremity of the promontory.

He looked around.

Out at sea a few sailing boats at anchor were fishing. Now and then rivulets of silver glittered among them in the sun: it was the water running from the nets. The Cashmere was not yet off St. Sampson. She had set her main-topsail, and was between Herm and Jethou.

Gilliatt rounded the rock, and came under the Gild-Holm-’Ur seat, at the foot of that kind of abrupt stairs where, less than three months before, he had assisted Caudray to come down. He ascended.

The greater number of the steps were already under water. Two or three only were still dry, by which he climbed.

The steps led up to the Gild-Holm-’Ur seat. He reached the niche, contemplated it for a moment, pressed his hand upon his eyes, and let it glide gently from one eyelid to the other — a gesture by which he seemed to obliterate the memory of the past — then sat down in the hollow, with the perpendicular wall behind him, and the ocean at his feet.

The Cashmere at that moment was passing the great round half-submerged tower, defended by one sergeant and a cannon, which marks the half way in the roads between Herm and St. Peter’s Port.

A few flowers stirred among the crevices in the rock about Gilliatt’s head. The sea was blue as far as eye could reach. The wind came from the east; there was a little surf in the direction of the island of Sark, of which only the western side is visible from Guernsey. In the distance appeared the coast of France like a mist, with the long yellow strips of sand about Carteret. Now and then a white butterfly fluttered by. The butterflies frequently fly out to sea.

The breeze was very slight. The blue expanse, both above and below, was tranquil. Not a ripple agitated those species of serpents, of an azure more or less dark, which indicate on the surface of the sea the lines of sunken rocks.

The Cashmere, little moved by the wind, had set her topsail and studding-sails to catch the breeze. All her canvas was spread, but the wind being a side one, her studding-sails only compelled her to hug the Guernsey coast more closely. She had passed the beacon of St. Sampson, and was off the hill of Vale Castle. The moment was approaching when she would double the point of the Bû de la Rue.

Gilliatt watched her approach.

The air and sea were still. The tide rose not by waves, but by an imperceptible swell. The level of the water crept upward without a palpitation. The subdued murmur from the open sea was soft as the breathing of a child.

In the direction of the harbour of St. Sampson, faint echoes could be heard of carpenters' hammers. The carpenters were probably the workmen constructing the tackle, gear, and apparatus for removing the engine from the sloop. The sounds, however, scarcely reached Gilliatt by reason of the mass of granite at his back.

The Cashmere approached with the slowness of a phantom.

Gilliatt watched it still.

Suddenly a touch and a sensation of cold caused him to look down. The sea had reached his feet.

He lowered his eyes, then raised them again.

The Cashmere was quite near.

The rock in which the rains had hollowed out the Gild-Holm-'Ur seat was so completely vertical, and there was so much water at its base, that in calm weather vessels were able to pass without danger within a few cables' lengths.

The Cashmere was abreast of the rock. It rose straight upwards as if it had grown out of the water; or like the lengthening out of a shadow. The rigging showed black against the heavens and in the magnificent expanse of the sea. The long sails, passing for a moment over the sun, became lighted up with a singular glory and transparence. The water murmured indistinctly; but no other noise marked the majestic gliding of that outline. The deck was as visible as if he had stood upon it.

The steersman was at the helm; a cabin-boy was climbing the shrouds; a few passengers leaning on the bulwarks were contemplating the beauty of the scene. The captain was smoking; but nothing of all this was seen by Gilliatt.

There was a spot on the deck on which the broad sunlight fell. It was on this corner that his eyes were fixed. In this sunlight were Déruchette and Caudray. They were sitting together side by side, like two birds, warming themselves in the noonday sun, upon one of those covered seats with a little awning which well-ordered packet-boats provided for passengers, and upon which was the inscription, when it happened to be an English vessel, "For ladies only." Déruchette's head was leaning upon Caudray's shoulder; his arm was around her waist; they held each other's hands with their fingers interwoven. A celestial light was discernible in those two faces formed by innocence. Their chaste embrace was expressive of their earthly union and their purity of soul. The seat was a sort of alcove, almost a nest; it was at the same time a glory round them; the tender aureola of love passing into a cloud.

The silence was like the calm of heaven.

Caudray's gaze was fixed in contemplation. Déruchette's lips moved; and, amidst that perfect silence, as the wind carried the vessel near shore, and it glided within a few fathoms of the Gild-Holm-'Ur seat, Gilliatt heard the tender and musical voice of Déruchette exclaiming:

"Look yonder. It seems as if there were a man upon the rock."

The vessel passed.

Leaving the promontory of the Bû de la Rue behind, the Cashmere glided on upon the waters. In less than a quarter of an hour, her masts and sails formed only a white obelisk, gradually decreasing against the horizon. Gilliatt felt that the water had reached his knees.

He contemplated the vessel speeding on her way.

The breeze freshened out at sea. He could see the Cashmere run out her lower studding-sails and her staysails, to take advantage of the rising wind.

She was already clear of the waters of Guernsey. Gilliatt followed the vessel with his eyes.

The waves had reached his waist.

The tide was rising: time was passing away.

The seamews and cormorants flew about him restlessly, as if anxious to warn him of his danger. It seemed as if some of his old companions of the Douvres rocks flying there had recognised him.

An hour had passed.

The wind from the sea was scarcely felt in the roads; but the form of the Cashmere was rapidly growing less. The sloop, according to all appearance, was sailing fast. It was already nearly off the Casquets.

There was no foam around the Gild-Holm-'Ur; no wave beat against its granite sides. The water rose peacefully. It was nearly level with Gilliatt's shoulders.

Another hour had passed.

The Cashmere was beyond the waters of Aurigny. The Ortach rock concealed it for a moment; it passed behind it, and came forth again as from an eclipse. The sloop was veering to the north upon the open sea. It was now only a point glittering in the sun.

The birds were hovering about Gilliatt, uttering short cries. Only his head was now visible. The tide was nearly at the full. Evening was approaching. Behind him, in the roads, a few fishing-boats were making for the harbour.

Gilliatt's eyes continued fixed upon the vessel in the horizon. Their expression resembled nothing earthly. A strange lustre shone in their calm and tragic depths. There was in them the peace of vanished hopes, the calm but sorrowful acceptance of an end far different from his dreams. By degrees the dusk of heaven began to darken in them, though gazing still upon the point in space. At the same moment the wide waters round the Gild-Holm-'Ur and the vast gathering twilight closed upon them.

The Cashmere, now scarcely perceptible, had become a mere spot in the thin haze.

Gradually, the spot, which was but a shape, grew paler.

Then it dwindled, and finally disappeared.

At the moment when the vessel vanished on the line of the horizon, the head of Gilliatt disappeared. Nothing was visible now but the sea.

Gilliat et la pieuvre, J. Carlier

Dédicace

Je dédie ce livre au rocher d'hospitalité et de liberté, à ce coin de vieille terre normande où vit le noble petit peuple de la mer, à l'île de Guernesey, sévère et douce, mon asile actuel, mon tombeau probable.

V. H.

PREFACE

La religion, la société, la nature; telles sont les trois luttes de l’homme. Ces trois luttes sont en même temps ses trois besoins; il faut qu’il croie, de là le temple; il faut qu’il crée, de là la cité; il faut qu’il vive, de là la charrue et le navire. Mais ces trois solutions contiennent trois guerres. La mystérieuse difficulté de la vie sort de toutes les trois. L’homme a affaire à l’obstacle sous la forme superstition, sous la forme préjugé, et sous la forme élément. Un triple anankè pèse sur nous, l’anankè des dogmes, l’anankè des lois, l’anankè des choses. Dans Notre-Dame de Paris, l’auteur a dénoncé le premier; dans les Misérables, il a signalé le second; dans ce livre, il indique le troisième.

À ces trois fatalités qui enveloppent l’homme se mêle la fatalité intérieure, l’anankè suprême, le cœur humain.

DE QUOI SE COMPOSE UNE MAUVAISE REPUTATION

UN MOT ÉCRIT SUR UNE PAGE BLANCHE

La Christmas de 182. fut remarquable à Guernesey. Il neigea ce jour-là. Dans les îles de la Manche, un hiver où il gèle à glace est mémorable, et la neige fait événement.

Le matin de cette Christmas, la route qui longe la mer de Saint-Pierre-Port au Valle était toute blanche. Il avait neigé depuis minuit jusqu'à l'aube. Vers neuf heures, peu après le lever du soleil, comme ce n'était pas encore le moment pour les anglicans d'aller à l'église de Saint-Sampson et pour les wesleyens d'aller à la chapelle Eldad, le chemin était à peu près désert. Dans tout le tronçon de route qui sépare la première tour de la seconde tour, il n'y avait que trois passants, un enfant, un homme et une femme. Ces trois passants, marchant à distance les uns des autres, n'avaient visiblement aucun lien entre eux. L'enfant, d'une huitaine d'années, s'était arrêté, et regardait la neige avec curiosité. L'homme venait derrière la femme, à une centaine de pas d'intervalle. Il allait comme elle du côté de Saint-Sampson. L'homme, jeune encore, semblait quelque chose comme un ouvrier ou un matelot. Il avait ses habits de tous les jours, une vareuse de gros drap brun, et un pantalon à jambières goudronnées, ce qui paraissait indiquer qu'en dépit de la fête il n'irait à aucune chapelle. Ses épais souliers de cuir brut, aux semelles garnies de gros clous, laissaient sur la neige une empreinte plus ressemblante à une serrure de prison qu'à un pied d'homme. La passante, elle, avait évidemment déjà sa toilette d'église; elle portait une large mante ouatée de soie noire à faille, sous laquelle elle était fort coquettement ajustée d'une robe de popeline d'Irlande à bandes alternées blanches et roses, et, si elle n'eût eu des bas rouges, on eût pu la prendre pour une parisienne. Elle allait devant elle avec une vivacité libre et légère, et, à cette marche qui n'a encore rien porté de la vie, on devinait une jeune fille. Elle avait cette grâce fugitive de l'allure qui marque la plus délicate des transitions, l'adolescence, les deux crépuscules mêlés, le commencement d'une femme dans la fin d'un enfant. L'homme ne la remarquait pas.

Tout à coup, près d'un bouquet de chênes verts qui est à l'angle d'un courtil, au lieu dit les Basses-Maisons, elle se retourna, et ce mouvement fit que l’homme la regarda. Elle s’arrêta, parut le considérer un moment, puis se baissa, et l’homme crut voir qu’elle écrivait avec son doigt quelque chose sur la neige. Elle se redressa, se remit en marche, doubla le pas, se retourna encore, cette fois en riant, et disparut à gauche du chemin, dans le sentier bordé de haies qui mène au château de Lierre. L’homme, quand elle se retourna pour la seconde fois, reconnut Déruchette, une ravissante fille du pays.

Il n’éprouva aucun besoin de se hâter, et, quelques instants après, il se trouva près du bouquet de chênes à l’angle du courtil. Il ne songeait déjà plus à la passante disparue, et il est probable que si, en cette minute-là, quelque marsouin eût sauté dans la mer ou quelque rouge-gorge dans les buissons, cet homme eût passé son chemin, l’œil fixé sur le rouge-gorge ou le marsouin. Le hasard fit qu’il avait les paupières baissées, son regard tomba machinalement sur l’endroit où la jeune fille s’était arrêtée. Deux petits pieds s’y étaient imprimés, et à côté il lut ce mot tracé par elle dans la neige: Gilliatt.

Ce mot était son nom.

Il s’appelait Gilliatt.

Il resta longtemps immobile, regardant ce nom, ces petits pieds, cette neige, puis continua sa route, pensif.

II

LE BÛ DE LA RUE

Gilliatt habitait la paroisse de Saint-Sampson. Il n’y était pas aimé. Il y avait des raisons pour cela.

D’abord il avait pour logis une maison « visionnée”. Il arrive quelquefois, à Jersey ou à Guernesey, qu’à la campagne, à la ville même, passant dans quelque coin désert ou dans une rue pleine d’habitants, vous rencontrez une maison dont l’entrée est barricadée; le houx obstrue la porte; on ne sait quels hideux emplâtres de planches clouées bouchent les fenêtres du rez-de-chaussée; les fenêtres des étages supérieurs sont à la fois fermées et ouvertes, tous les châssis sont verrouillés, mais tous les carreaux sont cassés. S’il y a un beyle, une cour, l’herbe y pousse, le parapet d’enceinte s’écroule; s’il y a un jardin, il est ortie, ronce et ciguë, et l’on peut y épier les insectes rares. Les cheminées se crevassent, le toit s’effondre; ce qu’on voit du dedans des chambres est démantelé; le bois est pourri, la pierre est moisie. Il y a aux murs du papier qui se décolle. Vous pouvez y étudier les vieilles modes du papier, les griffons de l’empire, les draperies en croissant du directoire, les balustres et les cippes de Louis XVI. L’épaississement des toiles pleines de mouches indique la paix profonde des araignées. Quelquefois on aperçoit un pot cassé sur une planche. C’est là une maison « visionnée”. Le diable y vient la nuit.

La maison comme l’homme peut devenir cadavre. Il suffit qu’une superstition la tue. Alors elle est terrible. Ces maisons mortes ne sont point rares dans les îles de la Manche.

Les populations campagnardes et maritimes ne sont pas tranquilles à l’endroit du diable. Celles de la Manche, archipel anglais et littoral français, ont sur lui des notions très précises. Le diable a des envoyés par toute la terre. Il est certain que Belphégor est ambassadeur de l’enfer en France, Hutgin en Italie, Bélial en Turquie, Thamuz en Espagne, Martinet en Suisse, et Mammon en Angleterre. Satan est un empereur comme un autre. Satan César. Sa maison est très bien montée; Dagon est grand panetier; Succor Bénoth est chef des eunuques; Asmodée, banquier des jeux; Kobal, directeur du théâtre, et Verdelet, grand maître des cérémonies; Nybbas est bouffon. Wiérus, homme savant, bon strygologue et démonographe bien renseigné, appelle Nybbas « le grand parodiste”.

Les pêcheurs normands de la Manche ont bien des précautions à prendre quand ils sont en mer, à cause des illusions que le diable fait. On a longtemps cru que saint Maclou habitait le gros rocher carré Ortach, qui est au large entre Aurigny et les Casquets, et beaucoup de vieux matelots d’autrefois affirmaient l’y avoir très souvent vu de loin, assis et lisant dans un livre. Aussi les marins de passage faisaient-ils force génuflexions devant le rocher Ortach jusqu’au jour où la fable s’est dissipée et a fait place à la vérité. On a découvert et l’on sait aujourd’hui que ce qui habite le rocher Ortach, ce n’est pas un saint, mais un diable. Ce diable, un nommé Jochmus, avait eu la malice de se faire passer pendant plusieurs siècles pour saint Maclou. Au reste l’église elle-même tombe dans ces méprises. Les diables Raguhel, Oribel et Tobiel ont été saints jusqu’en 745 où le pape Zacharie, les ayant flairés, les mit dehors. Pour faire de ces expulsions, qui sont certes très utiles, il faut beaucoup se connaître en diables.

Les anciens du pays racontent, mais ces faits-là appartiennent au passé, que la population catholique de l’archipel normand a été autrefois, bien malgré elle, plus en communication encore avec le démon que la population huguenote. Pourquoi? Nous l’ignorons. Ce qui est certain, c’est que cette minorité fut jadis fort ennuyée par le diable. Il avait pris les catholiques en affection, et cherchait à les fréquenter, ce qui donnerait à croire que le diable est plutôt catholique que protestant. Une de ses plus insupportables familiarités, c’était de faire des visites nocturnes aux lits conjugaux catholiques, au moment où le mari était endormi tout à fait, et la femme à moitié. De là des méprises. Patouillet pensait que Voltaire était né de cette façon. Cela n’a rien d’invraisemblable. Ce cas du reste est parfaitement connu et décrit dans les formulaires d’exorcismes, sous la rubrique: De erroribus nocturnis et de semine diabolorum. Il a particulièrement sévi à saint-Hélier vers la fin du siècle dernier, probablement en punition des crimes de la Révolution. Les conséquences des excès révolutionnaires sont incalculables. Quoi qu’il en soit, cette survenue possible du démon, la nuit, quand on n’y voit pas clair, quand on dort, embarrassait beaucoup de femmes orthodoxes. Donner naissance à un Voltaire n’a rien d’agréable. Une d’elles, inquiète, consulta son confesseur sur le moyen d’éclaircir à temps ce quiproquo. Le confesseur répondit: − Pour vous assurer si vous avez affaire au diable ou à votre mari, tâtez le front; si vous trouvez des cornes, vous serez sûre… − De quoi? demanda la femme.

La maison qu’habitait Gilliatt avait été visionnée et ne l’était plus. Elle n’en était que plus suspecte. Personne n’ignore que lorsqu’un sorcier s’installe dans un logis hanté, le diable juge le logis suffisamment tenu, et fait au sorcier la politesse de n’y plus venir, à moins d’être appelé, comme le médecin.

Cette maison se nommait le Bû de la rue. Elle était située à la pointe d’une langue de terre ou plutôt de rocher qui faisait un petit mouillage à part dans la crique de Houmet-Paradis. Il y a là une eau profonde. Cette maison était toute seule sur cette pointe presque hors de l’île, avec juste assez de terre pour un petit jardin. Les hautes marées noyaient quelquefois le jardin. Entre le port de Saint-Sampson et la crique de Houmet-Paradis, il y a la grosse colline que surmonte ce bloc de tours et de lierre appelé le château du Valle ou de l’Archange, en sorte que de Saint-Sampson on ne voyait pas le Bû de la Rue.

Rien n’est moins rare qu’un sorcier à Guernesey. Ils exercent leur profession dans certaines paroisses, et le dix-neuvième siècle n’y fait rien. Ils ont des pratiques véritablement criminelles. Ils font bouillir de l’or. Ils cueillent des herbes à minuit. Ils regardent de travers les bestiaux des gens. On les consulte; ils se font apporter dans des bouteilles de « l’eau des malades”, et on les entend dire à demi-voix: L’eau paraît bien triste. L’un d’eux un jour, en mars 1856, a constaté dans « l’eau” d’un malade sept diables. Ils sont redoutés et redoutables. Un d’eux a récemment ensorcelé un boulanger « ainsi que son four”. Un autre a la scélératesse de cacheter et sceller avec le plus grand soin des enveloppes « où il n’y a rien dedans”. Un autre va jusqu’à avoir dans sa maison sur une planche trois bouteilles étiquetées B. Ces faits monstrueux sont constatés. Quelques sorciers sont complaisants, et, pour deux ou trois guinées, prennent vos maladies. Alors ils se roulent sur leur lit en poussant des cris. Pendant qu’ils se tordent, vous dites: Tiens, je n’ai plus rien. D’autres vous guérissent de tous les maux en vous nouant un mouchoir autour du corps. Moyen si simple qu’on s’étonne que personne ne s’en soit encore avisé. Au siècle dernier la cour royale de Guernesey les mettait sur un tas de fagots, et les brûlait vifs. De nos jours elle les condamne à huit semaines de prison, quatre semaines au pain et à l’eau, et quatre semaines au secret, alternant. Amant alterna catenæ.

Le dernier brûlement de sorciers à Guernesey a eu lieu en 1747. La ville avait utilisé pour cela une de ses places, le carrefour du Bordage. Le carrefour du Bordage a vu brûler onze sorciers, de 1565 à 1700. En général ces coupables avouaient. On les aidait à l’aveu au moyen de la torture. Le carrefour du Bordage a rendu d’autres services encore à la société et à la religion. On y a brûlé les hérétiques. Sous Marie Tudor, on y brûla, entre autres huguenots, une mère et ses deux filles; cette mère s’appelait Perrotine Massy. Une des filles était grosse. Elle accoucha dans la braise du bûcher. La chronique dit: « Son ventre éclata.” Il sortit de ce ventre un enfant vivant; le nouveau-né roula hors de la fournaise; un nommé House le ramassa. Le bailli Hélier Gosselin, bon catholique, fit rejeter l’enfant dans le feu.

Pour ta femme, quand tu te marieras

Revenons à Gilliatt.

On contait dans le pays qu'une femme, qui avait avec elle un petit enfant, était venue vers la fin de la Révolution habiter Guernesey. Elle était anglaise, à moins qu'elle ne fût française. Elle avait un nom quelconque dont la prononciation guernesiaise et l'orthographe paysanne avaient fait Gilliatt. Elle vivait seule avec cet enfant qui était pour elle, selon les uns un neveu, selon les autres un fils, selon les autres un petit-fils, selon les autres rien du tout. Elle avait un peu d'argent, de quoi vivre pauvrement. Elle avait acheté une pièce de pré à la Sergentée, et une jaonnière à la Roque-Crespel, près de Rocquaine. La maison du Bû de la Rue était, à cette époque, visionnée. Depuis plus de trente ans, on ne l'habitait plus. Elle tombait en ruine. Le jardin, trop visité par la mer, ne pouvait rien produire. Outre les bruits nocturnes et les lueurs, cette maison avait cela de particulièrement effrayant que, si on y laissait le soir sur la cheminée une pelote de laine, des aiguilles et une pleine assiettée de soupe, on trouvait le lendemain matin la soupe mangée, l'assiette vide et une paire de mitaines tricotée. On offrait cette masure à vendre avec le démon qui était dedans pour quelques livres sterling. Cette femme l'acheta, évidemment tentée par le diable. Ou par le bon marché.

Elle fit plus que l'acheter, elle s'y logea, elle et son enfant; et, à partir de ce moment, la maison s'apaisa. Cette maison a ce qu'elle veut, dirent les gens du pays. Le visionnement cessa. On n'y entendit plus de cris au point du jour. Il n'y eut plus d'autre lumière que le suif allumé le soir par la bonne femme. Chandelle de sorcière vaut torche du diable. Cette explication satisfit le public.

Cette femme tirait parti des quelques vergées de terre qu'elle avait. Elle avait une bonne vache à beurre jaune. Elle récoltait des mouzettes blanches, des caboches et des pommes de terre Golden Drops. Elle vendait, tout comme une autre, « des panais par le tonneau, des oignons par le cent, et des fèves par le dénerel”. Elle n'allait pas au marché, mais faisait vendre sa récolte par Guilbert Falliot, aux Abreuveurs Saint-Sampson. Le registre de Falliot constate qu’il vendit pour elle une fois jusqu’à douze boisseaux de patates dites trois mois, des plus temprunes.

La maison avait été chétivement réparée, assez pour y vivre. Il ne pleuvait dans les chambres que par les très gros temps. Elle se composait d’un rez-de-chaussée et d’un grenier. Le rez-de-chaussée était partagé en trois salles, deux où l’on couchait, une où l’on mangeait. On montait au grenier par une échelle. La femme faisait la cuisine et montrait à lire à l’enfant. Elle n’allait point aux églises; ce qui fit que, tout bien considéré, on la déclara française. N’aller « à aucune place”, c’est grave.

En somme, c’étaient des gens que rien ne prouvait.

Française, il est probable qu’elle l’était. Les volcans lancent des pierres et les révolutions des hommes. Des familles sont ainsi envoyées à de grandes distances, des destinées sont dépaysées, des groupes sont dispersés et s’émiettent; des gens tombent des nues, ceux-ci en Allemagne, ceux-là en Angleterre, ceux-là en Amérique. Ils étonnent les naturels du pays. D’où viennent ces inconnus? C’est ce vésuve qui fume là-bas qui les a expectorés. On donne des noms à ces aérolithes, à ces individus expulsés et perdus, à ces éliminés du sort; on les appelle émigrés, réfugiés, aventuriers. S’ils restent, on les tolère; s’ils s’en vont, on est content. Quelquefois ce sont des êtres absolument inoffensifs, étrangers, les femmes du moins, aux évènements qui les ont chassés, n’ayant ni haine, ni colère, projectiles sans le vouloir, très étonnés. Ils reprennent racine comme ils peuvent. Ils ne faisaient rien à personne et ne comprennent pas ce qui leur est arrivé. J’ai vu une pauvre touffe d’herbe lancée éperdument en l’air par une explosion de mine. La Révolution française, plus que toute autre explosion, a eu de ces jets lointains.

La femme qu’à Guernesey on appelait la Gilliatt était peut-être cette touffe d’herbe-là.

La femme vieillit, l’enfant grandit. Ils vivaient seuls, et évités. Ils se suffisaient. Louve et louveteau se pourlèchent. Ceci est encore une des formules que leur appliqua la bienveillance environnante. L’enfant devint un adolescent, l’adolescent devint un homme, et alors, les vieilles écorces de la vie devant toujours tomber, la mère mourut. Elle lui laissa le pré de la Sergentée, la jaonnière de la Roque-Crespel, la maison du Bû de la Rue, plus, dit l’inventaire officiel, « cent guinées d’or dans le pied d’une cauche”, c’est-à-dire dans le pied d’un bas. La maison était suffisamment meublée de deux coffres de chêne, de deux lits, de six chaises et d’une table, avec ce qu'il faut d'ustensiles. Sur une planche il y avait quelques livres, et, dans un coin, une malle pas du tout mystérieuse qui dut être ouverte pour l'inventaire. Cette malle était en cuir fauve à arabesques de clous de cuivre et d'étoiles d'étain, et contenait un trousseau de femme neuf et complet en belle toile de fil de Dunkerque, chemises et jupes, plus des robes de soie en pièce, avec un papier où on lisait ceci écrit de la main de la morte: Pour ta femme, quand tu te marieras.

Cette mort fut pour le survivant un accablement. Il était sauvage, il devint farouche. Le désert s'acheva autour de lui. Ce n'était que l'isolement, ce fut le vide. Tant qu'on est deux, la vie est possible. Seul, il semble qu'on ne pourra plus la traîner. On renonce à tirer. C'est la première forme du désespoir. Plus tard on comprend que le devoir est une série d'acceptations. On regarde la mort, on regarde la vie, et l'on consent. Mais c'est un consentement qui saigne.

Gilliatt étant jeune, sa plaie se cicatrisa. À cet âge, les chairs du cœur reprennent. Sa tristesse, effacée peu à peu, se mêla autour de lui à la nature, y devint une sorte de charme, l'attira vers les choses et loin des hommes, et amalgama de plus en plus cette âme à la solitude.

IV.

Impopularité

Gilliatt, nous l’avons dit, n’était pas aimé dans la paroisse. Rien de plus naturel que cette antipathie. Les motifs abondaient. D’abord, on vient de l’expliquer, la maison qu’il habitait. Ensuite, son origine. Qu’est-ce que c’était que cette femme? et pourquoi cet enfant? Les gens du pays n’aiment pas qu’il y ait des énigmes sur les étrangers. Ensuite, son vêtement qui était d’un ouvrier, tandis qu’il avait, quoique pas riche, de quoi vivre sans rien faire. Ensuite, son jardin, qu’il réussissait à cultiver et d’où il tirait des pommes de terre malgré les coups d’équinoxe. Ensuite, de gros livres qu’il avait sur une planche, et où il lisait.

D’autres raisons encore.

D’où vient qu’il vivait solitaire? Le Bû de la Rue était une sorte de lazaret; on tenait Gilliatt en quarantaine; c’est pourquoi il était tout simple qu’on s’étonnât de son isolement, et qu’on le rendît responsable de la solitude qu’on faisait autour de lui.

Il n’allait jamais à la chapelle. Il sortait souvent la nuit. Il parlait aux sorciers. Une fois on l’avait vu assis dans l’herbe d’un air étonné. Il hantait le dolmen de l’Ancresse et les pierres fées qui sont dans la campagne çà et là. On croyait être sûr de l’avoir vu saluer poliment la Roque qui Chante. Il achetait tous les oiseaux qu’on lui apportait et les mettait en liberté. Il était honnête aux personnes bourgeoises dans les rues de Saint-Sampson, mais faisait volontiers un détour pour n’y point passer. Il pêchait souvent, et revenait toujours avec du poisson. Il travaillait à son jardin le dimanche. Il avait un bag-pipe, acheté par lui à des soldats écossais de passage à Guernesey, et dont il jouait dans les rochers au bord de la mer, à la nuit tombante. Il faisait des gestes comme un semeur. Que voulez-vous qu’un pays devienne avec un homme comme cela?

Quant aux livres, qui venaient de la femme morte, et où il lisait, ils étaient inquiétants. Le révérend Jaquemin Hérode, recteur de Saint-Sampson, quand il était entré dans la maison pour l’enterrement de la femme, avait lu au dos de ces livres les titres que voici: Dictionnaire de Rosier, Candide, par Voltaire, Avis au peuple sur sa santé, par Tissot. Un gentilhomme français, émigré, retiré à Saint-Sampson, avait dit: Ce doit être le Tissot qui a porté la tête de la princesse De Lamballe.

Le révérend avait remarqué sur un de ces livres ce titre véritablement bourru et menaçant: De Rhubarbaro.

Disons-le pourtant, l'ouvrage étant, comme le titre l'indique, écrit en latin, il était douteux que Gilliatt, qui ne savait pas le latin, lût ce livre.

Mais ce sont précisément les livres qu'un homme ne lit pas qui l'accusent le plus. L'inquisition d'Espagne a jugé ce point et l'a mis hors de doute.

Du reste ce n'était autre chose que le traité du docteur Tilingius sur la Rhubarbe, publié en Allemagne en 1679.

On n'était pas sûr que Gilliatt ne fît des charmes, des philtres et des « bouilleries". Il avait des fioles.

Pourquoi allait-il se promener le soir, et quelquefois jusqu'à minuit, dans les falaises? évidemment pour causer avec les mauvaises gens qui sont la nuit au bord de la mer dans de la fumée.

Une fois il avait aidé la sorcière de Torteval à désembourber son chariot. Une vieille, nommée Moutonne Gahy.

À un recensement qui s'était fait dans l'île, interrogé sur sa profession, il avait répondu: — Pêcheur, quand il y a du poisson à prendre. — Mettez-vous à la place des gens, on n'aime pas ces réponses-là.

La pauvreté et la richesse sont de comparaison. Gilliatt avait des champs et une maison, et, comparé à ceux qui n'ont rien du tout, il n'était pas pauvre. Un jour, pour l'éprouver, et peut-être aussi pour lui faire une avance, car il y a des femmes qui épouseraient le diable riche, une fille dit à Gilliatt: Quand donc prendrez-vous femme? Il répondit: Je prendrai femme quand la Roque qui Chante prendra homme.

Cette Roque qui Chante est une grande pierre plantée droite dans un courtil proche monsieur Lemézurier de Fry. Cette pierre est fort à surveiller. On ne sait ce qu'elle fait là. On y entend chanter un coq qu'on ne voit pas, chose extrêmement désagréable. Ensuite il est avéré qu'elle a été mise dans ce courtil par les sarregousets, qui sont la même chose que les sins.

La nuit, quand il tonne, si l'on voit des hommes voler dans le rouge des nuées et dans le tremblement de l'air, ce sont les sarregousets. Une femme, qui demeure au Grand-Mielles, les connaît. Un soir qu'il y avait des sarregousets dans un carrefour, cette femme cria à un charretier qui ne savait quelle route prendre: Demandez-leur votre chemin; c'est des gens bien faisants, c'est des gens bien civils à deviser au monde. Il y a gros à parier que cette femme est une sorcière.

Le judicieux et savant roi Jacques Ier faisait bouillir toutes vives les femmes de cette espèce, goûtait le bouillon, au goût du bouillon, disait: C'était une sorcière, ou Ce n'en était pas une.

Il est à regretter que les rois d'aujourd'hui n'aient plus de ces talents-là, qui faisaient comprendre l'utilité de l'institution.

Gilliatt, non sans de sérieux motifs, vivait en odeur de sorcellerie. Dans un orage, à minuit, Gilliatt étant en mer seul dans une barque du côté de la Sommeilleuse, on l'entendit demander:

— Y a-t-il du rang pour passer?

Une voix cria du haut des roches:

— Voire! hardi!

À qui parlait-il, si ce n'est à quelqu'un qui lui répondait? Ceci nous semble une preuve.

Dans une autre soirée d'orage, si noire qu'on ne voyait rien, tout près de la Catiau-Roque, qui est une double rangée de roches où les sorciers, les chèvres et les faces vont danser le vendredi, on crut être certain de reconnaître la voix de Gilliatt mêlée à l'épouvantable conversation que voici:

— Comment se porte Vésin Brovard? (C'était un maçon qui était tombé d'un toit.)

— Il guarit.

— Ver dia! il a chu de plus haut que ce grand pau. C'est ravissant qu'il ne se soit rien rompu.

— Les gens eurent beau temps au varech la semaine passée.

— Plus qu'ogny.

— Voire! il n'y aura pas hardi de poisson au marché.

— Il vente trop dur.

— Ils ne sauraient mettre leurs rets bas.

— Comment va la Catherine?

— Elle est de charme.

«La Catherine" était évidemment une sarregousette.

Gilliatt, selon toute apparence, faisait œuvre de nuit. Du moins, personne n'en doutait.

On le voyait quelquefois, avec une cruche qu'il avait, verser de l'eau à terre. Or l'eau qu'on jette à terre trace la forme des diables.

Il existe sur la route de Saint-Sampson, vis-à-vis le martello numéro I, trois pierres arrangées en escalier. Elles ont porté sur leur plate-forme, vide aujourd'hui, une croix, à moins qu'elles n'aient porté un gibet. Ces pierres sont très malignes.

Des gens fort prud'hommes et des personnes absolument croyables affirmaient avoir vu, près de ces pierres, Gilliatt causer avec un crapaud. Or il n'y a pas de crapauds à Guernesey; Guernesey a toutes les couleuvres, et Jersey a tous les crapauds. Ce crapaud avait dû venir de Jersey à la nage pour parler à Gilliatt. La conversation était amicale.

Ces faits demeurèrent constatés; et la preuve, c'est que les trois pierres sont encore là. Les gens qui douteraient peuvent les aller voir; et même, à peu de distance, il y a une maison au coin de laquelle on lit cette enseigne: Marchand en bétail mort et vivant, vieux cordages, fer, os et chiques; est prompt dans son paiement et dans son attention.

Il faudrait être de mauvaise foi pour contester la présence de ces pierres et l'existence de cette maison. Tout cela nuisait à Gilliatt.

Les ignorants seuls ignorent que le plus grand danger des mers de la Manche, c'est le roi des Auxcriniers. Pas de personnage marin plus redoutable. Qui l'a vu fait naufrage entre une Saint-Michel et l'autre. Il est petit, étant nain, et il est sourd, étant roi. Il sait les noms de tous ceux qui sont morts dans la mer et l'endroit où ils sont. Il connaît à fond le cimetière océan. Une tête massive en bas et étroite en haut, un corps trapu, un ventre visqueux et difforme, des nodosités sur le crâne, de courtes jambes, de longs bras, pour pieds des nageoires, pour mains des griffes, un large visage vert, tel est ce roi. Ses griffes sont palmées et ses nageoires sont onglées. Qu'on imagine un poisson qui est un spectre, et qui a une figure d'homme. Pour en finir avec lui, il faudrait l'exorciser, ou le pêcher. En attendant, il est sinistre. Rien n'est moins rassurant que de l'apercevoir. On entrevoit, au-dessus des lames et des houles, derrière les épaisseurs de la brume, un linéament qui est un être; un front bas, un nez camard, des oreilles plates, une bouche démesurée où il manque des dents, un rictus glauque, des sourcils en chevrons, et de gros yeux gais. Il est rouge quand l'éclair est livide, et blafard quand l'éclair est pourpre. Il a une barbe ruisselante et rigide qui s'étale, coupée carrément, sur une membrane en forme de pèlerine, laquelle est ornée de quatorze coquilles, sept par devant et sept par derrière. Ces coquilles sont extraordinaires pour ceux qui se connaissent en coquilles. Le roi des Auxcriniers n'est visible que dans la mer violente. Il est le baladin lugubre de la tempête. On voit sa forme s’ébaucher dans le brouillard, dans la rafale, dans la pluie. Son nombril est hideux. Une carapace de squames lui cache les côtes, comme ferait un gilet. Il se dresse debout au haut de ces vagues roulées qui jaillissent sous la pression des souffles et se tordent comme les copeaux sortant du rabot du menuisier. Il se tient tout entier hors de l’écume, et, s’il y a à l’horizon des navires en détresse, blême dans l’ombre, la face éclairée de la lueur d’un vague sourire, l’air fou et terrible, il danse. C’est là une vilaine rencontre. À l’époque où Gilliatt était une des préoccupations de Saint-Sampson, les dernières personnes qui avaient vu le roi des Auxcriniers déclaraient qu’il n’avait plus à sa pèlerine que treize coquilles. Treize; il n’en était que plus dangereux. Mais qu’était devenue la quatorzième? L’avait-il donnée à quelqu’un? Et à qui l’avait-il donnée? Nul ne pouvait le dire, et l’on se bornait à conjecturer. Ce qui est certain, c’est que M. Lupin-Mabier, du lieu les Godaines, homme ayant de la surface, propriétaire taxé à quatre-vingts quartiers, était prêt à jurer sous serment qu’il avait vu une fois dans les mains de Gilliatt une coquille très singulière.

Il n’était point rare d’entendre de ces dialogues entre deux paysans:

— N’est-ce pas, mon voisin, que j’ai là un beau bœuf?

— Bouffi, mon voisin.

— Tiens, c’est vrai tout de même.

— Il est meilleur en suif qu’il n’est en viande.

— Ver dia!

— Êtes-vous certain que Gilliatt ne l’a point regardé?

Gilliatt s’arrêtait au bord des champs près des laboureurs et au bord des jardins près des jardiniers, et il lui arrivait de leur dire des paroles mystérieuses: — Quand le mors du diable fleurit, moissonnez le seigle d’hiver.

(Parenthèse: le mors du diable, c’est la scabieuse.)

— Le frêne se feuille, il ne gèlera plus.

— Solstice d’été, chardon en fleur.

— S’il ne pleut pas en juin, les blés prendront le blanc. Craignez la nielle.

— Le merisier fait ses grappes, méfiez-vous de la pleine lune.

— Si le temps, le sixième jour de la lune, se comporte comme le quatrième ou comme le cinquième jour, il se comportera de même, neuf fois sur douze dans le premier cas, et onze fois sur douze dans le second, pendant toute la lune.

— Ayez l'œil sur les voisins en procès avec vous. Prenez garde aux malices. Un cochon, à qui on fait boire du lait chaud, crève. Une vache, à qui on frotte les dents avec du poireau, ne mange plus.

— L'éperlan fraye, gare les fièvres.

— La grenouille se montre, semez les melons.

— L'hépatique fleurit, semez l'orge.

— Le tilleul fleurit, fauchez les prés.

— L'ypréau fleurit, ouvrez les bâches.

— Le tabac fleurit, fermez les serres.

Et, chose terrible, si l'on suivait ses conseils, on s'en trouvait bien.

Une nuit de juin qu'il joua du bug-pipe dans la dune, du côté de la Demie de Fontenelle, la pêche aux maquereaux manqua.

Un soir, à la marée basse, sur la grève en face de sa maison du Bû de la Rue, une charrette chargée de varech versa. Il eut probablement peur d'être traduit en justice, car il se donna beaucoup de peine pour aider à relever la charrette, et il la rechargea lui-même.

Une petite fille du voisinage ayant des poux, il était allé à Saint-Pierre-Port, était revenu avec un onguent, et en avait frotté l'enfant; et Gilliatt lui avait ôté ses poux, ce qui prouve que Gilliatt les lui avait donnés.

Tout le monde sait qu'il y a un charme pour donner des poux aux personnes.

Gilliatt passait pour regarder les puits, ce qui est dangereux quand le regard est mauvais; et le fait est qu'un jour, aux Arculons, près Saint-Pierre-Port, l'eau d'un puits devint malsaine. La bonne femme à qui était le puits dit à Gilliatt: Voyez donc cette eau. Et elle lui en montra un plein verre. Gilliatt avoua. — L'eau est épaisse, dit-il; c'est vrai. La bonne femme, qui se méfiait, lui dit: Guérissez-moi-la donc. Gilliatt lui fit des questions: — si elle avait une étable? — si l'étable avait un égout? — si le ruisseau de l'égout ne passait pas tout près du puits? — La bonne femme répondit oui. Gilliatt entra dans l'étable, travailla à l'égout, détourna le ruisseau, et l'eau du puits redevint bonne. On pensa dans le pays ce qu'on voulut. Un puits n'est pas mauvais, et ensuite bon, sans motif; on ne trouva point la maladie de ce puits naturelle, et il est difficile de ne pas croire en effet que Gilliatt avait jeté un sort à cette eau.

Une fois qu'il était allé à Jersey, on remarqua qu'il s'était logé à Saint-Clément, rue des Alleurs. Les alleurs, ce sont les revenants.

Dans les villages, on recueille des indices sur un homme; on rapproche ces indices; le total fait une réputation.

Il arriva que Gilliatt fut surpris saignant du nez. Ceci parut grave. Un patron de barque, fort voyageur, qui avait presque fait le tour du monde, affirma que chez les Tungouses tous les sorciers saignent du nez. Quand on voit un homme saigner du nez, on sait à quoi s'en tenir. Toutefois les gens raisonnables firent remarquer que ce qui caractérise les sorciers en Tungousie peut ne point les caractériser au même degré à Guernesey.

Aux environs d'une Saint-Michel, on le vit s'arrêter dans un pré des courtils des Huriaux, bordant la grande route des Videclins. Il siffla dans le pré, et un moment après il y vint un corbeau, et un moment après il y vint une pie. Le fait fut attesté par un homme notable, qui a depuis été douzenier dans la Douzaine autorisée à faire un nouveau livre de Perchage du fief le Roi.

Au Hamel, dans la vingtaine de l'Épine, il y avait des vieilles femmes qui disaient être sûres d'avoir entendu un matin, à la piperette du jour, des hirondelles appeler Gilliatt.

Ajoutez qu'il n'était pas bon.

Un jour, un pauvre homme battait un âne. L'âne n'avançait pas. Le pauvre homme lui donna quelques coups de sabot dans le ventre, et l'âne tomba. Gilliatt accourut pour relever l'âne, l'âne était mort. Gilliatt souffleta le pauvre homme.

Un autre jour, voyant un garçon descendre d'un arbre avec une couvée de petits épluque-pommiers nouveau-nés, presque sans plumes et tout nus, Gilliatt prit cette couvée à ce garçon, et poussa la méchanceté jusqu'à la reporter dans l'arbre.

Des passants lui en firent des reproches, il se borna à montrer le père et la mère épluque-pommiers qui criaient au-dessus de l'arbre et qui revenaient à leur couvée. Il avait un faible pour les oiseaux. C'est un signe auquel on reconnaît généralement les magiciens.

Les enfants ont pour joie de dénicher les nids de goëlands et de mauves dans les falaises. Ils en rapportent des quantités d'œufs bleus, jaunes et verts avec lesquels on fait des rosaces sur les devantures des cheminées. Comme les falaises sont à pic, quelquefois le pied leur glisse, ils tombent, et se tuent. Rien n'est joli comme les paravents décorés d'œufs d'oiseaux de mer.

Gilliatt ne savait qu’inventer pour faire le mal. Il grimpait, au péril de sa propre vie, dans les escarpements des roches marines, et y accrochait des bottes de foin avec de vieux chapeaux et toutes sortes d’épouvantails, afin d’empêcher les oiseaux d’y nicher, et, par conséquent, les enfants d’y aller.

C’est pourquoi Gilliatt était à peu près haï dans le pays. On le serait à moins.

Autres côtés louches de Gilliatt

L’opinion n’était pas bien fixée sur le compte de Gilliatt.

Généralement on le croyait marcou, quelques-uns allaient jusqu’à le croire cambion. Le cambion est le fils qu’une femme a du diable.

Quand une femme a d’un homme sept enfants mâles consécutifs, le septième est marcou. Mais il ne faut pas qu’une fille gâte la série des garçons.

Le marcou a une fleur de lys naturelle empreinte sur une partie quelconque du corps, ce qui fait qu’il guérit les écrouelles aussi bien que les rois de France. Il y a des marcous en France un peu partout, particulièrement dans l’Orléanais. Chaque village du Gâtinais a son marcou. Il suffit, pour guérir les malades, que le marcou souffle sur leurs plaies ou leur fasse toucher sa fleur de lys. La chose réussit surtout dans la nuit du vendredi saint. Il y a une dizaine d’années, le marcou d’Ormes en Gâtinais, surnommé le Beau Marcou et consulté de toute la Beauce, était un tonnelier appelé Foulon, qui avait cheval et voiture. On dut, pour empêcher ses miracles, faire jouer la gendarmerie. Il avait la fleur de lys sous le sein gauche. D’autres marcous l’ont ailleurs.

Il y a des marcous à Jersey, à Aurigny et à Guernesey. Cela tient sans doute aux droits que la France a sur le duché de Normandie. Autrement, à quoi bon la fleur de lys?

Il y a aussi dans les îles de la Manche des scrofuleux; ce qui rend les marcous nécessaires.

Quelques personnes s’étant trouvées présentes un jour que Gilliatt se baignait dans la mer avaient cru lui voir la fleur de lys. Questionné là-dessus, il s’était, pour toute réponse, mis à rire. Car il riait comme les autres hommes, quelquefois. Depuis ce temps-là, on ne le voyait plus se baigner; il ne se baignait que dans des lieux périlleux et solitaires. Probablement la nuit, au clair de lune; chose, on en conviendra, suspecte.

Ceux qui s’obstinaient à le croire cambion, c’est-à-dire fils du diable, se trompaient évidemment. Ils auraient dû savoir qu’il n’y a guère de cambions qu’en Allemagne. Mais le Valle et Saint-Sampson étaient, il y a cinquante ans, des pays d’ignorance.

Croire, à Guernesey, quelqu’un fils du diable, il y a visiblement là de l’exagération.

Gilliatt, par cela même qu’il inquiétait, était consulté. Les paysans venaient, avec peur, lui parler de leurs maladies. Cette peur-là contient de la confiance; et, dans la campagne, plus le médecin est suspect, plus le remède est sûr. Gilliatt avait des médicaments à lui, qu’il tenait de la vieille femme morte; il en faisait part à qui les lui demandait, et ne voulait pas recevoir d’argent. Il guérissait les panaris avec des applications d’herbes; la liqueur d’une de ses fioles coupait la fièvre; le chimiste de Saint-Sampson, que nous appellerions pharmacien en France, pensait que c’était une décoction de quinquina. Les moins bienveillants convenaient volontiers que Gilliatt était assez bon diable pour les malades quand il s’agissait de ses remèdes ordinaires; mais, comme marcou, il ne voulait rien entendre; si un scrofuleux lui demandait à toucher sa fleur de lys, pour toute réponse il lui fermait sa porte au nez; faire des miracles était une chose à laquelle il se refusait obstinément, ce qui est ridicule à un sorcier. Ne soyez pas sorcier; mais, si vous l’êtes, faites votre métier.

Il y avait une ou deux exceptions à l’antipathie universelle. Sieur Landoys, du Clos-Landès, était clerc greffier de la paroisse de Saint-Pierre-Port, chargé des écritures et gardien du registre des naissances, mariages et décès. Ce greffier Landoys tirait vanité de descendre du trésorier de Bretagne Pierre Landais, pendu en 1485. Un jour sieur Landoys poussa son bain trop avant dans la mer, et faillit se noyer. Gilliatt se jeta à l’eau, faillit se noyer lui aussi, et sauva Landoys. À partir de ce jour, Landoys ne dit plus de mal de Gilliatt. À ceux qui s’en étonnaient, il répondait: Pourquoi voulez-vous que je déteste un homme qui ne m’a rien fait, et qui m’a rendu service? Le clerc greffier en vint même à prendre Gilliatt en une certaine amitié. Ce clerc greffier était un homme sans préjugés. Il ne croyait pas aux sorciers. Il riait de ceux qui ont peur des revenants. Quant à lui, il avait un bateau, il pêchait dans ses heures de loisir pour s’amuser, et il n’avait jamais rien vu d’extraordinaire, si ce n’est une fois au clair de lune une femme blanche qui sautait sur l’eau, et encore il n’en était pas bien sûr. Moutonne Gahy, la sorcière de Torteval, lui avait donné un petit sac qu’on s’attache sous la cravate et qui protège contre les esprits; il se moquait de ce sac, et ne savait ce qu’il contenait; pourtant il le portait, se sentant plus en sûreté quand il avait cette chose au cou.

Quelques personnes hardies se risquaient, à la suite du sieur Landoys, à constater en Gilliatt certaines circonstances atténuantes, quelques apparences de qualités, sa sobriété, son abstinence de gin et de tabac, et l’on en venait parfois jusqu’à faire de lui ce bel éloge: Il ne boit, ne fume, ne chique, ni ne snuffe.

Mais être sobre, ce n’est une qualité que lorsqu’on en a d’autres.

L’aversion publique était sur Gilliatt.

Quoi qu’il en fût, comme marcou, Gilliatt pouvait rendre des services. Un certain vendredi saint, à minuit, jour et heure usités pour ces sortes de cures, tous les scrofuleux de l’île, d’inspiration ou par rendez-vous pris entre eux, vinrent en foule au Bû de la Rue, à mains jointes, et avec des plaies pitoyables, demander à Gilliatt de les guérir. Il refusa. On reconnut là sa méchanceté.

VI

La panse

Tel était Gilliatt.

Les filles le trouvaient laid.

Il n’était pas laid. Il était beau peut-être. Il avait dans le profil quelque chose d’un barbare antique. Au repos, il ressemblait à un dace de la colonne trajane. Son oreille était petite, délicate, sans lambeau, et d’une admirable forme acoustique. Il avait entre les deux yeux cette fière ride verticale de l’homme hardi et persévérant. Les deux coins de sa bouche tombaient, ce qui est amer; son front était d’une courbe noble et sereine; sa prunelle franche regardait bien, quoique troublée par ce clignement que donne aux pêcheurs la réverbération des vagues. Son rire était puéril et charmant. Pas de plus pur ivoire que ses dents. Mais le hâle l’avait fait presque nègre. On ne se mêle pas impunément à l’océan, à la tempête et à la nuit; à trente ans, il en paraissait quarante-cinq. Il avait le sombre masque du vent et de la mer.

On l’avait surnommé Gilliatt le Malin.

Une fable de l’Inde dit: Un jour Brahmâ demanda à la Force: Qui est plus fort que toi? Elle répondit: l’Adresse. Un proverbe chinois dit: Que ne pourrait le lion, s’il était singe! Gilliatt n’était ni lion, ni singe; mais les choses qu’il faisait venaient à l’appui du proverbe chinois et de la fable indoue. De taille ordinaire et de force ordinaire, il trouvait moyen, tant sa dextérité était inventive et puissante, de soulever des fardeaux de géant et d’accomplir des prodiges d’athlète.

Il y avait en lui du gymnaste; il se servait indifféremment de sa main droite et de sa main gauche.

Il ne chassait pas, mais il pêchait. Il épargnait les oiseaux, non les poissons. Malheur aux muets! Il était nageur excellent.

La solitude fait des gens à talents ou des idiots. Gilliatt s’offrait sous ces deux aspects. Par moments on lui voyait « l’air étonné” dont nous avons parlé, et on l’eût pris pour une brute. Dans d’autres instants, il avait on ne sait quel regard profond. L’antique Chaldée a eu de ces hommes-là; à de certaines heures, l’opacité du pâtre devenait transparente et laissait voir le mage.

En somme, ce n’était qu’un pauvre homme sachant lire et écrire. Il est probable qu’il était sur la limite qui sépare le songeur du penseur. Le penseur veut, le songeur subit. La solitude s’ajoute aux simples, et les complique d’une certaine façon. Ils se pénètrent à leur insu d’horreur sacrée. L’ombre où était l’esprit de Gilliatt se composait, en quantité presque égale, de deux éléments obscurs tous deux, mais bien différents: en lui, l’ignorance, infirmité; hors de lui, le mystère, immensité.

À force de grimper dans les rochers, d’escalader les escarpements, d’aller et de venir dans l’archipel par tous les temps, de manœuvrer la première embarcation venue, de se risquer jour et nuit dans les passes les plus difficiles, il était devenu, sans en tirer parti du reste, et pour sa fantaisie et son plaisir, un homme de mer surprenant.

Il était pilote né. Le vrai pilote est le marin qui navigue sur le fond plus encore que sur la surface. La vague est un problème extérieur, continuellement compliqué par la configuration sous-marine des lieux où le navire fait route. Il semblait, à voir Gilliatt voguer sur les bas-fonds et à travers les récifs de l’archipel normand, qu’il eût sous la voûte du crâne une carte du fond de la mer. Il savait tout et bravait tout.

Il connaissait les balises mieux que les cormorans qui s’y perchent. Les différences imperceptibles qui distinguent l’une de l’autre les quatre balises poteaux du Creux, d’Alligande, des Trémies et de la Sardrette étaient parfaitement nettes et claires pour lui, même dans le brouillard. Il n’hésitait ni sur le pieu à pomme ovale d’Anfré, ni sur le triple fer de lance de la Rousse, ni sur la boule blanche de la Corbette, ni sur la boule noire de Longue-Pierre, et il n’était pas à craindre qu’il confondît la croix de Goubeau avec l’épée plantée en terre de la Platte, ni la balise marteau des Barbées avec la balise queue d’aronde du Moulinet.

Sa rare science de matelot éclata singulièrement un jour qu’il y eut à Guernesey une de ces sortes de joutes marines qu’on nomme régates. La question était celle-ci: être seul dans une embarcation à quatre voiles, la conduire de Saint-Sampson à l’île de Herm qui est à une lieue, et la ramener de Herm à Saint-Sampson. Manœuvrer seul un bateau à quatre voiles, il n’est pas de pêcheur qui ne fasse cela, et la difficulté ne semble pas grande, mais voici ce qui l’aggravait. Premièrement, l’embarcation elle-même, laquelle était une de ces larges et fortes chaloupes ventrues d’autrefois, à la mode de Rotterdam, que les marins du siècle dernier appelaient des panses hollandaises. On rencontre encore quelquefois en mer cet ancien gabarit de Hollande, joufflu et plat, et ayant à bâbord et à tribord deux ailes qui s’abattent, tantôt l’une, tantôt l’autre, selon le vent, et remplacent la quille. Deuxièmement, le retour de Herm; retour qui se compliquait d’un lourd lest de pierres. On allait à vide, mais on revenait chargé. Le prix de la joute était la chaloupe. Elle était d’avance donnée au vainqueur. Cette panse avait servi de bateau-pilote; le pilote qui l’avait montée et conduite pendant vingt ans était le plus robuste des marins de la Manche; à sa mort on n’avait trouvé personne pour gouverner la panse, et l’on s’était décidé à en faire le prix d’une régate. La panse, quoique non pontée, avait des qualités, et pouvait tenter un manœuvrier. Elle était mâtée en avant, ce qui augmentait la puissance de traction de la voilure. Autre avantage, le mât ne gênait point le chargement. C’était une coque solide; pesante, mais vaste, et tenant bien le large; une vraie barque commère. Il y eut empressement à se la disputer; la joute était rude, mais le prix était beau. Sept ou huit pêcheurs, les plus vigoureux de l’île, se présentèrent. Ils essayèrent tour à tour; pas un ne put aller jusqu’à Herm. Le dernier qui lutta était connu pour avoir franchi à la rame par un gros temps le redoutable étranglement de mer qui est entre Serk et Brecq-Hou. Ruisselant de sueur, il ramena la panse et dit: C’est impossible. Alors Gilliatt entra dans la barque, empoigna d’abord l’aviron, ensuite la grande écoute, et poussa au large. Puis, sans bitter l’écoute, ce qui eût été une imprudence, et sans la lâcher, ce qui le maintenait maître de la grande voile, laissant l’écoute rouler sur l’estrop au gré du vent, sans dériver, il saisit de la main gauche la barre. En trois quarts d’heure, il fut à Herm. Trois heures après, quoiqu’un fort vent du sud se fût élevé et eût pris la rade en travers, la panse, montée par Gilliatt, rentrait à Saint-Sampson avec le chargement de pierres. Il avait, par luxe et bravade, ajouté au chargement le petit canon de bronze de Herm, que les gens de l’île tiraient tous les ans le 5 novembre en réjouissance de la mort de Guy Fawkes.

Guy Fawkes, disons-le en passant, est mort il y a deux cent soixante ans; c’est là une longue joie.

Gilliatt, ainsi surchargé et surmené, quoiqu’il eût de trop le canon de Guy Fawkes dans sa barque et le vent du sud dans sa voile, ramena, on pourrait dire rapporta, la panse à Saint-Sampson.

Ce que voyant, mess Lethierry s’écria: Voilà un matelot hardi!

Et il tendit la main à Gilliatt.

Nous reparlerons de mess Lethierry.

La panse fut adjugée à Gilliatt.

Cette aventure ne nuisit pas à son surnom de Malin.

Quelques personnes déclarèrent que la chose n’avait rien d’étonnant, attendu que Gilliatt avait caché dans le bateau une branche de mélier sauvage. Mais cela ne put être prouvé.

À partir de ce jour, Gilliatt n’eut plus d’autre embarcation que la panse. C’est dans cette lourde barque qu’il allait à la pêche. Il l’amarrait dans le très bon petit mouillage qu’il avait pour lui tout seul sous le mur même de sa maison du Bû de la Rue. À la tombée de la nuit, il jetait ses filets sur son dos, traversait son jardin, enjambait le parapet de pierres sèches, dégringolait d’une roche à l’autre, et sautait dans la panse. De là au large.

Il pêchait beaucoup de poisson, mais on affirmait que la branche de mélier était toujours attachée à son bateau. Le mélier, c’est le néflier. Personne n’avait vu cette branche, mais tout le monde y croyait.

Le poisson qu’il avait de trop, il ne le vendait pas, il le donnait.

Les pauvres recevaient son poisson, mais lui en voulaient pourtant, à cause de cette branche de mélier. Cela ne se fait pas. On ne doit point tricher la mer.

Il était pêcheur, mais il n’était pas que cela. Il avait, d’instinct et pour se distraire, appris trois ou quatre métiers. Il était menuisier, ferron, charron, calfat, et même un peu mécanicien. Personne ne raccommodait une roue comme lui. Il fabriquait dans un genre à lui tous ses engins de pêche. Il avait dans un coin du Bû de la Rue une petite forge et une enclume, et, la panse n’ayant qu’une ancre, il lui en avait fait, lui-même et lui seul, une seconde. Cette ancre était excellente; l’organeau avait la force voulue, et Gilliatt, sans que personne le lui eût enseigné, avait trouvé la dimension exacte que doit avoir le jouail pour empêcher l’ancre de cabaner.

Il avait patiemment remplacé tous les clous du bordage de la panse par des gournables, ce qui rendait les trous de rouille impossibles.

De cette manière il avait beaucoup augmenté les bonnes qualités de mer de la panse. Il en profitait pour s’en aller de temps en temps passer un mois ou deux dans quelque îlot solitaire comme Chousey ou les Casquets. On disait: Tiens, Gilliatt n’est plus là. Cela ne faisait de peine à personne.

VII

À maison visionnée habitant visionnaire

Gilliatt était l’homme du songe. De là ses audaces, de là aussi ses timidités. Il avait ses idées à lui.

Peut-être y avait-il en Gilliatt de l’halluciné et de l’illuminé. L’hallucination hante tout aussi bien un paysan comme Martin qu’un roi comme Henri IV. L’Inconnu fait parfois à l’esprit de l’homme des surprises. Une brusque déchirure de l’ombre laisse tout à coup voir l’invisible, puis se referme. Ces visions sont quelquefois transfiguratrices; elles font d’un chamelier Mahomet et d’une chevrière Jeanne d’Arc. La solitude dégage une certaine quantité d’égarement sublime. C’est la fumée du buisson ardent. Il en résulte un mystérieux tremblement d’idées qui dilate le docteur en voyant et le poëte en prophète; il en résulte Horeb, le Cédron, Ombos, les ivresses du laurier de Castalie mâché, les révélations du mois Busion; il en résulte Péléïa à Dodone, Phémonoë à Delphes, Trophonius à Lébadée, Ézéchiel sur le Kébar, Jérôme dans la Thébaïde. Le plus souvent l’état visionnaire accable l’homme et le stupéfie. L’abrutissement sacré existe. Le fakir a pour fardeau sa vision comme le crétin son goître. Luther parlant aux diables dans le grenier de Wittemberg, Pascal masquant l’enfer avec le paravent de son cabinet, l’obi nègre dialoguant avec le dieu Bossum à face blanche, c’est le même phénomène, diversement porté par les cerveaux qu’il traverse, selon leur force et leur dimension. Luther et Pascal sont et restent grands; l’obi est imbécile.

Gilliatt n’était ni si haut, ni si bas. C’était un pensif. Rien de plus.

Il voyait la nature un peu étrangement.

De ce qu’il lui était arrivé plusieurs fois de trouver dans de l’eau de mer parfaitement limpide d’assez gros animaux inattendus, de formes diverses, de l’espèce méduse, qui, hors de l’eau, ressemblaient à du cristal mou, et qui, rejetés dans l’eau, s’y confondaient avec leur milieu, par l’identité de diaphanéité et de couleur, au point d’y disparaître, il concluait que, puisque des transparences vivantes habitaient l’eau, d’autres transparences, également vivantes, pouvaient bien habiter l’air. Les oiseaux ne sont pas les habitants de l’air; ils en sont les amphibies. Gilliatt ne croyait pas à l’air désert. Il disait: Puisque la mer est remplie, pourquoi l’atmosphère serait-elle vide? Des créatures couleur d’air s’effaceraient dans la lumière et échapperaient à notre regard; qui nous prouve qu’il n’y en a pas? L’analogie indique que l’air doit avoir ses poissons comme la mer a les siens; ces poissons de l’air seraient diaphanes, bienfait de la prévoyance créatrice pour nous comme pour eux; laissant passer le jour à travers leur forme et ne faisant point d’ombre et n’ayant pas de silhouette, ils resteraient ignorés de nous, et nous n’en pourrions rien saisir. Gilliatt imaginait que si l’on pouvait mettre la terre à sec d’atmosphère, et que si l’on pêchait l’air comme on pêche un étang, on y trouverait une foule d’êtres surprenants. Et, ajoutait-il dans sa rêverie, bien des choses s’expliqueraient.

La rêverie, qui est la pensée à l’état de nébuleuse, confine au sommeil, et s’en préoccupe comme de sa frontière. L’air habité par des transparences vivantes, ce serait le commencement de l’inconnu; mais au delà s’offre la vaste ouverture du possible. Là d’autres êtres, là d’autres faits. Aucun surnaturalisme; mais la continuation occulte de la nature infinie. Gilliatt, dans ce désœuvrement laborieux qui était son existence, était un bizarre observateur. Il allait jusqu’à observer le sommeil. Le sommeil est en contact avec le possible, que nous nommons aussi l’invraisemblable. Le monde nocturne est un monde. La nuit, en tant que nuit, est un univers. L’organisme matériel humain sur lequel pèse une colonne atmosphérique de quinze lieues de haut, est fatigué le soir, il tombe de lassitude, il se couche, il se repose; les yeux de chair se ferment; alors dans cette tête assoupie, moins inerte qu’on ne croit, d’autres yeux s’ouvrent; l’Inconnu apparaît. Les choses sombres du monde ignoré deviennent voisines de l’homme, soit qu’il y ait communication véritable, soit que les lointains de l’abîme aient un grossissement visionnaire; il semble que les vivants indistincts de l’espace viennent nous regarder et qu’ils aient une curiosité de nous, les vivants terrestres; une création fantôme monte ou descend vers nous et nous côtoie dans un crépuscule; devant notre contemplation spectrale, une vie autre que la nôtre s’agrège et se désagrège, composée de nous-mêmes et d’autre chose; et le dormeur, pas tout à fait voyant, pas tout à fait inconscient, entrevoit ces animalités étranges, ces végétations extraordinaires, ces lividités terribles ou souriantes, ces larves, ces masques, ces figures, ces hydres, ces confusions, ce clair de lune sans lune, ces obscures décompositions du prodige, ces croissances et ces décroissances dans une épaisseur trouble, ces flottaisons de formes dans les ténèbres, tout ce mystère que nous appelons le songe et qui n'est autre chose que l'approche d'une réalité invisible. Le rêve est l'aquarium de la nuit.

Ainsi songeait Gilliatt.

VIII

LA CHAISE GILD-HOLM-’UR

Ce serait vainement qu’on chercherait aujourd’hui, dans l’anse du Houmet, la maison de Gilliatt, son jardin, et la crique où il abritait la panse. Le Bû de la Rue n’existe plus. La petite presqu’île qui portait cette maison est tombée sous le pic des démolisseurs de falaises et a été chargée, charretée à charretée, sur les navires des brocanteurs de rochers et des marchands de granit. Elle est devenue quai, église et palais, dans la capitale. Toute cette crête d’écueils est depuis longtemps partie pour Londres.

Ces allongements de rochers dans la mer, avec leurs crevasses et leurs dentelures, sont de vraies petites chaînes de montagnes; on a, en les voyant, l’impression qu’aurait un géant regardant les Cordillères. L’idiome local les appelle Banques. Ces banques ont des figures diverses. Les unes ressemblent à une épine dorsale, chaque rocher est une vertèbre; les autres à une arête de poisson; les autres à un crocodile qui boit.

À l’extrémité de la banque du Bû de la Rue, il y avait une grande roche que les pêcheurs du Houmet appelaient la Corne de la Bête. Cette roche, sorte de Pyramide, ressemblait, quoique moins élevée, au pinacle de Jersey. À marée haute, le flot la séparait de la banque, et la Corne était isolée. À marée basse, on y arrivait par un isthme de roches praticables. La curiosité de ce rocher, c’était, du côté de la mer, une sorte de chaise naturelle creusée par la vague et polie par la pluie. Cette chaise était traître. On y était insensiblement amené par la beauté de la vue; on s’y arrêtait « pour l’amour du prospect”, comme on dit à Guernesey; quelque chose vous retenait; il y a un charme dans les grands horizons. Cette chaise s’offrait; elle faisait une sorte de niche dans la façade à pic du rocher; grimper à cette niche était facile, la mer qui l’avait taillée dans le roc avait étagé au-dessous et commodément disposé une sorte d’escalier de pierres plates; l’abîme a de ces prévenances, défiez-vous de ses politesses; la chaise tentait, on y montait, on s’y asseyait; là on était à l’aise; pour siège le granit usé et arrondi par l’écume, pour accoudoirs deux anfractuosités qui semblaient faites exprès, pour dossier toute la haute muraille verticale du rocher qu’on admirait au-dessus de sa tête sans penser à se dire qu’il serait impossible de l’escalader; rien de plus simple que de s’oublier dans ce fauteuil; on découvrait toute la mer, on voyait au loin les navires arriver ou s’en aller, on pouvait suivre des yeux une voile jusqu’à ce qu’elle s’enfonçât au delà des Casquets sous la rondeur de l’océan, on s’émerveillait, on regardait, on jouissait, on sentait la caresse de la brise et du flot; il existe à Cayenne un vespertilio, sachant ce qu’il fait, qui vous endort dans l’ombre avec un doux et ténébreux battement d’ailes; le vent est cette chauve-souris invisible; quand il n’est pas ravageur, il est endormeur. On contemplait la mer, on écoutait le vent, on se sentait gagner par l’assoupissement de l’extase. Quand les yeux sont remplis d’un excès de beauté et de lumière, c’est une volupté de les fermer. Tout à coup on se réveillait. Il était trop tard. La marée avait grossi peu à peu. L’eau enveloppait le rocher.

On était perdu.

Redoutable blocus que celui-ci: la mer montante.

La marée croît insensiblement d’abord, puis violemment. Arrivée aux rochers, la colère la prend, elle écume. Nager ne réussit pas toujours dans les brisants. D’excellents nageurs s’étaient noyés à la corne du Bû de la Rue.

En de certains lieux, à de certaines heures, regarder la mer est un poison. C’est comme, quelquefois, regarder une femme.

Les très anciens habitants de Guernesey appelaient jadis cette niche façonnée dans le roc par le flot la chaise Gild-Holm-’Ur, ou kidormur . Mot celte, dit-on, que ceux qui savent le celte ne comprennent pas et que ceux qui savent le français comprennent. Qui-dort-meurt. telle est la traduction paysanne.

On est libre de choisir entre cette traduction, Qui-dort-meurt, et la traduction donnée en 1819, je crois, dans l’armoricain , par M. Athénas. Selon cet honorable celtisant, Gild-Holm-’Ur signifierait halte-de-troupes-d’oiseaux.

Il existe à Aurigny une autre chaise de ce genre, qu’on nomme la Chaise-au-Moine, si bien confectionnée par le flot, et avec une saillie de roche ajustée si à propos, qu’on pourrait dire que la mer a la complaisance de vous mettre un tabouret sous les pieds.

Au plein de la mer, à la marée haute, on n’apercevait plus la chaise Gild-Holm-’Ur. L’eau la couvrait entièrement.

La chaise Gild-Holm-’Ur était la voisine du Bû de la Rue. Gilliatt la connaissait et s’y asseyait. Il venait souvent là. Méditait-il? Non. Nous venons de le dire, il songeait. Il ne se laissait pas surprendre par la marée.

MESS LETHIERRY

I

Vie agitée et conscience tranquille

Mess Lethierry, l’homme notable de saint-Sampson, était un matelot terrible. Il avait beaucoup navigué. Il avait été mousse, voilier, gabier, timonier, contre-maître, maître d’équipage, pilote, patron. Il était maintenant armateur. Il n’y avait pas un autre homme comme lui pour savoir la mer. Il était intrépide aux sauvetages. Dans les gros temps il s’en allait le long de la grève, regardant à l’horizon. Qu’est-ce que c’est que ça là-bas? Il y a quelqu’un en peine. C’est un chasse-marée de Weymouth, c’est un coutre d’Aurigny, c’est une bisquine de Courseulle, c’est le yacht d’un lord, c’est un anglais, c’est un français, c’est un pauvre, c’est un riche, c’est le diable, n’importe, il sautait dans une barque, appelait deux ou trois vaillants hommes, s’en passait au besoin, faisait l’équipe à lui tout seul, détachait l’amarre, prenait la rame, poussait en haute mer, montait et descendait et remontait dans les creux du flot, plongeait dans l’ouragan, allait au danger. On le voyait ainsi de loin dans la rafale, debout sur l’embarcation, ruisselant de pluie, mêlé aux éclairs, avec la face d’un lion qui aurait une crinière d’écume. Il passait quelquefois ainsi toute sa journée dans le risque, dans la vague, dans la grêle, dans le vent, accostant les navires en perdition, sauvant les hommes, sauvant les chargements, cherchant dispute à la tempête. Le soir il rentrait chez lui et tricotait une paire de bas.

Il mena cette vie cinquante ans, de dix ans à soixante, tant qu’il fut jeune. À soixante ans il s’aperçut qu’il ne levait plus d’un seul bras l’enclume de la forge du varclin; cette enclume pesait trois cents livres; et tout à coup il fut fait prisonnier par les rhumatismes. Il lui fallut renoncer à la mer. Alors il passa de l’âge héroïque à l’âge patriarcal. Ce ne fut plus qu’un bonhomme.

Il était arrivé en même temps aux rhumatismes et à l’aisance. Ces deux produits du travail se tiennent volontiers compagnie. Au moment où l’on devient riche, on est paralysé. Cela couronne la vie.

On se dit: jouissons maintenant.

Dans les îles comme Guernesey, la population est composée d’hommes qui ont passé leur vie à faire le tour de leur champ et d’hommes qui ont passé leur vie à faire le tour du monde. Ce sont les deux sortes de laboureurs, ceux-ci de la terre, ceux-là de la mer. Mess Lethierry était des derniers. Pourtant il connaissait la terre. Il avait eu une forte vie de travailleur. Il avait voyagé sur le continent. Il avait été quelque temps charpentier de navire à Rochefort, puis à Cette. Nous venons de parler du tour du monde; il avait accompli son tour de France comme compagnon dans la charpenterie. Il avait travaillé aux appareils d’épuisement des salines de Franche-Comté. Cet honnête homme avait eu une vie d’aventurier. En France il avait appris à lire, à penser, à vouloir. Il avait fait de tout, et de tout ce qu’il avait fait il avait extrait la probité. Le fond de sa nature, c’était le matelot. L’eau lui appartenait. Il disait: les poissons sont chez moi. En somme toute son existence, à deux ou trois années près, avait été donnée à l’océan; jetée à l’eau, disait-il. Il avait navigué dans les grandes mers, dans l’Atlantique et dans le Pacifique, mais il préférait la Manche. Il s’écriait avec amour: C’est celle-là qui est rude! il y était né et voulait y mourir. Après avoir fait un ou deux tours du monde, sachant à quoi s’en tenir, il était revenu à Guernesey, et n’en avait plus bougé. Ses voyages désormais étaient Granville et Saint-Malo.

Mess Lethierry était guernesiais, c’est-à-dire normand, c’est-à-dire anglais, c’est-à-dire français. Il avait en lui cette patrie quadruple, immergée et comme noyée dans sa grande patrie l’océan. Toute sa vie et partout, il avait gardé ses mœurs de pêcheur normand.

Cela ne l’empêchait point d’ouvrir un bouquin dans l’occasion, de se plaire à un livre, de savoir des noms de philosophes et de poëtes, et de baragouiner un peu toutes les langues.

II

UN GOÛT QU'IL AVAIT

Gilliatt était un sauvage. Mess Lethierry en était un autre.

Ce sauvage avait ses élégances.

Il était difficile pour les mains des femmes. Dans sa jeunesse, presque enfant encore, étant entre matelot et mousse, il avait entendu le bailli De Suffren s'écrier: Voilà une jolie fille, mais quelles grandes diables de mains rouges! un mot d'amiral, en toute matière, commande. Au-dessus d'un oracle, il y a une consigne. L'exclamation du bailli De Suffren avait rendu Lethierry délicat, et exigeant en fait de petites mains blanches. Sa main à lui, large spatule couleur acajou, était massue pour la légèreté et tenaille pour la caresse, et cassait un pavé en tombant dessus, fermée.

Il ne s'était jamais marié. Il n'avait pas voulu ou pas trouvé. Cela tenait peut-être à ce que ce matelot prétendait à des mains de duchesse. On ne rencontre guère de ces mains-là dans les pêcheuses de Portbail.

On racontait pourtant qu'à Rochefort en Charente, il avait jadis fait la trouvaille d'une grisette réalisant son idéal. C'était une jolie fille ayant de jolies mains. Elle médisait et égratignait. Il ne fallait point s'attaquer à elle. Griffes au besoin, et d'une propreté exquise, ses ongles étaient sans reproche et sans peur. Ces charmants ongles avaient enchanté Lethierry, puis l'avaient inquiété; et, craignant de ne pas être un jour le maître de sa maîtresse, il s'était décidé à ne point mener par-devant monsieur le maire cette amourette.

Une autre fois, à Aurigny, une fille lui avait plu. Il songeait aux épousailles, quand un habitant lui dit: Je vous fais mon compliment. Vous aurez là une bonne bouselière. Il se fit expliquer l'éloge. À Aurigny, on a une mode. On prend de la bouse de vache et on la jette contre les murs. Il y a une manière de la jeter. Quand elle est sèche, elle tombe, et l'on se chauffe avec cela. On appelle ces bouses sèches des coipiaux. On n'épouse une fille que si elle est bonne bouselière. Ce talent mit Lethierry en fuite.

Du reste il avait, en matière d'amour, ou d'amourette, une bonne grosse philosophie paysanne, une sagesse de matelot toujours pris, jamais enchaîné, et il se vantait de s'être, dans sa jeunesse, aisément laissé vaincre par le « cotillon”. Ce qu’on nomme aujourd’hui une crinoline, on l’appelait alors un cotillon. Cela signifie plus et moins qu’une femme.

Ces rudes marins de l’archipel normand ont de l’esprit. Presque tous savent lire et lisent. On voit le dimanche de petits mousses de huit ans assis sur un rouleau de cordages un livre à la main. De tout temps ces marins normands ont été sardoniques, et ont, comme on dit aujourd’hui, fait des mots. Ce fut l’un d’eux, le hardi pilote Quéripel, qui jeta à Montgomery, réfugié à Jersey après son malencontreux coup de lance à Henri II, cette apostrophe: Tête folle a cassé tête vide. C’est un autre, Touzeau, patron à saint-Brelade, qui a fait ce calembour philosophique, attribué à tort à l’évêque Camus: Après la mort les papes deviennent papillons et les sires deviennent cirons.

III

LA VIEILLE LANGUE DE MER

Ces marins des Channel Islands sont de vrais vieux gaulois. Ces îles, qui aujourd'hui s'anglaisent rapidement, sont restées longtemps autochthones. Le paysan de Serk parle la langue de Louis XIV.

Il y a quarante ans, on retrouvait dans la bouche des matelots de Jersey et d'Aurigny l'idiome marin classique. On se fût cru en pleine marine du xviie siècle. Un archéologue spécialiste eût pu venir étudier là l'antique patois de manœuvre et de bataille rugi par Jean Bart dans ce porte-voix qui terrifiait l'amiral Hidde. Le vocabulaire maritime de nos pères, presque entièrement renouvelé aujourd'hui, était encore usité à Guernesey vers 1820. Un navire qui tient bien le vent était « bon boulinier"; un navire qui se range au vent presque de lui-même, malgré ses voiles d'avant et son gouvernail, était un « vaisseau ardent". Entrer en mouvement, c'était « prendre aire"; mettre à la cape, c'était « capeyer"; amarrer le bout d'une manœuvre courante, c'était « faire dormant"; prendre le vent dessus, c'était « faire chapelle"; tenir bon sur le câble, c'était « faire teste"; être en désordre à bord, c'était « être en pantenne"; avoir le vent dans les voiles, c'était « porter-plain". Rien de tout cela ne se dit plus. Aujourd'hui on dit: louvoyer, alors on disait: leauvoyer; on dit: naviguer, on disait: naviger; on dit: virer vent devant, on disait: donner vent devant; on dit: aller de l'avant, on disait: tailler de l'avant; on dit: tirez d'accord, on disait: halez d'accord; on dit: dérapez, on disait: déplantez; on dit: embraquez, on disait: abraquez; on dit: taquets, on disait: bittons; on dit: burins, on disait: tappes; on dit: balancines, on disait: valancines; on dit: tribord, on disait: stribord; on dit: les hommes de quart à bâbord, on disait: les basbourdis. Tourville écrivait à Hocquincourt: nous avons singlé. Au lieu de « la rafale" , le raffal; au lieu de « bossoir", boussoir; au lieu de « drosse", drousse; au lieu de « loffer", faire une olofée; au lieu de « élonger", alonger; au lieu de « forte brise", survent; au lieu de « jouail", jas; au lieu de « soute", fosse; telle était, au commencement de ce siècle, la langue de bord des îles de la Manche. En entendant parler un pilote jersiais, Ango eût été ému. Tandis que partout les voiles faseyaient, aux îles de la Manche elles barbeyaient. Une saute-de-vent était une « folle-vente". On n'employait plus que là les deux modes gothiques d'amarrage, la valture et la portugaise. On n’entendait plus que là les vieux commandements: tour-et-choque! - bosse et bitte! - un matelot de Granville disait déjà le clan, qu’un matelot de Saint-Aubin ou de saint-Sampson disait encore le canal de pouliot. Ce qui était bout d’alonge à Saint-Malo, était à Saint-Hélier oreille d’âne. Mess Lethierry, absolument comme le duc De Vivonne, appelait la courbure concave des ponts la tonture et le ciseau du calfat la patarasse. C’est avec ce bizarre idiome entre les dents que Duquesne battit Ruyter, que Duguay-Trouin battit Wasnaer, et que Tourville en 1681 embossa en plein jour la première galère qui bombarda Alger. Aujourd’hui, c’est une langue morte. L’argot de la mer est actuellement tout autre. Duperré ne comprendrait pas Suffren.

La langue des signaux ne s’est pas moins transformée; et il y a loin des quatre flammes, rouge, blanche, bleue et jaune de La Bourdonnais aux dix-huit pavillons d’aujourd’hui qui, arborés deux par deux, trois par trois, et quatre par quatre, offrent aux besoins de la communication lointaine soixante-dix mille combinaisons, ne restent jamais court, et, pour ainsi dire, prévoient l’imprévu.

IV

ON EST VULNÉRABLE DANS CE QU’ON AIME

Mess Lethierry avait le cœur sur la main; une large main et un grand cœur. Son défaut, c’était cette admirable qualité, la confiance. Il avait une façon à lui de prendre un engagement; c’était solennel; il disait: J’en donne ma parole d’honneur au bon Dieu. Cela dit, il allait jusqu’au bout. Il croyait au bon Dieu, pas au reste. Le peu qu’il allait aux églises était politesse. En mer, il était superstitieux.

Pourtant jamais un gros temps ne l’avait fait reculer; cela tenait à ce qu’il était peu accessible à la contradiction. Il ne la tolérait pas plus de l’océan que d’un autre. Il entendait être obéi; tant pis pour la mer si elle résistait; il fallait qu’elle en prît son parti. Mess Lethierry ne cédait point. Une vague qui se cabre, pas plus qu’un voisin qui dispute, ne réussissait à l’arrêter. Ce qu’il disait était dit, ce qu’il projetait était fait. Il ne se courbait ni devant une objection, ni devant une tempête. Non, pour lui, n’existait pas; ni dans la bouche d’un homme, ni dans le grondement d’un nuage. Il passait outre. Il ne permettait point qu’on le refusât. De là son entêtement dans la vie et son intrépidité sur l’océan.

Il assaisonnait volontiers lui-même sa soupe au poisson, sachant la dose de poivre et de sel et les herbes qu’il fallait, et se régalait autant de la faire que de la manger. Un être qu’un suroît transfigure et qu’une redingote abrutit, qui ressemble, les cheveux au vent, à Jean Bart, et, en chapeau rond, à Jocrisse, gauche à la ville, étrange et redoutable à la mer, un dos de portefaix, point de jurons, très rarement de la colère, un petit accent très doux qui devient tonnerre dans un porte-voix, un paysan qui a lu l’Encyclopédie, un guernesiais qui a vu la révolution, un ignorant très savant, aucune bigoterie, mais toutes sortes de visions, plus de foi à la dame blanche qu’à la sainte Vierge, la force de Polyphème, la volonté de Christophe Colomb, la logique de la girouette, quelque chose d’un taureau et quelque chose d’un enfant, un nez presque camard, des joues puissantes, une bouche qui a toutes ses dents, un froncement partout sur la figure, une face qui semble avoir été tripotée par la vague et sur laquelle la rose des vents a tourné pendant quarante ans, un air d’orage sur le front, une carnation de roche en pleine mer; et maintenant mettez dans ce visage dur un regard bon, vous aurez mess Lethierry.

Mess Lethierry avait deux amours: Durande et Déruchette.

LIVRE TROISIEME

DURANDE ET DERUCHETTE

I

BABIL ET FUMÉE

Le corps humain pourrait bien n’être qu’une apparence. Il cache notre réalité. Il s’épaissit sur notre lumière ou sur notre ombre. La réalité c’est l’âme. À parler absolument, notre visage est un masque. Le vrai homme, c’est ce qui est sous l’homme. Si l’on apercevait cet homme-là, tapi ou abrité derrière cette illusion qu’on nomme la chair, on aurait plus d’une surprise. L’erreur commune, c’est de prendre l’être extérieur pour l’être réel. Telle fille, par exemple, si on la voyait ce qu’elle est, apparaîtrait oiseau.

Un oiseau qui a la forme d’une fille, quoi de plus exquis! Figurez-vous que vous l’avez chez vous. Ce sera Déruchette. Le délicieux être! On serait tenté de lui dire: Bonjour, mademoiselle la bergeronnette. On ne voit pas les ailes, mais on entend le gazouillement. Par instants, elle chante. Par le babil, c’est au-dessous de l’homme; par le chant, c’est au-dessus. Il y a le mystère dans ce chant; une vierge est une enveloppe d’ange. Quand la femme se fait, l’ange s’en va; mais plus tard, il revient, apportant une petite âme à la mère. En attendant la vie, celle qui sera mère un jour est très longtemps un enfant, la petite fille persiste dans la jeune fille, et c’est une fauvette. On pense en la voyant: qu’elle est aimable de ne pas s’envoler! Le doux être familier prend ses aises dans la maison, de branche en branche, c’est-à-dire de chambre en chambre, entre, sort, s’approche, s’éloigne, lisse ses plumes ou peigne ses cheveux, fait toutes sortes de petits bruits délicats, murmure on ne sait quoi d’ineffable à vos oreilles. Il questionne, on lui répond; on l’interroge, il gazouille. On jase avec lui. Jaser, cela délasse de parler. Cet être a du ciel en lui. C’est une pensée bleue mêlée à votre pensée noire. Vous lui savez gré d’être si léger, si fuyant, si échappant, si peu saisissable, et d’avoir la bonté de ne pas être invisible, lui qui pourrait, ce semble, être impalpable. Ici-bas, le joli, c’est le nécessaire. Il y a sur la terre peu de fonctions plus importantes que celle-ci: être charmant. La forêt serait au désespoir sans le colibri. Dégager de la joie, rayonner du bonheur, avoir parmi les choses sombres une exsudation de lumière, être la dorure du destin, être l’harmonie, être la grâce, être la gentillesse, c’est vous rendre service. La beauté me fait du bien en étant belle. Telle créature a cette féerie d’être pour tout ce qui l’entoure un enchantement; quelquefois elle n’en sait rien elle-même, ce n’en est que plus souverain; sa présence éclaire, son approche réchauffe; elle passe, on est content, elle s’arrête, on est heureux; la regarder, c’est vivre; elle est de l’aurore ayant la figure humaine; elle ne fait pas autre chose que d’être là, cela suffit, elle édénise la maison, il lui sort par tous les pores un paradis; cette extase, elle la distribue à tous sans se donner d’autre peine que de respirer à côté d’eux. Avoir un sourire qui, on ne sait comment, diminue le poids de la chaîne énorme traînée en commun par tous les vivants, que voulez-vous que je vous dise, c’est divin. Ce sourire, Déruchette l’avait. Disons plus, Déruchette était ce sourire. Il y a quelque chose qui nous ressemble plus que notre visage, c’est notre physionomie; il y a quelque chose qui nous ressemble plus que notre physionomie, c’est notre sourire. Déruchette souriant, c’était Déruchette.

C’est un sang particulièrement attrayant que celui de Jersey et de Guernesey. Les femmes, les filles surtout, sont d’une beauté fleurie et candide. C’est la blancheur saxonne et la fraîcheur normande combinées. Des joues roses et des regards bleus. Il manque à ces regards l’étoile. L’éducation anglaise les amortit. Ces yeux limpides seront irrésistibles le jour où la profondeur parisienne y apparaîtra. Paris, heureusement, n’a pas encore fait son entrée dans les anglaises. Déruchette n’était pas une parisienne, mais n’était pas non plus une guernesiaise. Elle était née à Saint-Pierre-Port, mais mess Lethierry l’avait élevée. Il l’avait élevée pour être mignonne; elle l’était.

Déruchette avait le regard indolent, et agressif sans le savoir. Elle ne connaissait peut-être pas le sens du mot amour, et elle rendait volontiers les gens amoureux d’elle. Mais sans mauvaise intention. Elle ne songeait à aucun mariage. Le vieux gentilhomme émigré qui avait pris racine à Saint-Sampson disait: Cette petite fait de la flirtation à poudre.

Déruchette avait les plus jolies petites mains du monde et des pieds assortis aux mains, quatre pattes de mouche, disait mess Lethierry. Elle avait dans toute sa personne la bonté et la douceur, pour famille et pour richesse mess Lethierry, son oncle, pour travail de se laisser vivre, pour talent quelques chansons, pour science la beauté, pour esprit l’innocence, pour cœur l’ignorance; elle avait la gracieuse paresse créole, mêlée d’étourderie et de vivacité, la gaîté taquine de l’enfance avec une pente à la mélancolie, des toilettes un peu insulaires, élégantes, mais incorrectes, des chapeaux de fleurs toute l’année, le front naïf, le cou souple et tentant, les cheveux châtains, la peau blanche avec quelques taches de rousseur l’été, la bouche grande et saine, et sur cette bouche l’adorable et dangereuse clarté du sourire. C’était là Déruchette.

Quelquefois, le soir, après le soleil couché, au moment où la nuit se mêle à la mer, à l’heure où le crépuscule donne une sorte d’épouvante aux vagues, on voyait entrer dans le goulet de Saint-Sampson, sur le soulèvement sinistre des flots, on ne sait quelle masse informe, une silhouette monstrueuse qui sifflait et crachait, une chose horrible qui râlait comme une bête et qui fumait comme un volcan, une espèce d’hydre bavant dans l’écume et traînant un brouillard, et se ruant vers la ville avec un effrayant battement de nageoires et une gueule d’où sortait de la flamme. C’était Durande.

II

HISTOIRE ÉTERNELLE DE L'UTOPIE

C'était une prodigieuse nouveauté qu'un bateau à vapeur dans les eaux de la Manche en 182... toute la côte normande en fut longtemps effarée. Aujourd'hui dix ou douze steamers se croisant en sens inverse sur un horizon de mer ne font lever les yeux à personne; tout au plus occupent-ils un moment le connaisseur spécial qui distingue à la couleur de leur fumée que celui-ci brûle du charbon de Wales et celui-là du charbon de Newcastle. Ils passent, c'est bien. Wellcome, s'ils arrivent. Bon voyage, s'ils partent.

On était moins calme à l'endroit de ces inventions-là dans le premier quart de ce siècle, et ces mécaniques et leur fumée étaient particulièrement mal vues chez les insulaires de la Manche. Dans cet archipel puritain, où la reine d'Angleterre a été blâmée de violer la bible en accouchant par le chloroforme, le bateau à vapeur eut pour premier succès d'être baptisé le Bateau-Diable (Devil-Boat). à ces bons pêcheurs d'alors, jadis catholiques, désormais calvinistes, toujours bigots, cela sembla être de l'enfer qui flottait. Un prédicateur local traita cette question: A-t-on le droit de faire travailler ensemble l'eau et le feu que Dieu a séparés? Cette bête de feu et de fer ne ressemblait-elle pas à Léviathan? N'était-ce pas refaire, dans la mesure humaine, le chaos? Ce n'est pas la première fois que l'ascension du progrès est qualifiée retour au chaos. Idée folle, erreur grossière, absurdité*; tel* avait été le verdict de l'académie des sciences consultée, au commencement de ce siècle, sur le bateau à vapeur par Napoléon; les pêcheurs de Saint-Sampson sont excusables de n'être, en matière scientifique, qu'au niveau des géomètres de Paris, et, en matière religieuse, une petite île comme Guernesey n'est pas forcée d'avoir plus de lumières qu'un grand continent comme l'Amérique. En 1807, quand le premier bateau de Fulton, patronné par Livingstone, pourvu de la machine de Watt envoyée d'Angleterre, et monté, outre l'équipage, par deux français seulement, André Michaux et un autre, quand ce premier bateau à vapeur fit son premier voyage de New-York à Albany, le hasard fit que ce fut le 17 août. Sur ce, le méthodisme prit la parole, et dans toutes les chapelles les prédicateurs maudirent cette machine, déclarant que ce nombre dix-sept était le total des dix antennes et des sept têtes de la bête de l'Apocalypse. En

Amérique on invoquait contre le navire à vapeur la bête de l'Apocalypse et en Europe la bête de la Genèse. Là était toute la différence.

Les savants avaient rejeté le bateau à vapeur comme impossible; les prêtres à leur tour le rejetaient comme impie. La science avait condamné, la religion damnait. Fulton était une variété de Lucifer. Les gens simples des côtes et des campagnes adhéraient à la réprobation par le malaise que leur donnait cette nouveauté. En présence du bateau à vapeur, le point de vue religieux était ceci: — l'eau et le feu sont un divorce. Ce divorce est ordonné de Dieu. On ne doit pas désunir ce que Dieu a uni; on ne doit pas unir ce qu'il a désuni. — Le point de vue paysan était ceci: ça me fait peur.

Pour oser à cette époque lointaine une telle entreprise, un bateau à vapeur allant de Guernesey à Saint-Malo, il ne fallait rien moins que mess Lethierry. Lui seul pouvait la concevoir comme libre penseur, et la réaliser comme hardi marin. Son côté français eut l'idée, son côté anglais l'exécuta.

À quelle occasion? disons-le.

III

RANTAINE

Quarante ans environ avant l’époque où se passent les faits que nous racontons ici, il y avait dans la banlieue de Paris, près du mur de ronde, entre la fosse-aux-loups et la tombe-issoire, un logis suspect. C’était une masure isolée, coupe-gorge au besoin. Là demeurait avec sa femme et son enfant une espèce de bourgeois bandit, ancien clerc de procureur au Châtelet, devenu voleur tout net. Il figura plus tard en cour d’assises. Cette famille s’appelait les Rantaine. On voyait dans la masure sur une commode d’acajou deux tasses en porcelaine fleurie; on lisait en lettres dorées sur l’une: souvenir d’amitié, et sur l’autre: don d’estime. L’enfant était dans le bouge pêle-mêle avec le crime. Le père et la mère ayant été de la demi-bourgeoisie, l’enfant apprenait à lire; on l’élevait. La mère, pâle, presque en guenilles, donnait machinalement « de l’éducation” à son petit, le faisait épeler, et s’interrompait pour aider son mari à quelque guet-apens, ou pour se prostituer à un passant. Pendant ce temps-là, la croix de Jésus, ouverte à l’endroit où on l’avait quittée, restait sur la table, et l’enfant auprès, rêveur.

Le père et la mère, saisis dans quelque flagrant délit, disparurent dans la nuit pénale. L’enfant disparut aussi.

Lethierry dans ses courses rencontra un aventurier comme lui, le tira d’on ne sait quel mauvais pas, lui rendit service, lui en fut reconnaissant, le prit en gré, le ramassa, l’amena à Guernesey, le trouva intelligent au cabotage, et en fit son associé. C’était le petit Rantaine devenu grand.

Rantaine, comme Lethierry, avait une nuque robuste, une large et puissante marge à porter des fardeaux entre les deux épaules, et des reins d’Hercule Farnèse. Lethierry et lui, c’était la même allure et la même encolure; Rantaine était de plus haute taille. Qui les voyait de dos se promener côte à côte sur le port, disait: voilà les deux frères. De face, c’était autre chose. Tout ce qui était ouvert chez Lethierry était fermé chez Rantaine. Rantaine était circonspect. Rantaine était maître d’armes, jouait de l’harmonica, mouchait une chandelle d’une balle à vingt pas, avait un coup de poing magnifique, récitait des vers de la Henriade et devinait les songes. Il savait par cœur les tombeaux de saint-Denis, par Treneuil. Il disait avoir été lié avec le sultan de Calicut que les portugais appellent le zamorin. Si l’on eût pu feuilleter le petit agenda qu’il avait sur lui, on y eût trouvé, entre autres notes, des mentions du genre de celle-ci: « À Lyon, dans une des fissures du mur d’un des cachots de saint-Joseph, il y a une lime cachée”. Il parlait avec une sage lenteur. Il se disait fils d’un chevalier de Saint-Louis. Son linge était dépareillé et marqué à des lettres différentes. Personne n’était plus chatouilleux que lui sur le point d’honneur; il se battait et tuait. Il avait dans le regard quelque chose d’une mère d’actrice.

La force servant d’enveloppe à la ruse, c’était là Rantaine.

La beauté de son coup de poing, appliquée dans une foire sur une cabeza de moro, avait gagné jadis le cœur de Lethierry.

On ignorait pleinement à Guernesey ses aventures. Elles étaient bigarrées. Si les destinées ont un vestiaire, la destinée de Rantaine devait être vêtue en arlequin. Il avait vu le monde et fait la vie. C’était un circumnavigateur. Ses métiers étaient une gamme. Il avait été cuisinier à Madagascar, éleveur d’oiseaux à Sumatra, général à Honolulu, journaliste religieux aux îles Gallapagos, poëte à Oomrawuttee, franc-maçon à Haïti. Il avait prononcé en cette dernière qualité au Grand-Goâve une oraison funèbre dont les journaux locaux ont conservé ce fragment: “ ... Adieu donc, belle âme! Dans la voûte azurée des cieux où tu prends maintenant ton vol, tu rencontreras sans doute le bon abbé Léandre Crameau du Petit-Goâve. Dis-lui que, grâce à dix années d’efforts glorieux, tu as terminé l’église de l’Anse-à-Veau! Adieu, génie transcendant, maç… modèle!” Son masque de franc-maçon ne l’empêchait pas, comme on voit, de porter le faux nez catholique. Le premier lui conciliait les hommes de progrès et le second les hommes d’ordre. Il se déclarait blanc pur sang, il haïssait les noirs; pourtant il eût certainement admiré Soulouque. À Bordeaux, en 1815, il avait été verdet. À cette époque, la fumée de son royalisme lui sortait du front sous la forme d’un immense plumet blanc. Il avait passé sa vie à faire des éclipses, paraissant, disparaissant, reparaissant. C’était un coquin à feu tournant. Il savait du turc; au lieu de guillotiné il disait néboïssé. Il avait été esclave en Tripoli chez un thaleb, et il y avait appris le turc à coups de bâton; sa fonction avait été d’aller le soir aux portes des mosquées et d’y lire à haute voix devant les fidèles le koran écrit sur des planchettes de bois ou sur des omoplates de chameau. Il était probablement renégat.

Il était capable de tout, et de pire.

Il éclatait de rire et fronçait le sourcil en même temps. Il disait: En politique, je n’estime que les gens inaccessibles aux influences. Il disait: Je suis pour les mœurs. Il était plutôt gai et cordial qu’autre chose. La forme de sa bouche démentait le sens de ses paroles. Ses narines eussent pu passer pour des naseaux. Il avait au coin de l’œil un carrefour de rides où toutes sortes de pensées obscures se donnaient rendez-vous. Le secret de sa physionomie ne pouvait être déchiffré que là. Sa patte d’oie était une serre de vautour. Son crâne était bas au sommet et large aux tempes. Son oreille, difforme et encombrée de broussailles, semblait dire: ne parlez pas à la bête qui est dans cet antre.

Un beau jour, à Guernesey, on ne sut plus où était Rantaine.

L’associé de Lethierry avait « filé”, laissant vide la caisse de l’association.

Dans cette caisse il y avait de l’argent à Rantaine sans doute, mais il y avait aussi cinquante mille francs à Lethierry.

Lethierry, dans son métier de caboteur et de charpentier de navires, avait, en quarante ans d’industrie et de probité, gagné cent mille francs. Rantaine lui en emporta la moitié.

Lethierry, à moitié ruiné, ne fléchit pas et songea immédiatement à se relever. On ruine la fortune des gens de cœur, non leur courage. On commençait alors à parler du bateau à vapeur. L’idée vint à Lethierry d’essayer la machine Fulton, si contestée, et de relier par un bateau à feu l’archipel normand à la France. Il joua son vatout sur cette idée. Il y consacra son reste. Six mois après la fuite de Rantaine, on vit sortir du port stupéfait de Saint-Sampson un navire à fumée, faisant l’effet d’un incendie en mer, le premier steamer qui ait navigué dans la Manche.

Ce bateau, que la haine et le dédain de tous gratifièrent immédiatement du sobriquet « la galiote à Lethierry”, s’annonça comme devant faire le service régulier de Guernesey à Saint-Malo.

IV

SUITE DE L’HISTOIRE DE L’UTOPIE

La chose, on le comprend de reste, prit d’abord fort mal. Tous les propriétaires de coutres faisant le voyage de l’île guernesiaise à la côte française jetèrent les hauts cris. Ils dénoncèrent cet attentat à l’écriture sainte et à leur monopole. Quelques chapelles fulminèrent. Un révérend, nommé Elihu, qualifia le bateau à vapeur « un libertinage”. Le navire à voiles fut déclaré orthodoxe. On vit distinctement les cornes du diable sur la tête des bœufs que le bateau à vapeur apportait et débarquait. Cette protestation dura un temps raisonnable. Cependant peu à peu on finit par s’apercevoir que ces bœufs arrivaient moins fatigués, et se vendaient mieux, la viande étant meilleure; que les risques de mer étaient moindres pour les hommes aussi; que ce passage, moins coûteux, était plus sûr et plus court; qu’on partait à heure fixe et qu’on arrivait à heure fixe; que le poisson, voyageant plus vite, était plus frais, et qu’on pouvait désormais déverser sur les marchés français l’excédent des grandes pêches, si fréquentes à Guernesey; que le beurre des admirables vaches de Guernesey faisait plus rapidement le trajet dans le Devil-Boat que dans les sloops à voile, et ne perdait plus rien de sa qualité, de sorte que Dinan en demandait, et que Saint-Brieuc en demandait, et que Rennes en demandait; qu’enfin il y avait, grâce à ce qu’on appelait la galiote à Lethierry, sécurité de voyage, régularité de communication, va-et-vient facile et prompt, agrandissement de circulation, multiplication de débouchés, extension de commerce, et qu’en somme il fallait prendre son parti de ce Devil-Boat qui violait la bible et enrichissait l’île. Quelques esprits forts se hasardèrent à approuver dans une certaine mesure. Sieur Landoys, le greffier, accorda son estime à ce bateau. Du reste, ce fut impartialité de sa part, car il n’aimait pas Lethierry. D’abord Lethierry était mess et Landoys n’était que sieur. Ensuite, quoique greffier à Saint-Pierre-Port, Landoys était paroissien de Saint-Sampson; or ils n’étaient dans la paroisse que deux hommes, Lethierry et lui, n’ayant point de préjugés; c’était bien le moins que l’un détestât l’autre. Être du même bord, cela éloigne.

Sieur Landoys néanmoins eut l’honnêteté d’approuver le bateau à vapeur. D’autres se joignirent à sieur Landoys. Insensiblement, le fait monta; les faits sont une marée, et, avec le temps, avec le succès continu et croissant, avec l'évidence du service rendu, l'augmentation du bien-être de tous étant constatée, il vint un jour où, quelques sages exceptés, tout le monde admira « la galiote à Lethierry”.

On l'admirerait moins aujourd'hui. Ce steamer d'il y a quarante ans ferait sourire nos constructeurs actuels. Cette merveille était difforme; ce prodige était infirme.

De nos grands steamers transatlantiques d'à présent au bateau à roues et à feu que Denis Papin fit manœuvrer sur la fulde en 1707, il n'y a pas moins de distance que du vaisseau à trois ponts le Montebello, long de deux cents pieds, large de cinquante, ayant une grande vergue de cent quinze pieds, déplaçant un poids de trois mille tonneaux, portant onze cents hommes, cent vingt canons, dix mille boulets et cent soixante paquets de mitraille, vomissant à chaque bordée, quand il combat, trois mille trois cents livres de fer, et déployant au vent, quand il marche, cinq mille six cents mètres carrés de toile, au dromon danois du iie siècle, trouvé plein de haches de pierre, d'arcs et de massues, dans les boues marines de Wester-Satrup, et déposé à l'hôtel de ville de Flensbourg.

Cent ans juste d'intervalle, 1707-1807, séparent le premier bateau de Papin du premier bateau de Fulton. La « galiote à Lethierry” était, à coup sûr, un progrès sur ces deux ébauches, mais était une ébauche elle-même. Cela ne l'empêchait pas d'être un chef-d'œuvre. Tout embryon de la science offre ce double aspect: monstre comme fœtus; merveille comme germe.

LE BATEAU-DIABLE

La « galiote à Lethierry” n’était pas mâtée selon le point vélique, et ce n’était pas là son défaut, car c’est une des lois de la construction navale; d’ailleurs le navire ayant pour propulseur le feu, la voilure était l’accessoire. Ajoutons qu’un navire à roues est presque insensible à la voilure qu’on lui met. La galiote était trop courte, trop ronde, trop ramassée; elle avait trop de joue et trop de hanche; la hardiesse n’avait pas été jusqu’à la faire légère; la galiote avait quelques-uns des inconvénients et quelques-unes des qualités de la panse. Elle tanguait peu, mais roulait beaucoup. Les tambours étaient trop hauts. Elle avait trop de bau pour sa longueur. La machine, massive, l’encombrait, et, pour rendre le navire capable d’une forte cargaison, on avait dû hausser démesurément la muraille, ce qui donnait à la galiote à peu près le défaut des vaisseaux de soixante-quatorze, qui sont un gabarit bâtard, et qu’il faut raser pour les rendre battants et marins. Étant courte, elle eût dû virer vite, les temps employés à une évolution étant comme les longueurs des navires; mais sa pesanteur lui ôtait l’avantage que lui donnait sa brièveté. Son maître-couple était trop large, ce qui la ralentissait, la résistance de l’eau étant proportionnelle à la plus grande section immergée et au carré de la vitesse du navire. L’avant était vertical, ce qui ne serait pas une faute aujourd’hui, mais en ce temps-là l’usage invariable était de l’incliner de quarante-cinq degrés. Toutes les courbes de la coque étaient bien raccordées, mais pas assez longues pour l’obliquité et surtout pour le parallélisme avec le prisme d’eau déplacé, lequel ne doit jamais être refoulé que latéralement. Dans les gros temps, elle tirait trop d’eau, tantôt par l’avant, tantôt par l’arrière, ce qui indiquait un vice dans le centre de gravité. La charge n’étant pas où elle devait être, à cause du poids de la machine, le centre de gravité passait souvent à l’arrière du grand mât, et alors il fallait s’en tenir à la vapeur, et se défier de la grande voile, car l’effort de la grande voile dans ce cas-là faisait arriver le vaisseau au lieu de le soutenir au vent. La ressource était, quand on était au plus près du vent, de larguer en bande la grande écoute; le vent, de la sorte, était fixé sur l’avant par l’amure, et la grande voile ne faisait plus l’effet d’une voile de poupe. Cette manœuvre était difficile. Le gouvernail était l’antique gouvernail, non à roue comme aujourd’hui, mais à barre, tournant sur ses gonds scellés dans l’étambot et mû par une solive horizontale passant par-dessus la barre d’arcasse. Deux canots, espèces de youyous, étaient suspendus aux pistolets. Le navire avait quatre ancres, la grosse ancre, la seconde ancre qui est l’ancre travailleuse, working-anchor, et deux ancres d’affourche. Ces quatre ancres, mouillées avec des chaînes, étaient manœuvrées, selon les occasions, par le grand cabestan de poupe et le petit cabestan de proue. À cette époque, le guindoir à pompe n’avait pas encore remplacé l’effort intermittent de la barre d’anspect. N’ayant que deux ancres d’affourche, l’une à tribord, l’autre à bâbord, le navire ne pouvait affourcher en patte d’oie, ce qui le désarmait un peu devant certains vents. Pourtant il pouvait en ce cas s’aider de la seconde ancre. Les bouées étaient normales, et construites de manière à porter le poids de l’orin des ancres, tout en restant à flot. La chaloupe avait la dimension utile. C’était le véritable en-cas du bâtiment; elle était assez forte pour lever la maîtresse ancre. Une nouveauté de ce navire, c’est qu’il était en partie gréé avec des chaînes, ce qui du reste n’ôtait rien de leur mobilité aux manœuvres courantes et de leur tension aux manœuvres dormantes. La mâture, quoique secondaire, n’avait aucune incorrection; le capelage bien serré, bien dégagé, paraissait peu. Les membrures étaient solides, mais grossières, la vapeur n’exigeant point la même délicatesse de bois que la voile. Ce navire marchait avec une vitesse de deux lieues à l’heure. En panne il faisait bien son abatée. Telle qu’elle était, « la galiote à Lethierry” tenait bien la mer, mais elle manquait de pointe pour diviser le liquide, et l’on ne pouvait dire qu’elle eût de belles façons. On sentait que dans un danger, écueil ou trombe, elle serait peu maniable. Elle avait le craquement d’une chose informe. Elle faisait, en roulant sur la vague, un bruit de semelle neuve.

Ce navire était surtout un récipient, et, comme tout bâtiment plutôt armé en marchandise qu’en guerre, il était exclusivement disposé pour l’arrimage. Il admettait peu de passagers. Le transport du bétail rendait l’arrimage difficile et très particulier. On arrimait alors les bœufs dans la cale, ce qui était une complication. Aujourd’hui on les arrime sur l’avant-pont. Les tambours du Devil-Boat Lethierry étaient peints en blanc, la coque, jusqu’à la ligne de flottaison, en couleur de feu, et tout le reste du navire, selon la mode assez laide de ce siècle, en noir.

Vide, il calait sept pieds, et, chargé, quatorze.

Quant à la machine, elle était puissante. La force était d’un cheval pour trois tonneaux, ce qui est presque une force de remorqueur. Les roues étaient bien placées, un peu en avant du centre de gravité du navire. La machine avait une pression maximum de deux atmosphères. Elle usait beaucoup de charbon, quoiqu’elle fût à condensation et à détente. Elle n’avait pas de volant à cause de l’instabilité du point d’appui, et elle y remédiait, comme on le fait encore aujourd’hui, par un double appareil faisant alterner deux manivelles fixées aux extrémités de l’arbre de rotation et disposées de manière à ce que l’une fût toujours à son point fort quand l’autre était à son point mort. Toute la machine reposait sur une seule plaque de fonte; de sorte que, même dans un cas de grave avarie, aucun coup de mer ne lui ôtait l’équilibre et que la coque déformée ne pouvait déformer la machine. Pour rendre la machine plus solide encore, on avait placé la bielle principale près du cylindre, ce qui transportait du milieu à l’extrémité le centre d’oscillation du balancier. Depuis on a inventé les cylindres oscillants qui permettent de supprimer les bielles; mais, à cette époque, la bielle près du cylindre semblait le dernier mot de la machinerie. La chaudière était coupée de cloisons et pourvue de sa pompe de saumure. Les roues étaient très grandes, ce qui diminuait la perte de force, et la cheminée était très haute, ce qui augmentait le tirage du foyer; mais la grandeur des roues donnait prise au flot et la hauteur de la cheminée donnait prise au vent. Aubes de bois, crochets de fer, moyeux de fonte, telles étaient les roues, bien construites et, chose qui étonne, pouvant se démonter. Il y avait toujours trois aubes immergées. La vitesse du centre des aubes ne surpassait que d’un sixième la vitesse du navire; c’était là le défaut de ces roues. En outre, le manneton des manivelles était trop long, et le tiroir distribuait la vapeur dans le cylindre avec trop de frottement. Dans ces temps-là, cette machine semblait et était admirable.

Cette machine avait été forgée en France à l’usine de fer de Bercy. Mess Lethierry l’avait un peu imaginée; le mécanicien qui l’avait construite sur son épure était mort; de sorte que cette machine était unique, et impossible à remplacer. Le dessinateur restait, mais le constructeur manquait.

La machine avait coûté quarante mille francs.

Lethierry avait construit lui-même la galiote sous la grande cale couverte qui est à côté de la première tour entre Saint-Pierre-Port et Saint-Sampson. Il avait été à Brême acheter le bois. Il avait épuisé dans cette construction tout son savoir-faire de charpentier de marine, et l’on reconnaissait son talent au bordage dont les coutures étaient étroites et égales, et recouvertes de sarangousti, mastic de l’Inde meilleur que le brai. Le doublage était bien mailleté. Lethierry avait enduit la carène de gallegalle. Il avait, pour remédier à la rondeur de la coque, ajusté un boute-hors au beaupré, ce qui lui permettait d’ajouter à la civadière une fausse civadière. Le jour du lancement, il avait dit: me voilà à flot! La galiote réussit en effet, on l’a vu.

Par hasard ou exprès, elle avait été lancée un 14 juillet. Ce jour-là, Lethierry, debout sur le pont entre les deux tambours, regarda fixement la mer et lui cria: — C’est ton tour! Les parisiens ont pris la Bastille; maintenant nous te prenons, toi!

La galiote à Lethierry faisait une fois par semaine le voyage de Guernesey à Saint-Malo. Elle partait le mardi matin et revenait le vendredi soir, veille du marché qui est le samedi. Elle était d’un plus fort échantillon de bois que les plus grands sloops caboteurs de tout l’archipel, et, sa capacité étant en raison de sa dimension, un seul de ses voyages valait, pour l’apport et pour le rendement, quatre voyages d’un coutre ordinaire. De là de forts bénéfices. La réputation d’un navire dépend de son arrimage, et Lethierry était un admirable arrimeur. Quand il ne put plus travailler en mer lui-même, il dressa un matelot pour le remplacer comme arrimeur. Au bout de deux années, le bateau à vapeur rapportait net sept cent cinquante livres sterling par an, c’est-à-dire dix-huit mille francs. La livre sterling de Guernesey vaut vingt-quatre francs, celle d’Angleterre vingt-cinq et celle de Jersey vingt-six. Ces chinoiseries sont moins chinoises qu’elles n’en ont l’air; les banques y trouvent leur compte.

VI

ENTRÉE DE LETHIERRY DANS LA GLOIRE

«La Galiote” prospérait. Mess Lethierry voyait s’approcher le moment où il deviendrait monsieur. à Guernesey on n’est pas de plain-pied monsieur. Entre l’homme et le monsieur il y a toute une échelle à gravir; d’abord, premier échelon, le nom tout sec, Pierre, je suppose; puis, deuxième échelon, vésin (voisin) Pierre; puis, troisième échelon, père Pierre; puis, quatrième échelon, sieur Pierre; puis, cinquième échelon, mess Pierre; puis, sommet, monsieur Pierre.

Cette échelle, qui sort de terre, se continue dans le bleu. Toute la hiérarchique Angleterre y entre et s’y étage. En voici les échelons, de plus en plus lumineux: au-dessus du monsieur gentleman, il y a l’esq. (écuyer), au-dessus de l’esq., le chevalier (sir viager), puis, en s’élevant toujours, le baronet (sir héréditaire), puis le lord, laird en écosse, puis le baron, puis le vicomte, puis le comte (earl en Angleterre, jarl en Norvège), puis le marquis, puis le duc, puis le pair d’Angleterre, puis le prince du sang royal, puis le roi. Cette échelle monte du peuple à la bourgeoisie, de la bourgeoisie au baronetage, du baronetage à la pairie, de la pairie à la royauté.

Grâce à son coup de tête réussi, grâce à la vapeur, grâce à sa machine, grâce au Bateau-Diable, mess Lethierry était devenu quelqu’un. Pour construire « la galiote”, il avait dû emprunter; il s’était endetté à Brême, il s’était endetté à Saint-Malo; mais chaque année il amortissait son passif.

Il avait de plus acheté à crédit, à l’entrée même du port de s Saint-Sampson, une jolie maison de pierre, toute neuve, entre mer et jardin, sur l’encoignure de laquelle on lisait ce nom: les Bravées. le logis les Bravées, dont la devanture faisait partie de la muraille même du port, était remarquable par une double rangée de fenêtres, au nord, du côté d’un enclos plein de fleurs, au sud, du côté de l’océan; de sorte que cette maison avait deux façades, l’une sur les tempêtes, l’autre sur les roses.

Ces façades semblaient faites pour les deux habitants, mess Lethierry et miss Déruchette.

La maison des Bravées était populaire à Saint-Sampson.

Car mess Lethierry avait fini par être populaire. Cette popularité lui venait un peu de sa bonté, de son dévouement et de son courage, un peu de la quantité d'hommes qu'il avait sauvés, beaucoup de son succès, et aussi de ce qu'il avait donné au port de Saint-Sampson le privilège des départs et des arrivées du bateau à vapeur. Voyant que décidément le Devil-Boat était une bonne affaire, Saint-Pierre, la capitale, l'avait réclamé pour son port, mais Lethierry avait tenu bon pour Saint-Sampson. C'était sa ville natale. — C'est là que j'ai été lancé à la mer, disait-il. — De là une vive popularité locale. Sa qualité de propriétaire payant taxe faisait de lui ce qu'on appelle à Guernesey un habitant. On l'avait nommé douzenier. Ce pauvre matelot avait franchi cinq échelons sur six de l'ordre social guernesiais; il était mess; il touchait au monsieur; et qui sait s'il n'arriverait pas même à franchir le monsieur? Qui sait si un jour on ne lirait pas dans l'almanach de Guernesey au chapitre gentry and nobility cette inscription inouïe et superbe: Lethierry esq.?

mais mess Lethierry dédaignait ou plutôt ignorait le côté par lequel les choses sont vanité. Il se sentait utile, c'était là sa joie. Être populaire le touchait moins qu'être nécessaire. Il n'avait, nous l'avons dit, que deux amours et, par conséquent, que deux ambitions, Durande et Déruchette.

Quoi qu'il en fût, il avait mis à la loterie de la mer, et il y avait gagné le quine.

Le quine, c'était la Durande naviguant.

VII

LE MÊME PARRAIN ET LA MÊME PATRONNE

Après avoir créé ce bateau à vapeur, Lethierry l’avait baptisé. Il l’avait nommé Durande. La Durande, — nous ne l’appellerons plus autrement. On nous permettra également, quel que soit l’usage typographique, de ne point souligner ce nom Durande, nous conformant en cela à la pensée de mess Lethierry pour qui la Durande était presque une personne.

Durande et Déruchette, c’est le même nom. Déruchette est le diminutif. Ce diminutif est fort usité dans l’ouest de la France.

Les saints dans les campagnes portent souvent leur nom avec tous ses diminutifs et tous ses augmentatifs. On croirait à plusieurs personnes là où il n’y en a qu’une. Ces identités de patrons et de patronnes sous des noms différents ne sont point chose rare. Lise, Lisette, Lisa, Élisa, Isabelle, Lisbeth, Betsy, cette multitude est Élisabeth. Il est probable que Mahout, Maclou, Malo et Magloire sont le même saint. Du reste, nous n’y tenons pas.

Sainte Durande est une sainte de l’Angoumois et de la Charente. Est-elle correcte? Ceci regarde les bollandistes. Correcte ou non, elle a des chapelles.

Lethierry étant à Rochefort, jeune matelot, avait fait connaissance avec cette sainte, probablement dans la personne de quelque jolie charentaise, peut-être de la grisette aux beaux ongles. Il lui en était resté assez de souvenir pour qu’il donnât ce nom aux deux choses qu’il aimait: Durande à la galiote, Déruchette à la fille.

Il était le père de l’une et l’oncle de l’autre.

Déruchette était la fille d’un frère qu’il avait eu. Elle n’avait plus ni père ni mère. Il l’avait adoptée. Il remplaçait le père, et la mère. Déruchette n’était pas seulement sa nièce. Elle était sa filleule. C’était lui qui l’avait tenue sur les fonts de baptême. C’était lui qui lui avait trouvé cette patronne, sainte Durande, et ce prénom Déruchette.

Déruchette, nous l’avons dit, était née à Saint-Pierre-Port. Elle était inscrite à sa date sur le registre de paroisse.

Tant que la nièce fut enfant et tant que l’oncle fut pauvre, personne ne prit garde à cette appellation, Déruchette; mais quand la petite fille devint une miss et quand le matelot devint un gentleman, Déruchette choqua. On s’en étonnait. On demandait à mess Lethierry: Pourquoi Déruchette? Il répondait: C’est un nom qui est comme ça. On essaya plusieurs fois de la débaptiser. Il ne s’y prêta point. Un jour une belle dame de la high life de Saint-Sampson, femme d’un forgeron riche ne travaillant plus, une sixty, comme on dit à Guernesey, dit à mess Lethierry: désormais j’appellerai votre fille Nancy. — Pourquoi pas Lons-Le-Saulnier? dit-il. La belle dame ne lâcha point prise, et lui dit le lendemain: Nous ne voulons décidément pas de Déruchette. J’ ai trouvé pour votre fille un joli nom, Marianne. — Joli nom en effet, repartit mess Lethierry, mais composé de deux vilaines bêtes, un mari et un âne. Il maintint Déruchette.

On se tromperait si l’on concluait du mot ci-dessus qu’il ne voulait point marier sa nièce. Il voulait la marier, certes, mais à sa façon. Il entendait qu’elle eût un mari dans son genre à lui, travaillant beaucoup, et qu’elle ne fît pas grand’chose. Il aimait les mains noires de l’homme et les mains blanches de la femme. Pour que Déruchette ne gâtât point ses jolies mains, il l’avait tournée vers la demoiselle. Il lui avait donné un maître de musique, un piano, une petite bibliothèque, et aussi un peu de fil et d’aiguilles dans une corbeille de travail. Elle était plutôt liseuse que couseuse, et plutôt musicienne que liseuse. Mess Lethierry la voulait ainsi. Le charme, c’était tout ce qu’il lui demandait. Il l’avait élevée plutôt à être fleur qu’à être femme. Quiconque a étudié les marins comprendra ceci. Ces rudesses aiment ces délicatesses. Pour que la nièce réalisât l’idéal de l’oncle, il fallait qu’elle fût riche. C’est bien ce qu’entendait mess Lethierry. Sa grosse machine de mer travaillait dans ce but. Il avait chargé Durande de doter Déruchette.

L’AIR « BONNY DUNDEE”

Déruchette habitait la plus jolie chambre des Bravées, à deux fenêtres, meublée en acajou ronceux, ornée d’un lit à rideaux quadrillés vert et blanc, et ayant vue sur le jardin et sur la haute colline où est le château du Valle. C’est de l’autre côté de cette colline qu’était le Bû de la Rue.

Déruchette avait dans cette chambre sa musique et son piano. Elle s’accompagnait de ce piano en chantant l’air qu’elle préférait, la mélancolique mélodie écossaise Bonny Dundee; tout le soir est dans cet air, toute l’aurore était dans sa voix; cela faisait un contraste doucement surprenant; on disait: miss Déruchette est à son piano; et les passants du bas de la colline s’arrêtaient quelquefois devant le mur du jardin des Bravées pour écouter ce chant si frais et cette chanson si triste.

Déruchette était de l’allégresse allant et venant dans la maison. Elle y faisait un printemps perpétuel. Elle était belle, mais plus jolie que belle, et plus gentille que jolie. Elle rappelait aux bons vieux pilotes amis de mess Lethierry cette princesse d’une chanson de soldats et de matelots qui était si belle « qu’elle passait pour telle dans le régiment”. Mess Lethierry disait: Elle a un câble de cheveux.

Dès l’enfance, elle avait été ravissante. On avait craint longtemps son nez; mais la petite, probablement déterminée à être jolie, avait tenu bon; la croissance ne lui avait fait aucun mauvais tour; son nez ne s’était ni trop allongé, ni trop raccourci; et, en devenant grande, elle était restée charmante.

Elle n’appelait jamais son oncle autrement que « mon père”.

Il lui tolérait quelques talents de jardinière, et même de ménagère. Elle arrosait elle-même ses plates-bandes de roses trémières, de molènes pourpres, de phlox vivaces et de benoîtes écarlates; elle cultivait le crépis rose et l’oxalide rose; elle tirait parti du climat de cette île de Guernesey, si hospitalière aux fleurs. Elle avait, comme tout le monde, des aloès en pleine terre, et, ce qui est plus difficile, elle faisait réussir la potentille du Népaul. Son petit potager était savamment ordonné; elle y faisait succéder les épinards aux radis et les pois aux épinards; elle savait semer des choux-fleurs de Hollande et des choux de Bruxelles qu’elle repiquait en juillet, des navets pour août, de la chicorée frisée pour septembre, des panais ronds pour l'automne, et de la raiponce pour l'hiver. Mess Lethierry la laissait faire, pourvu qu'elle ne maniât pas trop la bêche et le râteau et surtout qu'elle ne mît pas l'engrais elle-même. Il lui avait donné deux servantes, nommées l'une Grace et l'autre Douce, qui sont deux noms de Guernesey. Grace et Douce faisaient le service de la maison et du jardin, et elles avaient le droit d'avoir les mains rouges.

Quant à mess Lethierry, il avait pour chambre un petit réduit donnant sur le port, et attenant à la grande salle basse du rez-de-chaussée où était la porte d'entrée et où venaient aboutir les divers escaliers de la maison. Sa chambre était meublée de son branle, de son chronomètre et de sa pipe. Il y avait aussi une table et une chaise. Le plafond, à poutres, avait été blanchi au lait de chaux, ainsi que les quatre murs; à droite de la porte était cloué l'archipel de la Manche, belle carte marine portant cette mention: W. Faden, 5, charing Cross. Geographer to His Majesty; et à gauche d'autres clous étalaient sur la muraille un de ces gros mouchoirs de coton où sont figurés en couleur les pavillons et les signaux de toute la marine du globe, ayant aux quatre coins les étendards de France, de Russie, d'Espagne et des États-Unis d'Amérique, et au centre l'Union-Jack d'Angleterre.

Douce et Grace étaient deux créatures quelconques, du bon côté du mot. Douce n'était pas méchante et Grace n'était pas laide. Ces noms dangereux n'avaient point mal tourné. Douce, non mariée, avait un « galant”. Dans les îles de la Manche le mot est usité; la chose aussi. Ces deux filles avaient ce qu'on pourrait appeler le service créole, une sorte de lenteur propre à la domesticité normande dans l'archipel. Grace, coquette et jolie, considérait sans cesse l'horizon avec une inquiétude de chat. Cela tenait à ce qu'ayant, comme Douce, un galant, elle avait, de plus, disait-on, un mari matelot, dont elle craignait le retour. Mais cela ne nous regarde pas. La nuance entre Grace et Douce, c'est que, dans une maison moins austère et moins innocente, Douce fût restée la servante et Grace fût devenue la soubrette. Les talents possibles de Grace se perdaient avec une fille candide comme Déruchette. Du reste, les amours de Douce et de Grace étaient latents. Rien n'en revenait à mess Lethierry, et rien n'en rejaillissait sur Déruchette.

La salle basse du rez-de-chaussée, halle à cheminée entourée de bancs et de tables, avait, au siècle dernier, servi de lieu d'assemblée à un conventicule de réfugiés français protestants. Le mur de pierre nue avait pour tout luxe un cadre de bois noir où s'étalait une pancarte de parchemin ornée des prouesses de Bénigne Bossuet, évêque de Meaux. Quelques pauvres diocésains de cet aigle, persécutés par lui lors de la révocation de l’édit de Nantes, et abrités à Guernesey, avaient accroché ce cadre à ce mur pour porter témoignage. On y lisait, si l’on parvenait à déchiffrer une écriture lourde et une encre jaunie, les faits peu connus que voici: — Le 29 octobre 1685, démolition des temples de Morcerf et de Nanteuil, demandée au Roy par M. l’évêque de Meaux.” — « le 2 avril 1686, arrestation de Cochard père et fils pour religion, à la prière de M. l’évêque de Meaux. Relâchés; les Cochard ayant abjuré.” — « le 28 octobre 1699, M. l’évêque de Meaux envoie à M. De Pontchartrain un mémoire remontrant qu’il serait nécessaire de mettre les demoiselles de Chalandes et de Neuville, qui sont de la religion réformée, dans la maison des nouvelles-catholiques de Paris.” — « le 7 juillet 1703, est exécuté l’ordre demandé au Roy par M. l’évêque de Meaux de faire enfermer à l’hôpital le nommé Baudoin et sa femme, mauvais catholiques de Fublaines.”

Au fond de la salle, près de la porte de la chambre de mess Lethierry, un petit retranchement en planches qui avait été la chaire huguenote était devenu, grâce à un grillage avec chatière, « l’office” du bateau à vapeur, c’est-à-dire le bureau de la Durande, tenu par mess Lethierry en personne. Sur le vieux pupitre de chêne, un registre aux pages cotées Doit et Avoir remplaçait la bible.

IX

L'HOMME QUI AVAIT DEVINÉ RANTAINE

Tant que mess Lethierry avait pu naviguer, il avait conduit la Durande, et il n'avait pas eu d'autre pilote et d'autre capitaine que lui-même; mais il était venu une heure, nous l'avons dit, où mess Lethierry avait dû se faire remplacer. Il avait choisi pour cela sieur Clubin, de Torteval, homme silencieux. Sieur Clubin avait sur toute la côte un renom de probité sévère. C'était l'alter ego et le vicaire de mess Lethierry.

Sieur Clubin, quoiqu'il eût plutôt l'air d'un notaire que d'un matelot, était un marin capable et rare. Il avait tous les talents que veut le risque perpétuellement transformé. Il était arrimeur habile, gabier méticuleux, bosseman soigneux et connaisseur, timonier robuste, pilote savant, et hardi capitaine. Il était prudent, et il poussait quelquefois la prudence jusqu'à oser, ce qui est une grande qualité à la mer. Il avait la crainte du probable tempérée par l'instinct du possible. C'était un de ces marins qui affrontent le danger dans une proportion à eux connue et qui de toute aventure savent dégager le succès. Toute la certitude que la mer peut laisser à un homme, il l'avait. Sieur Clubin, en outre, était un nageur renommé; il était de cette race d'hommes rompus à la gymnastique de la vague, qui restent tant qu'on veut dans l'eau, qui, à Jersey, partent du Havre-des-Pas, doublent la Colette, font le tour de l'ermitage et du château Élisabeth, et reviennent au bout de deux heures à leur point de départ. Il était de Torteval, et il passait pour avoir souvent fait à la nage le trajet redouté des Hanois à la pointe de Plainmont.

Une des choses qui avaient le plus recommandé sieur Clubin à mess Lethierry, c'est que, connaissant ou pénétrant Rantaine, il avait signalé à mess Lethierry l'improbité de cet homme, et lui avait dit: — Rantaine vous volera. Ce qui s'était vérifié. Plus d'une fois, pour des objets, il est vrai, peu importants, mess Lethierry avait mis à l'épreuve l'honnêteté, poussée jusqu'au scrupule, de sieur Clubin, et il se reposait de ses affaires sur lui. Mess Lethierry disait: Toute conscience veut toute confiance.

X

LES RÉCITS DE LONG COURS

Mess Lethierry, mal à l’aise autrement, portait toujours ses habits de bord, et plutôt sa vareuse de matelot que sa vareuse de pilote. Cela faisait plisser le petit nez de Déruchette. Rien n’est joli comme les grimaces de la grâce en colère. Elle grondait et riait. — Bon père, s’écriait-elle, pouah! Vous sentez le goudron. et elle lui donnait une petite tape sur sa grosse épaule.

Ce bon vieux héros de la mer avait rapporté de ses voyages des récits surprenants. Il avait vu à Madagascar des plumes d’oiseau dont trois suffisaient à faire le toit d’une maison. Il avait vu dans l’Inde des tiges d’oseille hautes de neuf pieds. Il avait vu dans la Nouvelle-Hollande des troupeaux de dindons et d’oies menés et gardés par un chien de berger qui est un oiseau, et qu’on appelle l’agami. Il avait vu des cimetières d’éléphants. Il avait vu en Afrique des gorilles, espèces d’hommes-tigres, de sept pieds de haut. Il connaissait les mœurs de tous les singes, depuis le macaque sauvage qu’il appelait macaco bravo jusqu’au macaque hurleur qu’il appelait macaco barbado. Au Chili, il avait vu une guenon attendrir les chasseurs en leur montrant son petit. Il avait vu en Californie un tronc d’arbre creux tombé à terre dans l’intérieur duquel un homme à cheval pouvait faire cent cinquante pas. Il avait vu au Maroc les mozabites et les biskris se battre à coups de matraks et de barres de fer, les biskris pour avoir été traités de kelb, qui veut dire chiens, et les mozabites pour avoir été traités de khamsi, qui veut dire gens de la cinquième secte. Il avait vu en Chine couper en petits morceaux le pirate Chanh-Thong-Quan-Larh-Quoi, pour avoir assassiné le âp d’un village. À Thun-Daû-Môt, il avait vu un lion enlever une vieille femme en plein marché de la ville. Il avait assisté à l’arrivée du grand serpent venant de Canton à Saïgon pour célébrer dans la pagode de Cholen la fête de Quannam, déesse des navigateurs. Il avait contemplé chez les Moï le grand Quan-Sû. À Rio-Janeiro, il avait vu les dames brésiliennes se mettre le soir dans les cheveux de petites bulles de gaze contenant chacune une vagalumes, belle mouche à phosphore, ce qui les coiffe d’étoiles. Il avait combattu dans l’Uruguay les fourmilières et dans le Paraguay les araignées d’oiseaux, velues, grosses comme une tête d’enfant, couvrant de leurs pattes un diamètre d’un tiers d’aune, et attaquant l’homme, auquel elles lancent leurs poils qui s’enfoncent comme des flèches dans la chair et y soulèvent des pustules. Sur le fleuve Arinos, affluent du Tocantins, dans les forêts vierges au nord de Diamantina, il avait constaté l’effrayant peuple chauve-souris, les murcilagos, hommes qui naissent avec les cheveux blancs et les yeux rouges, habitent le sombre des bois, dorment le jour, s’éveillent la nuit, et pêchent et chassent dans les ténèbres, y voyant mieux quand il n’y a pas de lune. Près de Beyrouth, dans un campement d’une expédition dont il faisait partie, un pluviomètre ayant été volé dans une tente, un sorcier, habillé de deux ou trois bandelettes de cuir et ressemblant à un homme qui serait vêtu de ses bretelles, avait si furieusement agité une sonnette au bout d’une corne qu’une hyène était venue rapporter le pluviomètre. Cette hyène était la voleuse. Ces histoires vraies ressemblaient tant à des contes qu’elles amusaient Déruchette.

La poupée de la Durande était le lien entre le bateau et la fille. On nomme poupée dans les îles normandes la figure taillée dans la proue, statue de bois sculptée à peu près. De là, pour dire naviguer, cette locution locale, être entre poupe et poupée.

la poupée de la Durande était particulièrement chère à mess Lethierry. Il l’avait commandée au charpentier ressemblante à Déruchette. Elle ressemblait à coups de hache. C’était une bûche faisant effort pour être une jolie fille.

Ce bloc légèrement difforme faisait illusion à mess

Lethierry. Il le considérait avec une contemplation de croyant. Il était de bonne foi devant cette figure. Il y reconnaissait parfaitement Déruchette. C’est un peu comme cela que le dogme ressemble à la vérité, et l’idole à Dieu.

Mess Lethierry avait deux grandes joies par semaine; une joie le mardi et une joie le vendredi. Première joie, voir partir la Durande; deuxième joie, la voir revenir. Il s’accoudait à sa fenêtre, regardait son œuvre, et était heureux. Il y a quelque chose de cela dans la Genèse. Et vidit quod esset bonum.

Le vendredi, la présence de mess Lethierry à sa fenêtre valait un signal. Quand on voyait, à la croisée des Bravées, s’allumer sa pipe, on disait: Ah! Le bateau à vapeur est à l’horizon. Une fumée annonçait l’autre.

La Durande en rentrant au port nouait son câble sous les fenêtres de mess Lethierry à un gros anneau de fer scellé dans le soubassement des Bravées.

Ces nuits-là, Lethierry faisait un admirable somme dans son branle, sentant d’un côté Déruchette endormie et de l’autre Durande amarrée.

Le lieu d’amarrage de la Durande était voisin de la cloche du port. Il y avait là, devant la porte des Bravées, un petit bout de quai.

Ce quai, les Bravées, la maison, le jardin, les ruettes bordées de haies, la plupart même des habitations environnantes, n’existent plus aujourd’hui. L’exploitation du granit de Guernesey a fait vendre ces terrains. Tout cet emplacement est occupé, à l’heure où nous sommes, par des chantiers de casseurs de pierres.

XI

COUP D'ŒIL SUR LES MARIS ÉVENTUELS

Déruchette grandissait, et ne se mariait pas.

Mess Lethierry, en en faisant une fille aux mains blanches, l'avait rendue difficile. Ces éducations-là se retournent plus tard contre vous.

Du reste, il était, quant à lui, plus difficile encore. Le mari qu'il imaginait pour Déruchette était aussi un peu un mari pour Durande. Il eût voulu pourvoir d'un coup ses deux filles. Il eût voulu que le conducteur de l'une pût être aussi le pilote de l'autre. Qu'est-ce qu'un mari? C'est le capitaine d'une traversée. Pourquoi pas le même patron à la fille et au bateau? Un ménage obéit aux marées. Qui sait mener une barque sait mener une femme. Ce sont les deux sujettes de la lune et du vent. Sieur Clubin, n'ayant guère que quinze ans de moins que mess Lethierry, ne pouvait être pour Durande qu'un patron provisoire; il fallait un pilote jeune, un patron définitif, un vrai successeur du fondateur, de l'inventeur, du créateur. Le pilote définitif de Durande serait un peu le gendre de mess Lethierry. Pourquoi ne pas fondre les deux gendres dans un? Il caressait cette idée. Il voyait, lui aussi, apparaître dans ses songes un fiancé. Un puissant gabier basané et fauve, athlète de la mer, voilà son idéal. Ce n'était pas tout à fait celui de Déruchette. Elle faisait un rêve plus rose.

Quoi qu'il en fût, l'oncle et la nièce semblaient être d'accord pour ne point se hâter. Quand on avait vu Déruchette devenir une héritière probable, les partis s'étaient présentés en foule. Ces empressements-là ne sont pas toujours de bonne qualité. Mess Lethierry le sentait. Il grommelait: fille d'or, épouseur de cuivre. Et il éconduisait les prétendants. Il attendait. Elle de même.

Chose singulière, il tenait peu à l'aristocratie. De ce côté-là, mess Lethierry était un anglais invraisemblable. On croira difficilement qu'il avait été jusqu'à refuser pour Déruchette un Ganduel, de Jersey, et un Bugnet-Nicolin, de Serk. On n'a pas même craint d'affirmer, mais nous doutons que cela soit possible, qu'il n'avait point accepté une ouverture venant de l'aristocratie d'Aurigny, et qu'il avait décliné les propositions d'un membre de la famille Édou, laquelle évidemment descend d'Édouard le confesseur.

XII

EXCEPTION DANS LE CARACTÈRE DE LETHIERRY

Mess Lethierry avait un défaut; un gros. Il haïssait, non quelqu’un, mais quelque chose, le prêtre. Un jour, lisant, — car il lisait, — dans Voltaire, — car il lisait Voltaire, — ces mots: « les prêtres sont des chats”, il posa le livre, et on l’entendit grommeler à demi-voix: je me sens chien.

Il faut se souvenir que les prêtres, les luthériens et les calvinistes comme les catholiques, l’avaient, dans sa création du Devil-Boat local, vivement combattu et doucement persécuté. Être révolutionnaire en navigation, essayer d’ajuster un progrès à l’archipel normand, faire essuyer à la pauvre petite île de Guernesey les plâtres d’une invention nouvelle, c’était là, nous ne l’avons point dissimulé, une témérité damnable. Aussi l’avait-on un peu damné. Nous parlons ici, qu’on ne l’oublie pas, du clergé ancien, bien différent du clergé actuel, qui, dans presque toutes les églises locales, a une tendance libérale vers le progrès. On avait entravé Lethierry de cent manières; toute la quantité d’obstacles qu’il peut y avoir dans les prêches et dans les sermons lui avait été opposée. Détesté des hommes d’église, il les détestait. Leur haine était la circonstance atténuante de la sienne.

Mais, disons-le, son aversion des prêtres était idiosyncrasique. Il n’avait pas besoin pour les haïr, d’en être haï. Comme il le disait, il était le chien de ces chats. Il était contre eux par l’idée, et, ce qui est le plus irréductible, par l’instinct. Il sentait leurs griffes latentes, et il montrait les dents. Un peu à tort et à travers, convenons-en, et pas toujours à propos. Ne point distinguer est un tort. Il n’y a pas de bonne haine en bloc. Le vicaire savoyard n’eût point trouvé grâce devant lui. Il n’est pas sûr que, pour mess Lethierry, il y eût un bon prêtre. À force d’être philosophe, il perdait un peu de sagesse. L’intolérance des tolérants existe, de même que la rage des modérés. Mais Lethierry était si débonnaire qu’il ne pouvait être vraiment haineux. Il repoussait plutôt qu’il n’attaquait. Il tenait les gens d’église à distance. Ils lui avaient fait du mal, il se bornait à ne pas leur vouloir de bien. La nuance entre leur haine et la sienne, c’est que la leur était animosité, et que la sienne était antipathie.

Guernesey, toute petite île qu’elle est, a de la place pour deux religions. Elle contient de la religion catholique et de la religion protestante. Ajoutons qu’elle ne met point les deux religions dans la même église. Chaque culte a son temple ou sa chapelle à part. En Allemagne, à Heidelberg, par exemple, on n’y fait pas tant de façons; on coupe l’église en deux; une moitié à saint Pierre, une moitié à Calvin; entre deux, une cloison pour prévenir les gourmades; parts égales; les catholiques ont trois autels, les huguenots ont trois autels; comme ce sont les mêmes heures d’offices, la cloche unique sonne à la fois pour les deux services. Elle appelle en même temps à Dieu et au diable. Simplification.

Le flegme allemand s’accommode de ces voisinages. Mais à Guernesey chaque religion est chez elle. Il y a la paroisse orthodoxe et il y a la paroisse hérétique. On peut choisir. Ni l’une, ni l’autre; tel avait été le choix de mess Lethierry.

Ce matelot, cet ouvrier, ce philosophe, ce parvenu du travail, très simple en apparence, n’était pas du tout simple au fond. Il avait ses contradictions et ses opiniâtretés. Sur le prêtre, il était inébranlable. Il eût rendu des points à Montlosier.

Il se permettait des railleries très déplacées. Il avait des mots à lui, bizarres, mais ayant un sens. Aller à confesse, il appelait cela « peigner sa conscience”. Le peu de lettres qu’il avait, bien peu, une certaine lecture glanée çà et là, entre deux bourrasques, se compliquait de fautes d’orthographe. Il avait aussi des fautes de prononciation, pas toujours naïves. Quand la paix fut faite par Waterloo entre la France de Louis XVIII et l’Angleterre de Wellington, mess Lethierry dit: Bourmont a été le traître d’union entre les deux camps. Une fois il écrivit papauté, pape ôté. Nous ne pensons pas que ce fût exprès.

Cet antipapisme ne lui conciliait point les anglicans. Il n’était pas plus aimé des recteurs protestants que des curés catholiques. En présence des dogmes les plus graves, son irréligion éclatait presque sans retenue. Un hasard l’ayant conduit à un sermon sur l’enfer du révérend Jaquemin Hérode, sermon magnifique rempli d’un bout à l’autre de textes sacrés prouvant les peines éternelles, les supplices, les tourments, les damnations, les châtiments inexorables, les brûlements sans fin, les malédictions inextinguibles, les colères de la toute-puissance, les fureurs célestes, les vengeances divines, choses incontestables, on l’entendit, en sortant avec un des fidèles, dire doucement: — Voyez-vous, moi, j’ai une drôle d’idée. Je m’imagine que Dieu est bon.

Ce levain d’athéisme lui venait de son séjour en France.

Quoique guernesiais, et assez pur sang, on l’appelait dans l’île « le français”, à cause de son esprit improper. Lui-même ne s’en cachait point, il était imprégné d’idées subversives. Son acharnement de faire ce bateau à vapeur, ce Devil-Boat, l’avait bien prouvé. Il disait: J’ai tété 89. Ce n’est point là un bon lait.

Du reste, des contre-sens, il en faisait. Il est très difficile de rester entier dans les petits pays. En France, garder les apparences, en Angleterre, être respectable, la vie tranquille est à ce prix. Être respectable, cela implique une foule d’observances, depuis le dimanche bien sanctifié jusqu’à la cravate bien mise. « Ne pas se faire montrer au doigt”, voilà encore une loi terrible. Être montré au doigt, c’est le diminutif de l’anathème. Les petites villes, marais de commères, excellent dans cette malignité isolante, qui est la malédiction vue par le petit bout de la lorgnette. Les plus vaillants redoutent ce raca. On affronte la mitraille, on affronte l’ouragan, on recule devant Mme Pimbêche. Mess Lethierry était plutôt tenace que logique. Mais, sous cette pression, sa ténacité même fléchissait. Il mettait, autre locution pleine de concessions latentes, et parfois inavouables, « de l’eau dans son vin”. Il se tenait à l’écart des hommes du clergé, mais il ne leur fermait point résolûment sa porte. Aux occasions officielles et aux époques voulues des visites pastorales, il recevait d’une façon suffisante, soit le recteur luthérien, soit le chapelain papiste. Il lui arrivait, de loin en loin, d’accompagner à la paroisse anglicane Déruchette, laquelle elle-même, nous l’avons dit, n’y allait qu’aux quatre grandes fêtes de l’année.

Somme toute, ces compromis, qui lui coûtaient, l’irritaient, et, loin de l’incliner vers les gens d’église, augmentaient son escarpement intérieur. Il s’en dédommageait par plus de moquerie. Cet être sans amertume n’avait d’âcreté que de ce côté-là. Aucun moyen de l’amender là-dessus.

De fait et absolument, c’était son tempérament, et il fallait en prendre son parti.

Tout clergé lui déplaisait. Il avait l’irrévérence révolutionnaire. D’une forme à l’autre du culte il distinguait peu. Il ne rendait même pas justice à ce grand progrès: ne point croire à la présence réelle. Sa myopie en ces choses allait jusqu’à ne point voir la nuance entre un ministre et un abbé. Il confondait un révérend docteur avec un révérend père. Il disait: Wesley ne vaut pas mieux que Loyola. Quand il voyait passer un pasteur avec sa femme, il se détournait. Prêtre marié! disait-il, avec l’accent absurde que ces deux mots avaient en France à cette époque. Il contait qu’à son dernier voyage en Angleterre, il avait vu « l’évêchesse de Londres”. Ses révoltes sur ce genre d’unions allaient jusqu’à la colère. — Une robe n’épouse pas une robe! s’écriait-il. — Le sacerdoce lui faisait l’effet d’un sexe. Il eût volontiers dit: « Ni homme, ni femme; prêtre”. Il appliquait, avec mauvais goût, au clergé anglican et au clergé papiste, les mêmes épithètes dédaigneuses; il enveloppait les deux « soutanes” dans la même phraséologie; et il ne se donnait pas la peine de varier, à propos des prêtres, quels qu’ils fussent, catholiques ou luthériens, les métonymies soldatesques usitées dans ce temps-là. Il disait à Déruchette: Marie-toi avec qui tu voudras, pourvu que ce ne soit pas avec un calotin.

L'INSOUCIANCE FAIT PARTIE DE LA GRÂCE

Une fois une parole dite, mess Lethierry s'en souvenait; une fois une parole dite, Déruchette l'oubliait. Là était la nuance entre l'oncle et la nièce.

Déruchette, élevée comme on l'a vu, s'était accoutumée à peu de responsabilité. Il y a, insistons-y, plus d'un péril latent dans une éducation pas assez prise au sérieux. Vouloir faire son enfant heureux trop tôt, c'est peut-être une imprudence.

Déruchette croyait que, pourvu qu'elle fût contente, tout était bien. Elle sentait d'ailleurs son oncle joyeux de la voir joyeuse. Elle avait à peu près les idées de mess Lethierry. Sa religion se satisfaisait d'aller à la paroisse quatre fois par an. On l'a vue en toilette pour Noël. De la vie, elle ignorait tout. Elle avait tout ce qu'il faut pour être un jour folle d'amour. En attendant, elle était gaie.

Elle chantait au hasard, jasait au hasard, vivait devant elle, jetait un mot et passait, faisait une chose et fuyait, était charmante. Joignez à cela la liberté anglaise. En Angleterre les enfants vont seuls, les filles sont leurs maîtresses, l'adolescence a la bride sur le cou. Telles sont les mœurs. Plus tard ces filles libres font des femmes esclaves. Nous prenons ici ces deux mots en bonne part; libres dans la croissance, esclaves dans le devoir.

Déruchette s'éveillait chaque matin avec l'inconscience de ses actions de la veille. Vous l'eussiez bien embarrassée en lui demandant ce qu'elle avait fait la semaine passée. Ce qui ne l'empêchait pas d'avoir, à de certaines heures troubles, un malaise mystérieux, et de sentir on ne sait quel passage du sombre de la vie sur son épanouissement et sur sa joie. Ces azurs-là ont ces nuages-là. Mais ces nuages s'en allaient vite. Elle en sortait par un éclat de rire, ne sachant pourquoi elle avait été triste ni pourquoi elle était sereine. Elle jouait avec tout. Son espièglerie becquetait les passants. Elle faisait des malices aux garçons. Si elle eût rencontré le diable, elle n'en eût pas eu pitié, elle lui eût fait une niche. Elle était jolie, et en même temps si innocente, qu'elle en abusait. Elle donnait un sourire comme un jeune chat donne un coup de griffe. Tant pis pour l'égratigné. Elle n'y songeait plus. Hier n'existait pas pour elle; elle vivait dans la plénitude d'aujourd'hui.

Voilà ce que c’est que trop de bonheur. Chez Déruchette le souvenir s’évanouissait comme la neige fond.

PREMIÈRES ROUGEURS D’UNE AURORE OU D’UN INCENDIE

Gilliatt n’avait jamais parlé à Déruchette. Il la connaissait pour l’avoir vue de loin, comme on connaît l’étoile du matin.

À l’époque où Déruchette avait rencontré Gilliatt dans le chemin de Saint-Pierre-Port au Valle et lui avait fait la surprise d’écrire son nom sur la neige, elle avait seize ans. La veille précisément, mess Lethierry lui avait dit: Ne fais plus d’enfantillages. Te voilà grande fille.

Ce nom, Gilliatt, écrit par cette enfant, était tombé dans une profondeur inconnue.

Qu’était-ce que les femmes pour Gilliatt? Lui-même n’aurait pu le dire. Quand il en rencontrait une, il lui faisait peur, et il en avait peur. Il ne parlait à une femme qu’à la dernière extrémité. Il n’avait jamais été « le galant” d’aucune campagnarde. Quand il était seul dans un chemin et qu’il voyait une femme venir vers lui, il enjambait une clôture de courtil ou se fourrait dans une broussaille et s’en allait. Il évitait même les vieilles. Il avait vu dans sa vie une parisienne. Une parisienne de passage, étrange évènement pour Guernesey à cette époque lointaine. Et Gilliatt avait entendu cette parisienne raconter en ces termes ses malheurs: « Je suis très ennuyée, je viens de recevoir des gouttes de pluie sur mon chapeau, il est abricot, et c’est une couleur qui ne pardonne pas”. Ayant trouvé plus tard, entre les feuillets d’un livre, une ancienne gravure de modes représentant « une dame de la chaussée d’Antin” en grande toilette, il l’avait collée à son mur, en souvenir de cette apparition. Les soirs d’été, il se cachait derrière les rochers de la crique houmet-paradis pour voir les paysannes se baigner en chemise dans la mer. Un jour, à travers une haie, il avait regardé la sorcière de Torteval remettre sa jarretière. Il était probablement vierge.

Ce matin de Noël où il rencontra Déruchette et où elle écrivit son nom en riant, il rentra chez lui ne sachant plus pourquoi il était sorti. La nuit venue, il ne dormit pas. Il songea à mille choses; — qu’il ferait bien de cultiver des radis noirs dans son jardin; que l’exposition était bonne; — qu’il n’avait pas vu passer le bateau de Serk; était-il arrivé quelque chose à ce bateau? — qu’il avait vu des trique-madame en fleur, chose rare pour la saison. Il n’avait jamais su au juste ce que lui était la vieille femme qui était morte, il se dit que décidément elle devait être sa mère, et il pensa à elle avec un redoublement de tendresse. Il pensa au trousseau de femme qui était dans la malle de cuir. Il pensa que le révérend Jaquemin Hérode serait probablement un jour ou l’autre nommé doyen de Saint-Pierre-Port subrogé de l’évêque, et que le rectorat de Saint-Sampson deviendrait vacant. Il pensa que le lendemain de Noël on serait au vingt-septième jour de la lune, et que par conséquent la haute mer serait à trois heures vingt et une minutes, la demi-retirée à sept heures quinze, la basse mer à neuf heures trente-trois, et la demi-montée à douze heures trente-neuf. Il se rappela dans les moindres détails le costume du highlander qui lui avait vendu le bag-pipe, son bonnet orné d’un chardon, sa claymore, son habit serré aux pans courts et carrés, son jupon, le scilt or philaberg, orné de la bourse sporran et du smushing-mull, tabatière de corne, son épingle faite d’une pierre écossaise, ses deux ceintures, la sashwise et le belts, son épée, le swond, son coutelas, le dirck, et le skene dhu, couteau noir à poignée noire ornée de deux cairgorums, et les genoux nus de ce soldat, ses bas, ses guêtres quadrillées et ses souliers à boucles. Cet équipement devint un spectre, le poursuivit, lui donna la fièvre, et l’assoupit. Il se réveilla au grand jour, et sa première pensée fut Déruchette.

Le lendemain il dormit, mais il revit toute la nuit le soldat écossais. Il se dit à travers son sommeil que les chefs-plaids d’après Noël seraient tenus le 21 janvier. Il rêva aussi du vieux recteur Jaquemin Hérode. En se réveillant il songea à Déruchette, et il eut contre elle une violente colère; il regretta de ne plus être petit, parce qu’il irait jeter des pierres dans ses carreaux.

Puis il pensa que, s’il était petit, il aurait sa mère, et il se mit à pleurer.

Il forma le projet d’aller passer trois mois à Chousey ou aux Minquiers. Pourtant il ne partit pas.

Il ne remit plus les pieds dans la route de Saint-Pierre-Port au Valle.

Il se figurait que son nom, Gilliatt, était resté là gravé sur la terre et que tous les passants devaient le regarder.

II

ENTRÉE, PAS À PAS, DANS L'INCONNU

En revanche, il voyait tous les jours les Bravées. Il ne le faisait pas exprès, mais il allait de ce côté-là. Il se trouvait que son chemin était toujours de passer par le sentier qui longeait le mur du jardin de Déruchette.

Un matin, comme il était dans ce sentier, une femme du marché qui revenait des Bravées dit à une autre: Miss Lethierry aime les seakales.

Il fit dans son jardin du Bû de la Rue une fosse à seakales. Le seakale est un chou qui a le goût de l'asperge.

Le mur du jardin des Bravées était très bas; on pouvait l'enjamber. L'idée de l'enjamber lui eût paru épouvantable. Mais il n'était pas défendu d'entendre en passant, comme tout le monde, les voix des personnes qui parlaient dans les chambres ou dans le jardin. Il n'écoutait pas, mais il entendait. Une fois, il entendit les deux servantes, Douce et Grâce, se quereller. C'était un bruit de la maison. Cette querelle lui resta dans l'oreille comme une musique.

Une autre fois, il distingua une voix qui n'était pas comme celle des autres et qui lui sembla devoir être la voix de Déruchette. Il prit la fuite.

Les paroles que cette voix avait prononcées demeurèrent à jamais gravées dans sa pensée. Il se les redisait à chaque instant. Ces paroles étaient: Vous plairait-il me bailler le genêt?

Par degrés il s'enhardit. Il osa s'arrêter. Il arriva une fois que Déruchette, impossible à apercevoir du dehors, quoique sa fenêtre fût ouverte, était à son piano, et chantait. Elle chantait son air Bonny Dundee. Il devint très pâle, mais il poussa la fermeté jusqu'à écouter.

Le printemps arriva. Un jour, Gilliatt eut une vision; le ciel s'ouvrit. Gilliatt vit Déruchette arroser des laitues.

Bientôt, il fit plus que s'arrêter. Il observa ses habitudes, il remarqua ses heures, et il l'attendit.

Il avait bien soin de ne pas se montrer.

Peu à peu, en même temps que les massifs se remplissaient de papillons et de roses, immobile et muet des heures entières, caché derrière ce mur, vu de personne, retenant son haleine, il s’habitua à voir Déruchette aller et venir dans le jardin. On s’accoutume au poison.

De la cachette où il était, il entendait souvent Déruchette causer avec mess Lethierry sous une épaisse tonnelle de charmille où il y avait un banc. Les paroles venaient distinctement jusqu’à lui.

Que de chemin il avait fait! Maintenant il en était venu à guetter et à prêter l’oreille. Hélas! Le cœur humain est un vieil espion.

Il y avait un autre banc, visible et tout proche, au bord d’une allée. Déruchette s’y asseyait quelquefois.

D’après les fleurs qu’il voyait Déruchette cueillir et respirer, il avait deviné ses goûts en fait de parfums. Le liseron était l’odeur qu’elle préférait, puis l’œillet, puis le chèvrefeuille, puis le jasmin. La rose n’était que la cinquième. Elle regardait le lys, mais elle ne le respirait pas.

D’après ce choix de parfums, Gilliatt la composait dans sa pensée. À chaque odeur il rattachait une perfection.

La seule idée d’adresser la parole à Déruchette lui faisait dresser les cheveux.

Une bonne vieille chineuse, que son industrie ambulante ramenait de temps en temps dans la ruette longeant l’enclos des Bravées, en vint à remarquer confusément les assiduités de Gilliatt pour cette muraille et sa dévotion à ce lieu désert. Rattacha-t-elle la présence de cet homme devant ce mur à la possibilité d’une femme derrière ce mur? Aperçut-elle ce vague fil invisible? Était-elle, en sa décrépitude mendiante, restée assez jeune pour se rappeler quelque chose des belles années, et savait-elle encore, dans son hiver et dans sa nuit, ce que c’est que l’aube? Nous l’ignorons, mais il paraît qu’une fois, en passant près de Gilliatt « faisant sa faction”, elle dirigea de son côté toute la quantité de sourire dont elle était encore capable, et grommela entre ses gencives: ça chauffe.

Gilliatt entendit ces mots, il en fut frappé, il murmura avec un point d’interrogation intérieur: — Ça chauffe? Que veut dire cette vieille? — Il répéta machinalement le mot toute la journée, mais il ne le comprit pas.

Un soir qu’il était à sa fenêtre du Bû de la Rue, cinq ou six jeunes filles de l’ancresse vinrent par partie de plaisir se baigner dans la crique de Houmet. Elles jouaient dans l’eau, très naïvement, à cent pas de lui. Il ferma sa fenêtre violemment. Il s’aperçut qu’une femme nue lui faisait horreur.

L’AIR « BONNY DUNDEE” TROUVE UN ÉCHO DANS LA COLLINE

Derrière l’enclos du jardin des Bravées, un angle de mur couvert de houx et de lierre, encombré d’orties, avec une mauve sauvage arborescente et un grand bouillon-blanc poussant dans les granits, ce fut dans ce recoin qu’il passa à peu près tout son été. Il était là, inexprimablement pensif. Les lézards, accoutumés à lui, se chauffaient dans les mêmes pierres au soleil. L’été fut lumineux et caressant. Gilliatt avait au-dessus de sa tête le va-et-vient des nuages. Il était assis sur une pierre dans l’herbe. Tout était plein de bruits d’oiseaux. Il se prenait le front à deux mains et se demandait: Mais enfin pourquoi a-t-elle écrit mon nom sur la neige? Le vent de mer jetait au loin de grands souffles. Par intervalles, dans la carrière lointaine de la Vaudue, la trompe des mineurs grondait brusquement, avertissant les passants de s’écarter et qu’une mine allait faire explosion. On ne voyait pas le port de Saint-Sampson, mais on voyait les pointes des mâts par-dessus les arbres. Les mouettes volaient, éparses. Gilliatt avait entendu sa mère dire que les femmes pouvaient être amoureuses des hommes, que cela arrivait quelquefois. Il se répondait: Voilà. Je comprends, Déruchette est amoureuse de moi. Il se sentait profondément triste. Il se disait: Mais elle aussi, elle pense à moi de son côté; c’est bien fait. Il songeait que Déruchette était riche, et que, lui, il était pauvre. Il pensait que le bateau à vapeur était une exécrable invention. Il ne pouvait jamais se rappeler quel quantième du mois on était. Il regardait vaguement les gros bourdons noirs à croupes jaunes et à ailes courtes qui s’enfoncent avec bruit dans les trous des murailles.

Un soir, Déruchette rentrait se coucher. Elle s’approcha de sa fenêtre pour la fermer. La nuit était obscure. Tout à coup Déruchette prêta l’oreille. Dans cette profondeur d’ombre il y avait une musique. Quelqu’un qui était probablement sur le versant de la colline, ou au pied des tours du château du Valle, ou peut-être plus loin encore, exécutait un air sur un instrument. Déruchette reconnut sa mélodie favorite Bonny Dundee jouée sur le bag-pipe. Elle n’y comprit rien.

Depuis ce moment, cette musique se renouvela de temps en temps à la même heure, particulièrement dans les nuits très noires.

Déruchette n’aimait pas beaucoup cela.

IV

Pour l’oncle et le tuteur, bonshommes taciturnes,
Les sérénades sont des tapages nocturnes.
(Vers d’une comédie inédite.)

Quatre années passèrent.

Déruchette approchait de ses vingt et un ans et n’était toujours pas mariée.

Quelqu’un a écrit quelque part: — Une idée fixe, c’est une vrille. Chaque année elle s’enfonce d’un tour. Si on veut nous l’extirper la première année, on nous tirera les cheveux; la deuxième année, on nous déchirera la peau; la troisième année, on nous brisera l’os; la quatrième année, on nous arrachera la cervelle.

Gilliatt en était à cette quatrième année-là.

Il n’avait pas encore dit une parole à Déruchette. Il songeait du côté de cette charmante fille. C’était tout.

Il était arrivé qu’une fois, se trouvant par hasard à Saint-Sampson, il avait vu Déruchette causant avec mess Lethierry devant la porte des Bravées qui s’ouvrait sur la chaussée du port. Gilliatt s’était risqué à approcher très près. Il croyait être sûr qu’au moment où il avait passé elle avait souri. Il n’y avait à cela rien d’impossible.

Déruchette entendait toujours de temps en temps le bag-pipe.

Ce bag-pipe, mess Lethierry aussi l’entendait. Il avait fini par remarquer cet acharnement de musique sous les fenêtres de Déruchette. Musique tendre, circonstance aggravante. Un galant nocturne n’était pas de son goût. Il voulait marier Déruchette le jour venu, quand elle voudrait et quand il voudrait, purement et simplement, sans roman et sans musique. Impatienté, il avait guetté, et il croyait bien avoir entrevu Gilliatt. Il s’était passé les ongles dans les favoris, signe de colère, et il avait grommelé: Qu’a-t-il à piper, cet animal-là? Il aime Déruchette, c’est clair. Tu perds ton temps. Qui veut Déruchette doit s’adresser à moi, et pas en jouant de la flûte.

Un évènement considérable, prévu depuis longtemps, s’accomplit. On annonça que le révérend Jaquemin Hérode était nommé subrogé de l’évêque de Winchester, doyen de l’île et recteur de Saint-Pierre-Port, et qu’il quitterait Saint-Sampson pour Saint-Pierre immédiatement après avoir installé son successeur.

Le nouveau recteur ne pouvait tarder à arriver. Ce prêtre était un gentleman d'origine normande, monsieur Joë Ebenezer Caudray, anglaisé Cawdry.

On avait sur le futur recteur des détails que la bienveillance et la malveillance commentaient en sens inverse. On le disait jeune et pauvre, mais sa jeunesse était tempérée par beaucoup de doctrine et sa pauvreté par beaucoup d' es]pérance. Dans la langue spéciale créée pour l'héritage et la richesse, la mort s'appelle espérance. Il était le neveu et l'héritier du vieux et opulent doyen de Saint-Asaph. Ce doyen mort, il serait riche. M Ebenezer Caudray avait des parentés distinguées; il avait presque droit à la qualité d'honorable. Quant à sa doctrine, on la jugeait diversement. Il était anglican, mais, selon l'expression de l'évêque Tillotson, très « libertin", c'est-à-dire très sévère. Il répudiait le pharisaïsme; il se ralliait plutôt au presbytère qu'à l'épiscopat. Il faisait le rêve de la primitive église, où Adam avait le droit de choisir Éve, et où Frumentanus, évêque d'Hiérapolis, enlevait une fille pour en faire sa femme en disant aux parents: Elle le veut et je le veux, vous n'êtes plus son père et vous n'êtes plus sa mère, je suis l'ange d'Hiérapolis, et celle-ci est mon épouse. Le père, c'est Dieu. S'il fallait en croire ce qu'on disait, M. Ebenezer Caudray subordonnait le texte: Tes père et mère honoreras, au texte, selon lui supérieur: La femme est la chair de l'homme. La femme quittera son père et sa mère pour suivre son mari. Du reste, cette tendance à circonscrire l'autorité paternelle, et à favoriser religieusement tous les modes de formation du lien conjugal, est propre à tout le protestantisme, particulièrement en Angleterre et singulièrement en Amérique.

V

LE SUCCÈS JUSTE EST TOUJOURS HAÏ

Voici quel était à ce moment-là le bilan de mess Lethierry. La Durande avait tenu tout ce qu’elle avait promis. Mess Lethierry avait payé ses dettes, réparé ses brèches, acquitté les créances de Brême, fait face aux échéances de Saint-Malo. Il avait exonéré sa maison des Bravées des hypothèques qui la grevaient; il avait racheté toutes les petites rentes locales inscrites sur cette maison. Il était possesseur d’un grand capital productif, la Durande. Le revenu net du navire était maintenant de mille livres sterling et allait croissant. À proprement parler, la Durande était toute sa fortune. Elle était aussi la fortune du pays. Le transport des bœufs étant un des plus gros bénéfices du navire, on avait dû, pour améliorer l’arrimage et faciliter l’entrée et la sortie des bestiaux, supprimer les portemanteaux et les deux canots. C’était peut-être une imprudence. La Durande n’avait plus qu’une embarcation, la chaloupe. La chaloupe, il est vrai, était excellente.

Il s’était écoulé dix ans depuis le vol Rantaine.

Cette prospérité de la Durande avait un côté faible, c’est qu’elle n’inspirait point confiance; on la croyait un hasard. La situation de mess Lethierry n’était acceptée que comme exception. Il passait pour avoir fait une folie heureuse. Quelqu’un qui l’avait imité à Cowes, dans l’île de Wight, n’avait pas réussi. L’essai avait ruiné ses actionnaires. Lethierry disait: C’est que la machine était mal construite. Mais on hochait la tête. Les nouveautés ont cela contre elles que tout le monde leur en veut; le moindre faux pas les compromet. Un des oracles commerciaux de l’archipel normand, le banquier Jauge, de Paris, consulté sur une spéculation de bateaux à vapeur, avait, dit-on, répondu en tournant le dos: C’est une conversion que vous me proposez là. Conversion de l’argent en fumée. En revanche, les bateaux à voiles trouvaient des commandites tant qu’ils en voulaient. Les capitaux s’obstinaient pour la toile contre la chaudière. À Guernesey, la Durande était un fait, mais la vapeur n’était pas un principe. Tel est l’acharnement de la négation en présence du progrès. On disait de Lethierry: C’est bon, mais il ne recommencerait pas. Loin d’encourager, son exemple faisait peur. Personne n’eût osé risquer une deuxième Durande.

VI

CHANCE QU’ONT EUE CES NAUFRAGÉS DE RENCONTRER CE SLOOP

L’équinoxe s’annonce de bonne heure dans la Manche. C’est une mer étroite qui gêne le vent et l’irrite. Dès le mois de février, il y a commencement de vents d’ouest, et toute la vague est secouée en tous sens. La navigation devient inquiète; les gens de la côte regardent le mât de signal; on se préoccupe des navires qui peuvent être en détresse. La mer apparaît comme un guet-apens; un clairon invisible sonne on ne sait quelle guerre; de grands coups d’haleine furieuse bouleversent l’horizon; il fait un vent terrible. L’ombre siffle et souffle. Dans la profondeur des nuées la face noire de la tempête enfle ses joues.

Le vent est un danger; le brouillard en est un autre.

Les brouillards ont été de tout temps craints des navigateurs. Dans certains brouillards sont en suspension des prismes microscopiques de glace auxquels Mariotte attribue les halos, les parhélies et les parasélènes. Les brouillards orageux sont composites; des vapeurs diverses, de pesanteur spécifique inégale, s’y combinent avec la vapeur d’eau, et se superposent dans un ordre qui divise la brume en zones et fait du brouillard une véritable formation; l’iode est en bas, le soufre au-dessus de l’iode, le brome au-dessus du soufre, le phosphore au-dessus du brome. Ceci, dans une certaine mesure, en faisant la part de la tension électrique et magnétique, explique plusieurs phénomènes, le feu Saint-Elme de Colomb et de Magellan, les étoiles volantes mêlées aux navires dont parle Sénèque, les deux flammes Castor et Pollux dont parle Plutarque, la légion romaine dont César crut voir les javelots prendre feu, la pique du château de Duino dans le Frioul que le soldat de garde faisait étinceler en la touchant du fer de sa lance, et peut-être même ces fulgurations d’en bas que les anciens appelaient « les éclairs terrestres de Saturne”. À l’équateur, une immense brume permanente semble nouée autour du globe, c’est le cloud-ring, l’anneau de nuages. Le cloud-ring a pour fonction de refroidir le tropique, de même que le Gulf-Stream a pour fonction de réchauffer le pôle. Sous le cloud-ring, le brouillard est fatal. Ce sont les latitudes des chevaux, horse latitude; les navigateurs des derniers siècles jetaient là les chevaux à la mer, en temps d’orage pour s’alléger, en temps de calme pour économiser la provision d’eau. Colomb disait: Nube abaxo es muerte. « le nuage bas est la mort.” Les Étrusques, qui sont pour la météorologie ce que les chaldéens sont pour l’astronomie, avaient deux pontificats, le pontificat du tonnerre et le pontificat de la nuée; les fulgurateurs observaient les éclairs et les aquilèges observaient le brouillard. Le collège des prêtres-augures de Tarquinies était consulté par les Tyriens, les Phéniciens, les Pélasges, et tous les navigateurs primitifs de l’antique Marinterne. Le mode de génération des tempêtes était dès lors entrevu; il est intimement lié au mode de génération des brouillards, et c’est, à proprement parler, le même phénomène. Il existe sur l’océan trois régions des brumes, une équatoriale, deux polaires; les marins leur donnent un seul nom: le pot au noir.

Dans tous les parages et surtout dans la Manche, les brouillards d’équinoxe sont dangereux. Ils font brusquement la nuit sur la mer. Un des périls du brouillard, même quand il n’est pas très épais, c’est d’empêcher de reconnaître le changement de fond par le changement de couleur de l’eau; il en résulte une dissimulation redoutable de l’approche des brisants et des bas-fonds. On est près d’un écueil sans que rien vous en avertisse. Souvent les brouillards ne laissent au navire en marche d’autre ressource que de mettre en panne ou de jeter l’ancre. Il y a autant de naufrages de brouillard que de vent.

Pourtant, après une bourrasque fort violente qui succéda à une de ces journées de brouillard, le sloop de poste Cashmere arriva parfaitement d’Angleterre. Il entra à Saint-Pierre-Port au premier rayon du jour sortant de la mer, au moment même où le château Cornet tirait son coup de canon au soleil. Le ciel s’était éclairci. Le sloop Cashmere était attendu comme devant amener le nouveau recteur de Saint-Sampson. Peu après l’arrivée du sloop, le bruit se répandit dans la ville qu’il avait été accosté la nuit en mer par une chaloupe contenant un équipage naufragé.

CHANCE QU’A EUE CE FLÂNEUR D’ÊTRE APERÇU PAR CE PÊCHEUR

Cette nuit-là, Gilliatt, au moment où le vent avait molli, était allé pêcher, sans toutefois pousser la panse trop loin de la côte.

Comme il rentrait, à la marée montante, vers deux heures de l’après-midi, par un très beau soleil, en passant devant la corne de la bête pour gagner l’anse du Bû de la Rue, il lui sembla voir dans la projection de la chaise Gild-Holm-’Ur une ombre portée qui n’était pas celle du rocher. Il laissa arriver la panse de ce côté, et il reconnut qu’un homme était assis dans la chaise Gild-Holm-’Ur. La mer était déjà très haute, la roche était cernée par le flot, le retour n’était plus possible. Gilliatt fit à l’homme de grands gestes. L’homme resta immobile. Gilliatt approcha. L’homme était endormi.

Cet homme était vêtu de noir. — Cela a l’air d’un prêtre, pensa Gilliatt. Il approcha plus près encore, et vit un visage d’adolescent.

Ce visage lui était inconnu.

La roche heureusement était à pic, il y avait beaucoup de fond, Gilliatt effaça et parvint à élonger la muraille. La marée soulevait assez la barque pour que Gilliatt en se haussant debout sur le bord de la panse pût atteindre aux pieds de l’homme. Il se dressa sur le bordage et éleva les mains. S’il fût tombé en ce moment-là, il est douteux qu’il eût reparu sur l’eau. La lame battait. Entre la panse et le rocher l’écrasement était inévitable.

Il tira le pied de l’homme endormi.

— Hé, que faites-vous là?

L’homme se réveilla.

— Je regarde, dit-il.

Il se réveilla tout à fait et reprit:

— J’arrive dans le pays, je suis venu par ici en me promenant, j’ai passé la nuit en mer, j’ai trouvé la vue belle, j’étais fatigué, je me suis endormi.

— Dix minutes plus tard, vous étiez noyé, dit Gilliatt.

— Bah!

— Sautez dans ma barque.

Gilliatt maintint la barque du pied, se cramponna d’une main au rocher et tendit l’autre main à l’homme vêtu de noir, qui sauta lestement dans le bateau. C’était un très beau jeune homme.

Gilliatt prit l’aviron, et en deux minutes la panse arriva dans l’anse du Bû de la Rue.

Le jeune homme avait un chapeau rond et une cravate blanche. Sa longue redingote noire était boutonnée jusqu’à la cravate. Il avait des cheveux blonds en couronne, le visage féminin, l’œil pur, l’air grave.

Cependant la panse avait touché terre. Gilliatt passa le câble dans l’anneau d’amarre, puis se tourna, et vit la main très blanche du jeune homme qui lui présentait un souverain d’or.

Gilliatt écarta doucement cette main.

Il y eut un silence. Le jeune homme le rompit.

— Vous m’avez sauvé la vie.

— Peut-être, répondit Gilliatt.

L’amarre était nouée. Ils sortirent de la barque.

Le jeune homme reprit:

— Je vous dois la vie, monsieur.

— Qu’est-ce que ça fait?

Cette réponse de Gilliatt fut encore suivie d’un silence.

— Êtes-vous de cette paroisse? demanda le jeune homme.

— Non, répondit Gilliatt.

— De quelle paroisse êtes-vous?

Gilliatt leva la main droite, montra le ciel, et dit:

— De celle-ci.

Le jeune homme le salua et le quitta.

Au bout de quelques pas, le jeune homme s’arrêta, fouilla dans sa poche, en tira un livre, et revint vers Gilliatt en lui tendant le livre.

— Permettez-moi de vous offrir ceci.

Gilliatt prit le livre.

C’était une bible.

Un instant après, Gilliatt, accoudé sur son parapet, regardait le jeune homme tourner l’angle du sentier qui va à Saint-Sampson.

Peu à peu il baissa la tête, oublia ce nouveau venu, ne sut plus si la chaise Gild-Holm-’Ur existait, et tout disparut pour lui dans l’immersion sans fond de la rêverie. Gilliatt avait un abîme, Déruchette.

Une voix qui l’appelait le tira de cette ombre.

— Hé, Gilliatt!

Il reconnut la voix et leva les yeux.

— Qu'y a-t-il, sieur Landoys?

C'était en effet sieur Landoys qui passait sur la route à cent pas du Bû de la Rue dans son phiaton (phaéton) attelé de son petit cheval. Il s'était arrêté pour héler Gilliatt, mais il semblait affairé et pressé.

— Il y a du nouveau, Gilliatt.

— Où ça?

— Aux Bravées.

— Quoi donc?

— Je suis trop loin pour vous conter cela.

Gilliatt frissonna.

— Est-ce que miss Déruchette se marie?

— Non. Il s'en faut.

— Que voulez-vous dire?

— Allez aux Bravées. Vous le saurez.

Et sieur Landoys fouetta son cheval.

I. Les conversations de l’auberge Jean.

Sieur Clubin était l’homme qui attend une occasion. Il était petit et jaune avec la force d’un taureau. La mer n’avait pu réussir à le hâler. Sa chair semblait de cire. Il était de la couleur d’un cierge et il en avait la clarté discrète dans les yeux. Sa mémoire était quelque chose d’imperturbable et de particulier. Pour lui, voir un homme une fois, c’était l’avoir; comme on a une note dans un registre. Ce regard laconique empoignait. Sa prunelle prenait une épreuve d’un visage et la gardait; le visage avait beau vieillir, sieur Clubin le retrouvait. Impossible de dépister ce souvenir tenace. Sieur Clubin était bref, sobre, froid; jamais un geste. Son air de candeur gagnait tout d’abord. Beaucoup de gens le croyaient naïf; il avait au coin de l’oeil un pli d’une bêtise étonnante. Pas de meilleur marin que lui, nous l’avons dit; personne comme lui pour amurer une voile, pour baisser le point du vent, et pour maintenir avec l’écoute la voile orientée. Aucune réputation de religion et d’intégrité ne dépassait la sienne. Qui l’eût soupçonné eût été suspect. Il était lié d’amitié avec M Rébuchet, changeur à Saint-Malo, rue saint-Vincent, à côté de l’armurier, et M Rébuchet disait: je donnerais ma boutique à garder à Clubin. sieur Clubin était veuvier. Sa femme avait été l’honnête femme comme il était l’honnête homme. Elle était morte avec la renommée d’une vertu à tout rompre. Si le bailli lui eût conté fleurette, elle l’eût été dire au roi; et si le bon Dieu eût été amoureux d’elle, elle l’eût été dire au curé. Ce couple, sieur et dame Clubin, avait réalisé dans Torteval l’idéal de l’épithète anglaise, respectable. dame Clubin était le cygne; sieur Clubin était l’hermine. Il fût mort d’une tache. Il n’eût pu trouver une épingle sans en chercher le propriétaire.

Il eût tambouriné un paquet d’allumettes. Il était entré un jour dans un cabaret à Saint-Servan, et avait dit au cabaretier: j’ai déjeuné ici il y a trois ans, vous vous êtes trompé dans l’addition; et il avait remboursé au cabaretier soixante-cinq centimes. C’était une grande probité, avec un pincement de lèvres attentif. Il semblait en arrêt. Sur qui? Sur les coquins probablement. Tous les mardis il menait la durande de Guernesey à Saint-Malo. Il arrivait à Saint-Malo le mardi soir, séjournait deux jours pour faire son chargement, et repartait pour Guernesey le vendredi matin. Il y avait alors à Saint-Malo une petite hôtellerie sur le port qu'on appelait l'auberge Jean. La construction des quais actuels a démoli cette auberge. à cette époque la mer venait mouiller la porte saint-Vincent et la porte Dinan; Saint-Malo et Saint-Servan communiquaient à marée basse par des carrioles et des maringottes roulant et circulant entre les navires à sec, évitant les bouées, les ancres et les cordages, et risquant parfois de crever leur capote de cuir à une basse vergue ou à une barre de clin-foc. Entre deux marées, les cochers houspillaient leurs chevaux sur ce sable où, six heures après, le vent fouettait le flot. Sur cette même grève rôdaient jadis les vingt-quatre dogues portiers de Saint-Malo, qui mangèrent un officier de marine en 1770. Cet excès de zèle les a fait supprimer. Aujourd'hui l'on n'entend plus d'aboiements nocturnes entre le petit Talard et le grand Talard. Sieur Clubin descendait à l'auberge Jean. C'est là qu'était le bureau français de la durande. Les douaniers et les gardes-côtes venaient prendre leurs repas et boire à l'auberge Jean. Ils avaient leur table à part. Les douaniers de Binic se rencontraient là, utilement pour le service, avec les douaniers de Saint-Malo. Des patrons de navires y venaient aussi, mais mangeaient à une autre table. Sieur Clubin s'asseyait tantôt à l'une, tantôt à l'autre, plus volontiers pourtant à la table des douaniers qu'à celle des patrons. Il était bienvenu aux deux. Ces tables étaient bien servies. Il y avait des raffinements de boissons locales étrangères pour les marins dépaysés. Un matelot petit-maître de Bilbao y eût trouvé une helada. On y buvait du stout comme à Greenwich et de la gueuse brune comme à Anvers. Des capitaines au long cours et des armateurs faisaient quelquefois figure à la mense des patrons. On y échangeait les nouvelles: -où en sont les sucres? -cette douceur ne figure que pour de petits lots. Pourtant les bruts vont; trois mille sacs de Bombay et cinq cents boucauts de Sagua.

— vous verrez que la droite finira par renverser Villèle. -et l'indigo? -on n'a traité que sept surons Guatemala. -la nanine-Julie est montée en rade. Joli trois-mâts de Bretagne. -voilà encore les deux villes de la Plata en bisbille. -quand Montevideo engraisse, Buenos-Ayres maigrit. -il a fallu transborder le chargement du regina-coeli , condamné au Callao. -les cacaos marchent; les sacs caraques sont cotés deux cent trente-quatre et les sacs Trinidad soixante-treize. -il paraît qu'à la revue du champ de Mars on a crié: à bas les ministres! -les cuirs salés verts saladeros se vendent, les boeufs soixante francs et les vaches quarante-huit. -a-t-on passé le Balkan?

Que fait Diebitsch? -à San Francisco l’anisette en pomponelles manque. L’huile d’olive Plagniol est calme. Le fromage de Gruyère en tins, trente-deux francs le quintal. -eh bien, Léon Xii est-il mort? -etc. Ces choses-là se criaient et se commentaient bruyamment. à la table des douaniers et des gardes-côtes on parlait moins haut. Les faits de police des côtes et des ports veulent moins de sonorité et moins de clarté dans le dialogue. La table des patrons était présidée par un vieux capitaine au long cours, M Gertrais-Gaboureau. M Gertrais-Gaboureau n’était pas un homme, c’était un baromètre. Son habitude de la mer lui avait donné une surprenante infaillibilité de pronostic. Il décrétait le temps qu’il fera demain. Il auscultait le vent; il tâtait le pouls à la marée. Il disait au nuage: montre-moi ta langue. C’est-à-dire l’éclair. Il était le docteur de la vague, de la brise, de la rafale. L’océan était son malade; il avait fait le tour du monde comme on fait une clinique, examinant chaque climat dans sa bonne et mauvaise santé; il savait à fond la pathologie des saisons. On l’entendait énoncer des faits comme ceci: -le baromètre a descendu une fois, en 1796, à trois lignes au-dessous de tempête. -il était marin par amour. Il haïssait l’Angleterre de toute l’amitié qu’il avait pour la mer. Il avait étudié soigneusement la marine anglaise pour en connaître le côté faible. Il expliquait en quoi le sovereign de 1637 différait du royal william de 1670 et de la victory de 1735. Il comparait les accastillages. Il regrettait les tours sur le pont et les hunes en entonnoir du great harry de 1514, probablement au point de vue du boulet français, qui se logeait si bien dans ces surfaces. Les nations pour lui n’existaient que par leurs institutions maritimes; des synonymies bizarres lui étaient propres. Il désignait volontiers l’Angleterre par trinity house , l’écosse par northern commissionners , et l’Irlande par ballast board . Il abondait en renseignements; il était alphabet et almanach; il était étiage et tarif. Il savait par coeur le péage des phares, surtout des anglais; un penny par tonne en passant devant celui-ci, un farthing devant celui-là. Il vous disait: le phare de small’s rock, qui ne consommait que deux cents gallons d’huile, en brûle maintenant quinze cents gallons. un jour, à bord, dans une maladie grave qu’il fit, on le croyait mort, l’équipage entourait son branle, il interrompit les hoquets de l’agonie pour dire au maître charpentier: -il serait avantageux d’adapter dans l’épaisseur des chouquets une mortaise de chaque côté pour y recevoir un réa en fonte ayant son essieu en fer et pour servir à passer les guinderesses. -de tout cela résultait une figure magistrale. Il était rare que le sujet de conversation fût le même à la table des patrons et à la table des douaniers. Ce cas pourtant se présenta précisément dans les premiers jours de ce mois de février où nous ont amené les faits que nous racontons. Le trois-mâts tamaulipas , capitaine Zuela, venant du Chili et y retournant, appela l’attention des deux menses. à la mense des patrons on parla de son chargement, et à la mense des douaniers de ses allures. Le capitaine Zuela, de Copiapo, était un chilien un peu colombien, qui avait fait avec indépendance les guerres de l’indépendance, tenant tantôt pour Bolivar, tantôt pour Morillo, selon qu’il y trouvait son profit. Il s’était enrichi à rendre service à tout le monde. Pas d’homme plus bourbonien, plus bonapartiste, plus absolutiste, plus libéral, plus athée, et plus catholique. Il était de ce grand parti qu’on pourrait nommer le parti lucratif. Il faisait de temps en temps en France des apparitions commerciales; et, à en croire les ouï-dire, il donnait volontiers passage à son bord à des gens en fuite, banqueroutiers ou proscrits politiques, peu lui importait, payants. Son procédé d’embarquement était simple. Le fugitif attendait sur un point désert de la côte, et, au moment d’appareiller, Zuela détachait un canot qui l’allait prendre. Il avait ainsi, à son précédent voyage, fait évader un contumace du procès Berton, et cette fois il comptait, disait-on, emmener des hommes compromis dans l’affaire de la Bidassoa. La police, avertie, avait l’oeil sur lui. Ces temps étaient une époque de fuites. La restauration était une réaction; or les révolutions amènent des émigrations, et les restaurations entraînent des proscriptions. Pendant les sept ou huit premières années après la rentrée des bourbons, la panique fut partout, dans la finance, dans l’industrie, dans le commerce, qui sentaient la terre trembler et où abondaient les faillites. Il y avait un sauve-qui-peut dans la politique. Lavalette avait pris la fuite, Lefebvre-Desnouettes avait pris la fuite, Delon avait pris la fuite. Les tribunaux d’exception sévissaient, plus Trestaillon. On fuyait le pont de Saumur, l’esplanade de la Réole, le mur de l’observatoire de Paris, la tour de Taurias d’Avignon, silhouettes lugubrement debout dans l’histoire, qu’a marquées la réaction, et où l’on distingue encore aujourd’hui cette main sanglante. à Londres le procès Thistlewood ramifié en France, à Paris le procès Trogoff, ramifié en Belgique, en Suisse et en Italie, avaient multiplié les motifs d’inquiétude et de disparition, et augmenté cette profonde déroute souterraine qui faisait le vide jusque dans les plus hauts rangs de l’ordre social d’alors. Se mettre en sûreté, tel était le souci. être compromis, c’était être perdu. être accusé, c’était être exécuté. L’esprit des cours prévôtales avait survécu à l’institution. Les condamnations étaient de complaisance. On se sauvait au Texas, aux montagnes Rocheuses, au Pérou, au Mexique. Les hommes de la Loire, brigands alors, paladins aujourd’hui, avaient fondé le champ d’asile. Une chanson de Béranger disait: sauvages, nous sommes français; prenez pitié de notre gloire. s’expatrier était la ressource. Mais rien n’est moins simple que de fuir; ce monosyllabe contient des abîmes. Tout fait obstacle à qui s’esquive. Se dérober implique se déguiser. Des personnes considérables, et même illustres, étaient réduites à des expédients de malfaiteurs. Et encore elles y réussissaient mal. Elles y étaient invraisemblables. Leur habitude de coudées franches rendait difficile leur glissement à travers les mailles de l’évasion. Un filou en rupture de ban était devant l’oeil de la police plus correct qu’un général. S’imagine-t-on l’innocence contrainte à se grimer, la vertu contrefaisant sa voix, la gloire mettant un masque? Tel passant à l’air suspect était une renommée en quête d’un faux passe-port. Les allures louches de l’homme qui s’échappe ne prouvaient pas qu’on n’eût point devant les yeux un héros. Traits fugitifs et caractéristiques des temps, que l’histoire dite régulière néglige, et que le vrai peintre d’un siècle doit souligner. Derrière ces fuites d’honnêtes gens se faufilaient, moins surveillées et moins suspectes, les fuites des fripons. Un chenapan forcé de s’éclipser profitait du pêle-mêle, faisait nombre parmi les proscrits, et souvent, nous venons de le dire, grâce à plus d’art, semblait dans ce crépuscule plus honnête homme que l’honnête homme. Rien n’est gauche comme la probité reprise de justice. Elle n’y comprend rien et fait des maladresses. Un faussaire s’échappait plus aisément qu’un conventionnel. Chose bizarre à constater, on pourrait presque dire, particulièrement pour les malhonnêtes gens, que l’évasion menait à tout. La quantité de civilisation qu’un coquin apportait de Paris ou de Londres lui tenait lieu de dot dans les pays primitifs ou barbares, le recommandait, et en faisait un initiateur. Cette aventure n’avait rien d’impossible d’échapper ici au code pour arriver là-bas au sacerdoce. Il y avait de la fantasmagorie dans la disparition, et plus d’une évasion a eu des résultats de rêve. Une fugue de ce genre conduisait à l’inconnu et au chimérique. Tel banqueroutier sorti d’Europe par ce trou à la lune a reparu vingt ans après grand vizir au Mogol ou roi en Tasmanie.

Aider aux évasions, c’était une industrie et, vu la fréquence du fait, une industrie à gros profits. Cette spéculation complétait de certains commerces. Qui voulait se sauver en Angleterre s’adressait aux contrebandiers; qui voulait se sauver en Amérique s’adressait à des fraudeurs de long cours tels que Zuela.

II. Clubin aperçoit quelqu’un.

Zuela venait quelquefois manger à l’auberge Jean. Sieur Clubin le connaissait de vue. Du reste, sieur Clubin n’était pas fier; il ne dédaignait pas de connaître de vue les chenapans. Il allait même quelquefois jusqu’à les connaître de fait, leur donnant la main en pleine rue et leur disant bonjour. Il parlait anglais au smogler et baragouinait l’espagnol avec le contrebandista. Il avait là-dessus des sentences: -on peut tirer du bien de la connaissance du mal. -le garde-chasse cause utilement avec le braconnier. -le pilote doit sonder le pirate; le pirate étant un écueil. -je goûte à un coquin comme un médecin goûte à un poison. -c’était sans réplique. Tout le monde donnait raison au capitaine Clubin. On l’approuvait de ne point être un délicat ridicule. Qui donc eût osé en médire? Tout ce qu’il faisait était évidemment “ pour le bien du service “ . De lui tout était simple. Rien ne pouvait le compromettre. Le cristal voudrait se tacher qu’il ne pourrait. Cette confiance était la juste récompense d’une longue honnêteté, et c’est là l’excellence des réputations bien assises. Quoi que fît ou quoi que semblât faire Clubin, on y entendait malice dans le sens de la vertu; l’impeccabilité lui était acquise; -par-dessus le marché, il est très avisé, disait-on; -et de telle ou telle accointance qui dans un autre eût été suspecte, sa probité sortait avec un relief d’habileté. Ce renom d’habileté se combinait harmonieusement avec son renom de naïveté, sans contradiction ni trouble. Un naïf habile, cela existe. C’est une des variétés de l’honnête homme, et une des plus appréciées. Sieur Clubin était de ces hommes qui, rencontrés en conversation intime avec un escroc ou un bandit, sont acceptés ainsi, pénétrés, compris, respectés d’autant plus, et ont pour eux le clignement d’yeux satisfait de l’estime publique. Le tamaulipas avait complété son chargement. Il était en partance et allait prochainement appareiller. Un mardi soir la durande arriva à Saint-Malo comme il faisait encore grand jour. Sieur Clubin, debout sur la passerelle et surveillant la manoeuvre de l’approche du port, aperçut près du petit-bey, sur la plage de sable, entre deux rochers, dans un lieu très solitaire, deux hommes qui causaient.

Il les visa de sa lunette marine, et reconnut l’un des deux hommes. C’était le capitaine Zuela. Il paraît qu’il reconnut aussi l’autre. Cet autre était un personnage de haute taille, un peu grisonnant. Il portait le haut chapeau et le grave vêtement des amis. C’était probablement un quaker. Il baissait les yeux avec modestie. En arrivant à l'auberge Jean, sieur Clubin apprit que le tamaulipas comptait appareiller dans une dizaine de jours. On a su depuis qu'il avait pris encore quelques autres informations. à la nuit il entra chez l'armurier de la rue saint-Vincent et lui dit: -savez-vous ce que c'est qu'un revolver? -oui, répondit l'armurier, c'est américain. -c'est un pistolet qui recommence la conversation. -en effet, ça a la demande et la réponse. -et la réplique. -c'est juste, monsieur Clubin. Un canon tournant. -et cinq ou six balles. L'armurier entr'ouvrit le coin de sa lèvre et fit entendre ce bruit de langue qui, accompagné d'un hochement de tête, exprime l'admiration. -l'arme est bonne, Monsieur Clubin. Je crois qu'elle fera son chemin. -je voudrais un revolver à six canons. -je n'en ai pas. -comment ça, vous armurier? -je ne tiens pas encore l'article. Voyez-vous, c'est nouveau. ça débute. On ne fait encore en France que du pistolet. -diable! -ça n'est pas encore dans le commerce. -diable! -j'ai d'excellents pistolets. -je veux un revolver. -je conviens que c'est plus avantageux. Mais attendez donc, Monsieur Clubin... -quoi? -je crois savoir qu'il y en a un en ce moment à Saint-Malo, d'occasion. -un revolver? -oui. -à vendre? -oui. -où ça? -je crois savoir où. Je m'informerai. -quand pourrez-vous me rendre réponse? -d'occasion. Mais bon. -quand faut-il que je revienne? -si je vous procure un revolver, c'est qu'il sera bon. -quand me rendrez-vous réponse? -à votre prochain voyage. -ne dites pas que c'est pour moi, dit Clubin.

III. Clubin emporte et ne rapporte point.

Sieur Clubin fit le chargement de la durande, embarqua nombre de boeufs et quelques passagers, et quitta, comme à l'ordinaire, Saint-Malo pour Guernesey le vendredi matin. Ce même jour vendredi, quand le navire fut au large, ce qui permet au capitaine de s'absenter quelques instants du pont de commandement, Clubin entra dans sa cabine, s'y enferma, prit un sac-valise qu'il avait, mit des vêtements dans le compartiment élastique, du biscuit, quelques boîtes de conserves, quelques livres de cacao en bâton, un chronomètre et une lunette marine dans le compartiment solide, cadenassa le sac, et passa dans les oreillons une aussière toute préparée pour le hisser au besoin. Puis il descendit dans la cale, entra dans la fosse aux câbles, et on le vit remonter avec une de ces cordes à noeuds armées d'un crampon qui servent aux calfats sur mer et aux voleurs sur terre. Ces cordes facilitent les escalades. Arrivé à Guernesey, Clubin alla à Torteval. Il y passa trente-six heures. Il y emporta le sac-valise et la corde à noeuds, et ne les rapporta pas. à cette époque, les contrebandiers d'Espagne venaient jusqu'à Guernesey.

Ils y apportaient des cigares de la Havane et du vin de Xérès, que les anglais appellent sherry. Disons-le une fois pour toutes, le Guernesey dont il est question dans ce livre, c’est l’ancien Guernesey, qui n’existe plus et qu’il serait impossible de retrouver aujourd’hui, ailleurs que dans les campagnes. Là il est encore vivant, mais il est mort dans les villes. La remarque que nous faisons pour Guernesey doit être aussi faite pour Jersey. Saint-Hélier vaut Dieppe; Saint-Pierre-Port vaut Lorient. Grâce au progrès, grâce à l’admirable esprit d’initiative de ce vaillant petit peuple insulaire, tout s’est transformé depuis quarante ans dans l’archipel de la Manche. Où il y avait l’ombre, il y a la lumière. Cela dit, passons. En ces temps qui sont déjà, par l’éloignement, des temps historiques, la contrebande était très active dans la Manche. Les navires fraudeurs abondaient particulièrement sur la côte ouest de Guernesey. Les personnes renseignées à outrance, et qui savent dans les moindres détails ce qui se passait il y a tout à l’heure un demi-siècle, vont jusqu’à citer les noms de plusieurs de ces navires, presque tous asturiens et guipuscoans. Ce qui est hors de doute, c’est qu’il ne s’écoulait guère de semaine sans qu’il en vînt un ou deux, soit dans la baie des saints, soit à Plainmont. Cela avait presque les allures d’un service régulier. Une cave de la mer à Serk s’appelait et s’appelle encore les boutiques, parce que c’était dans cette grotte qu’on venait acheter aux fraudeurs leurs marchandises. Pour les besoins de ces commerces, il se parlait dans la Manche une espèce de langue contrebandière, oubliée aujourd’hui, et qui était à l’espagnol ce que le levantin est à l’italien. Sur beaucoup de points du littoral anglais et français, la contrebande était en cordiale entente secrète avec le négoce patent et patenté. Elle avait ses entrées chez plus d’un haut financier, par la porte dérobée, il est vrai; et elle fusait souterrainement dans la circulation commerciale et dans tout le système veineux de l’industrie. Négociant par devant, contrebandier par derrière; c’était l’histoire de beaucoup de fortunes. Séguin le disait de Bourgain; Bourgain le disait de Séguin. Nous ne nous faisons point garant de leurs paroles; peut-être se calomniaient-ils l’un et l’autre. Quoi qu’il en fût, la contrebande, traquée par la loi, était incontestablement fort bien apparentée dans la finance. Elle était en rapport avec “ le meilleur monde “ . Cette caverne, où Mandrin coudoyait jadis le comte de Charolais, était honnête au dehors, et avait une façade irréprochable sur la société; pignon sur rue. De là beaucoup de connivences, nécessairement masquées. Ces mystères voulaient une ombre impénétrable. Un contrebandier savait beaucoup de choses, et devait les taire; une foi inviolable et rigide était sa loi. La première qualité d’un fraudeur était la loyauté. Sans discrétion pas de contrebande. Il y avait le secret de la fraude comme il y a le secret de la confession. Ce secret était imperturbablement gardé. Le contrebandier jurait de tout taire, et tenait parole. On ne pouvait se fier à personne mieux qu’à un fraudeur. Le juge-alcade d’Oyarzun prit un jour un contrebandier des ports secs, et le fit mettre à la question pour le forcer à nommer son bailleur de fonds secret. Le contrebandier ne nomma point le bailleur de fonds. Ce bailleur de fonds était le juge-alcade. De ces deux complices, le juge et le contrebandier, l’un avait dû, pour obéir aux yeux de tous à la loi, ordonner la torture, à laquelle l’autre avait résisté, pour obéir à son serment. Les deux plus fameux contrebandiers hantant Plainmont à cette époque étaient Blasco et Blasquito. Ils étaient tocayos. C’est une parenté espagnole et catholique qui consiste à avoir le même patron dans le paradis, chose, on en conviendra, non moins digne de considération que d’avoir le même père sur la terre. Quand on était à peu près au fait du furtif itinéraire de la contrebande, parler à ces hommes, rien n’était plus facile et plus difficile. Il suffisait de n’avoir aucun préjugé nocturne, d’aller à Plainmont et d’affronter le mystérieux point d’interrogation qui se dresse là.

IV. Plainmont.

Plainmont, près Torteval, est un des trois angles de Guernesey. Il y a là, à l’extrémité du cap, une haute croupe de gazon qui domine la mer. Ce sommet est désert. Il est d’autant plus désert qu’on y voit une maison. Cette maison ajoute l’effroi à la solitude. Elle est, dit-on, visionnée. Hantée ou non, l’aspect en est étrange. Cette maison, bâtie en granit et élevée d’un étage, est au milieu de l’herbe. Elle n’a rien d’une ruine. Elle est parfaitement habitable. Les murs sont épais et le toit est solide. Pas une pierre ne manque aux murailles, pas une tuile au toit. Une cheminée de brique contrebute l’angle du toit. Cette maison tourne le dos à la mer. Sa façade du côté de l’océan n’est qu’une muraille. En examinant attentivement cette façade, on y distingue une fenêtre, murée. Les deux pignons offrent trois lucarnes, une à l’est, deux à l’ouest, murées toutes trois. La devanture qui fait face à la terre a seule une porte et des fenêtres. La porte est murée. Les deux fenêtres du rez-de-chaussée sont murées. Au premier étage, et c’est là ce qui frappe tout d’abord quand on approche, il y a deux fenêtres ouvertes; mais les fenêtres murées sont moins farouches que ces fenêtres ouvertes. Leur ouverture les fait noires en plein jour. Elles n’ont pas de vitres, pas même de châssis. Elles s’ouvrent sur l’ombre du dedans. On dirait les trous vides de deux yeux arrachés. Rien dans cette maison. On aperçoit par les croisées béantes le délabrement intérieur. Pas de lambris, nulle boiserie, la pierre nue. On croit voir un sépulcre à fenêtre permettant aux spectres de regarder dehors. Les pluies affouillent les fondations du côté de la mer. Quelques orties agitées par le vent caressent le bas des murs. à l’horizon, aucune habitation humaine. Cette maison est une chose vide où il y a le silence. Si l’on s’arrête pourtant et si l’on colle son oreille à la muraille, on y entend confusément par instants des battements d’ailes effarouchées. Au-dessus de la porte murée, sur la pierre qui fait l’architrave, sont gravées ces lettres: elm-pbilg, et cette date: 1780. La nuit, la lune lugubre entre là.

Toute la mer est autour de cette maison. Sa situation est magnifique, et par conséquent sinistre. La beauté du lieu devient une énigme. Pourquoi aucune famille humaine n’habite-t-elle ce logis? La place est belle, la maison est bonne. D’où vient cet abandon? Aux questions de la raison s’ajoutent les questions de la rêverie. Ce champ est cultivable, d’où vient qu’il est inculte? Pas de maître. La porte murée. Qu’a donc ce lieu? Pourquoi l’homme en fuite? Que se passe-t-il ici? S’il ne s’y passe rien, pourquoi n’y a-t-il personne? Quand tout est endormi, y a-t-il ici quelqu’un d’éveillé? La rafale ténébreuse, le vent, les oiseaux de proie, les bêtes cachées, les êtres ignorés, apparaissent à la pensée et se mêlent à cette maison. De quels passants est-elle l’hôtellerie? On se figure des ténèbres de grêle et de pluie s’engouffrant dans les fenêtres. De vagues ruissellements de tempêtes ont laissé leurs traces sur la muraille intérieure. Ces chambres murées et ouvertes sont visitées par l’ouragan. S’est-il commis un crime là? Il semble que, la nuit, cette maison livrée à l’ombre doit appeler au secours. Reste-t-elle muette? En sort-il des voix? à qui a-t-elle affaire dans cette solitude? Le mystère des heures noires est à l’aise ici. Cette maison est inquiétante à midi; qu’est-elle à minuit? En la regardant, on regarde un secret. On se demande, la rêverie ayant sa logique et le possible ayant sa pente, ce que devient cette maison entre le crépuscule du soir et le crépuscule du matin. L’immense dispersion de la vie extra-humaine a-t-elle sur ce sommet désert un noeud où elle s’arrête et qui la force à devenir visible et à descendre? L’épars vient-il y tourbillonner? L’impalpable s’y condense-t-il jusqu’à prendre forme? énigmes. L’horreur sacrée est dans ces pierres. Cette ombre qui est dans ces chambres défendues est plus que de l’ombre; c’est de l’inconnu. Après le soleil couché, les bateaux pêcheurs rentreront, les oiseaux se tairont, le chevrier qui est derrière le rocher s’en ira avec ses chèvres, les entre-deux des pierres livreront passage aux premiers glissements des reptiles rassurés, les étoiles commenceront à regarder, la bise soufflera, le plein de l’obscurité se fera, ces deux fenêtres seront là, béantes. Cela s’ouvre aux songes; et c’est par des apparitions, par des larves, par des faces de fantômes vaguement distinctes, par des masques dans des lueurs, par de mystérieux tumultes d’âmes et d’ombres, que la croyance populaire, à la fois stupide et profonde, traduit les sombres intimités de cette demeure avec la nuit. La maison est “ visionnée “; ce mot répond à tout. Les esprits crédules ont leur explication; mais les esprits positifs ont aussi la leur. Rien de plus simple, disent-ils, que cette maison. C’est un ancien poste d’observation, du temps des guerres de la révolution et de l’empire, et des contrebandes. Elle a été bâtie là pour cela. La guerre finie, le poste a été abandonné.

On n’a pas démoli la maison parce qu’elle peut redevenir utile. On a muré la porte et les fenêtres du rez-de-chaussée contre les stercoraires humains, et pour que personne n’y pût entrer; on a muré les fenêtres des trois côtés sur la mer, à cause du vent du sud et du vent d’ouest. Voilà tout. Les ignorants et les crédules insistent. D’abord, la maison n’a pas été bâtie à l’époque des guerres de la révolution. Elle porte la date-1780- antérieure à la révolution. Ensuite, elle n’a pas été bâtie pour être un poste; elle porte les lettres elm-pbilg, qui sont le double monogramme de deux familles, et qui indiquent, suivant l’usage, que la maison a été construite pour l’établissement d’un jeune ménage. Donc, elle a été habitée. Pourquoi ne l’est-elle plus? Si l’on a muré la porte et les croisées pour que personne ne pût pénétrer dans la maison, pourquoi a-t-on laissé deux fenêtres ouvertes? Il fallait tout murer, ou rien. Pourquoi pas de volets? Pourquoi pas de châssis? Pourquoi pas de vitres? Pourquoi murer les fenêtres d’un côté si on ne les mure pas de l’autre? On empêche la pluie d’entrer par le sud, mais on la laisse entrer par le nord. Les crédules ont tort, sans doute, mais à coup sûr les positifs n’ont pas raison. Le problème persiste. Ce qui est sûr, c’est que la maison passe pour avoir été plutôt utile que nuisible aux contrebandiers. Le grossissement de l’effroi ôte aux faits leur vraie proportion. Sans nul doute, bien des phénomènes nocturnes, parmi ceux dont s’est peu à peu composé le “ visionnement “ de la masure, pourraient s’expliquer par des présences obscures et furtives, par de courtes stations d’hommes tout de suite rembarqués, tantôt par les précautions, tantôt par les hardiesses de certains industriels suspects se cachant pour mal faire et se laissant entrevoir pour faire peur. à cette époque déjà lointaine, beaucoup d'audaces étaient possibles. La police, surtout dans les petits pays, n'était pas ce qu'elle est aujourd'hui. Ajoutons que, si cette masure était, comme on le dit, commode aux fraudeurs, leurs rendez-vous devaient avoir là jusqu'à un certain point leurs coudées franches, précisément parce que la maison était mal vue. être mal vue l'empêchait d'être dénoncée. Ce n'est guère aux douaniers et aux sergents qu'on s'adresse contre les spectres. Les superstitieux font des signes de croix et non des procès-verbaux. Ils voient ou croient voir, s'enfuient et se taisent. Il existe une connivence tacite, non voulue, mais réelle, entre ceux qui font peur et ceux qui ont peur. Les effrayés se sentent dans leur tort d'avoir été effrayés, ils s'imaginent avoir surpris un secret, ils craignent d'aggraver leur position, mystérieuse pour eux-mêmes, et de fâcher les apparitions. Ceci les rend discrets. Et, même en dehors de ce calcul, l'instinct des gens crédules est le silence; il y a du mutisme dans l'épouvante; les terrifiés parlent peu; il semble que l'horreur dise: chut! S'il faut ajouter foi aux légendes locales et aux récits des gens qu'on rencontre, la superstition autrefois a quelquefois été jusqu'à suspendre aux murs de cette maison de Plainmont, à des clous dont on voit encore çà et là la trace, des rats sans pattes, des chauves-souris sans ailes, des carcasses de bêtes mortes, des crapauds écrasés entre les pages d'une bible, des brins de lupin jaune, étranges ex-voto, accrochés là par d'imprudents passants nocturnes qui avaient cru voir quelque chose, et qui, par ces cadeaux, espéraient obtenir leur pardon, et conjurer la mauvaise humeur des stryges, des larves et des brucolaques. Il y a eu de tout temps des crédules aux abacas et aux sabbats, et même d'assez haut placés. César consultait Sagane, et Napoléon Mademoiselle Lenormand. Il est des consciences inquiètes jusqu'à tâcher d'obtenir des indulgences du diable. que Dieu fasse et que Satan ne défasse pas! c'était là une des prières de Charles-Quint. D'autres esprits sont plus timorés encore. Ils vont jusqu'à se persuader qu'on peut avoir des torts envers le mal. être irréprochable vis-à-vis du démon, c'est une de leurs préoccupations. De là des pratiques religieuses tournées vers l'immense malice obscure. C'est un bigotisme comme un autre. Les crimes contre le démon existent dans certaines imaginations malades; avoir violé la loi d'en bas tourmente de bizarres casuistes de l'ignorance; on a des scrupules du côté des ténèbres. Croire à l’efficacité de la dévotion aux mystères du Brocken et d’Armuyr, se figurer qu’on a péché contre l’enfer, avoir recours pour des infractions chimériques à des pénitences chimériques, avouer la vérité à l’esprit de mensonge, faire son meâ culpâ devant le père de la faute, se confesser en sens inverse, tout cela existe ou a existé; les procès de magie le prouvent à chaque page de leurs dossiers. Le songe humain va jusque-là. Quand l’homme se met à s’effarer, il ne s’arrête point. On rêve des fautes imaginaires, on rêve des purifications imaginaires, et l’on fait faire le nettoyage de sa conscience par l’ombre du balai des sorcières. Il faut se souvenir que ceci remonte à l’époque où les paysans guernesiais croyaient que le mystère de la crèche était, tous les ans, à jour fixe, répété par les boeufs et les ânes; époque où personne, dans la nuit de noël, n’eût osé pénétrer dans une étable, de peur d’y trouver les bêtes à genoux. Quoi qu’il en soit, si cette maison a des aventures, c’est son affaire; à part quelques hasards et quelques exceptions, nul n’y va voir, elle est laissée seule; il n’est du goût de personne de se risquer aux rencontres infernales. Grâce à la terreur qui la garde, et qui en éloigne quiconque pourrait observer et témoigner, il a été de tout temps facile de s’introduire la nuit dans cette maison, au moyen d’une échelle de corde, ou même tout simplement du premier échalier venu pris aux courtils voisins. Un en-cas de hardes et de vivres apporté là permettrait d’y attendre en toute sécurité l’éventualité et l’à-propos d’un embarquement furtif. La tradition raconte qu’il y a une quarantaine d’années, un fugitif, de la politique selon les uns, du commerce selon les autres, a séjourné quelque temps caché dans la maison visionnée de Plainmont, d’où il a réussi à s’embarquer sur un bateau pêcheur pour l’Angleterre. D’Angleterre on gagne aisément l’Amérique. Cette même tradition affirme que des provisions déposées dans cette masure y demeurent sans qu’on y touche; Lucifer, comme les contrebandiers, ayant intérêt à ce que celui qui les a mises là revienne. Du sommet où est cette maison, on aperçoit au sud-ouest, à un mille de la côte, l’écueil des hanois. Cet écueil est célèbre. Il a fait toutes les mauvaises actions que peut faire un rocher. C’était un des plus redoutables assassins de la mer. Il attendait en traître les navires dans la nuit. Il a élargi les cimetières de Torteval et de la Rocquaine. En 1862 on a placé sur cet écueil un phare. Aujourd’hui l’écueil des hanois éclaire la navigation qu’il fourvoyait; le guet-apens a un flambeau à la main. On cherche à l’horizon comme un protecteur et un guide ce rocher qu’on fuyait comme un malfaiteur. Les hanois rassurent ces vastes espaces nocturnes qu’ils effrayaient. C’est quelque chose comme le brigand devenu gendarme. Il y a trois hanois: le grand hanois, le petit hanois, et la mauve. C’est sur le petit hanois qu’est aujourd’hui le “ light red “ . Cet écueil fait partie d’un groupe de pointes, quelques-unes sous-marines, quelques-unes sortant de la mer. Il les domine. Il a, comme une forteresse, ses ouvrages avancés; du côté de la haute mer, un cordon de treize rochers; au nord, deux brisants, les hautes-fourquies, les aiguillons, et un banc de sable, l’hérouée; au sud, trois roches, le cat-rock, la percée et la roque herpin; plus deux boues, la south boue et la boue le mouet, et en outre, devant Plainmont, à fleur d’eau, le tas de pois d’aval. Qu’un nageur franchisse le détroit des hanois à Plainmont, cela est malaisé, non impossible. On se souvient que c’était une des prouesses de sieur Clubin. Le nageur qui connaît ces bas-fonds a deux stations où il peut se reposer, la roque ronde, et plus loin, en obliquant un peu à gauche, la roque rouge.

V. Les déniquoiseaux.

C’est à peu près vers cette journée le samedi, passée par sieur Clubin à Torteval, qu’il faut rapporter un fait singulier, peu ébruité d’abord dans le pays, et qui ne transpira que longtemps après. Car beaucoup de choses, nous venons de le remarquer, restent inconnues à cause même de l’effroi qu’elles ont fait à ceux qui en ont été témoins. Dans la nuit du samedi au dimanche, nous précisons la date et nous la croyons exacte, trois enfants escaladèrent l’escarpement de Plainmont. Ces enfants s’en retournaient au village. Ils venaient de la mer. C’était ce qu’on appelle dans la langue locale des déniquoiseaux . Lisez déniche-oiseaux. Partout où il y a des falaises et des trous de rochers au-dessus de la mer, les enfants dénicheurs d’oiseaux abondent. Nous en avons dit un mot déjà. On se souvient que Gilliatt s’en préoccupait, à cause des oiseaux et à cause des enfants. Les déniquoiseaux sont des espèces de gamins de l’océan, peu timides. La nuit était très obscure. D’épaisses superpositions de nuées cachaient le zénith. Trois heures du matin venaient de sonner au clocher de torteval, qui est rond et pointu et qui ressemble à un bonnet de magicien. Pourquoi ces enfants revenaient-ils si tard? Rien de plus simple. Ils étaient allés à la chasse aux nids de mauves, dans le tas de pois d’aval. La saison ayant été très douce, les amours des oiseaux commençaient de très bonne heure. Ces enfants, guettant les allures des mâles et des femelles autour des gîtes, et distraits par l’acharnement de cette poursuite, avaient oublié l’heure. Le flux les avait cernés; ils n’avaient pu regagner à temps la petite anse où ils avaient amarré leur canot, et ils avaient dû attendre sur une des pointes du tas de pois que la mer se retirât. De là leur rentrée nocturne. Ces rentrées-là sont attendues par la fiévreuse inquiétude des mères, laquelle, rassurée, dépense sa joie en colère, et, grossie dans les larmes, se dissipe en taloches. Aussi se hâtaient-ils, assez inquiets. Ils avaient cette manière de se hâter qui s'attarderait volontiers, et qui contient un secret désir de ne pas arriver. Ils avaient en perspective un embrassement compliqué de giffles. Un seul de ces enfants n'avait rien à craindre, c'était un orphelin. Ce garçon était français, sans père ni mère, et content en cette minute-là de n'avoir pas de mère. Personne ne s'intéressant à lui, il ne serait pas battu. Les deux autres étaient guernesiais, et de la paroisse même de Torteval. La haute croupe de roches escaladée, les trois déniquoiseaux parvinrent sur le plateau où est la maison visionnée. Ils commencèrent par avoir peur, ce qui est le devoir de tout passant, et surtout de tout enfant, à cette heure et dans ce lieu. Ils eurent bien envie de se sauver à toutes jambes, et bien envie de s'arrêter pour regarder. Ils s'arrêtèrent. Ils regardèrent la maison. Elle était toute noire, et formidable. C'était, au milieu du plateau désert, un bloc obscur, une excroissance symétrique et hideuse, une haute masse carrée à angles rectilignes, quelque chose de semblable à un énorme autel de ténèbres. La première pensée des enfants avait été de s'enfuir; la seconde fut de s'approcher. Ils n'avaient jamais vu cette maison-là à cette heure-là. La curiosité d'avoir peur existe. Ils avaient un petit français avec eux, ce qui fit qu'ils approchèrent. On sait que les français ne croient à rien. D'ailleurs, être plusieurs dans un danger, rassure; avoir peur à trois, encourage. Et puis, on est chasseur, on est enfant; à trois qu'on est, on n'a pas trente ans; on est en quête, on fouille, on épie les choses cachées; est-ce pour s'arrêter en chemin? On avance la tête dans ce trou-ci, comment ne point l'avancer dans ce trou-là? Qui est en chasse subit un entraînement; qui va à la découverte est dans un engrenage. Avoir tant regardé dans le nid des oiseaux, cela donne la démangeaison de regarder un peu dans le nid des spectres. Fureter dans l'enfer; pourquoi pas? De gibier en gibier, on arrive au démon. Après les moineaux, les farfadets. On va savoir à quoi s'en tenir sur toutes ces peurs que vos parents vous ont faites. être sur la piste des contes bleus, rien n'est plus glissant. En savoir aussi long que les bonnes femmes, cela tente. Tout ce pêle-mêle d'idées, à l'état de confusion et d'instinct dans la cervelle des déniquoiseaux guernesiais, eut pour résultante leur témérité. Ils marchèrent vers la maison. Du reste, le petit qui leur servait de point d’appui dans cette bravoure en était digne. C’était un garçon résolu, apprenti calfat, de ces enfants déjà hommes, couchant au chantier sur de la paille dans un hangar, gagnant sa vie, ayant une grosse voix, grimpant volontiers aux murs et aux arbres, sans préjugés vis-à-vis des pommes près desquelles il passait, ayant travaillé à des radoubs de vaisseaux de guerre, fils du hasard, enfant de raccroc, orphelin gai, né en France, et on ne savait où, deux raisons pour être hardi, ne regardant pas à donner un double à un pauvre, très méchant, très bon, blond jusqu’au roux, ayant parlé à des parisiens. Pour le moment, il gagnait un chelin par jour à calfater des barques de poissonniers, en réparation aux pêqueries. Quand l’envie lui en prenait, il se donnait des vacances, et allait dénicher des oiseaux. Tel était le petit français. La solitude du lieu avait on ne sait quoi de funèbre. On sentait là l’inviolabilité menaçante. C’était farouche. Ce plateau, silencieux et nu, dérobait à très courte distance dans le précipice sa courbe déclive et fuyante. La mer en bas se taisait. Il n’y avait point de vent. Les brins d’herbe ne bougeaient pas. Les petits déniquoiseaux avançaient à pas lents, l’enfant français en tête, en regardant la maison. L’un d’eux, plus tard, en racontant le fait, ou l’à peu près qui lui en était resté, ajoutait: “ elle ne disait rien. “ ils s’approchaient en retenant leur haleine, comme on approcherait d’une bête. Ils avaient gravi le roidillon qui est derrière la maison et qui aboutit du côté de la mer à un petit isthme de rochers peu praticable; ils étaient parvenus assez près de la masure; mais ils ne voyaient que la façade sud, qui est toute murée; ils n’avaient pas osé tourner à gauche, ce qui les eût exposés à voir l’autre façade où il y a deux fenêtres, ce qui est terrible. Cependant ils s’enhardirent, l’apprenti calfat leur ayant dit tout bas: -virons à bâbord. C’est ce côté-là qui est le beau. Il faut voir les deux fenêtres noires. Ils “ virèrent à bâbord “ et arrivèrent de l’autre côté de la maison. Les deux fenêtres étaient éclairées. Les enfants s’enfuirent. Quand ils furent loin, le petit français se retourna. -tiens, dit-il, il n’y a plus de lumière. En effet, il n’y avait plus de clarté aux fenêtres. La silhouette de la masure se dessinait, découpée comme à l’emporte-pièce, sur la lividité diffuse du ciel. La peur ne s’en alla point, mais la curiosité revint. Les déniquoiseaux se rapprochèrent. Brusquement, aux deux fenêtres à la fois, la lumière se refit. Les deux gars de Torteval reprirent leurs jambes à leur cou, et se sauvèrent. Le petit satan de français n’avança pas, mais ne recula pas. Il demeura immobile, faisant face à la maison, et la regardant.

La clarté s’éteignit, puis brilla de nouveau. Rien de plus horrible. Le reflet faisait une vague traînée de feu sur l’herbe mouillée par la buée de la nuit. à un certain moment, la lueur dessina sur le mur intérieur de la masure de grands profils noirs qui remuaient et des ombres de têtes énormes. Du reste, la masure étant sans plafonds ni cloisons et n’ayant plus que les quatre murs et le toit, une fenêtre ne peut pas être éclairée sans que l’autre le soit. Voyant que l’apprenti calfat restait, les deux autres déniquoiseaux revinrent, pas à pas, l’un après l’autre, tremblants, curieux. L’apprenti calfat leur dit tout bas: -il y a des revenants dans la maison. J’ai vu le nez d’un. -les deux petits de Torteval se blottirent derrière le français, et haussés sur la pointe du pied, par-dessus son épaule, abrités par lui, le prenant pour bouclier, l’opposant à la chose, rassurés de le sentir entre eux et la vision, ils regardèrent, eux aussi. La masure, de son côté, semblait les regarder. Elle avait, dans cette vaste obscurité muette, deux prunelles rouges. C’étaient les fenêtres. La lumière s’éclipsait, reparaissait, s’éclipsait encore, comme font ces lumières-là. Ces intermittences sinistres tiennent probablement au va-et-vient de l’enfer. Cela s’entr’ouvre, puis se referme. Le soupirail du sépulcre a des effets de lanterne sourde. Tout à coup une noirceur très opaque ayant la forme humaine se dressa sur l’une des fenêtres comme si elle venait du dehors, puis s’enfonça dans l’intérieur de la maison. Il sembla que quelqu’un venait d’entrer. Entrer par la croisée, c’est l’habitude des alleurs. La clarté fut un moment plus vive, puis s’éteignit et ne reparut plus. La maison redevint noire. Alors il en sortit des bruits. Ces bruits ressemblaient à des voix. C’est toujours comme cela. Quand on voit, on n’entend pas; quand on ne voit pas, on entend. La nuit sur la mer a une taciturnité particulière. Le silence de l’ombre est là plus profond qu’ailleurs. Lorsqu’il n’y a ni vent ni flot, dans cette remuante étendue où d’ordinaire on n’entend pas voler les aigles, on entendrait une mouche voler. Cette paix sépulcrale donnait un relief lugubre aux bruits qui sortaient de la masure. -voyons voir, dit le petit français. Et il fit un pas vers la maison. Les deux autres avaient une telle peur qu’ils se décidèrent à le suivre. Ils n’osaient plus s’enfuir tout seuls. Comme ils venaient de dépasser un assez gros tas de fagots qui, on ne sait pas pourquoi, les rassurait dans cette solitude, une chevêche s’envola d’un buisson. Cela fit un froissement de branches. Les chevêches ont une espèce de vol louche, d’une obliquité inquiétante. L’oiseau passa de travers près des enfants, en fixant sur eux la rondeur de ses yeux, clairs dans la nuit. Il y eut un certain tremblement dans le groupe derrière le petit français. Il apostropha la chevêche. -moineau, tu viens trop tard. Il n’est plus temps. Je veux voir. Et il avança. Le craquement de ses gros souliers cloutés sur les ajoncs n’empêchait pas d’entendre les bruits de la masure, qui s’élevaient et s’abaissaient, avec l’accentuation calme et la continuité d’un dialogue. Un moment après, il ajouta: -d’ailleurs il n’y a que les bêtes qui croient aux revenants. L’insolence dans le danger rallie les traînards et les pousse en avant. Les deux gars de Torteval se remirent en marche, emboîtant le pas à la suite de l’apprenti calfat. La maison visionnée leur faisait l’effet de grandir démesurément. Dans cette illusion d’optique de la peur il y avait de la réalité. La maison grandissait en effet, parce qu’ils en approchaient. Cependant les voix qui étaient dans la maison prenaient une saillie de plus en plus nette. Les enfants écoutaient. L’oreille aussi a ses grossissements. C’était autre chose qu’un murmure, plus qu’un chuchotement, moins qu’un brouhaha. Par instants une ou deux paroles clairement articulées se détachaient. Ces paroles, impossibles à comprendre, sonnaient bizarrement. Les enfants s’arrêtaient, écoutaient, puis recommençaient à avancer. -c’est la conversation des revenants, murmura l’apprenti calfat, mais je ne crois pas aux revenants. Les petits de Torteval étaient bien tentés de se replier derrière le tas de fagots; mais ils en étaient déjà loin, et leur ami le calfat continuait de marcher vers la masure. Ils tremblaient de rester avec lui, et ils n’osaient pas le quitter. Pas à pas, et perplexes, ils le suivaient. L’apprenti calfat se tourna vers eux et leur dit: -vous savez que ce n’est pas vrai. Il n’y en a pas. La maison devenait de plus en plus haute. Les voix devenaient de plus en plus distinctes. Ils approchaient. En approchant, on reconnaissait qu’il y avait dans la maison quelque chose comme de la lumière étouffée. C’était une lueur très vague, un de ces effets de lanterne sourde indiqués tout à l’heure, et qui abondent dans l’éclairage des sabbats.

Quand ils furent tout près, ils firent halte. Un des deux de Torteval hasarda cette observation: -ce n’est pas des revenants; c’est des dames blanches. -qu’est-ce que c’est que ça qui pend à une fenêtre? Demanda l’autre. -ça a l’air d’une corde. -c’est un serpent. -c’est de la corde de pendu, dit le français avec autorité. ça leur sert. Mais je n’y crois pas. Et, en trois bonds plutôt qu’en trois pas, il fut au pied du mur de la masure. Il y avait de la fièvre dans cette hardiesse. Les deux autres, frissonnants, l’imitèrent, et vinrent se coller près de lui, se serrant l’un contre son côté droit, l’autre contre son côté gauche. Les enfants appliquèrent leur oreille contre la muraille. On continuait de parler dans la maison. Voici ce que disaient les fantômes: -ainsi, c’est entendu? -entendu. -c’est dit? -dit. -un homme attendra ici, et pourra s’en aller en Angleterre avec Blasquito? -en payant. -en payant. -Blasquito prendra l’homme dans sa barque. -sans chercher à savoir de quel pays il est? -cela ne nous regarde pas. -sans lui demander son nom? -on ne demande pas le nom; on pèse la bourse.

— bien. L’homme attendra dans cette maison. -il faudra qu’il ait de quoi manger. -il en aura. -où? -dans ce sac que j’apporte. -très bien. -puis-je laisser ce sac ici? -les contrebandiers ne sont pas des voleurs. -et vous autres, quand partez-vous? -demain matin. Si votre homme était prêt, il pourrait venir avec nous. -il n’est pas prêt. -c’est son affaire. -combien de jours aura-t-il à attendre dans cette maison? -deux, trois, quatre jours. Moins ou plus. -est-il certain que Blasquito viendra? -certain. -ici? à Plainmont? -à Plainmont. -quelle semaine? -la semaine prochaine.

— quel jour? -vendredi, samedi, ou dimanche. -il ne peut manquer? -il est mon tocayo. -il vient par tous les temps? -par tous. Il n’a pas peur. Je suis Blasco, il est Blasquito. -ainsi, il ne peut manquer de venir à Guernesey? -je viens un mois; il vient l’autre mois. -je comprends. -à compter de samedi prochain, d’aujourd’hui en huit, il ne se passera pas cinq jours sans que Blasquito arrive. -mais si la mer était très dure? -egurraldia gaïztoa? -oui. -Blasquito ne viendra pas si vite, mais il viendra. -d’où viendra-t-il? -de Bilbao. -où ira-t-il? -à Portland. -c’est bien.

— ou à Torbay. -c’est mieux. -votre homme peut être tranquille. -Blasquito ne trahira pas? -les lâches sont les traîtres. Nous sommes des vaillants. La mer est l’église de l’hiver. La trahison est l’église de l’enfer. -personne n’entend ce que nous disons? -nous écouter et nous regarder est impossible. L’épouvante fait ici le désert. -je le sais. -qui oserait se hasarder à nous écouter? -c’est vrai. -d’ailleurs on écouterait qu’on ne comprendrait pas. Nous parlons une farouche langue à nous que personne ne connaît. Puisque vous la savez, c’est que vous êtes des nôtres. -je suis venu pour prendre des arrangements avec vous. -c’est bon. -maintenant je m’en vais. -soit. -dites-moi, si le passager veut que Blasquito le conduise ailleurs qu’à Portland ou à Torbay?

— Blasquito fera-t-il ce que l’homme voudra? -Blasquito fera ce que les onces voudront. -faut-il beaucoup de temps pour aller à Torbay? -qu’il ait des onces. -comme il plaît au vent. -huit heures? -moins ou plus. -Blasquito obéira-t-il à son passager? -si la mer obéit à Blasquito. -il sera bien payé. -l’or est l’or. Le vent est le vent. -c’est juste. -l’homme avec l’or fait ce qu’il peut. Dieu avec le vent fait ce qu’il veut. -l’homme qui compte partir avec Blasquito sera ici vendredi. -bien. -à quel moment arrive Blasquito? -à la nuit. On arrive la nuit. On part la nuit. Nous avons une femme qui s’appelle la mer, et une soeur qui s’appelle la nuit. La femme trompe quelquefois; la soeur jamais.

— tout est convenu. Adieu, hommes. -bonsoir. Un coup d’eau-de-vie? -merci. -c’est meilleur que du sirop. -j’ai votre parole. -mon nom est point-d’honneur. -adieu. -vous êtes gentilhomme et je suis chevalier. Il était clair que des diables seuls pouvaient parler ainsi. Les enfants n’en écoutèrent pas davantage, et cette fois prirent la fuite pour de bon, le petit français, enfin convaincu, courant plus vite que les autres. Le mardi qui suivit ce samedi, sieur Clubin était de retour à Saint-Malo, ramenant la durande. Le tamaulipas était toujours en rade. Sieur Clubin, entre deux bouffées de pipe, demanda à l’aubergiste de l’auberge Jean: -eh bien, quand donc part-il, ce tamaulipas? -après-demain jeudi, répondit l’aubergiste. Ce soir-là, Clubin soupa à la table des gardes-côtes, et, contre son habitude, sortit après son souper. Il résulta de cette sortie qu’il ne put tenir le bureau de la Durande, et qu’il manqua à peu près son chargement. Cela fut remarqué d’un homme si exact. Il paraît qu’il causa quelques instants avec son ami le changeur. Il rentra deux heures après que Noguette eut sonné le couvre-feu. La cloche brésilienne sonne à dix heures. Il était donc minuit.

VI. La jacressarde.

Il y a quarante ans, Saint-Malo possédait une ruelle dite la ruelle coutanchez. Cette ruelle n’existe plus, ayant été comprise dans les embellissements. C’était une double rangée de maisons de bois penchées les unes vers les autres, et laissant entre elles assez de place pour un ruisseau qu’on appelait la rue. On marchait les jambes écartées des deux côtés de l’eau, en heurtant de la tête ou du coude les maisons de droite et de gauche. Ces vieilles baraques du moyen-âge normand ont des profils presque humains. De masure à sorcière il n’y a pas loin. Leurs étages rentrants, leurs surplombs, leurs auvents circonflexes et leurs broussailles de ferrailles simulent des lèvres, des mentons, des nez et des sourcils. La lucarne est l’oeil, borgne. La joue, c’est la muraille, ridée et dartreuse. Elles se touchent du front comme si elles complotaient un mauvais coup. Tous ces mots de l’ancienne civilisation, coupe-gorge, coupe-trogne, coupe-gueule, se rattachent à cette architecture. Une des maisons de la ruelle coutanchez, la plus grande, la plus fameuse ou la plus famée, se nommait la jacressarde. La jacressarde était le logis de ceux qui ne logent pas. Il y a, dans toutes les villes, et particulièrement dans les ports de mer, au-dessous de la population, un résidu. Des gens sans aveu, à ce point que souvent la justice elle-même ne parvient pas à leur en arracher un, des écumeurs d’aventures, des chasseurs d’expédients, des chimistes de l’espèce escroc, remettant toujours la vie au creuset, toutes les formes du haillon et toutes les manières de le porter, les fruits secs de l’improbité, les existences en banqueroute, les consciences qui ont déposé leur bilan, ceux qui ont avorté dans l’escalade et le bris de clôture (car les grands faiseurs d’effractions planent et restent en haut), les ouvriers et les ouvrières du mal, les drôles et les drôlesses, les scrupules déchirés et les coudes percés, les coquins aboutis à l’indigence, les méchants mal récompensés, les vaincus du duel social, les affamés qui ont été les dévorants, les gagne-petit du crime, les gueux, dans la double et lamentable acception du mot; tel est le personnel. L’intelligence humaine est là; bestiale. C’est le tas d’ordure des âmes. Cela s’amasse dans un coin, où passe de temps en temps ce coup de balai qu’on nomme une descente de police. à Saint-Malo la jacressarde était ce coin. Ce qu’on trouve dans ces repaires, ce ne sont pas les forts criminels, les bandits, les escarpes, les grands produits de l’ignorance et de l’indigence. Si le meurtre y est représenté, c’est par quelque ivrogne brutal; le vol n’y dépasse point le filou. C’est plutôt le crachat de la société que son vomissement. Le truand, oui; le brigand, non. Pourtant il ne faudrait pas s’y fier. Ce dernier étage des bohèmes peut avoir des extrémités scélérates. Une fois, en jetant le filet sur l’épi-scié qui était pour Paris ce que la jacressarde était pour saint-Malo, la police prit Lacenaire. Ces gîtes admettent tout. La chute est un nivellement. Quelquefois l’honnêteté qui se dépouille tombe là. La vertu et la probité ont, cela s’est vu, des aventures. Il ne faut, d’emblée, ni estimer les louvres ni mépriser les bagnes. Le respect public, de même que la réprobation universelle, veulent être épluchés. On y a des surprises. Un ange dans le lupanar, une perle dans le fumier, cette sombre et éblouissante trouvaille est possible. La jacressarde était plutôt une cour qu’une maison, et plutôt un puits qu’une cour. Elle n’avait point d’étage sur la rue. Un haut mur percé d’une porte basse était sa façade. On levait le loquet, on poussait la porte, on était dans une cour. Au milieu de cette cour, on apercevait un trou rond, entouré d’une marge de pierre au niveau du sol. C’était un puits. La cour était petite, le puits était grand. Un pavage défoncé encadrait la margelle. La cour, carrée, était bâtie de trois côtés. Du côté de la rue, rien; mais en face de la porte, et à droite et à gauche, il y avait du logis. Si, après la nuit tombée, on entrait là, un peu à ses risques et périls, on entendait comme un bruit d'haleines mêlées, et, s'il y avait assez de lune ou d'étoiles pour donner forme aux linéaments obscurs qu'on avait sous les yeux, voici ce qu'on voyait. La cour. Le puits. Autour de la cour, vis-à-vis la porte, un hangar figurant une sorte de fer à cheval qui serait carré, galerie vermoulue, tout ouverte, à plafond de solives, soutenue par des piliers de pierre inégalement espacés; au centre, le puits; autour du puits, sur une litière de paille, et faisant comme un chapelet circulaire, des semelles droites, des dessous de bottes éculées, des orteils passant par des trous de souliers, et force talons nus, des pieds d'homme, des pieds de femme, des pieds d'enfant. Tous ces pieds dormaient. Au delà de ces pieds, l'oeil, en s'enfonçant dans la pénombre du hangar, distinguait des corps, des formes, des têtes assoupies, des allongements inertes, des guenilles des deux sexes, une promiscuité dans du fumier, on ne sait quel sinistre gisement humain. Cette chambre à coucher était à tout le monde. On y payait deux sous par semaine. Les pieds touchaient le puits. Dans les nuits d'orage, il pleuvait sur ces pieds; dans les nuits d'hiver, il neigeait sur ces corps. Qu'était-ce que ces êtres? Les inconnus. Ils venaient là le soir et s'en allaient le matin. L'ordre social se complique de ces larves. Quelques-uns se glissaient pour une nuit et ne payaient pas. La plupart n'avaient point mangé de la journée. Tous les vices, toutes les abjections, toutes les infections, toutes les détresses; le même sommeil d'accablement sur le même lit de boue. Les rêves de toutes ces âmes faisaient bon voisinage. Rendez-vous funèbre où remuaient et s'amalgamaient dans le même miasme les lassitudes, les défaillances, les ivresses cuvées, les marches et contre-marches d'une journée sans un morceau de pain et sans une bonne pensée, les lividités à paupières closes, des remords, des convoitises, des chevelures mêlées de balayures, des visages qui ont le regard de la mort, peut-être des baisers de bouches de ténèbres. Cette putridité humaine fermentait dans cette cuve. Ils étaient jetés dans ce gîte par la fatalité, par le voyage, par le navire arrivé la veille, par une sortie de prison, par la chance, par la nuit. Chaque jour la destinée vidait là sa hotte. Entrait qui voulait, dormait qui pouvait, parlait qui osait. Car c'était un lieu de chuchotement. On se hâtait de se mêler. On tâchait de s'oublier dans le sommeil, puisqu'on ne peut se perdre dans l'ombre. On prenait de la mort ce qu'on pouvait. Ils fermaient les yeux dans cette agonie pêle-mêle recommençant tous les soirs. D'où sortaient-ils? De la société, étant la misère; de la vague, étant l’écume. N’avait point de la paille qui voulait. Plus d’une nudité traînait sur le pavé; ils se couchaient éreintés; ils se levaient ankylosés. Le puits, sans parapet et sans couvercle, toujours béant, avait trente pieds de profondeur. La pluie y tombait, les immondices y suintaient, tous les ruissellements de la cour y filtraient. Le seau pour tirer l’eau était à côté. Qui avait soif, y buvait. Qui avait ennui, s’y noyait. Du sommeil dans le fumier on glissait à ce sommeil-là. En 1819, on en retira un enfant de quatorze ans. Pour ne point courir de danger dans cette maison, il fallait être “ de la chose “ . Les laïques étaient mal vus. Ces êtres se connaissaient-ils entre eux? Non. Ils se flairaient. Une femme était la maîtresse du logis, jeune, assez jolie, coiffée d’un bonnet à rubans, débarbouillée quelquefois avec l’eau du puits, ayant une jambe de bois. Dès l’aube, la cour se vidait; les habitués s’envolaient. Il y avait dans la cour un coq et des poules, grattant le fumier tout le jour. La cour était traversée par une poutre horizontale sur poteaux, figure d’un gibet pas trop dépaysée là. Souvent, le lendemain des soirées pluvieuses, on voyait sécher sur cette poutre une robe de soie mouillée et crottée, qui était à la femme jambe de bois. Au-dessus du hangar, et, comme lui, encadrant la cour, il y avait un étage, et au-dessus de l’étage un grenier. Un escalier de bois pourri trouant le plafond du hangar menait en haut; échelle branlante gravie bruyamment par la femme chancelante. Les locataires de passage, à la semaine ou à la nuit, habitaient la cour; les locataires à demeure habitaient la maison. Des fenêtres, pas un carreau; des chambranles, pas une porte; des cheminées, pas un foyer; c’était la maison. On passait d’une chambre dans l’autre indifféremment par un trou carré long, qui avait été la porte, ou par une baie triangulaire qui était l’entre-deux des solives de la cloison. Les plâtrages tombés couvraient le plancher. On ne savait comment tenait la maison. Le vent la remuait. On montait comme on pouvait sur le glissement des marches usées de l’escalier. Tout était à claire-voie. L’hiver entrait dans la masure comme l’eau dans une éponge. L’abondance des araignées rassurait contre l’écroulement immédiat. Aucun meuble. Deux ou trois paillasses dans des coins, ventre ouvert, montrant plus de cendre que de paille. çà et là une cruche et une terrine, servant à divers usages. Une odeur douce et hideuse. Des fenêtres on avait vue sur la cour. Cette vue ressemblait à un dessus de tombereau de boueux. Les choses, sans compter les hommes, qui pourrissaient là, qui s’y rouillaient, qui y moisissaient, étaient indescriptibles. Les débris fraternisaient; il en tombait des murailles, il en tombait des créatures. Les loques ensemençaient les décombres. Outre sa population flottante, cantonnée dans la cour, la jacressarde avait trois locataires, un charbonnier, un chiffonnier et un faiseur d’or. Le charbonnier et le chiffonnier occupaient deux des paillasses du premier; le faiseur d’or, chimiste, logeait au grenier, qu’on appelait, on ne sait pourquoi, le galetas. On ignorait dans quel coin couchait la femme. Le faiseur d’or était un peu poëte. Il habitait, dans le toit, sous les tuiles, une chambre où il y avait une lucarne étroite et une grande cheminée de pierre, gouffre à faire mugir le vent. La lucarne n’ayant pas de châssis, il avait cloué dessus un morceau de feuillard provenant d’une déchirure de navire. Cette tôle laissait passer peu de jour et beaucoup de froid. Le charbonnier payait d’un sac de charbon de temps en temps, le chiffonnier payait d’un setier de grain aux poules par semaine, le faiseur d’or ne payait pas. En attendant il brûlait la maison. Il avait arraché le peu qu’il y avait de boiserie, et à chaque instant il tirait du mur ou du toit une latte pour faire chauffer sa marmite à or. Sur la cloison, au-dessus du grabat du chiffonnier, on voyait deux colonnes de chiffres à la craie, tracées par le chiffonnier semaine à semaine, une colonne de 3 et une colonne de 5, selon que le setier de grain coûtait trois liards ou cinq centimes. La marmite à or du “ chimiste “ était une vieille bombe cassée, promue par lui chaudière, où il combinait des ingrédients. La transmutation l’absorbait. Quelquefois il en parlait dans la cour aux va-nu-pieds, qui en riaient. Il disait: ces gens-là sont pleins de préjugés. il était résolu à ne pas mourir sans jeter la pierre philosophale dans les vitres de la science. Son fourneau mangeait beaucoup de bois. La rampe de l’escalier y avait disparu. Toute la maison y passait, à petit feu. L’hôtesse lui disait: vous ne me laisserez que la coque. Il la désarmait en lui faisant des vers. Telle était la jacressarde. Un enfant, qui était peut-être un nain, âgé de douze ans ou de soixante ans, goîtreux, ayant un balai à la main, était le domestique. Les habitués entraient par la porte de la cour; le public entrait par la boutique. Qu’était-ce que la boutique? Le haut mur faisant façade sur la rue était percé, à droite de l’entrée de la cour, d’une baie en équerre à la fois porte et fenêtre, avec volet et châssis, le seul volet dans toute la maison qui eût des gonds et des verrous, le seul châssis qui eût des vitres. Derrière cette devanture, ouverte sur la rue, il y avait une petite chambre, compartiment pris sur le hangar-dortoir. On lisait sur la porte de la rue cette inscription charbonnée: ici on tient la curiosité. le mot était dès lors usité. Sur trois planches s’appliquant en étagère au vitrage, on apercevait quelques pots de faïence sans anse, un parasol chinois en baudruche à figures, crevé çà et là, impossible à ouvrir et à fermer, des tessons de fer ou de grès informes, des chapeaux d’homme et de femme effondrés, trois ou quatre coquilles d’ormers, quelques paquets de vieux boutons d’os et de cuivre, une tabatière avec portrait de Marie-Antoinette, et un volume dépareillé de l’algèbre de Boisbertrand. C’était la boutique. Cet assortiment était “ la curiosité “ . La boutique communiquait, par une arrière-porte, avec la cour où était le puits. Il y avait une table et un escabeau. La femme à la jambe de bois était la dame de comptoir.

VII. Acheteurs nocturnes et vendeur ténébreux.

Clubin avait été absent de l’auberge Jean le mardi toute la soirée; il le fut encore le mercredi soir. Ce soir-là, à la brune, deux hommes s’engagèrent dans la ruelle coutanchez; ils s’arrêtèrent devant la jacressarde. L’un d’eux cogna à la vitre. La porte de la boutique s’ouvrit. Ils entrèrent. La femme à la jambe de bois leur fit le sourire réservé aux bourgeois. Il y avait une chandelle sur la table. Ces hommes étaient deux bourgeois en effet. Celui des deux qui avait cogné dit: -bonjour, la femme. Je viens pour la chose. La femme jambe de bois fit un deuxième sourire et sortit par l’arrière-porte, qui donnait sur la cour au puits. Un moment après, l’arrière-porte se rouvrit, et un homme se présenta dans l’entre-bâillement. Cet homme avait une casquette et une blouse, et la saillie d’un objet sous sa blouse. Il avait des brins de paille dans les plis de sa blouse et le regard de quelqu’un qu’on vient de réveiller. Il avança. On se regarda. L’homme en blouse avait l’air ahuri et fin. Il dit: -c’est vous l’armurier? Celui qui avait cogné répondit: -oui. C’est vous le parisien?

— dit Peaurouge. Oui. -montrez. -voici. L’homme tira de dessous sa blouse un engin fort rare en Europe à cette époque, un revolver. Ce revolver était neuf et brillant. Les deux bourgeois l’examinèrent. Celui qui semblait connaître la maison et que l’homme en blouse avait qualifié “ l’armurier “ fit jouer le mécanisme. Il passa l’objet à l’autre, qui paraissait être moins de la ville et qui se tenait le dos tourné à la lumière. L’armurier reprit: -combien? L’homme en blouse répondit: -j’arrive d’Amérique avec. Il y a des gens qui apportent des singes, des perroquets, des bêtes, comme si les français étaient des sauvages. Moi j’apporte ça. C’est une invention utile. -combien? Repartit l’armurier. -c’est un pistolet qui fait le moulinet. -combien? -paf. Un premier coup. Paf. Un deuxième coup. Paf... une grêle, quoi! ça fait de la besogne. -combien? -il y a six canons. -eh bien, combien?

-six canons, c’est six louis. -voulez-vous cinq louis? -impossible. Un louis par balle. C’est le prix. -voulons-nous faire affaire? Soyons raisonnables. -j’ai dit le prix juste. Examinez-moi ça, monsieur l’arquebusier. -j’ai examiné. -le moulinet tourne comme Monsieur Talleyrand. On pourrait mettre ce moulinet-là dans le dictionnaire des girouettes. C’est un bijou. -je l’ai vu. -quant aux canons, c’est de forge espagnole. -je l’ai remarqué. -c’est rubané. Voici comment ça se confectionne, ces rubans-là. On vide dans la forge la hotte d’un chiffonnier en vieux fer. On prend tout plein de vieille ferraille, des vieux clous de maréchal, des fers à cheval cassés... -et de vieilles lames de faulx. -j’allais le dire, monsieur l’armurier. On vous fiche à tout ce bric-à-brac une bonne chaude suante, et ça vous fait une magnifique étoffe de fer...

— oui, mais qui peut avoir des crevasses, des éventures, des travers. -pardine. Mais on remédie aux travers par des petites queues d’aronde, de même qu’on évite le risque des doublures en battant ferme. On corroie son étoffe de fer au gros marteau, on lui flanque deux autres chaudes suantes; si le fer a été surchauffé, on le rétablit par des chaudes grasses, et à petits coups. Et puis on étire l’étoffe, et puis on la roule bien sur la chemise, et avec ce fer-là, fichtre! On vous fait ces canons-là. -vous êtes donc du métier? -je suis de tous les métiers. -les canons sont couleur d’eau. -c’est une beauté, monsieur l’armurier. ça s’obtient avec du beurre d’antimoine. -nous disons donc que nous allons vous payer cela cinq louis? -je me permets de faire observer à monsieur que j’ai eu l’honneur de dire six louis. L’armurier baissa la voix. -écoutez, parisien. Profitez de l’occasion. Défaites-vous de ça. ça ne vaut rien pour vous autres, une arme comme ça. ça fait remarquer un homme. -en effet, dit le parisien, c’est un peu voyant. C’est meilleur pour un bourgeois. -voulez-vous cinq louis? -non, six. Un par trou. -eh bien, six napoléons. -je veux six louis. -vous n’êtes donc pas bonapartiste? Vous préférez un louis à un napoléon! Parisien, dit Peaurouge, sourit. -napoléon vaut mieux, dit-il, mais louis vaut plus. -six napoléons. -six louis. C’est pour moi une différence de vingt-quatre francs. -pas d’affaire en ce cas. -soit. Je garde le bibelot. -gardez-le. -du rabais! Par exemple! Il ne me sera pas dit que je me serai défait comme ça d’une chose qui est une invention. -bonsoir, alors. -c’est un progrès sur le pistolet, que les indiens chesapeakes appellent nortay-u-hah. -cinq louis payés comptant, c’est de l’or.

— nortay-u-hah, cela veut dire fusil-court . Beaucoup de personnes ignorent cela. -voulez-vous cinq louis, et un petit écu de rabiot? -bourgeois, j’ai dit six. L’homme qui tournait le dos à la chandelle et qui n’avait pas encore parlé faisait pendant ce dialogue pivoter le mécanisme. Il s’approcha de l’oreille de l’armurier et lui chuchota: -l’objet est-il bon? -excellent. -je donne les six louis. Cinq minutes après, pendant que parisien dit Peaurouge serrait dans une fente secrète sous l’aisselle de sa blouse les six louis d’or qu’il venait de recevoir, l’armurier et l’acheteur emportant dans la poche de son pantalon le revolver sortaient de la ruelle coutanchez.

VIII. Carambolage de la bille rouge et de la bille noire.

Le lendemain, qui était le jeudi, à peu de distance de Saint-Malo, près de la pointe du décollé, à un endroit où la falaise est haute et où la mer est profonde, il se passa une chose tragique. Une langue de rochers en forme de fer de lance, qui se relie à la terre par un isthme étroit, se prolonge dans l’eau et s’y achève brusquement par un grand brisant à pic; rien n’est plus fréquent dans l’architecture de la mer. Pour arriver, en venant du rivage, au plateau de la roche à pic, on suit un plan incliné dont la montée est quelquefois assez âpre. C’est sur un plateau de ce genre qu’était debout vers quatre heures du soir un homme enveloppé dans une large cape d’ordonnance et probablement armé dessous, chose facile à reconnaître à de certains plis droits et anguleux de son manteau. Le sommet où se tenait cet homme était une plate-forme assez vaste, semée de gros cubes de roche pareils à des pavés démesurés, et laissant entre eux des passages étroits. Cette plate-forme, où croissait une petite herbe épaisse et courte, se terminait du côté de la mer par un espace libre, aboutissant à un escarpement vertical. L’escarpement, élevé d’une soixantaine de pieds au-dessus de la haute mer, semblait taillé au fil à plomb. Son angle de gauche pourtant se ruinait et offrait un de ces escaliers naturels propres aux falaises de granit, dont les marches peu commodes exigent quelquefois des enjambées de géants ou des sauts de clowns. Cette dégringolade de rochers descendait perpendiculairement jusqu’à la mer et s’y enfonçait. C’était à peu près un casse-cou. Cependant, à la rigueur, on pouvait par là s’aller embarquer sous la muraille même de la falaise. La brise soufflait. L’homme serré dans sa cape, ferme sur ses jarrets, la main gauche empoignant son coude droit, clignait un oeil et appuyait sur l’autre une longue-vue. Il semblait absorbé dans une attention sérieuse. Il s’était approché du bord de l’escarpement, et il se tenait là immobile, le regard imperturbablement attaché sur l’horizon. La marée était pleine. Le flot battait au-dessous de lui le bas de la falaise. Ce que cet homme observait, c’était un navire au large qui faisait en effet un jeu singulier.

Ce navire, qui venait de quitter depuis une heure à peine le port de Saint-Malo, s’était arrêté derrière les banquetiers. C’était un trois-mâts. Il n’avait pas jeté l’ancre, peut-être parce que le fond ne lui eût permis d’abattre que sur le bord du câble, et parce que le navire eût serré son ancre sous le taille-mer; il s’était borné à mettre en panne. L’homme, qui était un garde-côte, comme le faisait voir sa cape d’uniforme, épiait toutes les manoeuvres du trois-mâts et semblait en prendre note mentalement. Le navire avait mis en panne vent dessus vent dedans; ce qu’indiquaient le petit hunier coeffé et le vent laissé dans le grand hunier; il avait bordé l’artimon et orienté le perroquet de fougue au plus près, de façon à contrarier les voiles les unes par les autres, et à avoir peu d’arrivée et moins de dérive. Il ne se souciait point de se présenter beaucoup au vent, car il n’avait brassé le petit hunier que perpendiculairement à la quille. De cette façon, tombant en travers, il ne dérivait au plus que d’une demi-lieue à l’heure. Il faisait encore grand jour, surtout en pleine mer et sur le haut de la falaise. Le bas des côtes devenait obscur. Le garde-côte, tout à sa besogne et espionnant consciencieusement le large, n’avait pas songé à scruter le rocher à côté et au-dessous de lui. Il tournait le dos à l’espèce d’escalier peu praticable qui mettait en communication le plateau de la falaise et la mer. Il ne remarquait pas que quelque chose y remuait. Il y avait dans cet escalier, derrière une anfractuosité, quelqu’un, un homme, caché là, selon toute apparence, avant l’arrivée du garde-côte. De temps en temps, dans l’ombre, une tête sortait de dessous la roche, regardait en haut, et guettait le guetteur. Cette tête, coiffée d’un large chapeau américain, était celle de l’homme, du quaker, qui, une dizaine de jours auparavant, parlait, dans les pierres du petit-bey, au capitaine Zuela. Tout à coup l’attention du garde-côte parut redoubler. Il essuya rapidement du drap de sa manche le verre de sa longue-vue et la braqua avec énergie sur le trois-mâts. Un point noir venait de s’en détacher. Ce point noir, semblable à une fourmi sur la mer, était une embarcation. L’embarcation semblait vouloir gagner la terre. Quelques marins la montaient, ramant vigoureusement. Elle obliquait peu à peu et se dirigeait vers la pointe du décollé. Le guet du garde-côte était arrivé à son plus haut degré de fixité. Il ne perdait pas un mouvement de l’embarcation. Il s’était rapproché plus près encore de l’extrême bord de la falaise.

En ce moment un homme de haute stature, le quaker, surgit derrière le garde-côte au haut de l'escalier. Le guetteur ne le voyait pas. Cet homme s'arrêta un instant, les bras pendants et les poings crispés, et, avec l'oeil d'un chasseur qui vise, il regarda le dos du garde-côte. Quatre pas seulement le séparaient du garde-côte; il mit un pied en avant, puis s'arrêta; il fit un second pas, et s'arrêta encore; il ne faisait point d'autre mouvement que de marcher, tout le reste de son corps était statue; son pied s'appuyait sur l'herbe sans bruit; il fit le troisième pas, et s'arrêta; il touchait presque le garde-côte, toujours immobile avec sa longue-vue. L'homme ramena lentement ses deux mains fermées à la hauteur de ses clavicules, puis, brusquement, ses avant-bras s'abattirent, et ses deux poings, comme lâchés par une détente, frappèrent les deux épaules du garde-côte. Le choc fut sinistre. Le garde-côte n'eut pas le temps de jeter un cri. Il tomba la tête la première du haut de la falaise dans la mer. On vit ses deux semelles le temps d'un éclair. Ce fut une pierre dans l'eau. Tout se referma. Deux ou trois grands cercles se firent dans l'eau sombre. Il ne resta que la longue-vue échappée des mains du garde-côte et tombée à terre sur l'herbe. Le quaker se pencha sur le bord de l'escarpement, regarda les cercles s'effacer dans le flot, attendit quelques minutes, puis se redressa en chantant entre ses dents: monsieur d'la police est mort en perdant la vie. Il se pencha une seconde fois. Rien ne reparut. Seulement, à l'endroit où le garde-côte s'était englouti, il s'était formé à la surface de l'eau une sorte d'épaisseur brune qui s'élargissait sur le balancement de la lame. Il était probable que le garde-côte s'était brisé le crâne sur quelque roche sous-marine. Son sang remontait et faisait cette tache dans l'écume. Le quaker, tout en considérant cette flaque rougeâtre, reprit: un quart d'heure avant sa mort, il était encore... il n'acheva pas. Il entendit derrière lui une voix très douce qui disait: -vous voilà, Rantaine. Bonjour. Vous venez de tuer un homme. Il se retourna, et vit à une quinzaine de pas en arrière de lui, à l'issue d'un des entre-deux des rochers, un petit homme qui avait un revolver à la main. Il répondit: -comme vous voyez. Bonjour, sieur Clubin. Le petit homme eut un tressaillement. -vous me reconnaissez? -vous m'avez bien reconnu, repartit Rantaine. Cependant on entendait un bruit de rames sur la mer. C'était l'embarcation observée par le garde-côte, qui approchait. Sieur Clubin dit à demi-voix, comme se parlant à lui-même: -cela a été vite fait. -qu'y a-t-il pour votre service? Demanda Rantaine. -pas grand'chose. Voilà tout à l'heure dix ans que je ne vous ai vu. Vous avez dû faire de bonnes affaires. Comment vous portez-vous? -bien, dit Rantaine. Et vous? -très bien, répondit sieur Clubin. Rantaine fit un pas vers sieur Clubin. Un petit coup sec arriva à son oreille. C’était sieur Clubin qui armait le revolver. -Rantaine, nous sommes à quinze pas. C’est une bonne distance. Restez où vous êtes. -ah çà, fit Rantaine, qu’est-ce que vous me voulez? -moi, je viens causer avec vous. Rantaine ne bougea plus. Sieur Clubin reprit: -vous venez d’assassiner un garde-côte. Rantaine souleva le bord de son chapeau et répondit: -vous m’avez déjà fait l’honneur de me le dire. -en termes moins précis. J’avais dit: un homme; je dis maintenant: un garde-côte. Ce garde-côte portait le numéro si cent dix-neuf. Il était père de famille. Il laisse une femme et cinq enfants. -ça doit être, dit Rantaine. Il y eut un imperceptible temps d’arrêt. -ce sont des hommes de choix, ces gardes-côtes, fit Clubin, presque tous d’anciens marins. -j’ai remarqué, dit Rantaine, qu’en général on laisse une femme et cinq enfants. Sieur Clubin continua: -devinez combien m’a coûté ce revolver? -c’est une jolie pièce, répondit Rantaine. -combien l’estimez-vous?

— je l’estime beaucoup. -il m’a coûté cent quarante-quatre francs. -vous avez dû acheter ça, dit Rantaine, à la boutique d’armes de la rue coutanchez. Clubin reprit: -il n’a pas crié. La chute coupe la voix. -sieur Clubin, il y aura de la brise cette nuit. -je suis seul dans le secret. -logez-vous toujours à l’auberge Jean? Demanda Rantaine. -oui, on n’y est pas mal. -je me rappelle y avoir mangé de bonne choucroute. -vous devez être excessivement fort, Rantaine. Vous avez des épaules! Je ne voudrais pas recevoir une chiquenaude de vous. Moi, quand je suis venu au monde, j’avais l’air si chétif qu’on ne savait pas si on réussirait à m’élever. -on y a réussi, c’est heureux. -j’ai gardé mes habitudes, je loge toujours à cette vieille auberge Jean. -savez-vous, sieur Clubin, pourquoi je vous ai reconnu? C’est parce que vous m’avez reconnu. J’ai dit: il n’y a pour cela que Clubin. Et il avança d’un pas. -replacez-vous où vous étiez, Rantaine. Rantaine recula et fit cet aparté: -on devient un enfant devant ces machins-là. Sieur Clubin poursuivit: -situation. Nous avons à droite, du côté de Saint-énogat, à trois cents pas d’ici, un autre garde-côte, le numéro six cent dix-huit, qui est vivant, et à gauche, du côté de Saint-Lunaire, un poste de douane. Cela fait sept hommes armés qui peuvent être ici dans cinq minutes. Le rocher sera cerné. Le col sera gardé. Impossible de s’évader. Il y a un cadavre au pied de la falaise. Rantaine jeta un oeil oblique sur le revolver. -comme vous dites, Rantaine. C’est une jolie pièce. Peut-être n’est-il chargé qu’à poudre.

Mais qu’est-ce que cela fait? Il suffit d’un coup de feu pour faire accourir la force armée. J’en ai six à tirer. Le choc alternatif des rames devenait très distinct. Le canot n’était pas loin. Le grand homme regardait le petit homme, étrangement. Sieur Clubin parlait d’une voix de plus en plus tranquille et douce. -Rantaine, les hommes du canot qui va arriver, sachant ce que vous venez de faire ici tout à l’heure, prêteraient main-forte et aideraient à vous arrêter. Vous payez dix mille francs votre passage au capitaine Zuela. Par parenthèse, vous auriez eu meilleur marché avec les contrebandiers de Plainmont; mais ils ne vous auraient mené qu’en Angleterre, et d’ailleurs vous ne pouvez risquer d’aller à Guernesey où l’on a l’honneur de vous connaître. Je reviens à la situation. Si je fais feu, on vous arrête. Vous payez à Zuela votre fugue dix mille francs. Vous lui avez donné cinq mille francs d’avance. Zuela garderait les cinq mille francs, et s’en irait. Voilà. Rantaine, vous êtes bien affublé. Ce chapeau, ce drôle d’habit et ces guêtres vous changent. Vous avez oublié les lunettes. Vous avez bien fait de laisser pousser vos favoris. Rantaine fit un sourire assez semblable à un grincement. Clubin continua: -Rantaine, vous avez une culotte américaine à gousset double. Dans l’un il y a votre montre. Gardez-la. -merci, sieur Clubin. -dans l’autre il y a une petite boîte de fer battu qui ouvre et ferme à ressort. C’est une ancienne tabatière à matelot. Tirez-la de votre gousset et jetez-la-moi. -mais c’est un vol! -vous êtes libre de crier à la garde. Et Clubin regarda fixement Rantaine. -tenez, mess Clubin..., dit Rantaine faisant un pas, et tendant sa main ouverte. mess était une flatterie. -restez où vous êtes, Rantaine. -mess Clubin, arrangeons-nous. Je vous offre moitié. Clubin exécuta un croisement de bras d’où sortait le bout de son revolver. -Rantaine, pour qui me prenez-vous? Je suis un honnête homme. Et il ajouta après un silence: -il me faut tout. Rantaine grommela entre ses dents: -celui-ci est d’un fort gabarit. Cependant l’oeil de Clubin venait de s’allumer. Sa voix devint nette et coupante comme l’acier. Il s’écria: -je vois que vous vous méprenez. C’est vous qui vous appelez vol, moi je m’appelle restitution. Rantaine, écoutez. Il y a dix ans, vous avez quitté de nuit Guernesey en prenant dans la caisse d’une association cinquante mille francs qui étaient à vous, et en oubliant d’y laisser cinquante mille francs qui étaient à un autre. Ces cinquante mille francs volés par vous à votre associé, l’excellent et digne mess Lethierry, font aujourd’hui avec les intérêts composés pendant dix ans quatrevingt-un mille six cent soixante-six francs soixante-six centimes. Hier vous êtes entré chez un changeur. Je vais vous le nommer. Rébuchet, rue saint-Vincent. Vous lui avez compté soixante-seize mille francs en billets de banque français, contre lesquels il vous a donné trois bank-notes d'Angleterre de mille livres sterling chaque, plus l'appoint. Vous avez mis ces bank-notes dans la tabatière de fer, et la tabatière de fer dans votre gousset de droite. Ces trois mille livres sterling font soixante-quinze mille francs. Au nom de mess Lethierry, je m'en contenterai. Je pars demain pour Guernesey, et j'entends les lui porter. Rantaine, le trois-mâts qui est là en panne est le tamaulipas . Vous y avez fait embarquer cette nuit vos malles mêlées aux sacs et aux valises de l'équipage. Vous voulez quitter la France. Vous avez vos raisons. Vous allez à Arequipa. L'embarcation vient vous chercher. Vous l'attendez ici. Elle arrive. On l'entend qui nage. Il dépend de moi de vous laisser partir ou de vous faire rester. Assez de paroles. Jetez-moi la tabatière de fer. Rantaine ouvrit son gousset, en tira une petite boîte et la jeta à Clubin. C'était la tabatière de fer. Elle alla rouler aux pieds de Clubin. Clubin se pencha sans baisser la tête et ramassa la tabatière de la main gauche, tenant dirigés sur Rantaine ses deux yeux et les six canons du revolver. Puis il cria: -mon ami, tournez le dos. Rantaine tourna le dos. Sieur Clubin mit le revolver sous son aisselle, et fit jouer le ressort de la tabatière. La boîte s'ouvrit. Elle contenait quatre bank-notes, trois de mille livres et une de dix livres. Il replia les trois bank-notes de mille livres, les replaça dans la tabatière de fer, referma la boîte et la mit dans sa poche. Puis il prit à terre un caillou. Il enveloppa ce caillou du billet de dix livres, et dit: -retournez-vous. Rantaine se retourna. Sieur Clubin reprit: -je vous ai dit que je me contenterais des trois mille livres. Voilà dix livres que je vous rends. Et il jeta à Rantaine le billet lesté du caillou. Rantaine, d'un coup de pied, lança la bank-note et le caillou dans la mer. -comme il vous plaira, fit Clubin. Allons, vous devez être riche. Je suis tranquille.

Le bruit de rames, qui s'était continuellement rapproché pendant ce dialogue, cessa. Cela indiquait que l'embarcation était au pied de la falaise. -votre fiacre est en bas. Vous pouvez partir, Rantaine. Rantaine se dirigea vers l'escalier et s'y enfonça. Clubin vint avec précaution au bord de l'escarpement, et, avançant la tête, le regarda descendre. Le canot s'était arrêté près de la dernière marche de rochers, à l'endroit même où était tombé le garde-côte. Tout en regardant dégringoler Rantaine, Clubin grommela: -bon numéro six cent dix-neuf! Il se croyait seul. Rantaine croyait n'être que deux. Moi seul savais que nous étions trois. Il aperçut à ses pieds sur l’herbe la longue-vue qu’avait laissé tomber le garde-côte. Il la ramassa. Le bruit de rames recommença. Rantaine venait de sauter dans l’embarcation, et le canot prenait le large. Quand Rantaine fut dans le canot, après les premiers coups d’aviron, la falaise commençant à s’éloigner derrière lui, il se dressa brusquement debout, sa face devint monstrueuse, il montra le poing en bas, et cria: -ha! Le diable lui-même est une canaille! Quelques secondes après, Clubin, au haut de la falaise et braquant la longue-vue sur l’embarcation, entendait distinctement ces paroles articulées par une voix haute dans le bruit de la mer: -sieur Clubin, vous êtes un honnête homme; mais vous trouverez bon que j’écrive à Lethierry pour lui faire part de la chose, et voici dans le canot un matelot de Guernesey qui est de l’équipage du tamaulipas , qui s’appelle Ahier Tostevin, qui reviendra à Saint-Malo au prochain voyage de Zuela et qui témoignera que je vous ai remis pour mess Lethierry la somme de trois mille livres sterling. C’était la voix de Rantaine. Clubin était l’homme des choses bien faites. Immobile comme l’avait été le garde-côte, et à cette même place, l’oeil dans la longue-vue, il ne quitta pas un instant le canot du regard. Il le vit décroître dans les lames, disparaître et reparaître, approcher le navire en panne, et l’accoster, et il put reconnaître la haute taille de Rantaine sur le pont du tamaulipas . Quand le canot fut remonté à bord et replacé dans les pistolets, le tamaulipas fit servir. La brise montait de terre, il éventa toutes ses voiles, la lunette de Clubin demeura braquée sur cette silhouette de plus en plus simplifiée, et, une demi-heure après, le tamaulipas n’était plus qu’une corne noire s’amoindrissant à l’horizon sur le ciel blême du crépuscule.

IX. Renseignement utile aux personnes qui attendent, ou craignent, des lettres d’outre-mer.

Ce soir-là encore, sieur Clubin rentra tard. Une des causes de son retard, c’est qu’avant de rentrer il était allé jusqu’à la porte Dinan où il y avait des cabarets. Il avait acheté, dans un de ces cabarets où il n’était pas connu, une bouteille d’eau-de-vie qu’il avait mise dans la large poche de sa vareuse comme s’il voulait l’y cacher; puis, la durande devant partir le lendemain matin, il avait fait un tour à bord pour s’assurer que tout était en ordre. Quand sieur Clubin rentra à l’auberge Jean, il n’y avait plus dans la salle basse que le vieux capitaine au long cours, M Gertrais-Gaboureau, qui buvait sa chope et fumait sa pipe. M Gertrais-Gaboureau salua sieur Clubin entre une bouffée et une gorgée. -good bye, capitaine Clubin. -bonsoir, capitaine Gertrais. -eh bien, voilà le tamaulipas parti. -ah! Dit Clubin, je n’y ai pas fait attention. Le capitaine Gertrais-Gaboureau cracha et dit: -filé, Zuela. -quand ça donc? -ce soir. -où va-t-il? -au diable. -sans doute; mais où? -à Arequipa. -je n'en savais rien, dit Clubin. Il ajouta: -je vais me coucher. Il alluma sa chandelle, marcha vers la porte, et revint. -êtes-vous allé à Arequipa, capitaine Gertrais? -oui. Il y a des ans. -où relâche-t-on?

— un peu partout. Mais ce tamaulipas ne relâchera point. M Gertrais-Gaboureau vida sur le bord d'une assiette la cendre de sa pipe, et continua: -vous savez, le chasse-marée cheval-de-Troie et ce beau trois-mâts, le trentemouzin , qui sont allés à Cardiff. Je n'étais pas d'avis du départ à cause du temps. Ils sont revenus dans un bel état. Le chasse-marée était chargé de térébenthine, il a fait eau, et en faisant jouer les pompes il a pompé avec l'eau tout son chargement. Quant au trois-mâts, il a surtout souffert dans les hauts; la guibre, la poulaine, les minots, le jas de l'ancre à bâbord, tout ça cassé. Le bout-dehors du grand foc cassé au ras du chouque. Les haubans de focs et les sous-barbes, va-t'en voir s'ils viennent. Le mât de misaine n'a rien; il a eu cependant une sévère secousse. Tout le fer du beaupré a manqué, et, chose incroyable, le beaupré n'est que mâché, mais il est complètement dépouillé. Le masque du navire à bâbord est à jour trois bons pieds carrés. Voilà ce que c'est que de ne pas écouter le monde. Clubin avait posé sa chandelle sur la table et s'était mis à repiquer un rang d'épingles qu'il avait dans le collet de sa vareuse. Il reprit: -ne disiez-vous pas, capitaine Gertrais, que le tamaulipas ne relâchera point? -non. Il va droit au Chili. -en ce cas il ne pourra pas donner de ses nouvelles en route. -pardon, capitaine Clubin. D'abord il peut remettre des dépêches à tous les bâtiments qu'il rencontre faisant voile pour Europe. -c'est juste. -ensuite il a la boîte aux lettres de la mer. -qu'appelez-vous la boîte aux lettres de la mer? -vous ne connaissez pas ça, capitaine Clubin? -non. -quand on passe le détroit de Magellan. -eh bien? -partout de la neige, toujours gros temps, de vilains mauvais vents, une mer de quatre sous. -après? -quand vous avez doublé le cap Monmouth. -bien. Ensuite? -ensuite vous doublez le cap Valentin. -et ensuite? -ensuite vous doublez le cap Isidore. -et puis? -vous doublez la pointe Anna.

— bon. Mais qu'est-ce que vous appelez la boîte aux lettres de la mer? -nous y sommes. Montagnes à droite, montagnes à gauche. Des pingouins partout, des pétrels-tempêtes. Un endroit terrible. Ah! Mille saints, mille singes! Quel bataclan, et comme ça tape! La bourrasque n'a pas besoin qu'on aille à son secours. C'est là qu'on surveille la lisse de hourdi! C'est là qu’on diminue la toile! C’est là qu’on vous remplace la grande voile par le foc, et le foc par le tourmentin! Coups de vent sur coups de vent. Et puis quelquefois quatre, cinq, six jours de cape sèche. Souvent d’un jeu de voiles tout neuf il vous reste de la charpie. Quelle danse! Des rafales à vous faire sauter un trois-mâts comme une puce. J’ai vu sur un brick anglais, le true blue , un petit mousse occupé à la gibboom emporté à tous les cinq cent mille millions de tonnerres de Dieu, et la gibboom avec. On va en l’air comme des papillons, quoi. J’ai vu le contre-maître de la revenue , une jolie goëlette, arraché de dessus le fore-crostree, et tué roide. J’ai eu ma lisse cassée, et mon serre-gouttière en capilotade. On sort de là avec toutes ses voiles mangées. Des frégates de cinquante font eau comme des paniers. Et la mauvaise diablesse de côte! Rien de plus bourru. Des rochers déchiquetés comme par enfantillage. On approche du port-famine. Là, c’est pire que pire. Les plus rudes lames que j’aie vues de ma vie. Des parages d’enfer. Tout à coup on aperçoit ces deux mots écrits en rouge: post-office . -que voulez-vous dire, capitaine Gertrais? -je veux dire, capitaine Clubin, que tout de suite après qu’on a doublé la pointe Anna on voit sur un caillou de cent pieds de haut un grand bâton. C’est un poteau qui a une barrique au cou. Cette barrique, c’est la boîte aux lettres. Il a fallu que les anglais écrivent dessus: post-office . De quoi se mêlent-ils? C’est la poste de l’océan; elle n’appartient pas à cet honorable gentleman, le roi d’Angleterre. Cette boîte aux lettres est commune. Elle appartient à tous les pavillons. post-office! est-ce assez chinois! ça vous fait l’effet d’une tasse de thé que le diable vous offrirait tout à coup. Voici maintenant comme se fait le service. Tout bâtiment qui passe expédie au poteau un canot avec ses dépêches. Le navire qui vient de l’Atlantique envoie ses lettres pour l’Europe, et le navire qui vient du Pacifique envoie ses lettres pour l’Amérique. L’officier commandant votre canot met dans le baril votre paquet et y prend le paquet qu’il y trouve. Vous vous chargez de ces lettres-là; le navire qui viendra après vous se chargera des vôtres. Comme on navigue en sens contraire, le continent d’où vous venez, c’est celui où je vais. Je porte vos lettres, vous portez les miennes. Le baril est bitté au poteau avec une chaîne. Et il pleut! Et il neige! Et il grêle! Une fichue mer! Les satanicles volent de tous côtés. Le tamaulipas ira par là. Le baril a un bon couvercle à charnière, mais pas de serrure ni de cadenas. Vous voyez qu’on peut écrire à ses amis. Les lettres parviennent. -c’est très drôle, murmura Clubin rêveur. Le capitaine Gertrais-Gaboureau se retourna vers sa chope. -une supposition que ce garnement de Zuela m'écrit, ce gueux flanque son barbouillage dans la barrique à Magellan et dans quatre mois j'ai le griffonnage de ce gredin. -ah çà! Capitaine Clubin, est-ce que vous partez demain? Clubin, absorbé dans une sorte de somnambulisme, n'entendit pas. Le capitaine Gertrais répéta sa question. Clubin se réveilla. -sans doute, capitaine Gertrais. C'est mon jour. Il faut que je parte demain matin. -si c'était moi, je ne partirais pas. Capitaine Clubin, la peau des chiens sent le poil mouillé. Les oiseaux de mer viennent depuis deux nuits tourner autour de la lanterne du phare. Mauvais signe. J'ai un storm-glass qui fait des siennes. Nous sommes au deuxième octant de la lune; c'est le maximum d'humidité. J'ai vu tantôt des pimprenelles qui fermaient leurs feuilles et un champ de trèfles dont les tiges étaient toutes droites. Les vers de terre sortent, les mouches piquent, les abeilles ne s'éloignent pas de leur ruche, les moineaux se consultent. On entend le son des cloches de loin. J'ai entendu ce soir l'angélus de Saint-Lunaire. Et puis le soleil s'est couché sale. Il y aura demain un fort brouillard. Je ne vous conseille pas de partir. Je crains plus le brouillard que l'ouragan. C'est un sournois, le brouillard.

LE TIMONIER IVRE ET LE CAPITAINE SOBRE

I. la perle au fond du précipice.

Quelques minutes après son court colloque avec sieur Landoys, Gilliatt était à Saint-Sampson. Gilliatt était inquiet jusqu'à l'anxiété. Qu'était-il donc arrivé? Saint-Sampson avait une rumeur de ruche effarouchée. Tout le monde était sur les portes. Les femmes s'exclamaient. Il y avait des gens qui semblaient raconter quelque chose et qui gesticulaient; on faisait groupe autour d'eux. On entendait ce mot: quel malheur! Plusieurs visages souriaient. Gilliatt n'interrogea personne. Il n'était pas dans sa nature de faire des questions. D'ailleurs il était trop ému pour parler à des indifférents. Il se défiait des récits, il aimait mieux tout savoir d'un coup; il alla droit aux bravées. Son inquiétude était telle qu'il n'eut même pas peur d'entrer dans cette maison. D'ailleurs la porte de la salle basse sur le quai était toute grande ouverte. Il y avait sur le seuil un fourmillement d'hommes et de femmes. Tout le monde entrait, il entra. En entrant, il trouva contre le chambranle de la porte sieur Landoys qui lui dit à demi-voix: -vous savez sans doute à présent l'évènement? -non. -je n'ai pas voulu vous crier ça dans la route. On a l'air d'un oiseau de malheur. -qu'est-ce? -la durande est perdue.

Il y avait foule dans la salle. Les groupes parlaient bas, comme dans la chambre d'un malade. Les assistants, qui étaient les voisins, les passants, les curieux, les premiers venus, se tenaient entassés près de la porte avec une sorte de crainte, et laissaient vide le fond de la salle où l'on voyait, à côté de Déruchette en larmes, assise, mess Lethierry, debout. Il était adossé à la cloison du fond. Son bonnet de matelot tombait sur ses sourcils. Une mèche de cheveux gris pendait sur sa joue. Il ne disait rien. Ses bras n'avaient pas de mouvement, sa bouche semblait n'avoir plus de souffle. Il avait l'air d'une chose posée contre le mur. On sentait, en le voyant, l'homme au dedans duquel la vie vient de s'écrouler. Durande n'étant plus, Lethierry n'avait plus de raison d'être. Il avait une âme en mer, cette âme venait de sombrer. Que devenir maintenant? Se lever tous les matins, se coucher tous les soirs. Ne plus attendre durande, ne plus la voir partir, ne plus la voir revenir. Qu'est-ce qu'un reste d'existence sans but? Boire, manger, et puis? Cet homme avait couronné tous ses travaux par un chef-d’oeuvre, et tous ses dévouements par un progrès. Le progrès était aboli, le chef-d’oeuvre était mort. Vivre encore quelques années vides, à quoi bon? Rien à faire désormais. à cet âge on ne recommence pas; en outre, il était ruiné. Pauvre vieux bonhomme! Déruchette, pleurante près de lui sur une chaise, tenait dans ses deux mains un des poings de mess Lethierry. Les mains étaient jointes, le poing était crispé. La nuance des deux accablements était là. Dans les mains jointes quelque chose espère encore; dans le poing crispé, rien. Mess Lethierry lui abandonnait son bras et la laissait faire. Il était passif. Il n’avait plus que la quantité de vie qu’on peut avoir après le coup de foudre. Il y a de certaines arrivées au fond de l’abîme qui vous retirent du milieu des vivants. Les gens qui vont et viennent dans votre chambre sont confus et indistincts; ils vous coudoient sans parvenir jusqu’à vous. Vous leur êtes inabordable et ils vous sont inaccessibles. Le bonheur et le désespoir ne sont pas les mêmes milieux respirables; désespéré, on assiste à la vie des autres de très loin, on ignore presque leur présence; on perd le sentiment de sa propre existence; on a beau être en chair et en os, on ne se sent plus réel; on n’est plus pour soi-même qu’un songe. Mess Lethierry avait le regard de cette situation-là. Les groupes chuchotaient. On échangeait ce qu’on savait. Voici quelles étaient les nouvelles: la durande s’était perdue la veille sur le rocher Douvres, par le brouillard, une heure environ avant le coucher du soleil. à l’exception du capitaine qui n’avait pas voulu quitter son navire, les gens s’étaient sauvés dans la chaloupe. Une bourrasque de sud-ouest, survenue après le brouillard, avait failli les faire naufrager une seconde fois, et les avait poussés au large au delà de Guernesey. Dans la nuit ils avaient eu ce bon hasard de rencontrer le cashmere , qui les avait recueillis et amenés à Saint-Pierre-Port. Tout était de la faute du timonier Tangrouille, qui était en prison. Clubin avait été magnanime. Les pilotes, qui abondaient dans les groupes, prononçaient ce mot, l’écueil Douvres, d’une façon particulière. -mauvaise auberge, disait l’un d’eux. On remarquait sur la table une boussole et une liasse de registres et de carnets; c’étaient sans doute la boussole de la durande et les papiers de bord remis par Clubin à Imbrancam et à Tangrouille au moment du départ de la chaloupe; magnifique abnégation de cet homme sauvant jusqu’à des paperasses à l’instant où il se laisse mourir; petit détail plein de grandeur; oubli sublime de soi-même. On était unanime pour admirer Clubin, et, du reste, unanime aussi pour le croire, après tout, sauvé. Le coutre shealtiel était arrivé quelques heures après le cashmere; c’était ce coutre qui apportait les derniers renseignements. Il venait de passer vingt-quatre heures dans les mêmes eaux que la durande. Il y avait patienté pendant le brouillard et louvoyé pendant la tempête. Le patron du shealtiel était présent parmi les assistants. à l’instant où Gilliatt était entré, ce patron venait de faire son récit à mess Lethierry. Ce récit était un vrai rapport. Vers le matin, la bourrasque étant finie et le vent devenant maniable, le patron du shealtiel avait entendu des beuglements en pleine mer. Ce bruit de prairies au milieu des vagues l’avait surpris; il s’était dirigé de ce côté. Il avait aperçu la durande dans les rochers Douvres. L’accalmie était suffisante pour qu’il pût approcher. Il avait hélé l’épave. Le mugissement des boeufs qui se noyaient dans la cale avait seul répondu. Le patron du shealtiel était certain qu’il n’y avait personne à bord de la durande. L’épave était parfaitement tenable; et, si violente qu’eût été la bourrasque, Clubin eût pu y passer la nuit. Il n’était pas homme à lâcher prise aisément. Il n’y était point, donc il était sauvé. Plusieurs sloops et plusieurs lougres, de Granville et de Saint-Malo, se dégageant du brouillard, avaient dû, la veille au soir, ceci était hors de doute, côtoyer d’assez près l’écueil Douvres. Un d’eux avait évidemment recueilli le capitaine Clubin. Il faut se souvenir que la chaloupe de la durande était pleine en quittant le navire échoué, qu’elle allait courir beaucoup de risques, qu’un homme de plus était une surcharge et pouvait la faire sombrer, et que c’était là surtout ce qui avait dû déterminer Clubin à rester sur l’épave; mais qu’une fois son devoir rempli, un navire sauveteur se présentant, Clubin n’avait, à coup sûr, fait nulle difficulté d’en profiter. On est un héros, mais on n’est pas un niais. Un suicide eût été d’autant plus absurde, que Clubin était irréprochable. Le coupable c’était Tangrouille, et non Clubin. Tout ceci était concluant; le patron du shealtiel avait visiblement raison, et tout le monde s’attendait à voir Clubin reparaître d’un moment à l’autre. On préméditait de le porter en triomphe. Deux certitudes ressortaient du récit du patron, Clubin sauvé et la durande perdue. Quant à la durande, il fallait en prendre son parti, la catastrophe était irrémédiable. Le patron du shealtiel avait assisté à la dernière phase du naufrage. Le rocher fort aigu où la durande était en quelque sorte clouée avait tenu bon toute la nuit, et avait résisté au choc de la tempête comme s’il voulait garder l’épave pour lui; mais au matin, à l’instant où le shealtiel , constatant qu’il n’y avait personne à sauver, allait s’éloigner de la durande, il était survenu un de ces paquets de mer qui sont comme les derniers coups de colère des tempêtes. Ce flot avait furieusement soulevé la durande, l’avait arrachée du brisant, et, avec la vitesse et la rectitude d’une flèche lancée, l’avait jetée entre les deux roches Douvres. On avait entendu un craquement “ diabolique “ , disait le patron. La durande, portée par la lame à une certaine hauteur, s’était engagée dans l’entre-deux des roches jusqu’au maître-couple. Elle était de nouveau clouée, mais plus solidement que sur le brisant sous-marin. Elle allait rester là, déplorablement suspendue, livrée à tout le vent et à toute la mer. La durande, au dire de l’équipage du shealtiel , était déjà aux trois quarts fracassée. Elle eût évidemment coulé dans la nuit si l’écueil ne l’eût retenue et soutenue. Le patron du shealtiel avec sa lunette avait étudié l’épave. Il donnait avec la précision marine le détail du désastre; la hanche de tribord était défoncée, les mâts tronqués, la voilure déralinguée, les chaînes des haubans presque toutes coupées, la claire-voie du capot-de-chambre écrasée par la chute d’une vergue, les jambettes brisées au ras du plat bord depuis le travers du grand mât jusqu’au couronnement, le dôme de la cambuse effondré, les chantiers de la chaloupe culbutés, le rouffle démonté, l’arbre du gouvernail rompu, les drosses déclouées, les pavois rasés, les bittes emportées, le traversin détruit, la lisse enlevée, l’étambot cassé. C’était toute la dévastation frénétique de la tempête. Quant à la grue de chargement scellée au mât sur l’avant, plus rien, aucune nouvelle, nettoyage complet, partie à tous les diables, avec sa guinderesse, ses moufles, sa poulie de fer et ses chaînes. La durande était disloquée; l’eau allait maintenant se mettre à la déchiqueter. Dans quelques jours, il n’en resterait rien. Pourtant la machine, chose remarquable et qui prouvait son excellence, était à peine atteinte dans ce ravage. Le patron du shealtiel croyait pouvoir affirmer que “ la manivelle “ n’avait point d’avarie grave. Les mâts du navire avaient cédé, mais la cheminée de la machine avait résisté. Les gardes de fer de la passerelle de commandement étaient seulement tordues; les tambours avaient souffert, les cages étaient froissées, mais les roues ne paraissaient pas avoir une palette de moins. La machine était intacte. C’était la conviction du patron du shealtiel . Le chauffeur Imbrancam, qui était mêlé aux groupes, partageait cette conviction. Ce nègre, plus intelligent que beaucoup de blancs, était l’admirateur de la machine. Il levait les bras en ouvrant les dix doigts de ses mains noires et disait à Lethierry muet: mon maître, la mécanique est en vie. Le salut de Clubin semblant assuré, et la coque de la durande étant sacrifiée, la machine, dans les conversations des groupes, était la question. On s'y intéressait comme à une personne. On s'émerveillait de sa bonne conduite. -voilà une solide commère, disait un matelot français. -c'est de quoi bon! S'écriait un pêcheur guernesiais. -il faut qu'elle ait eu de la malice, reprenait le patron du shealtiel , pour se tirer de là avec deux ou trois écorchures. Peu à peu cette machine fut la préoccupation unique. Elle échauffa les opinions pour et contre. Elle avait des amis et des ennemis. Plus d'un, qui avait un bon vieux coutre à voiles, et qui espérait ressaisir la clientèle de la durande, n'était pas fâché de voir l'écueil Douvres faire justice de la nouvelle invention. Le chuchotement devint brouhaha. On discuta presque avec bruit. Pourtant c'était une rumeur toujours un peu discrète, et il se faisait par intervalles de subits abaissements de voix, sous la pression du silence sépulcral de Lethierry. Du colloque engagé sur tous les points, il résultait ceci: la machine était l'essentiel. Refaire le navire était possible, refaire la machine non. Cette machine était unique. Pour en fabriquer une pareille, l'argent manquerait, l'ouvrier manquerait encore plus. On rappelait que le constructeur de la machine était mort. Elle avait coûté quarante mille francs. Personne ne risquerait désormais sur une telle éventualité un tel capital; d'autant plus que voilà qui était jugé, les navires à vapeur se perdaient comme les autres; l'accident actuel de la durande coulait à fond tout son succès passé. Pourtant il était déplorable de penser qu'à l'heure qu'il était, cette mécanique était encore entière et en bon état, et qu'avant cinq ou six jours elle serait probablement mise en pièces comme le navire. Tant qu'elle existait, il n'y avait, pour ainsi dire, pas de naufrage. La perte seule de la machine serait irrémédiable. Sauver la machine, ce serait réparer le désastre. Sauver la machine, c'était facile à dire. Mais qui s'en chargerait? Est-ce que c'était possible? Faire et exécuter c'est deux, et la preuve, c'est qu'il est aisé de faire un rêve et difficile de l'exécuter. Or si jamais un rêve avait été impraticable et insensé, c'était celui-ci: sauver la machine échouée sur les Douvres. Envoyer travailler sur ces roches un navire et un équipage serait absurde; il n'y fallait pas songer. C'était la saison des coups de mer; à la première bourrasque les chaînes des ancres seraient sciées par les crêtes sous-marines des brisants, et le navire se fracasserait à l'écueil. Ce serait envoyer un deuxième naufrage au secours du premier. Dans l'espèce de trou du plateau supérieur où s'était abrité le naufragé légendaire mort de faim, il y avait à peine place pour un homme. Il faudrait donc que, pour sauver cette machine, un homme allât aux rochers Douvres, et qu’il y allât seul, seul dans cette mer, seul dans ce désert, seul à cinq lieues de la côte, seul dans cette épouvante, seul des semaines entières, seul devant le prévu et l’imprévu, sans ravitaillement dans les angoisses du dénûment, sans secours dans les incidents de la détresse, sans autre trace humaine que celle de l’ancien naufragé expiré de misère là, sans autre compagnon que ce mort. Et comment s’y prendrait-il d’ailleurs pour sauver cette machine? Il faudrait qu’il fût non seulement matelot, mais forgeron. Et à travers quelles épreuves! L’homme qui tenterait cela serait plus qu’un héros. Ce serait un fou. Car dans de certaines entreprises disproportionnées où le surhumain semble nécessaire, la bravoure a au-dessus d’elle la démence. Et en effet, après tout, se dévouer pour de la ferraille, ne serait-ce pas extravagant? Non, personne n’irait aux rochers Douvres. On devait renoncer à la machine comme au reste. Le sauveteur qu’il fallait ne se présenterait point. Où trouver un tel homme? Ceci, dit un peu autrement, était le fond de tous les propos murmurés dans cette foule. Le patron du shealtiel , qui était un ancien pilote, résuma la pensée de tous par cette exclamation à voix haute: -non! C’est fini. L’homme qui ira là et qui rapportera la machine n’existe pas. -puisque je n’y vais pas, ajouta Imbrncam, c’est qu’on ne peut pas y aller. Le patron du shealtiel secoua sa main gauche avec cette brusquerie qui exprime la conviction de l’impossible, et reprit: -s’il existait... Déruchette tourna la tête. -je l’épouserais, dit-elle. Il y eut un silence. Un homme très pâle sortit du milieu des groupes et dit: -vous l’épouseriez, miss Déruchette? C’était Gilliatt. Cependant tous les yeux s’étaient levés. Mess Lethierry venait de se dresser tout droit. Il avait sous le sourcil une lumière étrange. Il prit du poing son bonnet de matelot et le jeta à terre, puis il regarda solennellement devant lui sans voir aucune des personnes présentes, et dit: -Déruchette l’épouserait. J’en donne ma parole d’honneur au bon Dieu.

II. beaucoup d’étonnement sur la côte ouest.

La nuit qui suivit ce jour-là devait être, à partir de dix heures du soir, une nuit de lune. Cependant, quelle que fût la bonne apparence de la nuit, du vent et de la mer, aucun pêcheur ne comptait sortir ni de la Hougue La Perre, ni du Bourdeaux, ni de Houmet Benet, ni du Platon, ni de Port Grat, ni de la baie Vason, ni de Perelle bay, ni de Pezeris, ni du Tielles, ni de la baie des Saints, ni de Petit Bô, ni d’aucun port ou portelet de Guernesey. Et cela était tout simple, le coq avait chanté à midi. Quand le coq chante à une heure extraordinaire, la pêche manque. Ce soir-là, pourtant, à la tombée de la nuit, un pêcheur qui rentrait à Omptolle eut une surprise. à la hauteur du Houmet Paradis, au delà des deux Brayes et des deux Grunes, ayant à gauche la balise des Plattes Fougères qui représente un entonnoir renversé, et à droite la balise de Saint-Sampson qui représente une figure d'homme, il crut apercevoir une troisième balise. Qu'était-ce que cette balise? Quand l'avait-on plantée sur ce point? Quel bas-fond indiquait-elle? La balise répondit tout de suite à ces interrogations; elle remuait; c'était un mât. L'étonnement du pêcheur ne décrut point. Une balise faisait question; un mât bien plus encore. Il n'y avait point de pêche possible. Quand tout le monde rentrait, quelqu'un sortait. Qui? Pourquoi? Dix minutes après, le mât, cheminant lentement, arriva à quelque distance du pêcheur d'Omptolle. Il ne put reconnaître la barque. Il entendit ramer. Il n'y avait que le bruit de deux avirons. C'était donc vraisemblablement un homme seul. Le vent était nord; cet homme évidemment nageait pour aller prendre le vent au delà de la pointe Fontenelle. Là, probablement, il mettrait à la voile. Il comptait donc doubler l'Ancresse et le mont Crevel. Qu'est-ce que cela voulait dire? Le mât passa, le pêcheur rentra. Cette même nuit, sur la côte ouest de Guernesey, des observateurs d'occasion, disséminés et isolés, firent, à des heures diverses et sur divers points, des remarques. Comme le pêcheur d'Omptolle venait d'amarrer sa barque, un charretier de varech, à un demi-mille plus loin, fouettant ses chevaux dans la route déserte des clôtures, près du cromlech, aux environs des martellos 6 et 7, vit en mer, assez loin à l'horizon, dans un endroit peu fréquenté parce qu'il faut le bien connaître, devers la Roque-Nord et la Sablonneuse, une voile qu'on hissait. Il y fit d'ailleurs peu d'attention, étant pour chariot et non pour bateau. Une demi-heure s'était peut-être écoulée depuis que le charretier avait aperçu cette voile, quand un plâtreur, revenant de son ouvrage de la ville et contournant la mare Pelée, se trouva tout à coup presque en face d'une barque très hardiment engagée parmi les roches du Quenon, de la Rousse De Mer et de la Grippe De Rousse. La nuit était noire, mais la mer était claire, effet qui se produit souvent, et l'on pouvait distinguer au large les allées et venues. Il n'y avait en mer que cette barque. Un peu plus bas, et un peu plus tard, un ramasseur de langoustes, disposant ses boutiques sur l'ensablement qui sépare le Port Soif du Port Enfer, ne comprit pas ce que faisait une barque glissant entre la Boue Corneille et la Moulrette. Il fallait être bon pilote et bien pressé d'arriver quelque part pour se risquer là. Comme huit heures sonnaient au Catel, le tavernier de Cobo Bay observa, avec quelque ébahissement, une voile au delà de la Boue Du Jardin et des Grunettes, très près de la Suzanne et des Grunes de l’ouest. Non loin de Cobo Bay, sur la pointe solitaire du Houmet de la baie Vason, deux amoureux étaient en train de se séparer et de se retenir; au moment où la fille disait au garçon: -si je m’en vas, ce n’est pas pour l’amour de ne pas être avec toi, c’est que j’ai mon fait à choser-, ils furent distraits de leur baiser d’adieu par une assez grosse barque qui passa très près d’eux et qui se dirigeait vers les Messellettes. Monsieur Le Peyre Des Norgiots, habitant le cotillon Pipet, était occupé vers neuf heures du soir à examiner un trou fait par des maraudeurs dans la haie de son courtil, la Jennerotte, et de son “ friquet planté à arbres “; tout en constatant le dommage, il ne put s’empêcher de remarquer une barque doublant témérairement le Crocq-Point à cette heure de nuit. Un lendemain de tempête, avec ce qui reste d’agitation à la mer, cet itinéraire était peu sûr. On était imprudent de le choisir, à moins de savoir par coeur les passes. à neuf heures et demie, à l’équerrier, un chalutier remportant son filet s’arrêta quelque temps pour considérer entre Colombelle et la Souffleresse quelque chose qui devait être un bateau. Ce bateau s’exposait beaucoup. Il y a là des coups de vent subits très dangereux. La roche Souffleresse est ainsi nommée parce qu’elle souffle brusquement sur les barques. à l’instant où la lune se levait, la marée étant pleine et la mer étant étale dans le petit détroit de Li-Hou, le gardien solitaire de l’île de Li-Hou fut très effrayé; il vit passer entre la lune et lui une longue forme noire. Cette forme noire, haute et étroite, ressemblait à un linceul debout qui marcherait. Elle glissait lentement au-dessus des espèces de murs que font les bancs de rochers. Le gardien de Li-Hou crut reconnaître la Dame Noire. La Dame Blanche habite le Tau De Pez D’Amont, la Dame Grise habite le Tau De Pez D’Aval, la Dame Rouge habite la Silleuse au nord du Banc-Marquis, et la Dame Noire habite le Grand-étacré, à l’ouest de Li-Houmet. La nuit, au clair de lune, ces dames sortent, et quelquefois se rencontrent. à la rigueur cette forme noire pouvait être une voile. Les longs barrages de rochers sur lesquels elle semblait marcher pouvaient en effet cacher la coque d’une barque voguant derrière eux, et laisser voir la voile seulement. Mais le gardien se demanda quelle barque oserait à cette heure se hasarder entre Li-Hou et la Pécheresse et les Angullières et Lérée-Point. Et dans quel but? Il lui parut plus probable que c’était la Dame Noire. Comme la lune venait de dépasser le clocher de Saint-Pierre Du Bois, le sergent du château rocquaine, en relevant la moitié de l’échelle pont-levis, distingua, à l’embouchure de la baie, plus loin que la Haute Canée, plus près que la Sambule, une barque à la voile qui semblait descendre du nord au sud. Il existe sur la côte sud de Guernesey, en arrière de Plainmont, au fond d’une baie toute de précipices et de murailles, coupée à pic dans le flot, un port singulier qu’un français, séjournant dans l’île depuis 1855, le même peut-être qui écrit ces lignes, a baptisé le port au quatrième étage , nom généralement adopté aujourd’hui. Ce port, qui s’appelait alors la Moie, est un plateau de roche, à demi naturel, à demi taillé, élevé d’une quarantaine de pieds au-dessus du niveau de l’eau, et communiquant avec les vagues par deux gros madriers parallèles en plan incliné. Les barques, hissées à force de bras par des chaînes et des poulies, montent de la mer et y redescendent le long de ces madriers qui sont comme deux rails. Pour les hommes il y a un escalier. Ce port était alors très fréquenté par les contrebandiers. étant peu praticable, il leur était commode. Vers onze heures, des fraudeurs, peut-être ceux-là mêmes sur lesquels avait compté Clubin, étaient avec leurs ballots au sommet de cette plate-forme de la Moie. Qui fraude guette; ils épiaient. Ils furent étonnés d’une voile qui déboucha brusquement au delà de la silhouette noire du cap Plainmont. Il faisait clair de lune. Ces contrebandiers surveillèrent cette voile, craignant que ce ne fût quelque garde-côte allant s’embusquer en observation derrière le grand hanois. Mais la voile dépassa les hanois, laissa derrière elle au nord-ouest la Boue Blondel, et s’enfonça au large dans l’estompe livide des brumes de l’horizon. -où diable peut aller cette barque? Se dirent les contrebandiers. Le même soir, un peu après le coucher du soleil, on avait entendu quelqu’un frapper à la porte de la masure du bû de la rue. C’était un jeune garçon vêtu de brun avec des bas jaunes, ce qui indiquait un petit clerc de la paroisse. Le bû de la rue était fermé, porte et volets. Une vieille pêcheuse de fruits de mer, rôdant dans la banque une lanterne à la main, avait hélé le garçon, et ces paroles s’étaient échangées devant le bû de la rue entre la pêcheuse et le petit clerc. -qu’est-ce que vous voulez, gars? -l’homme d’ici. -il n’y est point. -où est-il? -je ne sais point. -y sera-t-il demain? -je ne sais point. -est-ce qu’il est parti? -je ne sais point. -c’est que, voyez-vous, la femme, le nouveau recteur de la paroisse, le révérend Ebenezer Caudray, voudrait lui faire une visite. -je ne sais point. -le révérend m’envoie demander si l’homme du bû de la rue sera chez lui demain matin. -je ne sais point.

III. ne tentez pas la bible.

Dans les vingt-quatre heures qui suivirent, mess Lethierry ne dormit pas, ne mangea pas, ne but pas, baisa au front Déruchette, s’informa de Clubin dont on n’avait pas encore de nouvelles, signa une déclaration comme quoi il n’entendait former aucune plainte, et fit mettre Tangrouille en liberté. Il resta toute la journée du lendemain à demi appuyé à la table de l’office de la durande, ni debout, ni assis, répondant avec douceur quand on lui parlait. Du reste, la curiosité étant satisfaite, la solitude s’était faite aux bravées. Il y a beaucoup de désir d’observer dans l’empressement à s’apitoyer. La porte s’était refermée; on laissait Lethierry avec Déruchette. L’éclair qui avait passé dans les yeux de Lethierry s’était éteint; le regard lugubre du commencement de la catastrophe lui était revenu. Déruchette, inquiète, avait, sur le conseil de Grace et de Douce, mis, sans rien dire, à côté de lui sur la table une paire de bas qu’il était en train de tricoter quand la mauvaise nouvelle était arrivée. Il sourit amèrement et dit: -on me croit donc bête. Après un quart d’heure de silence, il ajouta: -c’est bon quand on est heureux ces manies-là. Déruchette avait fait disparaître la paire de bas, et avait profité de l’occasion pour faire disparaître aussi la boussole et les papiers de bord, que mess Lethierry regardait trop. Dans l’après-midi, un peu avant l’heure du thé, la porte s’ouvrit, et deux hommes entrèrent, vêtus de noir, l’un vieux, l’autre jeune. Le jeune, on l’a peut-être aperçu déjà dans le cours de ce récit. Ces hommes avaient tous deux l’air grave, mais d’une gravité différente; le vieillard avait ce qu’on pourrait nommer la gravité d’état; le jeune homme avait la gravité de nature. L’habit donne l’une, la pensée donne l’autre. C’étaient, le vêtement l’indiquait, deux hommes d’église, appartenant tous deux à la religion établie. Ce qui, dans le jeune homme, eût, au premier abord, frappé l’observateur, c’est que cette gravité, qui était profonde dans son regard, et qui résultait évidemment de son esprit, ne résultait pas de sa personne. La gravité admet la passion, et l’exalte en l’épurant, mais ce jeune homme était, avant tout, joli. étant prêtre, il avait au moins vingt-cinq ans; il en paraissait dix-huit. Il offrait cette harmonie, et aussi ce contraste, qu’en lui l’âme semblait faite pour la passion et le corps pour l’amour. Il était blond, rose, frais, très fin et très souple dans son costume sévère, avec des joues de jeune fille et des mains délicates; il avait l’allure vive et naturelle, quoique réprimée. Tout en lui était charme, élégance, et presque volupté. La beauté de son regard corrigeait cet excès de grâce. Son sourire sincère, qui montrait des dents d’enfant, était pensif et religieux. C’était la gentillesse d’un page et la dignité d’un évêque. Sous ses épais cheveux blonds, si dorés qu’ils paraissaient coquets, son crâne était élevé, candide et bien fait. Une ride légère à double inflexion entre les deux sourcils éveillait confusément l’idée de l’oiseau de la pensée planant, ailes déployées, au milieu de ce front. On sentait, en le voyant, un de ces êtres bienveillants, innocents et purs, qui progressent en sens inverse de l’humanité vulgaire, que l’illusion fait sages et que l’expérience fait enthousiastes. Sa jeunesse transparente laissait voir sa maturité intérieure. Comparé à l’ecclésiastique en cheveux gris qui l’accompagnait, au premier coup d’oeil il semblait le fils, au second coup d’oeil il semblait le père. Celui-ci n’était autre que le docteur Jaquemin Hérode. Le docteur Jaquemin Hérode appartenait à la haute église, laquelle est à peu près un papisme sans pape. L’anglicanisme était travaillé dès cette époque par les tendances qui se sont depuis affirmées et condensées dans le puséysme. Le docteur Jaquemin Hérode était de cette nuance anglicane qui est presque une variété romaine. Il était haut, correct, étroit et supérieur. Son rayon visuel intérieur sortait à peine au dehors. Il avait pour esprit la lettre. Du reste altier. Son personnage tenait de la place. Il avait moins l’air d’un révérend que d’un monsignor. Sa redingote était un peu coupée en soutane. Son vrai milieu eût été Rome. Il était prélat de chambre, né. Il semblait avoir été créé exprès pour orner un pape, et pour marcher derrière la chaise gestatoire, avec toute la cour pontificale, in abitto paonazzo . L’accident d’être né anglais, et une éducation théologique plus tournée vers l’ancien testament que vers le nouveau, lui avaient fait manquer cette grande destinée. Toutes ses splendeurs se résumaient en ceci, être recteur de Saint-Pierre-Port, doyen de l’île de Guernesey et subrogé de l’évêque de Winchester. C’était, sans nul doute, de la gloire. Cette gloire n’empêchait pas M Jaquemin Hérode d’être, à tout prendre, un assez bon homme. Comme théologien, il était bien situé dans l’estime des connaisseurs, et il faisait presque autorité à la cour des arches, cette sorbonne de l’Angleterre. Il avait la mine docte, un clignement d’yeux capable et exagéré, les narines velues, les dents visibles, la lèvre supérieure mince et la lèvre inférieure épaisse, plusieurs diplômes, une grosse prébende, des amis baronets, la confiance de l’évêque, et toujours une bible dans sa poche. Mess Lethierry était si complètement absorbé que tout ce que put produire l’entrée des deux prêtres fut un imperceptible froncement de sourcil. M Jaquemin Hérode s’avança, salua, rappela, en quelques mots sobrement hautains, sa promotion récente, et dit qu’il venait, selon l’usage, “ introduire “ près des notables, -et près de mess Lethierry en particulier, -son successeur dans la paroisse, le nouveau recteur de Saint-Sampson, le révérend Joë Ebenezer Caudray, désormais pasteur de mess Lethierry. Déruchette se leva. Le jeune prêtre, qui était le révérend Ebenezer, s’inclina. Mess Lethierry regarda M Ebenezer Caudray et grommela entre ses dents: mauvais matelot. Grace avança des chaises. Des deux révérends s’assirent près de la table. Le docteur Hérode entama un speech. Il lui était revenu qu’il était arrivé un évènement. La durande avait fait naufrage. Il venait, comme pasteur, apporter des consolations et des conseils. Ce naufrage était malheureux, mais heureux aussi. Sondons-nous; n’étions-nous pas enflés par la prospérité? Les eaux de la félicité sont dangereuses. Il ne faut pas prendre en mauvaise part les malheurs. Les voies du seigneur sont inconnues. Mess Lethierry était ruiné. Eh bien? être riche, c’est être en danger. On a de faux amis. La pauvreté les éloigne. On reste seul. solus eris. la durande rapportait, disait-on, mille livres sterling par an. C’est trop pour le sage. Fuyons les tentations, dédaignons l’or. Acceptons avec reconnaissance la ruine et l’abandon. L’isolement est plein de fruits. On y obtient les grâces du seigneur. C’est dans la solitude qu’Aia trouva les eaux chaudes, en conduisant les ânes de Sébéon son père. Ne nous révoltons pas contre les impénétrables décrets de la providence. Le saint homme Job, après sa misère, avait crû en richesse. Qui sait si la perte de la durande n’aurait pas des compensations, même temporelles? Ainsi, lui docteur Jaquemin Hérode, il avait engagé des capitaux dans une très belle opération en cours d’exécution à Sheffield; si mess Lethierry, avec les fonds qui pouvaient lui rester, voulait entrer dans cette affaire, il y referait sa fortune; c’était une grosse fourniture d’armes au czar en train de réprimer la Pologne. On y gagnerait trois cents pour cent. Le mot czar parut réveiller Lethierry. Il interrompit le docteur Hérode. -je ne veux pas du czar. Le révérend Hérode répondit: -mess Lethierry, les princes sont voulus de Dieu. Il est écrit: “ rendez à César ce qui est à César. “ le czar, c’est César. Lethierry, à demi retombé dans son rêve, murmura: -qui ça, César? Je ne connais pas. Le révérend Jaquemin Hérode reprit son exhortation. Il n’insistait pas sur Sheffield. Ne pas vouloir de César, c’est être républicain. Le révérend comprenait qu’on fût républicain. En ce cas, que mess Lethierry se tournât vers une république. Mess Lethierry pouvait rétablir sa fortune aux états-Unis mieux encore qu’en Angleterre. S’il voulait décupler ce qui lui restait, il n’avait qu’à prendre des actions dans la grande compagnie d’exploitation des plantations du Texas, laquelle employait plus de vingt mille nègres. -je ne veux pas de l’esclavage, dit Lethierry. -l’esclavage, répliqua le révérend Hérode, est d’institution sacrée. Il est écrit: “ si le maître a frappé son esclave, il ne lui sera rien fait, car c’est son argent. “ Grace et Douce, sur le seuil de la porte, recueillaient avec une sorte d’extase les paroles du révérend recteur. Le révérend continua. C’était, somme toute, nous venons de le dire, un bon homme; et, quels que pussent être ses dissentiments de caste ou de personne avec mess Lethierry, il venait très sincèrement lui apporter toute l’aide spirituelle, et même temporelle, dont lui, docteur Jaquemin Hérode, disposait. Si mess Lethierry était ruiné à ce point de ne pouvoir coopérer fructueusement à une spéculation quelconque, russe ou américaine, que n’entrait-il dans le gouvernement et dans les fonctions salariées? Ce sont de nobles places, et le révérend était prêt à y introduire mess Lethierry. L’office de député-vicomte était précisément vacant à Jersey. Mess Lethierry était aimé et estimé, et le révérend Hérode, doyen de Guernesey et subrogé de l’évêque, se faisait fort d’obtenir pour mess Lethierry l’emploi de député-vicomte de Jersey. Le député-vicomte est un officier considérable; il assiste, comme représentant de sa majesté, à la tenue des chefs-plaids, aux débats de la cohue, et aux exécutions des arrêts de justice. Lethierry fixa sa prunelle sur le docteur Hérode. -je n’aime pas la pendaison, dit-il. Le docteur Hérode, qui jusqu’alors avait prononcé tous les mots avec la même intonation, eut un accès de sévérité et une inflexion nouvelle. -mess Lethierry, la peine de mort est ordonnée divinement. Dieu a remis le glaive à l’homme. Il est écrit: “ oeil pour oeil, dent pour dent. “ le révérend Ebenezer rapprocha imperceptiblement sa chaise de la chaise du révérend Jaquemin, et lui dit, de façon à n’être entendu que de lui: -ce que dit cet homme lui est dicté. -par qui? Par quoi? Demanda du même ton le révérend Jaquemin Hérode. Ebenezer répondit très bas: -par sa conscience. Le révérend Hérode fouilla dans sa poche, en tira un gros in-dix-huit relié avec fermoirs, le posa sur la table, et dit à voix haute: -la conscience, la voici. Le livre était une bible. Puis le docteur Hérode s’adoucit. Son désir était d’être utile à mess Lethierry, qu’il considérait fort. Il avait, lui pasteur, droit et devoir de conseil; pourtant mess Lethierry était libre. Mess Lethierry, ressaisi par son absorption et par son accablement, n’écoutait plus. Déruchette, assise près de lui, et pensive de son côté, ne levait pas les yeux et mêlait à cette conversation peu animée la quantité de gêne qu’apporte une présence silencieuse. Un témoin qui ne dit rien est une espèce de poids indéfinissable. Au surplus, le docteur Hérode ne semblait pas le sentir. Lethierry ne répondant plus, le docteur Hérode se donna carrière. Le conseil vient de l'homme et l'inspiration vient de Dieu. Dans le conseil du prêtre il y a de l'inspiration. Il est bon d'accepter les conseils et dangereux de les rejeter. Sochoth fut saisi par onze diables pour avoir dédaigné les exhortations de Nathanaël. Tiburien fut frappé de la lèpre pour avoir mis hors de chez lui l'apôtre André. Barjésus, tout magicien qu'il était, devint aveugle pour avoir ri des paroles de saint Paul. Elxaï, et ses soeurs Marthe et Marthène, sont en enfer à l'heure qu'il est pour avoir méprisé les avertissements de Valencianus qui leur prouvait clair comme le jour que leur Jésus-Christ de trente-huit lieues de haut était un démon. Oolibama, qui s'appelle aussi Judith, obéissait aux conseils. Ruben et Pheniel écoutaient les avis d'en haut; leurs noms seuls suffisent pour l'indiquer; Ruben signifie fils de la vision , et Pheniel signifie la face de Dieu . Mess Lethierry frappa du poing sur la table. -parbleu! S'écria-t-il, c'est ma faute. -que voulez-vous dire? Demanda M Jaquemin Hérode. -je dis que c'est ma faute. -votre faute, quoi? -puisque je faisais revenir durande le vendredi. M Jaquemin Hérode murmura à l'oreille de M Ebenezer Caudray: -cet homme est superstitieux. Il reprit en élevant la voix, et du ton de l'enseignement: -mess Lethierry, il est puéril de croire au vendredi. Il ne faut pas ajouter foi aux fables. Le vendredi est un jour comme un autre. C'est très souvent une date heureuse. Melendez a fondé la ville de Saint-Augustin un vendredi; c'est un vendredi que Henri Vii a donné sa commission à John Cabot; les pèlerins du mayflower sont arrivés à Providence-Town un vendredi. Washington est né le vendredi 22 février 1732; Christoph Colomb a découvert l'Amérique le vendredi 12 octobre 1492. Cela dit, il se leva. Ebenezer, qu'il avait amené, se leva également. Grace et Douce, devinant que les révérends allaient prendre congé, ouvrirent la porte à deux battants. Mess Lethierry ne voyait rien et n'entendait rien. M Jaquemin Hérode dit en aparté à M Ebenezer Caudray: -il ne nous salue même pas. Ce n'est pas du chagrin, c'est de l'abrutissement. Il faut croire qu'il est fou. Cependant il prit sa petite bible sur la table et la tint entre ses deux mains allongées comme on tiendrait un oiseau qu'on craint de voir envoler. Cette attitude créa parmi les personnes présentes une certaine attente. Grace et Douce avancèrent la tête. Sa voix fit tout ce qu'elle put pour être majestueuse. -mess Lethierry, ne nous séparons pas sans lire une page du saint livre. Les situations de la vie sont éclairées par les livres; les profanes ont les sorts virgiliens, les croyants ont les avertissements bibliques. Le premier livre venu, ouvert au hasard, donne un conseil; la bible, ouverte au hasard, fait une révélation. Elle est surtout bonne pour les affligés. Ce qui se dégage immanquablement de la sainte écriture, c’est l’adoucissement à leur peine. En présence des affligés, il faut consulter le saint livre sans choisir l’endroit, et lire avec candeur le passage sur lequel on tombe. Ce que l’homme ne choisit pas, Dieu le choisit. Dieu sait ce qu’il nous faut. Son doigt invisible est sur le passage inattendu que nous lisons. Quelle que soit cette page, il en sort infailliblement de la lumière. N’en cherchons pas d’autre, et tenons-nous-en là. C’est la parole d’en haut. Notre destinée nous est dite mystérieusement dans le texte évoqué avec confiance et respect. écoutons, et obéissons. Mess Lethierry, vous êtes dans la douleur, ceci est le livre de consolation. Vous êtes dans la maladie, ceci est le livre de santé. Le révérend Jaquemin Hérode fit jouer le ressort du fermoir, glissa son ongle à l’aventure entre deux pages, posa sa main un instant sur le livre ouvert, et se recueillit, puis, abaissant les yeux avec autorité, il se mit à lire à haute voix. Ce qu’il lut, le voici: “ Isaac se promenait dans le chemin qui mène au puits appelé le puits de celui qui vit et qui voit. “ Rébecca, ayant aperçu Isaac, dit: qui est cet homme qui vient au devant de moi? “ alors Isaac la fit entrer dans sa tente, et la prit pour femme, et l’amour qu’il eut pour elle fut grand. “ Ebenezer et Déruchette se regardèrent.

LIVRE SEPTIEME

IMPRUDENCE DE FAIRE DES QUESTIONS A UN LIVRE

I. la perle au fond du précipice.

Quelques minutes après son court colloque avec sieur Landoys, Gilliatt était à Saint-Sampson. Gilliatt était inquiet jusqu'à l'anxiété. Qu'était-il donc arrivé? Saint-Sampson avait une rumeur de ruche effarouchée. Tout le monde était sur les portes. Les femmes s'exclamaient. Il y avait des gens qui semblaient raconter quelque chose et qui gesticulaient; on faisait groupe autour d'eux. On entendait ce mot: quel malheur! Plusieurs visages souriaient. Gilliatt n'interrogea personne. Il n'était pas dans sa nature de faire des questions. D'ailleurs il était trop ému pour parler à des indifférents. Il se défiait des récits, il aimait mieux tout savoir d'un coup; il alla droit aux bravées. Son inquiétude était telle qu'il n'eut même pas peur d'entrer dans cette maison. D'ailleurs la porte de la salle basse sur le quai était toute grande ouverte. Il y avait sur le seuil un fourmillement d'hommes et de femmes. Tout le monde entrait, il entra. En entrant, il trouva contre le chambranle de la porte sieur Landoys qui lui dit à demi-voix: -vous savez sans doute à présent l'évènement? -non. -je n'ai pas voulu vous crier ça dans la route. On a l'air d'un oiseau de malheur. -qu'est-ce? -la durande est perdue.
